The question which Professor Kedourie asks with such eloquence is indeed one which a typical burgher in an agrarian society would ask himself, if one morning he just heard that the local Pasha had been overthrown and replaced by an altogether new one. If, at that point, his wife dared ask of the burgher what language the new Pasha spoke in the intimacy of his home life — was it Arabic, Turkish, Persian, French or English? — the hapless burgher would give her a sharp look, and wonder how he would cope with all the new difficulties when, at the same time, his wife had gone quite mad.

The sensible implication is that Kedourie’s question is no longer coherent in a world in which accountable, participatory and representative government is possible, and in which a modern economy requires a national system of communication.

[104] Gellner, Thought and Change, p. 155.

[105] Ibid., pp. 155, 157.

[106] Ibid., p. 159. Gellner added (p. 159, n. 1) that ‘It is of course possible for nominally independent political units to exist in a kind of educationally parasitic way. But the present argument is not really undermined by the existence of Monaco or Andorra.’

[107] Ibid., p. 160.

[108] Ibid., p. 160.

[109] Ibid., p. 166.

[110] Ibid., p. 171.

[111] Ibid., p. 168.

[112] Ibid., p. 173.

[113] Ibid., p. 173.

[114] Ibid.,p. 174.

[115] Gellner could not consistently claim to reject this thesis and accept, as he appeared to do above (see p. 143), that some pre-modern cultures were a factor in making up the materials of modern nations.

[116] Gellner, Thought and Change, p. 174. Highly educated French, Swiss-Deutsch and Italian-speakers frequently speak to each other in English as a neutral second language.

[117] Ibid., p. 177.

[118] Perhaps that explains why when Gellner re-expressed the argument in Nations and Nationalism nearly two decades later there were complaints that he had ignored the writings of North American scholars — see, e.g., B. Shafer's 'Review of Ernest Gellner's Nations and Nationalism, Canadian Review of Studies in Nationalism, vol. 11, 1984. Many surveyors of writings on nationalism, and many students, appear to see little difference between Gellner's arguments and those of Karl Deutsch's Nationalism and Social Communications, Cambridge, MA, 1966. Yet there is this major difference: whereas Deutsch conveyed the notion that the idea of nationalism is transmitted by newspapers, books and radio (and now television) to previously non-nationalist peoples, Gellner insisted that it is the media, 'the pervasiveness and importance of abstract, centralised, standardised, one to many communication, which automatically engenders the core idea of nationalism, quite irrespective of what ... is being put into the specific messages transmitted ... That core message is that the style and language of the transmissions is important, that only he who can understand them, or can acquire such comprehension, is included in a moral and political community, and that he who does not and cannot, is excluded' (Nations and Nationalism, p. 127). In addition, unlike Deutsch's, Gellner's theory of nationalism does not suffer from facile optimism about the ease with which peoples can be assimilated into 'nation-building' projects — for decisive criticism of Deutsch at this point, see W. Connor, 'Nation-building or Nation-destroying?', World Politics, vol. 24, 1972.

[119] See for example, B. Barry, 'Review of Ernest Gellner's Nations and Nationalism', Ethics, vol. 95, 1984; J. Kellas, 'Review of Nations and Nationalism, InternationalAffairs, vol. 60, 1984; A. D. Smith, 'Book Review: Ernest Gellner, Nations andNationalism', Millennium, vol. 13, 1983; B. Crick, 'The Gad-fly and the Eagle', New Statesman, 16 September 1983; and J. Dunn, 'For the Good of the Country’, Times Higher Educational Supplement, 21 October 1983.

[120] Gellner, Nations and Nationalism, p. 129. One of Kedourie’s arguments was that nationalism could be cleansed from the planet by the education students used to undergo when they took his courses on the History of Political Thought (Pierre Trudeau, one of Kedourie’s students, acted on Kedourie’s premises, refusing to make significant concessions to Quebec nationalism, and thereby helped destabilise the Canadian federation).

Another implication was that Kant was the source of all evil. Gellner contested both Kedourie’s history of ideas as well as his idealist insistence on the power of (bad) ideas. He defended Kant in Nations and Nationalism (p. 133), maintaining that there is no relationship, other than a verbal one, between individual ‘self-determination’ and ‘national self-determination’: Kant was ‘a very model for that allegedly bloodless, cosmopolitan, emaciated ethic of the Enlightenment’ which romantic nationalists detested. All that nationalists and Kant have in common is that neither are, in Kedourie’s sense, respecters of tradition.

[121] Gellner, Nations and Nationalism, pp. 129–30.

[122] Ibid., p. 57. The italics are mine.

[123] Unlike Benedict Anderson who insists on the pivotal importance of ‘print capitalism’ (Imagined Communities, London, 1983), Gellner stressed the importance of print per se. Given that the large-scale production of bibles, so important in the development of European vernacular languages at the expense of Latin, was a state (or state-church) sponsored project, why should we regard capitalism, rather than the mass production of texts, as the salient cause in the origins and spread of languages?

Gellner shared Anderson’s emphasis on the impersonal nature of the nation, but unlike Anderson had no time for the metaphoric pun involved in describing nations as ‘imagined communities’: a pun that plays on (and confuses) the difference between the non-real and the not-immediately visual. Gellner’s emphasis on the anonymous, impersonal and unmediated nature of nations captures what is best in Anderson’s notion of ‘imagined’ community.

[124] This philosophy was later stated at length in his Plough, Sword and Book (London, 1988), published coterminously with the end of Gellner’s long engagement with Soviet Marxist scholarship — State and Society in Soviet Thought, Oxford, 1988.

[125] Ibid., pp. 164–71.

[126] Pre-modern examples might include Iceland, Korea, Thailand and Japan.

[127] Gellner, Nations and Nationalism, p. 95. This argument is odd. It excludes a widespread form of nationalism, a reforming nationalism ‘from above’ — imposed by a Jacobin intelligentsia on a less than modern peasantry.

[128] The square brackets are mine. Gellner strangely treats this case (ibid., p. 97) as a ‘nonnationalist one’ though it is plainly what historians would call a ‘satisfied nationalism’. This suggests that his typology was directed towards explaining nationalist conflicts rather than forms of nationalism.

[129] Ibid., p. 98.

[130] The contrast between ethnic nationalism and western liberal nationalism is Gellner’s reworking of John Plamenatz’s contrast between eastern and western (European) nationalisms — itself not dissimilar to Hans Kohn’s contrast between civic and ethnic nationalisms: see J. Plamenatz, ‘Two Types of Nationalism’, in E. Kamenka, ed., Nationalism (London, 1973) and H. Kohn, Nationalism (Princeton, 1955). Gellner argued (Nations and Nationalism, p. 101) that the key advantage of his approach is that the contrast between ‘western’ and ‘eastern’ nationalism emerged logically from the three dimensions of his typology.

[131] Gellner, Nations and Nationalism, pp. 101–9.

[132] Ibid., p. 96.

[133] Ibid., pp. 63–87.

[134] Ibid., p. 64.

[135] Ibid., p. 65. The emphasis is mine.

[136] Ibid., p. 47.

[137] Ibid., pp. 43–50.

[138] See inter alia: G. A. Cohen, Karl Marx’s Theory of History, Oxford, 1978, pp. 249–96; J. Bister, Making Sense of Marx, Cambridge, 1985, pp. 27–37; and B. O’Leary, The Asiatic Mode of Production: Oriental Despotism, Historical Materialism and Indian History, Oxford, 1989, chs. 4–5.

[139] P. Anderson, ‘Science, Politics, Enchantment’, in J. A. Hall and I. C. Jarvie, eds., Transition to Modernity: Essays on Power, Wealth and Belief, Cambridge, 1992, p. 207.

[140] Ibid., p. 140.

[141] I use the expressions ‘modern society’ and ‘modernisation’ throughout, in anticipation of the difficulties attached to Gellner’s arguments about the relationships between nationalism and industrialisation.

[142] See Jon Elster’s formalisation of functionalist argumentation, Ulysses and the Sirens, Cambridge, 1979, pp. 28–35 and Explaining Technical Change, Cambridge, 1983.

[143] Bister, Ulysses and the Sirens, p. 30.

[144] The same logic explains why nationalists were often liberal feminists, promoting the education of boys and girls, and men and women, outside the home in national educational systems.

[145] J. J. Rousseau, The Government of Poland, trans. W. Kendall, Indianapolis, 1985, ch. 12 and ch. 4.

[146] This is the principal burden of M. Mann, ‘The Emergence of Modern European Nationalism’, in Hall and Jarvie, eds., Power, Wealth and Belief.

[147] There are multiple suggestive — and ambiguous — passages in his writings on this theme. Compare two paragraphs (from his Muslim Society, Cambridge, 1981) separated by a few pages:

The elective affinity of scripturalist rigorism or fundamentalism with the social and political needs of the period of industrialisation or ‘development’ is fairly clear ... it may well be that, for the viability of a religion, its specific doctrines on faith and morals matter far less than their spirit. Whether that spirit can also remain compatible with an economically developed society, as opposed to a developing one, remains to be seen.(p. 61)

The two processes, ‘purification’ or radicalisation of religion, and nationalism, are often intimately intertwined, to a degree that it is hard to say which one is ‘merely’ the external form of the other.(p. 59)

[148] In responding to Gellner, Kedourie advanced the remarkable view (Nationalism, p. 148), which does not survive any historical scrutiny, that ‘the areas ... where industrialism first appeared and made the greatest progress, i.e., Great Britain and the United States of America, are precisely those areas where nationalism is unknown’. Only a truly deferential child of the British empire could hold such a pious view.

[149] See inter alia H. Seton-Watson, Nations and States: An Inquiry into the Origins of Nations and the Politics of Nationalism, London, 1977, pp. 15–88, which treats the British, French, Irish, Iberian, Dutch, Scandinavian, Swiss and Russian nations as ‘old and continuous’.

[150] J. Armstrong, Nations before Nationalism, Chapel Hill, 1982 and A. D. Smith, The Ethnic Origins of Nations, Oxford, 1986. Smith, however, happily concedes the discontinuity between modern nationalism and pre-modern ‘ethnicism’ — his criticism of Gellner is that this discontinuity builds on historical continuity, i.e. a modern nation is most successfully constructed when it builds on an actual ethnic communal base.

[151] Smith, ‘Book Review’, pp. 280–2.

[152] L. Greenfeld, Nationalism: Five Roads to Modernity, Cambridge, MA, 1992. Greenfeld’s position on the relationship between nationalism and modernity is more extremist, and more indefensible, than Gellner’s. For her, ‘modernity is defined by nationalism’, and she wants to reverse the normal order of causality — maintaining both that nationalism precedes and causes modernity and that it is constitutive of it (pp. 18, 21).

[153] The same point is made forcefully by his chief protagonist, Kedourie: ‘Nationalist ideology spread in areas like Greece, the Balkans and other parts of the Ottoman Empire when they were innocent of industrialisation’ (Nationalism, p. 148).

[154] The ‘vast disagreement among eminent authorities’ on the modernity of nationalism ‘has been made possible by the near absence of conclusive evidence. The fact that members of the ruling elite or intelligentsia manifest national sentiment is not sufficient to establish that national consciousness has permeated the value system of the masses. And the masses, until recent times totally or semi-illiterate, furnished few hints concerning their view of group-self’ — W. Connor, ‘When Is a Nation?’, in his Ethnonationalism: The Quest for Understanding, Princeton, 1994, p. 214.

[155] The conceptual confusions are illustrated by Greenfeld’s opening gambit: The word ‘nationalism’ is used here as an umbrella term under which are subsumed the related phenomena of national identity (or nationality) and consciousness, and collectivities based on them — nations; occasionally, it is employed to refer to the articulate ideology on which national identity and consciousness rest, though not — unless specified — to the politically activist, xenophobic variety of national patriotism, which it frequently designates. (Greenfeld, Nationalism, p. 1)

This strategy elides the admittedly much-tangled concept ofnation, national identity, national consciousness, patriotism, nationality and nationalism. No wonder that ‘nationalism’ can be found in the 1500s if the term has such empirical range — though lay usage admittedly accepts this approach.

Connor has been a stern critic of ‘terminological chaos’ in this field: see ‘A Nation Is a Nation, Is a State, Is an Ethnic Group, Is a … ‘, in his Ethnonationalism.

[156] Smith, The Ethnic Origins of Nations, p. 18. Smith recognises that nationalism has the etymological range which Greenfeld suggests, but narrows his definition — in his National Identity, London, 1991, pp. 72ff. — to ‘an ideological movement for attaining and maintaining autonomy, unity and identity on behalf of a population deemed by some of its members to constitute an actual or potential “nation” ‘.

[157] Gellner, Nations and Nationalism, pp. 74–5.

[158] Ibid., pp. 110–22.

[159] The most feasible form in which widespread secessionism will occur across Europe will be in departures from the European Union if it becomes a federation — with the late entrants with glorious imperial pasts as the most likely anti-federalists, viz., the United Kingdom, Sweden, Denmark and Austria. Given that the European Union has been deprived of its recent geopolitical rationale, and has to rely largely upon materialist incentives for cooperation, it may become subject to the predictable strains that nationalism brings to federal systems.

[160] A proper answer to the question ‘has there been a nationalist revival in the liberal advanced industrialised OECD?’ would require hard data on (a) support for nationalist movements and parties; (b) the formation and impact of new nationalist parties, and nationalist grievances; (c) evidence of relearning of old languages and cultural traditions; (d) opinion poll data on nationalist secessionist of (re-)unification sentiment; and (e) irridentist/ jingoistic political rhetoric amongst politicians, intelligentsias and mass media.

[161] See B. O’Leary and J. McGarry, The Politics of Antagonism: Understanding Northern Ireland, London, 1993, ch. 8; B. O’Leary, T. Lyne, J. Marshall and B. Rowthorn, Northern Ireland: Sharing Authority, London, 1993; and J. McGarry and B. O’Leary, Explaining Northern Ireland: Broken Images, Oxford, 1995, especially ch. 9.

[162] For example, James Mayall’s otherwise excellent Nationalism and International Society, Cambridge, 1990 (especially p. 64) suggested that legal and political opinion within the state-system, and the geopolitical interests of the two superpowers, had placed an effective moratorium on the prospects of further secessions. Perhaps Mayall’s mistake was to suggest that ‘there are no more empires to collapse’.

[163] We were all expected to become monocultured, though our monoculture would be the rationalisation of all cultures. In efficient states we would eat Italian food, listen to Mozart on Sony Walkmans, distribute welfare like the Swedes and make love like the French; in inefficient states we would eat American food, listen to Swedish pop music on Korean tape recorders, distribute welfare like the Italians and make love like the English.

[164] A. Cobban, The Nation State and National Self-Determination, Glasgow, 1969, pp. 83–4 notes that ‘The more we study the Peace Conference, the less it seems to have been under the control of the principle of selfdetermination.’

[165] Gellner recognised that the major difference between Edward Carr and himself was that the latter was interested in the impact of nationalism on the state-system, whereas he was interested in the societal transformation (from ‘Agraria’ to ‘Industria’) which generates nationalism. See Gellner’s ‘Nationalism and the International Order’, in his Encounters with Nationalism.

[166] Ibid., p. 100.

[167] In any case there are difficulties with the alleged ‘western liberal nationalisms’. These are supposed to have been the civil-territorial forms, by contrast with the ethnic-communitarian types of the Hapsburg lands. Britain, France and the USA are meant to be the exemplars of western liberal nationalism. Yet the Catholics of the British Isles, the provincials and Jews of France, and the Red Indians and black slaves of the USA do not have histories which resonate with this ‘type’. It seems best to say that civic nationalism is the name often given to the nationalism of a people who already have a state or territorial unit of government; whereas ethnic nationalism is the name often given to a people who do not have such an identity. This problem is not, however, Gellner’s alone: it starts with the first academic treatments of nationalism, in the writings of Hans Kohn and Carlton Hayes.

[168] Peter Alter usefolly distinguishes ‘risorgimento nationalism’, ‘reform nationalism’ and ‘integral nationalism’ (Nationalism, London, 1985); Wolfgang Mommsen differentiates liberal, imperialist, fascist and contemporary nationalisms (‘The Varieties of the Nation-state in Modern History: Liberal, Imperialist, Fascist and Contemporary Notions of Nation and Nationality’, in M. Mann, ed., The Rise and Decline of the Nation-State, Oxford, 1990); whilst John A. Hall distinguishes nationalisms ‘from above’, nationalisms based on ‘desire and fear blessed by opportunity’ (Latin America), risorgimento nationalism, integral nationalism, decolonising nationalism and nationalism by trade (Coercion and Consent, Oxford, 1994).

[169] Ibid., p. 55. This statement sits oddly with a later (p. 138) disclaimer: ‘It is not claimed that, even in the modern world, nationalism is the only force operating, or an irresistible one.’

[170] J. McGarry and B. O’Leary, ‘Introduction: The Macro-Political Regulation of Ethnic Conflict’, in J. McGarry and B. O’Leary, eds., The Politics of Ethnic Conflict Regulation: Case Studies of Protracted Ethnic Conflicts, London, 1993.

[171] Ibid. Federation includes all types of genuine territorial autonomy. Mixed types are also possible: e.g. a democratic condominium in a bicultural region could combine principles of arbitration, federation and consociation.

[172] See the sober case studies in W. J. Durch, ed., The Evolution of UN Peacekeeping: Case Studies and Comparative Analysis, New York, 1993.

[173] Social democratic and more conservative appraisals of the United Kingdom as a multinational state can be found respectively in R. Parry, ‘State and Nation in the United Kingdom’, in M. Messner, K. Armes and K. Martin, eds., State and Nation in Multiethnic Societies, Manchester, 1991 and R. Rose, Understanding the United Kingdom: The Territorial Dimension in Government, Harlow, 1982.

[174] Gellner, Nations andNationalism, p. 138.

[175] The ‘people’ of course were narrowly defined to exclude women and slaves in the American case, and women in the French example.

[176] See, for example, T. Vanhanen, The Process of Democratisation: A Comparative Study of 147 States, New York, 1990. Gellner would have rejected the socio-biological foundations of Vanhanen’s arguments — which, in my judgement, are inessential to Vanhanen’s case — but he would have shared Vanhanen’s view of the inescapability ofhierarchy in agro-literate polities.

[177] Gellner, Nations and Nationalism, pp. 124–5. Compare the verdict reached by Benedict Anderson (Imagined Communities, pp. 14–15): ‘unlike other isms, nationalism has never produced its own grand thinkers: no Hobbeses, Tocquevilles, Marxes or Webers’. Therefore, he reasons, nationalism should not be compared with political doctrines, but rather with kinship and religion.

It is strange not to classify Weber as a nationalist grand thinker, stranger still that Rousseau, Burke, John Stuart Mill and Friedrich List are not seen as nationalist grand thinkers, and exceedingly odd, and I say this as an atheist, to imply that religion has never produced its grand thinkers.

[178] Gellner's contempt is more provocative than the inaccurate and cliche-ridden view that nationalism is the 'starkest political shame of the twentieth century, the deepest, most intractable, and yet most unanticipated blot on the political history of the world since the year 1900' (J. Dunn, Western Political Theory in the Face of the Future, Cambridge, 1979, p. 55). The starkest political shames of the twentieth century were the genocidal regimes of Nazi Germany and Stalin's Soviet Union, both formally transnational in nature. The most unanticipated blot on our history in this century was also provided by these regimes. Nationalism by contrast helped to destroy both Nazi Germany and the Soviet Union, and to bring down the other European empires.

[179] Burke can be read, like Rousseau, as an exponent of the thesis that nations have the right to resist rulers who do not meet the obligations expected of them by organically developed nations, and List consistently advocated a system of national economy for the USA and France as well as his native Germany — on which see R. Szporluk, Communism and Nationalism: Karl Marx versus Friedrich List, New York, 1991, pp. 96–114.

[180] See inter alia D. Miller, On Nationality, Oxford, 1995, Y. Tamir, Liberal Nationalism, Princeton, 1993 and M. Lind, 'In Defence of Liberal Nationalism', Foreign Affairs, vol. 73, 1994. These authors are not, of course, identical, nor am I saying that I entirely agree with any one of them.

[181] B. Barry, 'Nationalism', in D. Miller, J. Coleman, W. Connolly and A. Ryan, eds., The Basil Blackwell Encyclopaedia of Political Thought, Oxford, 1987, pp. 352–4.

[182] For a conservative’s perplexed glance at national self-determination, see Kedourie’s Nationalism, pp. 62–91.

[183] D. P. Moynihan calls his recent diatribe against self-determination Pandaemonium: Ethnicity in International Politics, Oxford, 1993, while A. Etzioni lists ‘The Evils of Self-Determination’, Foreign Policy, vol. 89, 1992.

[184] See H. Beran’s ‘A Liberal Theory of Secession’, Political Studies, vol. 32, 1984 for a provisional attempt to grapple with these issues. Neither Buzan nor his critics think his article is the final word on the subject.

[185] O’Leary and McGarry, The Politics of Antagonism, ch. 8; O’Leary, Lyne, Marshall and Rowthorn, Northern Ireland; and McGarry and O’Leary, Explaining Northern Ireland, ch. 9.

[186] Barry, ‘Nationalism’.

[187] Brian Barry provides an astringent review of the arguments of cosmopolitan liberals who believe in the unrestrained movement of people and money in ‘The Quest for Consistency: a Sceptical View’, in B. Barry and R. Goodin, eds., Free Movement: Ethical Issues in the Transnational Migration of People and ofMoney, University Park Pennsylvania, 1992.

[188] C. C. O’Brien, ‘A Lost Chance to Save the Jews’, New York Review of Books, vol. 30, 1989. Gellner wrote an incisive criticism of O’Brien’s views on nationalism, which is now in Encounters with Nationalism.

[189] Gellner, Nationalism, pp. 11–13.

[190] Ibid., pp. 90–101.

[191] Ibid., p. 41.

[192] Nationalism is not definitive on this issue. Perhaps Gellner simply meant that the Greeks were the first Europeans to rise in nationalist form against the settlement of the Congress of Vienna, but since he appears to claim that the Congress of Vienna is stage 1 in demarcating the history of nationalism in Europe he is vulnerable to my charge of simple error about the timing and location of the first nationalist risings.

[193] Gellner, ‘Reply to Critics’, p. 7.

[194] In an exemplary illustration of the merits of comparison, Rogers Brubaker has made a strong case for arguing that for many entities the post-Soviet period is rather like the post-Versailles era (Nationalism Reframed, Cambridge, 1996, especially chs. 2 and 5).

[195] Gellner recognised (in Encounters with Nationalism, p. 29), the Republic of Ireland as the sole case leading to major frontier adjustment in time-zone 1, but states that it is ‘not clear’ whether the separation of Belgium from Holland or Norway from Sweden should count as ‘specimens of modern nationalism’. The latter anomalies are interesting: if the secessions of Belgium and Norway were not specimens of modern nationalism then what type of nationalism were they — proto-modern?

[196] Gellner, Muslim Society.

[197] Gellner, Nationalism, p. 85.

[198] Gellner, Nationalism Observed, pp. 102–8.

[199] Ibid., p. 104.

[200] Ibid., p. 106.

[201] Anyone who wants to read a delightfol assault on Oakeshottian political philosophy should read Gellner’s response (pp. 8–13) to Ken Minogue.

[202] Gellner also replied to people like the present author who embrace some liberal nationalist ideas. He argued that we should not make nationalists a present of their ontology, e.g. by endorsing the notion that nations should be free. However, a tu quoque is in order here. As Gellner acknowledged, I, like him, regard nations as a largely modern phenomenon; moreover, just as he claimed he did, I acknowledge that nations are authentically felt expressions of collective identity. So apparently the only real difference between us is this. He did want to devalue the authenticity of present national identifications by explaining their origins — refusing nationalists their ontology. But this is precisely what he accused me of being wrong to do with his arguments when I charged them with reductionism, i.e. I was accused of assuming that his explanation of nationalism somehow denied the authenticity of nationalist sentiment. It is a shame that we could not have had this debate, preferably with wine and food.

[203] Hobsbawm, Nations and Nationalism since 1780, p. 118.

* Part II: The classical criticisms

 3. Real and constructed: the nature of the nation

Miroslav Hroch

When, thirty years ago, I began to write my book about the social composition of the leaders of national movements, it was not my intention to present a ‘theory’ of the origins of nations. [204] My aim was far more modest: to determine just which social circumstances were favourable for the successful spread of national consciousness among the broad mass of the population — in other words the conditions for the success of those activities which I grouped together under the term ‘national agitation’. At the same time I hoped to clarify the place of the Czech ‘national revival’ in the European context. If I had any ambitions beyond the realm of empirical research, these lay in the field of methods rather than theory: I tried to demonstrate the utility of comparative methods at a time when their use was not yet a commonplace in European (and even less in Czech) historiography. I also aimed to investigate the possibilities of quantification as a modified form of ‘Namierism’.

In order to apply comparative methods, it was first necessary to select an approach which would exclude voluntarism and above all avoid the error of attempting to compare things that are not comparable. Therefore it was necessary to define the subject of comparison (the ‘nation’ or ‘nationality’) and to choose a set of processes involved in the formation of nations that have enough features in common so as to be brought together under a single type. My definition of the ‘nation’ at that time was thus a wholly provisional one intended to promote a better understanding of the issues. Behind all this of course stood a certain theoretical conception: the view that the great social group known as the ‘nation’ was formed in historical time, that it really exists in the present and may thus serve as an object of empirical research far more conveniently than the irrational and foggy notion of ‘nationalism’.

As the objects to be compared I chose only those which belonged to one of two basic types of processes of national formation, the one which I called the ‘formation of smaller nations’ — in traditional terminology a ‘national revival’. Here the adjective ‘smaller’ had a qualitative rather than quantitative connotation. This consisted in the fact that, at the beginning of its development towards a modern national state, the ‘smaller nation’ lacked its own ruling classes, while its language had been significantly weakened, so that it possessed only an enfeebled or interrupted literary tradition. Its leaders were just launching their efforts to gain the sympathy of the people for their idea of the nation and to win recognition from the ruling state-nation. I called this twin effort a ‘national movement’.

In order to compare national movements it was necessary to establish a periodisation which would not only permit a synchronic comparison but also one according to analogous situations. Of the three phases of the national movement I chose the second, ‘Phase B’, that of national agitation, in which the decision was taken to proceed to a mass-based national movement. The criterion of comparison, then, was the social and territorial composition or origin of the national leaders, the ‘pioneers’ of the agitation in Phase B of the national movement. This composition was not limited to a consideration of professional grouping but also included the wider context of property, relation to the state, position in the distribution of goods, and varying life-styles — in short membership of classes (landlords, yeomen, urban middle class) and social groups (various categories of officials, professionals, craftsmen, students, clergy).

The English translation of the book was prepared at the end of the 1970s, at a time when publication in western Europe, even of an old manuscript, carried the risk of repression at home. For a number of reasons publication was delayed, so that the book appeared only after the new and significant theoretical works by Anthony Smith, Benedict Anderson and Ernest Gellner, but too soon for me to be able even to refer to them in the preface or notes. [205] It therefore appeared in the context of those studies which attempted a comprehensive theory, and so it was judged in a context which its author had not anticipated when it was written twenty years earlier.[206] This explains, among other things, why the book devotes scant attention to analysis of the relationship between the ‘revival’ of the nation and the social transformations during the transition to modern society, even though the author, inspired by historical materialism, considered this relationship to be of decisive importance and practically self-evident. [207]

At the time the book was written, the problems of the formation of nations were considered to be outdated, and ‘nationalism’ itself was studied as an antiquated deviation, a historical error. [208] This represented an advantage for scholarly analysis: it was possible to work free of ideological constraint, independently, especially when the chief object of analysis was quantification of social and geographical structures. Practically no models existed, and thus it was not difficult to choose pathbreaking procedures and to open new horizons.

Since the 1960s, of course, conditions have changed: new researchers appeared on the scene, and the informational base expanded. The need to explain and clarify the process of the formation of modern nations took on the aspect of a currently relevant task for the social sciences, and the study of ‘nationalism’ was raised to a political and ethical duty. In these circumstances it was necessary to reckon with a scholarly boom in the field and with the advisability of presenting as quickly as possible the most original and effective results. The social sciences saw an overproduction of new theories; on the other hand, historians recognised that they could not limit themselves to mere empiricism. They were also obliged to take into account the findings of the social sciences, at least at the level of middle-range theories. [209]

With the growing number of studies, a certain terminological poverty became increasingly widespread — especially the monotonous and unreflected repetition of the term ‘nationalism’ in the most varied contexts and applied to the most varied phenomena. Sometimes an individual state of mind is meant, sometimes that of a certain group or even of an entire society. Sometimes the term is applied to the activities of individuals, sometimes to that of groups.[210] The result is frequent misunderstanding and an inability to provide explanation. If we regard ‘nationalism’ as the prime mover, then we merely shift the explanation from the level of empirically grasped social activity to that of a ‘state of mind’, which is not susceptible to historical investigation. This is perhaps the reason why contemporary historical research on ‘nationalism’ has yielded so few relevant (i.e. generalising) results. I do not presume to pass judgement on the results of research in the social sciences.

As long as the historian has not given up on perceiving development in causal contexts, then the notion that the nation is a mere myth or construct will be of little help, as will the authoritative a priori thesis that the conflict of nations is unrepresented in history. [211] Even if national identity is not the sole determinant of an individual's place in society, one cannot ignore the fact that from a certain point in the history of modern Europe there have existed large groupings of people who are integrated by a combination of several kinds of relationships (economic, historical, political, religious, linguistic, cultural, geographical, etc.), and by their subjective perception of a collective consciousness of belonging together. Many of these ties could be mutually substitutable, but among them, three stand out as irreplaceable: a memory of a common past, treated as a destiny of the group; a density of linguistic or religious ties enabling a higher degree of social communication within the group than beyond it; and a conception of the equality of all members of the group organised as a civil society. The fact that members of these groups term themselves as a 'nation' — a term whose equivalents in different languages have varying connotations — is no reason to doubt the existence of such groups. These, or similar groups, would still exist if they were assigned another verbal designation or some sort of code.

This does not mean that nations should be regarded as eternal categories. In this connection it is necessary to note that I have used the term 'revival' in a metaphorical sense, though it is a term which comes from a vocabulary characteristic of the primordialist vision of the nation and was a typical commonplace for the national movements of the nineteenth century. But if we wish to analyse the processes of national formation, we must take into account the fact that objective relationships and ties, which were characteristic of the coherence of a large group (the nation), took centuries to be formed. [212] The process whereby nations were built was not preordained or irreversible. It went through two distinct stages, of unequal length and intensity. The first stage had an extensive character and began during the Middle Ages. The second, which was intensive and decisive, took place during the nineteenth century and was a part of that basic social transformation referred to above.

The relation between the formation of nations and this transformation occupies a key place in our discussion. Some authors, such as Hans Kohn and his followers, limit this relation to the diffusion of the ideas of the French Revolution. Sometimes greater emphasis is placed on other intellectual currents, such as the influence of Herder or of German Romanticism. But the origin of nations cannot be satisfactorily explained without reference to the changes in the spheres of society, politics and economics. The fact that the rise of modern capitalist society comes in the same period as the rise of nations is not merely a chronological coincidence. At the same time I think it is unimportant whether we call the great social transformation a transition from feudAl-absolutist society to capitalism, a process of modernisation, or (in Gellner's usage) a process of industrialisation. [213]

Two basic types of nation-forming may be distinguished, according to the starting-point of the second, decisive stage. The first was that in the early modern state-nation, as in France, the Netherlands or Sweden. The second type, which I first called the 'smaller nation', began under conditions of a non-dominant ethnic group, i.e. a group which formed an ethnic community and whose members possessed a greater or lesser degree of ethnic identity. [214] The non-dominant ethnic group was distinguished from the state-nation by three deficiencies: it lacked 'its own' nobility or ruling classes, statehood and continuous literary tradition in its own language.

Sooner or later a group of educated members of these ethnic communities reached the conclusion that their group also belonged to the category of the 'nation', but that it was still an 'unconscious' nation which needed to be awakened, revived and made aware, but also required recognition from the other, already established nations. In time there began a purposeful activity aimed at achieving all the attributes of a fully formed nation: they started a 'national movement'. The success of this movement was by no means preordained. My research was focused on this second type of nation-forming process, the national movement. Therefore the central role was occupied neither by the ideas of the French Revolution, nor by the theories of Tocqueville nor by the politics of Bismarck.

In a historical explanation, the term 'national movement' has a significant advantage over 'nationalism' in that it refers to empirically observable activity by concrete individuals. We can analyse their goals and demands, their forms of organisation, their numbers and their social composition. At the beginning of the national movements there was activity which was above all devoted to scholarly inquiry into and propagation of an awareness of the linguistic, cultural, social, economic and historical attributes of the non-dominant ethnic group (Phase A). In the ensuing period, Phase B, a new range of activists emerged, who now sought to win over as many of their ethnic group as possible to the project of creating a modern nation, by patriotic agitation. Once the major part of the population came to set special store by their national identity, a mass movement emerged — Phase C.

This periodisation, originally worked out in order to compare analogous stages of various national movements, has met with the approval of many researchers. It gradually became clear that its usefulness extended beyond its original role as a purely working approach; it can be used for the measurement of national territory, for codification of language and for determining the basic components of national identity. The attitude of the patriots, their relation to the state and to power — and also the response they elicited from within their ethnic group — varied according to which phase the national movement had attained. The same holds true for the national programme.

The essence of national agitation, which arose with Phase B, was the effort to spread the idea of national identity in an environment which until that time recognised several distinct identities. As has been mentioned, ethnic identity was stronger wherever it was supported by institutions — ecclesiastical organisations, parliaments, armies and so forth — in which a ‘memory’ of political or cultural uniqueness survived. However, national identity cannot be reduced to a mere transformation of ethnic identity. With varying strength and social results, other identities were represented in the territory of the non-dominant ethnic groups: those defined by the state or dynasty, in a multiethnic monarchy focused upon the ruler; by the land or country, sometimes in the form of ‘land patriotism’; by the region, in the sense of enlightened patriotism; and finally by social group or religion.

In what ways did national identity differ from these older identities? In contrast with ethnic identity, national identity expressed a relationship to a large social group which (1) possessed, or should possess, a fully formed social composition, including an educated elite and an entrepreneurial class; (2) was at the same time a community of citizens enjoying equal rights; (3) acknowledged a body of ‘higher culture’ in the national language; (4) combined an awareness of a common origin with an awareness of a common destiny, to create a historical ‘personalised’ collectivity.

The relationship between national and state identity depended to a decisive degree on the level of modernisation attained during Phase B of the national movement. Wherever the idea of the state was still formed by the dynastic identity of the absolutist monarchy, the efforts towards a new, national identity could focus on a combination of the civic principle and cultural uniqueness. Wherever a constitutional system and civic society had appeared before the inauguration of Phase B, it became far more difficult to make national identity independent of state identity, as for example in Catalonia, Scotland or Slovakia.

In contrast to the premodern state identity, regional identity was compatible with national identity and in certain situations could act as a preparation for it. The difference lay in the fact that enlightened regional patriotism was based chiefly on the idea of the responsibility of the educated elite for the life of the people of the given region and on the moral obligation to be useful for these people. Its goal, then, was not the mobilisation of the mass of the people. What is now regarded as regionalism already posits the existence of a mass regional identity and depends upon it. This identity is of course based on vaguely defined borders, it usually lacks a firm awareness of ethnic community and a personalised conception of a common past.

The national movement did not operate in a social and political vacuum. Members of non-dominant ethnic groups lived in multiethnic states which had their ruling elites, administrations, and their fully developed social composition. The leaders of the national movements therefore had to adopt an attitude towards the internal conditions of the given state and participate in its internal conflicts. The basic problem was the process of social transformation and modernisation mentioned earlier. Wherever the national movement began under conditions of late absolutism, it was obliged to take up a stance towards that system, and its social and cultural demands, whatever the intentions of the movement’s leaders, were inevitably aimed against the old regime, even when their goal was only modernisation through reforms. [215]

The structure of the demands of national movements corresponded roughly to those missing elements which excluded them from the ranks of the fully-fledged nations. We may divide these demands into three groups:

(i) Cultural and linguistic demands: the development of a national culture based on the local language and its normal use in literature, education, administration and political life.

(ii) Political demands: the achievement of civil rights and political selfadministration and participation; later also autonomy and independence.

(iii) Social demands: here the specific demands varied according to the prevailing social and economic situation — emancipation of the peasantry, better conditions for the crafts, access to education, and so forth. However, all national movements endeavoured to attain a complete social structure within the ethnic group, including an educated elite, an entrepreneurial and sometimes a landowning class.

The combination of groups of demands varied, as did their timing, but it was not random, and certainly it cannot be inferred from the arbitrary decisions of the ‘nationalists’. On the contrary, we can observe a remarkable correlation between the character of the demands and the social structure. Most of the national movements pursued cultural, linguistic and social goals during Phase B, while political demands were formulated only at the beginning or during the course of Phase C. However, some national movements already formulated political demands during Phase B, sometimes demanding complete independence (the Greeks, Norwegians, Serbs, Poles), at others only aiming for autonomy (the Irish, Hungarians). If we ask what these national movements had in common, the answer is clear: they were movements of ethnic groups which possessed ‘their own’ elites including ‘their own’ nobility or bourgeoisie. A second common feature is that these ethnic groups could point to the sometime existence of ‘their own’ state and demand its renewal.[216]

As mentioned earlier, the process of nation-forming acquired an irreversible character only once the national movement had won mass support, thereby reaching Phase C. This is a fact which has escaped most contemporary theoreticians of ‘nationalism’. We know of a number of cases in which the national movement remained in Phase B for a long time, sometimes down to the present: here we may point to Wales, Brittany, Belarus or the eastern Ukraine. How can these differences be explained? Certainly not by reference to ‘nationalism’: for if we wish, we can find it everywhere.

The question of the ‘success’ of the national movement cannot be posed in the abstract, but concretely within the individual phases of the national movement. Three analytical levels need to be distinguished:

(i) Why did some of the patriots from Phase A decide to begin national agitation? In other words, why did Phase B begin?

(ii) Why did their national agitation win a mass response, and why was the national movement able to proceed to Phase C?

(iii) Why and in what circumstances did the national movement achieve its cultural, social and political goals?

The first level of the problem has so far been accorded scant attention in empirical research?[217] But we may infer the basic connections by evaluating the conditions in which the decision in favour of a new national identity was taken. This always occurred during a crisis of the old regime (whether we choose to emphasise its absolutist or its feudal character) at a time when the old relations and ties were disrupted and opened to doubt, and when the old religious legitimacy was challenged. The ruling elites — or more specifically some of their members — reacted to this crisis of the old regime with efforts at reform from above, at a systematic modernisation by decree. The immediate outcome of these reforms was of course a further disruption of the existing relations and certainties, and hence also of identity.

We may recall for example, that Phase B of the national movements in the Hapsburg monarchy began with reaction to the Josephine Reforms and to the shocks of the Napoleonic wars, which also certainly resulted in the turn towards the official Austrian state identity. The national movement in tsarist Russia reacted to the crisis of the monarchy in the 1850s and the ensuing reforms of Alexander II. The beginning of the Serbian and Greek struggles for independence followed immediately upon the political tremors within the Ottoman empire, which were preceded by Selim III's efforts to reform the backward system and which continued during the Napoleonic period.

Of course it must be admitted that in the beginning the weakening of old certainties and the old system of values was only perceived by those who possessed a certain breadth of outlook and education; they concluded that it was necessary to search for new certainties and to create a new system of values which would correspond to the modern age. For some of them the solution was to look for new certainties in a new type of identity: by identifying with a group of equal citizens bound together by a common culture, destiny, social position, language and so forth.

For this new type of group solidarity the term 'nation' offered itself, and in many cases it echoed an analogous historical community to which it was possible to subscribe. Thus the term 'nation' was able to take on a new connotation, sometimes (though not always) under the influence of the French Revolution, which imparted to it the attributes of a political programme. The comparative study of the different connotations which the term 'nation' had at the beginning of Phase B (or also during Phase A) in the varying linguistic contexts of the European national movements would be an attractive theme for future scholars.[218]

The success of national agitation during Phase B, as has been mentioned, was a basic factor in the successful outcome of the nationforming process within the non-dominant ethnic group. If national agitation is evaluated in this way, then the question arises of whether the modern nation cannot be regarded as the result of a wilful decision on the part of the 'nationalists'. Is it not possible to agree with Gellner's view that a 'rival conclusion' may be drawn from my analysis — that it was ‘nationalism’ that created nations? [219]

If this were the case, we would have to explain why it occurred to nobody at the beginning of the nineteenth century to launch a campaign to persuade, for example, the Irish that they were in fact Germans, or to win over the Hungarians to the notion that they were actually Chinese. What explains the failure to create a Slavic nation, as the Pan-Slavists attempted, or an Illyrian nation? Why did the idea of a united Czechoslovak nation fail among the Slovaks, even though in the interwar period the Czechoslovak Republic possessed all the necessary means of effective agitation to put across this view of state and national identity?

The answer is simple. The basic condition for the success of any agitation (not only national agitation) is that its argument at least roughly corresponds to reality as perceived by those to whom it is directed. National agitation therefore had to (and normally did) begin with the fact that, quite independently of the will of the ‘patriots’, certain relations and ties had developed over the centuries which united those people towards whom the agitation was directed. They formed a community united by inward ties, and they were at least vaguely aware of this. There was of course a further psychological condition that was not entirely evident: this was the ability of the targets of national agitation to conceive of the existence of ‘their’ group outside the framework of their everyday experience. [220] This conception in turn depended on the degree of education and the personal experiences of individuals. These were not circumstances which the agitators could themselves create or influence; they were results of the process of modernisation.

Along with these elementary and general conditions for successful agitation, four further factors must be mentioned, for taken together they were of decisive importance. The first was the successful course of Phase A: successful in so far as it clearly distinguished the nation-to-be from its neighbours, codified the language, provided basic information about the ‘national’ past, and so forth. The second was a basic level of vertical social mobility: some educated people must come from the nondominant ethnic group without being assimilated. The third necessary condition was an increasing level of social communication, including literacy, schooling and market relations.

While these three conditions are more or less generally accepted as necessary to the nation-forming process, the fourth factor in national integration was more controversial. I have termed this factor a ‘nationally relevant conflict of interests’, i.e. a social or professional tension or collision that could be mapped onto linguistic divisions. Although I emphasised that these nationally relevant conflicts of interests ‘definitely cannot be reduced to fundamental antagonisms’ such as those between tenants and landlords, Gellner based his criticism of my book on the assertion that I had reduced history to the history of class conflicts and had explained the formation of nations as a result of such conflicts.[221] In any case, among the examples of nationally relevant conflicts of interests I pointed chiefly to conflicts which cannot be classified in the repertory of class conflict.[222]

Especially it was the conflict between new university graduates coming from a non-dominant ethnic group and a closed elite from the ruling nation keeping a hereditary grip on leading positions in the state. Further, I pointed to the tension between craftsmen belonging to the non-dominant group and the large traders and manufacturers belonging to the dominant nation.[223] To these instances may be added the tension between the towns and the countryside, between the centre and the provinces, and so forth. [224] Ultimately the struggle for positions of power may also be considered an interesting conflict.

In any case, I always used the phrase ‘classes and groups’ (i.e. social groups) in order to distance myself from a simplistic class ‘reductionism’. On the other hand, I have searched the text in vain for the term ‘class struggle’ ascribed to me by Gellner.[225] Nor did I ever assert that the origin of the nation depended exclusively on the existence of nationally relevant conflicts of interests (they were only one of four factors), and in this connection I certainly never emphasised the class interest. Twenty-five years ago I considered ‘the most outstanding and obvious result’ of my empirical analysis to have been that ‘no class or social group had a stable place in the structure of the patriotic communities’.[226]

In interpreting the response to national agitation, I do not consider it to be of fundamental importance whether we refer to artisans or officials as ‘classes’ or ‘social groups’. What is important is to demonstrate that national agitation was more effective wherever the conflict of interests could be articulated in national terms. And conversely, wherever the issues were only those of language and culture, or where conflicts of interests were articulated not in national, but in political terms, national agitation encountered marked difficulties, and Phase B lasted much longer, as in the case of the Flemings or Welsh.

I fully agree with Gellner’s view that history ‘is rich in countless kinds of conflict’, and that it cannot be reduced to class conflicts.[227] But unlike him I believe that conflicts between classes (that is, those social groups which are distinguished by the nature of the ownership of productive forces) also have their place among these ‘countless’ conflicts. This difference of opinion is only a nuance in the interpretation of nationforming and without any fundamental importance. What is important, however, is that nationally relevant conflicts of interests can only be applied as a factor in nation-forming in the case of national movements, and not in the type of nation-forming which began in the context of the nation-state. Here — in France, England, Sweden and so forth — conflicts of interests did not acquire a national relevance: they were firmly confined to the social sphere and were sometimes articulated in the political sphere. Since Gellner failed to take account of my typological distinction between two basic processes of nation-forming, it is perhaps possible to accept his criticism of the relation between class and nation in conditions of ‘industrialism’ as far as the first ‘French’ type of nationforming is concerned, but not for the type which was the object of my analysis and which I designated as ‘national movements’.[228]

While Phase B of the national movement was chiefly a struggle for the very existence of the nation, Phase C decided the form that the emerging nation would take. This form was not defined merely by the political programme worked out by this or that national movement, which in Phase B inclined towards linguistic and cultural aims. For it was only in Phase C that most of the national communities achieved a fully formed social structure. National elites appeared: industrialists, financiers, large traders, high officials, scholars. Meanwhile, at least a part of the peasantry or yeomanry had been won over for the national community, and there were efforts to integrate the national working class. Phase C, then, was marked by three significant novelties: first, a political programme was formulated, in which nationalism (in the proper sense of the word) was established; secondly, the nation acquired a fully-formed social composition; and third, the working class — or more precisely, an organised socialist movement — appeared on the scene.

In my view, the rise of a working-class movement was not significant, as Gellner supposes, because it signalled the end of capitalism and the rise of socialism,[229] but rather because the socialists offered the only relevant alternative to a national identity and nationalism, namely, a class identity and internationalism. For the study of the factors which influenced the process of nation-forming — and especially for the study of the spread of a national identity among the popular masses — the fact that this alternative did not ultimately win out is completely irrelevant.

If class identity did not in most cases replace national identity, this has its reasons which are susceptible to analysis, though this theme exceeds the scope of the present chapter. Apart from this, the rise of the socialist workers' movement is also of significance for the study of the nationforming process itself. The Austro-Marxists (above all Otto Bauer) were the first to criticise the myth of the eternal nation, and the Marxist discussion concerning the relation between the working class and the national movements set the agenda for the ensuing discussion of the phenomenon of 'nationalism'.[230]

That which we characterise as the political programme of the national movement contained several elements which emerged gradually and in connection with broad political changes within the given multiethnic state. The demand for local self-administration emerged quite early: the struggle for influence in 'City Hall' provided the first political school for most of the national movements. Another level of political demands was participation, which of course was only practicable within a constitutional regime. The demand for participation was followed by that for autonomy, that is, the possibility to take decisions within territory which the leaders of the national movement considered 'their own'.

If we accept Balibar's view that 'the bourgeoisie was always the state bourgeoisie',[231] it is logical that the demand for automony or statehood could appear in the programme of the national movement only after the social composition of the emerging nation had been completed, i.e. that it also included the bourgeoisie (or some parts of nobility as its substitute — as in the case of Hungary). Also connected with the completion of the social composition was the internal differentiation of political programmes, which found its institutional expression in the appearance of political parties. It is symptomatic, and part of the nature of national movements, that all the political parties emphasised general national interests along with their particular party demands.

When can we consider the national movement to have been finished? On the plane of theory, the usual answer is: after it has achieved all attributes of a fully-fledged nation. But on the concrete plane, the question remains of what we consider to be the fulfilment of the individual elements of the national programme. This is especially important for the political programme. While full linguistic equality and cultural emancipation can be achieved in conditions of political autonomy, it remains debatable whether we can consider autonomy to be the 'fulfilment' of the political demands. Surely much depends on the degree of autonomy. With Dualism, Hungary practically became a national state, so that here we may speak of a completion of the national movement. On the other hand, Finnish or Galician autonomy was far from being able to create the conditions for a full national selfadministration.

Full independence in the form of a nation-state, then, was part of the political programme of only some of the European national movements (Norwegian, Polish, Irish), while in most cases the right of self-determination was limited to autonomy. If in spite of this most of the national movements in fact ended with the formation of a nation-state, this was not the fruit of a deliberate and long-term effort on the part of the national leaders; rather it was a consequence of external events. The disintegration of three multiethnic empires at the end of World War I (together with the policies of the Allied powers) opened the way to national independence. Therefore it is a mistake to project the outcome back into the past and assign credit for eventual state independence to all political programmes of the nineteenth century. [232]

In conclusion, I do not believe that my explanation of nation-forming was merely an unintended ‘alternative vision’ to Gellner’s theory. On the contrary, it seems to me that our approaches to the basic question are concurrent: our shared view is that nation-forming must be explained and understood in the context of the great social and cultural transformation that ushered in the modern age. As a historian I cannot conceive of this transformation in the abstract but rather as a shift in relations among real, actually existing people, who had their specific interests and concrete social background, while their social and economic interests cannot be trivialised as a fiction or ‘stereotype’. I also agree with Gellner that it would be a mistake to reduce the social and cultural situation to relations between the classes. However, such a reduction cannot be ascribed to me. The basic difference of opinion lies elsewhere: I cannot accept the view that nations are a mere ‘myth’, nor do I accept Gellner’s global understanding of nationalism as an allpurpose explanation including categories of which the nation is a mere derivative. [233] The relation between the nation and national consciousness (or national identity, or ‘nationalism’) is not one of unilateral derivation but one of mutual and complementary correlation, and the discussion about which of them is ‘primary’ can, at least for the present, be left to the philosophers and ideologues.

 Notes

John A. Hall encouraged me to contribute to this collection an explanation of my conception of nation-forming, in part as an answer to Gellner’s recent critique of my work. I complied only after hesitation, and I regret that my reply appears after the death of this outstanding scholar.

[204] The book appeared in German in Prague in 1968: Die Vorkiimpfer der nationalen Bewegung bei den kleinen Volkern Europas. Eine vergleichende Analyse zur gesellschaftlichen Schichtung der patriotischen Gruppen, Acta Universtatis Carolinae Philosophica et Historica, Monographia XXIV.

[205] Social Preconditions of National Revival in Europe: A Comparative Analysis of Patriotic Groups among the Smaller European Nations, Cambridge, 1985.

[206] Thus it is flattering but chronologically inaccurate for Gellner to see — as he does in Encounters with Nationalism, Oxford, 1994, ch. 14 — my book of 1968 as ‘an alternative vision’ to his own 1983 monograph.

[207] Whether we apply to this process of transformation the term ‘transition from traditional to modern society’ or ‘transition from agrarian to industrial society’ is not, I think, of any great importance.

[208] Typical in this respect is E. Kedourie, Nationalism, London, 1960.

[209] The most noteworthy result of this trend in recent years was the interdisciplinary conference held in Santiago de Compostela in 1993, the papers of which appeared in two volumes as J. G. Beramendi, R. Maiz and S. M. Nunez, eds., Nationalism in Europe: Past and Present, Santiago de Compostela, 1994.

[210] Gellner’s characterisation of my book as a study of nationalism suggests a serious misunderstanding. I never used the word ‘nationalism’ because I do not consider it an appropriate tool for scholarly analysis. Nor does the content of my book deal with an attitude that I would characterise as ‘nationalist’.

[211] Gellner, Encounters with Nationalism, p. 199.

[212] Ibid., pp. 185–6. Gellner’s presupposition that I do not recognise the ‘earlier roots’ (i.e. the pre-modern stage) of national development is again the result of misunderstanding. In a book about the social composition of nineteenthcentury patriots, which did not aim at developing a general theory, there was no reason to discuss earlier developments, except for occasional remarks at the beginning of particular case studies — on which, see Social Preconditions of National Revival, pp. 33, 44, 86, 98, etc.

[213] Gellner’s understanding of the terms ‘industrialisation’ and ‘industrial’ differs from that of most historians. In his text they do not refer to the age in which machine production was introduced in the factories but to the appearance of new forms of enterprise, social mobility and shifts in ownership patterns — in other words, roughly the sense of the category ‘transition to capitalist society’. This is also the source of his mistaken impression that I did not place the process of nation-forming in the context of this great transformation. This context was for me self-evident: the difficulty lies only in the fact that Gellner’s term ‘industrialisation’ was not applied to the transformation. In fact, one result of my analysis was that industrialisation (in the sense of the introduction of machine production, the rise of a modern proletariat, etc.), as far as it coincided with Phase B of the national movement, had no demonstrable influence on a positive response from the masses to national agitation. On this see Social Preconditions of National Revival, pp. l 69ff.

[214] I originally used the term ‘smaller nations’ for this type of development but now prefer the more precise ‘non-dominant ethnic group’, the term popularised and in a way codified by the European Science Foundation’s ‘Comparative Studies on Governments and Non-Dominant Ethnic Groups in Europe, 1850–1950’, whose results were published in a six volume series under the same title by New York University Press, Dartmouth, 1990.

[215] To Gellner’s remark that I have assigned feudalism and absolutism to one period (Encounters with Nationalism, p. 183), I can only note here that I analysed the relations between the two in a book co-authored with J. Petran, Das 17. Jahrhundert — Krise der Feudalgesellschaft, Hamburg, 1981. Decisive for my not very different approach towards the problem of the formation of nations as part of the rise of modern society was that the absolutist system had more features in common with classical feudalism than with civic society.

[216] I have analysed these and other elements of national demands in my latest study V narodnim zajmu. Pozadavky a cile evropskych narodnich hnuti v komparativniperspkktive, Prague, 1996.

[217] This is a serious weakness of my work of 1968 — which, however, Gellner overlooks. But even from this model we cannot explain why some individuals decided in favour of the new identity and embarked on national agitation.

[218] On this subject there is a suggestive book by the Finnish historian A. Kemilainen, Nationalism: Problems Concerning the Word, the Concept and Classification, Helsinki, 1964, which of course limits itself to the ‘major’ languages.

[219] In this modification I locate the rational nucleus of Gellner’s suggestion (Encounters with Nationalism, pp. l 95ff.) that ‘rival conclusions’ may be drawn from the empirical data that I collected.

[220] Benedict Anderson’s metaphor of ‘imagined community’ must also be interpreted in this sense. In accord with this is the concept of operationalisation formulated earlier by Gail Stokes in ‘Cognition and the Function of Nationalism’, Journal of Interdisciplinary History, vol. 4, 1976, pp. 530ff.

[221] Social Preconditions of National Revival, p. 188; Encounters with Nationalism, pp. 196ff.

[222] In any case, Gellner’s critique contains no concrete examples of the class conflicts that he has in mind when labelling their role as a ‘myth’.

[223] Social Preconditions of National Revival, pp. 188ff.

[224] M. Hechter, Internal Colonialism: The Celtic Fringe in British National Development, 1536–1966, London, 1975.

[225] I never wrote the sentence ‘Class struggle on its own led to no revolution ... was similarly ineffective’ which Gellner cites (Encounters with Nationalism, p. 197). The quotation from my book (p. 185) actually begins ‘Conflicts of interest ...’ Nor can the sentence ‘It is the presence ...’ (cited by Gellner on the same page) be found in my book.

[226] Social Preconditions of National Revival, p. 129.

[227] Encounters with Nationalism, p. 199.

[228] Ibid., pp. 198ff. In this connection should be considered Gellner’s claim that I ‘map’ class and cultural differences as if they were ‘really independent’. I am not sure what the term ‘independent’ signifies in anthropology, but from a historical perspective the two phenomena cannot be regarded as ‘independent’, since in that case we would be unable to explain the dynamic of their change. On the contrary, the concept of ‘nationally relevant conflicts of interests’ is based on their functional interdependence — or, in Gellner’s phrase, on the assumption that ‘class and cultural differences overlap’.

[229] If, as Gellner correctly asserts (Encounters with Nationalism, pp. 194ff.), I never mentioned the ‘victory of socialism’ or a ‘socialist nation’ (though both phrases would have been welcomed by the regime at the time), this surely had its reasons.

[230] O. Bauer, Nationalitiitenfrage und die Sozialdemokratie, Vienna, 1907; E. Nimni, Marxism and Nationalism: Theoretical Origins of a Political Crisis, London, 1991, pp. 50ff.

[231] E. Balibar and I. Wallerstein, Race, Nation, Class: Ambiguous Identities, London, 1991, p. 91.

[232] The opinion that Gellner attributes to me (that national movements had to ‘create their high culture before they could even strive for a state ... ‘) seems somewhat teleological. In any case, I mentioned several examples of national movements beginning to strive for a state prior to their formation of a high culture (Norwegians, Greeks, etc.).

[233] I believe that this brief contribution convincingly shows that Gellner’s critical objections to my book are based partly on misunderstanding and partly on an inadequate interpretation of my terms and concepts. I consider some of them as a demonstration of his efforts to distance his explanation from Marxism, to which in his historical materialism he was methodologically (though not politically) closer than most of the authors who have dealt with the problem of ‘nationalism’. In any case, on the level of methods and working procedures, the distinctions between Marxism, ‘semi-Marxism’ and historical materialism are matters more of definition than principle.

 4. The curse of rurality: limits of modernisation theory

Tom Nairn

Northern Ireland, the Basque Country, Corsica, Bosnia-Herzegovina, Ngorno-Karabakh: this list of familiar trouble spots is neither complete nor extended beyond Europe, in which case it would be at least eight times longer. Originally coined for Ireland, ‘troubles’ in this sense have multiplied and become global, notably since 1989. No serious newspaper and few bulletins are without their quota of violent trouble items, which often enough make up most of the news.

Under such a barrage it is easy to feel ‘trouble’ as a climate of the age, and link it to one indiscriminate ‘-ism’ or another. Yet even from the restricted sample quoted something else may spring to the eye, not so easily classified. Most such ethnonationalist conflicts seem to go on recurring in predominantly rural situations. Nor are these ‘rural’ merely in the sense of being agricultural or non-urban — like East Anglia, say, or the Beauce plain in central France. No, they are areas where ‘rural’ tends to mean ‘peasant’ — that is, where an historical pattern of small landholding prevails, or has until recently prevailed, marked by intense heritable rights, rigid morality or faith, customary exclusivity and an accompanying small-town or village culture.

It is certainly also true that the troubles are not literally confined to the countryside. Thus, Sarajevo was a key site for a good deal of what was none the less more accurately described as the Bosnian ‘village war’. ETA is notoriously active and supported in the industrial suburbs of Bilbao and San Sebastian, as well as in the Basque mountain heartland. Belfast has undeniably been the focus of much of the Ulster conflict, and witnessed the forced segregation of the contending communities among different streets or quarters, as well as into separate farm towns or hamlets.

However, in none of these examples did the conflict itself originate in the cities. In Ireland, for instance, it notoriously derives on both sides from a centuries-old struggle over land rights — as Colm Toibin wrote in his thoughtful travel book about the Northern Ireland frontier, Walking along the Border, it came out of the ‘good and bad blood’ generated by violent expropriation, and involved both literal and land hunger.[234] Whatever else it may have become, today’s Sinn Fein is also the inheritor of Republicanism’s old social ideal: the rural and pious peasant family utopia which inspired the Irish constitution, and regulated most of its strategic development from 1922 until Ireland’s entry to the European Community in 1975. The resultant generational warfare may penetrate or even take over cities, the urban sites to which extended families of land-dwellers have moved or (sometimes) been expelled. But the violent side of the conflicts appears invariably to have its origin in the peasant or small town world they have left behind.

Also, such violence may for a time — maybe quite a long time — be aggravated by the transition itself. ‘Urbanisation’ is the smoothsounding, impersonal term for what was often an agonising process: the fearful undertow of modernity. During it rural emigrants look backward as much as forward, and pass from the remembrance to the often elaborate reinvention of the worlds they have lost. They are helped to do so by other strata without direct connection to the land. Some urban classes have a parallel if different motivation — above all, the intellectuals. They are seeking to ‘mobilise’ lost-world psychology in order to build a new world, that of the modern nation-state. Eventually this may owe very little to the old rural existence and its folk memories; yet while the original nation-building alliance holds good the debt feels important, and will go on finding expression in myths of rootedness. Hence many traits of the abandoned world may continue to ‘haunt’ an existence in other ways apparently broken in to city existence and civic conditions.

It seems to me there is another term for such haunting: ethnic nationalism. Ethnic nationalism is in essence a peasantry transmuted (at least in ideal terms) into a nation. It is the breath and reverberation of modernity’s undertow, the deepest voice of ‘transition’. Granted, the formation of modern national identities has notoriously involved a multiplicity of other factors, all attended to by different brands of social scientist: states, frontiers, literacy, industrialisation, school systems, symbols and complex cultural artefacts. But it can be read along this other axis too. Underneath all the accumulating paraphernalia of the modern lies a prolonged and massive social Calvary out of peasant subsistence and towards eventual urban interdependence. On that level of the Gemeinschaft-Gesellschaft journey terrible accidents have been common. Peasantries may be ‘re-imagined’ essentially as a form of leverage, a way of helping to erect the modern nation, and in the end such imagining of communities may turn into Green Politics and ecology. However, it is not impossible for the instrumental lever to assume a life of its own and (at least for a time) to take over and dominate the processes by which nations are built.

The late Edward Thompson liked to insist that the working class was present at its own birth: the new workers were not only modelled by impersonal forces, he explained in The Making of the English Working Class,[235] but helped to make even their early history. But most ‘workers’ originated as ex-peasants. In many parts of the world they for long tried to combine aspects of both fates, and still do so today — most strikingly in the East Asian societies representing the latest round of industrial development. Nor, when it came to ‘making’, have they operated exclusively in the social, forward and outward-looking spirit most approved of by our century’s socialists. Escape or flight backwards or sideways have also figured prominently — movement away from the rules of a ‘progress’ whose burdens or sacrifices came to seem (or were made to seem) insupportable. Occasionally such flights have taken the form of short-cuts to Utopia, a magically foreshortened ‘end of history’.

One of the most revealing took place in Cambodia, between 1975 and 1979. There, a significant and concentrated historical attempt was made literally to reverse the entire process — to abort urbanisation altogether and forcibly reconstitute peasant society into a different sort of nation. In his important new study Ben Kiernan calls it ‘the indentured agrarian state’.[236] Everyone has heard of the horrors accompanying this attempt. And yet the episode itself remains ill understood. In its own day the Cambodian revolution was interpreted by the outside world primarily in terms of Cold War dogmatics, as an aberration of communism or Marxist ideology. But in the longer retrospect now so thoroughly divulged, one can see the inadequacy of that prism. Other coordinates were much more important. The Cambodian Hell was more truly an aberration of nationalist development than of socialism. Hence from the vantage point of the late 1990s it appears quite differently: as an extraordinary precursor of today’s ocean of ‘troubles’. Twenty years before such crises became common with the collapse of communist state power, it demonstrated fully how devastating the exercise of that power could be upon an explicitly ethnic or racial nationalist template.

‘In this book I shall show ... that Khmer Rouge conceptions of race overshadowed those of class’, Kiernan states firmly in his introduction.[237] ‘In terms of population as well as of territory, history was to be undone’, through absolute central control devoted, with ever-increasing fervour and ruthlessness, to what was then not yet known as ‘ethnic cleansing’.[238] The aim of Pol Pot’s revolution was a pure-blood and almost entirely rural, self-sufficient Khmer nation-state. The shadow cast across history by the retreating peasantry is, I would contend, generally much longer and deeper than most analyses have acknowledged. And, in Cambodia, certain exceptional circumstances let it attain for four years to an unexampled and murderous darkness. The political instruments of ‘revolutionary’ modernity were consecrated to the reconstruction of a nativist countryside — the rooted, Edenic community that had supposedly existed before the time of cities, social classes and individual guilt or shame.[239]

 A dark monkey from the mountains

His real name was Saloth Sar. ‘Pol Pot’ — an emblematic title in the tradition of twentieth-century communist rebaptism — was not disclosed to the world until 14 April 1976, when he became prime minister of the new revolutionary government in Phnom Penh. The Saloth family were peasants all right (12 hectares, 6 buffalo) but with a difference. They had royal connections. His cousin was a palace dancer and ‘favourite wife’ to a king. An elder brother found employment as a lackey, and the future dictator joined him there at the age of six. As Kiernan points out, ‘he never worked a rice field or knew much of village life ... few Cambodian childhoods were so removed from their vernacular culture’.[240]

He went on to a royal monastery and a Catholic school for the privileged. It is still astonishing to recall just how privileged: with a population of about 7 million and after nearly a century of French colonial occupation, there was very little secondary education in Cambodia and no higher education at all. When independence was granted in 1953 only 144 Cambodians had the baccalaureat. While in France Saloth Sar met the woman who became his wife in 1956, Khieu Ponnary: she was the first Khmer woman to graduate from high school. So it is not surprising that even elite Khmers felt like country bumpkins in the wider world. When he first reached Saigon in 1948, on his way to Paris, Saloth and the other twenty-year-old with him felt themselves to be like ‘two dark monkeys from the mountains’.

His scholarship was meant to turn him into a radio electrician, but it failed. He joined the French Communist Party (Cambodian Section) instead, and took part in the exiled independence movement. To avoid persecution the emigre cadres habitually used noms de plume like ‘Khmer Worker’, but Saloth Sar’s was unusual: ‘khmaer da’em’ or ‘original Cambodian’, an anticipation of that fidelity to native essence which, twenty years later, would turn Phnom Penh inside out and build the skull mountains at Tuol Sleng extermination centre.

Not that much of this showed on the surface, either in Paris or later. A consensual social view of Saloth emerges from the many careful references in Kiernan’s book: only with some difficulty would butter have melted in his mouth. In public he always displayed the palace fa<;ade — personally ‘charming, self-effacing’, cultivated, ‘genteel’ and quite humorous, and rarely showing anger in public. There is one account of Pol Pot breaking someone’s leg in a vicious punishment session: his own deputy prime minister, Vorn Vet. [241] But otherwise no record suggests burning eyes, Mussolinian blustering sessions or heimatisch warblings like the lyrics of Radovan Karadzic. In general, the outstanding serialkiller of the age shrouded his resentment so well that few could have known what it portended.

 Living for death

In a three-hour speech delivered on 27 September 1977 Pol Pot included a few words in honour of the national anthem of Democratic Kampuchea:

<quote>

Our national anthem clearly shows the essence of our people’s struggle. As you know, our national anthem was not composed by a poet. Its essence is the blood of our entire people ... This blood call has been incorporated into the national anthem ... [242]

</quote>

A colossal amount of actual blood was wasted by the Khmer Rouge regime. Kiernan estimates it as about 20 per cent of the previous population, or ‘... at least 1.5 million’. Twenty years before Rwanda, ‘the DK regime was on a genocidal track. There is no reason to believe the killing would have slowed, had it not been stopped by the Vietnamese army.’[243]

However, the anthem (which did in fact mention blood in almost every line) was not exalting mere haemoglobin. ‘Blood’ in this essentialist sense is the precious, inherited gist of an ‘entire people’, the secret of a nation passed on in trust from one generation to the next. But ‘entire people’ should not be read literally either: the meaning was not everybody who lived in pre-1975 Cambodia, and not even everyone ‘of Khmer descent’ in a certifiable or physical sense. Phnom Penh and the ancien regime had been full of traitors and vendus, as well as foreigners. These false Khmers had to be got rid of, which could be done only with the assistance of a ‘true Khmer’ stereotype. Although the Marxist ideology deployed by Pol Pot prescribed ‘workers and peasants’ for the slot, in practice Cambodia had only peasants. Not just any peasants, however: the well-off ones were no good, since privilege might have aligned them with the enemy. It had to be the poor — or, in terms of ancient piety, the simple - peasants who bore the blood-burden of the national soul. This is why they figured so prominently in the hectorings of Khmer Rouge ideologist Khieu Samphan:

<quote>

Did university graduates know anything about the true natural sciences? No ... everything was done according to foreign books and foreign standards. Therefore it was useless. By contrast our children in the rural areas have always had very usefol knowledge. They can tell you which cow is tame and which is skittish. They can mount a buffalo from both sides ... They are practically masters of nature [and] only this should be called natural science because it is closely connected with the reality of the nation, with the ideas of nationalism, production, national construction and national defense ... [244]

</quote>

Such true Khmers had to re-educate their fallen cousins in the meaning of ‘national’. That was best accomplished on the spot, close to the soil. Instead of taking peasant brigades to the cities, therefore, the cities were emptied out into the fields. Foreign obsessions and selfish individualism would be beaten out of them there, by a regime of productive if arduous labour which would also raise food production and make Cambodia self-sufficient, or ‘truly independent’. This would swiftly bring about a new society, sound, clean, free of corruption, hooliganism, graft, embezzlement, gambling, prostitution, alcoholism or any kind of hazardous games. [245]

All those who could not or would not be cleaned up, died. Betrayal of the slightest unclean impulse meant extinction.[246] Pol Pot and Khieu Samphan were of course influenced by the Chinese Cultural Revolution. That is, they thought the Red Guards had chickened out. After beating up a few ancien re&me egg-heads they stopped short of serious measures like vacating Peking and abolishing money. Now it was up to Cambodia. The flames of peasant nationalism had been fanned by Mao's Great Leap Forward. But the same fire was far more intense among the Khmers, a small and historically vulnerable people equipped with a relegation complex and an indurate hatred for its neighbours. By harnessing and directing that, the Cambodian Party thought it had the possibility of really forging an exemplary rural-socialist state. For the first time in modern history, 'autarchy' or total self-sufficiency might be realisable.[247]

As we saw earlier, Kiernan believes ethnic purity was one key theme in the resultant Cambodian frenzy. The other was what he calls 'the struggle for central control', or 'the Khmer Rouge Center's unceasing ... struggle for top-down domination' .[248] However, the one really implied the other. Stereotypically simple peasants could not themselves plan or organise their new hegemony, or decide who were the incompatible elements and what to do with them. That was the task of the party. It spoke 'in the name of' the soil cultivators, of course, as orthodox communists did for the working class. But knowledge of tame and skittish cows did not take it far, and neither did a traditional rankling sense of 'us and them'. Most of the message had therefore to be made up by the revolutionaries as they went along. General Marxist apologetics was too forward-looking to contribute much: however deluded in detail, it was at least devoted to an imminent industrialised future, and to out-producing capitalism in its own unclean terms. The ethnonationalist stereotype, by contrast, offered significant advantages as an instrument of control and coercion.

Ethnic boundaries are for the most part both murky and alterable. They compose a sign-system which lays claim to natural and selfevident status — something like the obvious contrast between (say) a Rwandan Hutu and a Chinaman. But in reality comparatively few signs carry such blatant meaning, and for these the sub-ethnic category of 'race' tends to be employed. Most ethnic markers rely on language (learnable), customs (adoptable or forgettable), faith (acquirable), or still more imprecise configurations like ‘national character’, common history or memory. One implication is that it often is quite difficult to contradict a verdict about just who is a what. When authority decides the matter, in effect it decrees: so-and-so either was or was not a ‘Khmer’ or (more to the point after 1975) a ‘true Khmer’, genetically patented to sustain the revolution of authentic Khmerism rather than to betray it. Mercifully, people do not carry around DNA birth charts or gene tattoos to refute such decisions. In practice contesting them involves something like an argumentative legal battle, with the production and weighing of evidence before a qualified and preferably impartial tribunal. But few are ever really in a position to undertake such procedures — and in the fury of revolutionary warfare, none at all were. Hence the decree was normally immediate, and final. In Democratic Kampuchea the Centre (Angkar, ‘the organisation’) tailored Khmerness to fit the rules of its rural national Utopia; but as time passed that meant simply to suit itself, or the day’s message from the leader. Central control gains its own momentum, in other words, and (as in postYugoslav Serbia) may then turn nationalism into the most malleable instrument of absolutism. This is why (as Kiernan underlines in his all-too-brief Conclusion to this book): ‘Despite its underdeveloped economy, the regime probably exerted more power over its citizens than any state in world history.’ [249]

A further advantage of nationalism for autocrats lies in its fictive kinship. The idealised nation is perceived as a vastly extended family. This is supposed to bestow a general sense of psychic belonging and community (or, in the Cambodian case, of rural-commune solidarity).

In many cases what it most observably does is to legitimate the actual extended-family behaviour of a leadership clique. As in Syria and Iraq, Cambodian central power gravitated quite naturally into the hands of family relations: the ‘people one can trust’ from a particular kin network or village area. Nationalism sanctifies nepotism; but also, nepotism can be in a sense exalted by a genetically oriented or ethnic nationalism. As Karl D. Jackson wrote some years ago:

<quote>

In essence the concept of collective leadership was infused into the tradition of Khmer family power ... Rivals within the Communist movement were tortured and executed in large numbers along with their spouses, indicating the degree to which the Khmer leadership perceived power as flowing along family lines; to destroy an important political opponent it was necessary to root out the entire family. [250]

</quote>

The ‘rooting out’ procedure can never be completed. Behind it lies a violent struggle for ‘top-down domination’ requiring a constant flow of new evidence of the enemy or anti-nation. Since it serves directly to justify power, such evidence must be made visible and catalogued for future time: proof of true descent, as it were, the birth certificate of Utopia. Tuol Sleng’s function was to provide this. The agony of its victims was secondary, and their possible repentance unimportant: only seven survived (accidentally) of the over 14,000 sent there. The aim was proud commemoration. Their piteous confessions and photographs were filed for the gaze of Pol Pot and his lineage, and much of the archive has survived. In 1996 a BBC television programme, ‘The Works’, followed the activity of two American photographers in Phnom Penh, Chris Riley and Doug Niven. Twenty years later they are still labouring to complete the record of depravity, unearthing dusty negatives and yellowing log-books, and interviewing ex-prison guards.

Hell-holes are as distinctive as the revolutions they serve. Although Hitler and Stalin dealt in much larger numbers than Pol Pot, the latter greatly excelled them in puritanic zeal and ethnic thoroughness. ‘Smashing’ was the favourite Khmer Rouge term, and in fact simple rustic methods — boot, knife, water immersion, a blow to the head to save bullets — realised their purpose better than the high technology of Auschwitz and Sobibor.

 Apocalypse then

In Peasants, his classical introduction to peasant anthropology, Eric Wolf observes how rural history has been punctuated by extraordinarily cruel uprisings: jacqueries (a fourteenth-century term) where

‘the peasant band sweeps across the countryside like an avalanche’ and tries literally to drown its oppressors in blood. This ‘seems in curious contradiction to the everyday life of the peasant, which … appears to be spent in such docile drudgery upon the land’, and was often associated with millenialist visions of an imminent new order. Inevitably, such convulsions generated an even more violent reaction, like that called for in Martin Luther’s infamous pamphlet of May 1525 — Against the Robbing and Murdering Hordes of Peasants. The cure was to be cruder than the ailment: ‘Therefore let everyone who can, smite, slay and stab, secretly or openly, remembering that nothing can be more poisonous, hurtful, or Devilish than a rebel.’

In more modern circumstances (Wolf goes on) peasant-based movements occur most readily ‘in countries so devastated by war that they experience a breakdown of traditional leadership and social order’?[251] This is the equivalent of the Black Death which preceded the great English Peasant Revolt of 1381. It creates a sense of total, oneiric alteration in which, since the time-honoured no longer functions, almost anything can be attempted. The world can be turned upside down. For Cambodians apocalypse came out of the air, in the shape of the prolonged American bombardment of their country during the last years of the Vietnamese War. ‘The most important single factor in Pol Pot’s rise’, writes Kiernan, ‘was the 1969–73 carpet-bombing of Cambodia’s countryside by American B-52s.’[252] As the Vietnamese army made increasing use of a supposedly neutral Cambodia, it was pursued and harassed there by the US Air Force. Naturally, most of the resultant carnage was Cambodian.

The beginning of Roland Jaffe’s film Killing Fields tried to evoke something of the climate fostered by the attacks. One saw New York Times correspondent Sidney Schanberg visiting a border town ‘accidentally’ flattened by the bombers, and over its ruins the Khmer Rouge rebels advance to the capture of Phnom Penh. The Nixon-Kissinger government had not even the excuse of ignorance. One of the most telling of the declassified CIA documents quoted by Kiernan was already outlining the consequences in 1973:

<quote>

The Khmer Rouge are using the damage caused by B-52 strikes as the main theme of their propaganda. The cadres tell the people that the Lon Nol government has requested the airstrikes and is responsible for the ‘suffering of innocent villagers’ ... [hence] the only way to stop ‘the massive destruction of the country’ is to defeat Lon Nol and stop the bombing. This approach has resulted in the successful recruitment of a number of young men [and] been effective with refugees and in areas subject to B-52 strikes ... [253] which by that time meant most populated parts of Cambodia. However, this was only the wooden tongue of a disregarded espionage service. Kiernan quotes more tellingly from the eye-wimesses. Near Angkor Wat (the emblem of Cambodia’s once glorious nationhood) for example:

</quote>

<quote>

The ordinary people sometimes literally shat in their pants when the big bombs and shells came ... Their minds just froze up and they would wander round mute for three or four days. Terrified and half-crazy, the people were ready to believe what they were told, that was what made it so easy for the Khmer Rouge to win people over.[254]

</quote>

Killing Fields continues with the sufferings of the Phnom Penh press corps and the evacuation of the American and French embassies. It would have been more costly to recreate on film what was happening in the background: the blowing-up of the Cambodian Central Bank (after which millions of bank notes were allowed to flutter through the capital’s deserted streets) and the stone-by-stone disassembly of the Roman Catholic cathedral. Thus economics as we know it was ended, and no trace of western religion remained. Mter apocalypse, the ground plan of millennium was being laid down: no mere simple-soul vision, but an organised framework to fill the void, egalitarian kibbutzim of peasantwarriors where Adam would delve and Eve spin once more, free for good of cash, gentlemen and (above all) of foreigners.

 Peasant chauvinism

Much of Kiernan’s study is devoted to the downfall of the Khmer Rouge state. [255] Fortunately, the infernal machine of party-guided ethnicity had an internal contradiction built into it. Pol Pot bit off more than he could chew, and (even before the Viemamese chased him back into the jungle) had begun to choke to death. The maintenance of mass chauvinist tension inside the country demanded a parallel mobilisation against foreign foes, and particularly against the old national enemy, Vietnam. But the logic of this was suicidal. In late February of 1978 Hanoi secretly decided that the Pol Pot regime had to go, and one year later it had accomplished the task.

Ben Kiernan appears less secure when it comes to overall diagnosis of the Cambodian storm. This is of course what counts most in any Gellnerian perspective. Was it a peasant revolution? Or was it foisted upon the country by a specially evil combination of intelligentsia and hoodlums? The first view has become particularly associated with Michael Vickery, author of Cambodia 1975–1982, who perceives the 1975 takeover as ‘a complete peasant revolution, with the victorious revolutionaries doing what peasant rebels have always wanted to do to their urban enemies’?[256] This was the source of the extraordinary violence. Pol Pot’s Centre was an elite of deracinated intellectuals like himself, driven partly by anti-colonial Marxism but (more significantly) by ‘peasantist romanticism’. Peasantism was their equivalent of western ‘workerism’, a creed obliging them to obey what they interpreted as the impulses of the masses.

The opposite standpoint is presented in Kate Frieson’s ‘The Impact of Revolution on Cambodian Peasants, 1970–1975’.[257] There the rural masses of Cambodia are depicted as essentially innocent: ‘unwitting participants’ in a movement directed from outside their ken, by idea-led cadres seizing the unique chance provided by the chaos following the bombardments and the fall of Prince Sihanouk’s old regime. By and large mass motivation remained traditional, she argues, if not timeless: the cultivating class kept its head down and did as commanded — ‘digging in, bending low, and cursing inwardly’. [258] In time they even put up with the Khmer Rouge’s ‘high-level cooperatives’ where communal eating was enforced and the family was phased out. Private land, the family and religious belief — the staples of peasant existence — disappeared, as they found themselves turned into unpaid indentured labourers.

Drawing on a much wider range of interviews and documents than previous scholars, what Kiernan comes up with is an uneasy compromise between these two interpretations. ‘In my view, ideological as well as economic issues were at stake’: that is, the peasants at first actively supported the Khmer Rouge takeover and then grew disillusioned, above all when they realised that family life itself was under threat. [259] Pol Pot’s rural Utopia really aimed at ending rural life as they had known it. Individual land ownership and Buddhist faith were in the end less important to them than ‘the devastating blows administered by the ending of home meals and the enforced separation of children from parents’. As for the violence and death, Kiernan judges the peasantry to be guilty but with (increasingly) extenuating circumstances: initially they must have had it in for city folk, particularly educated ones, but were later forced to repent. His final conclusion adds little to this save a last-minute emphasis upon the significance of racism. [260]

 The brood of Nicolas Chauvin

But what is really emphasised by this final flourish is the oddity of the preceding judgement. The Pol Pot Regime is a wonderful if dismaying portrait of ethnic nationalism unleashed. Ernest Gellner explained definitively why nationalism as such is not a malignancy. However (like its Nazi predecessor) the Cambodian version was manifestly a pathological diversion from the mainstream pattern he so often described. Although on the small scale of its nation, the Khmer head-count was proportionately the most savage example of genetic pandemonium in history — at least until the Rwandan massacre of 1994, which matched Pol Pot’s in numbers but was to outdo even it in intensity. Yet when trying to account for the whole event Kiernan ultimately falls back primarily on social factors. ‘Social’, that is, in the conventional sense which seeks for explanation in terms of class or individual interests: the peasants, the middle class, intellectuals and so on. A second explanatory motif is provided by a political category like ‘central control’ and then a more subordinate one by external affairs — the effects of French colonialism and American, Chinese or Vietnamese interference.

In reality, if ‘racism’ was so vital to the story — as the author asserts from beginning to end — then surely a frankly nationalist explanation-grid is more relevant. What bound the revolutionary intelligentsia and the peasant majority together was the historical formation (or malformation) of the Khmer national identity. A combination of marked retardation and uniquely maleficent external blows produced an equally (and fatally) singular reaction. In relation to its size Cambodia probably had the least developed urban middle class and intelligentsia in the world. Yet this had to be the country which was, in one of the century’s grimmest phrases, ‘bombed back into the Stone Age’. Twentieth-century history exhibits plenty of atrocities; does it show any more extreme example of identity assault and battery? Many forms of nationalism have operated in terms of threats of extinction, often exaggerated or imaginary, and preached a life-or-death struggle ‘before it is too late’. But in Phnom Penh in 1975 there was nothing at all exaggerated about fear of extinction, and almost everyone must have thought, or half-thought, that it might already be too late. The French had incorporated the Khmers into ‘Indochina’, their South-East Asian empire; now, the new convulsions of the postcolonial war had swamped them in another way and put a decimated and almost helpless land at the mercy of the Vietnamese.[261]

By the testimony so massively marshalled in Kiernan’s book Khmer nationalism was a powerful yet very maimed and lop-sided sentiment. It was capable of uniting the peasantry with the country’s tiny, nascent radical elite — but only through the bias of an exaggerated ‘peasantism’, as discerned in Vickery’s analysis. The feeble native kingdom in whose ruins Pol Pot was raised had disappeared. There was no industry, and the cities were inhabited to a remarkable extent by foreign traders or middlemen. Father Frarn;ois Ponchaud, author of Cambodia: Year Zero and one of the last to quit Phnom Penh in the great exodus, wrote later: ‘It is little wonder that Cambodian peasants perceived the centres of wealth and power as being dominated disproportionately by foreigners against whom they already held longstanding feelings of racial animosity.’[262] What gave the sense of ‘zero’ or void was the absence of the articulation nationalist ideas normally undergo amid differing upper- and middle-class strata. In this void it was possible for a jacquerie to become the state. By exchanging Marxism for the vilest and most wilful form of chauvinism, that state was then able to remain in power for years though (fortunately) only by the violent erosion of its own foundations. Even so, it took outside intervention to kill it.

These were ideal conditions both for abrupt radical ascendancy and for what is more accurately called ‘chauvinism’ rather than nationalism. Few terms have been more abused in recent debate. It has become vague enough in denotation to be almost appropriated by gender politics, as a shorthand for ‘male chauvinism’. French in origin (like most modern political vocabulary) the idea of ‘chauvinism’ arose in Paris during the post-Napoleonic era, and was linked to the popular wartime hero-figure of Nicolas Chauvin: le soldat-laboureur or ploughman-soldier. What the dictionaries of every modern tongue define as ‘extreme or vulgar nationalism’, ‘foreigner-hating xenophobia’, etc., had its source therefore in a particular person — or at any rate, in the supposed antics of that individual, as depicted on the vaudeville stage from the 1820s to mid-century. [263] But what matters here is that the Gallic original is essentially and incontestably a peasant. He always retires to his smallholding (usually with a wooden leg), where musket and bemedalled uniform are kept ready for action, and the village boys are regaled with lurid tales of the emperor, Bedouin-bashing and laying the foreigners’ women. Blood and soil are evoked in crassly direct fashion: while ploughing, he is forever turning up the ancestral bones of those who died for la patrie in times past.

We know from Gerard de Puymege’s superb study of early chauvinism that he never actually existed: ‘Chauvin’ was pure but very significant myth. [264] With roots in antiquity, what it represented was the profound reverberation of the rural world among those who had (just) left it behind — the newly urbanised masses painfully adapting themselves to modern conditions, individual opportunity, shops and factories, literacy and the nuclear family. In its infancy, chauvinism was one aspect of how peasants were ‘made into Frenchmen’. And what de Puymege reminds us of is that the very same process conserved Frenchmen as, so to speak, ideological peasants. That is, it reconfigured them as the subjects of a national myth-system incorporating and forever reproducing the primary ingredients of rurality, blood and soil.

This myth-system also instilled elements deriving from the revolutionary state-formation of 1789 and later — Frenchmen as citizens, embodiments (like Americans) of the Rights of Man and of a selfconsciously liberal and supra-ethnic Enlightenment. There was of course always a clash between these components of Frenchness. It has led to the profound internal warfare of all modern French Republics, and to what Raymond Aron and others have diagnosed as the weakness of political and ideological liberalism in France. One of its most striking later episodes (to mention a single important example) was the Dreyfus Affair in the 1890s — a drama which was to define for us the true twentieth-century meaning of the term ‘intellectual’, and illustrate its determining link to the thematic of nationalism.[265]

However, such a national idea-system can perfectly well go on supporting ‘contradictions’ in a practical sense. All it means is that French men and women have had to learn to move between different personae in different situations, and also to try and compose links between these. If the clash is allowed to become too overt (as at the moment of the Dreyfus trials) then something like civil war threatens. But much effort is normally put into preventing that happening, notably vis-a-vis foreigners. Political and cultural weapons are customarily deployed to maintain in operation an identity structure which, if laid out as doctrine, would be absurd.[266] However, identities are devices for living, not for composing Doctorates. Irresolvable contradictions within them must either be concealed, neutralised by some kind of balancing mechanism or — in crises where the devices fail — fought out through open civil war. For the French, this war threatened again at the time of the Popular Front, was precipitated by the 1940 defeat and the formation of Petain’s (literally) ‘chauvinist’ republic at Vichy, then prosecuted through the Resistance and its immediate postwar aftermath.

 The spell of ruraUty

What the true story of ‘chauvinism’ suggests is that modernisation involves passage through something like a colossal mill-race, in which a multigenerational struggle between the (rural) past and the (urban-industrial) future is fought out. Sometimes images of ‘uneven development’ depict this as a relatively tidy process, where developmental poles or centres impact upon tradition like stones cast into the pool of the past, with outward-spreading ripples of reaction and emulation. [267] But in reality many stones were cast together, or at least fairly close together, the pond where they fell was fairly small (the world), and the resultant back-and counter-flows convulsed the entire body of the carrying stream. ‘Uneven and combined’ registers something of the complexity of this, but not its sheer chaos and pandemonium.

The mill-race of ‘Progress’ occasionally produces struggles to the literal death, in particular circumstances. But in any case it is (in an appropriately epochal sense) always a life and death contest, where one global mode of existence perishes to make way for a successor. Nationalism is no side-effect of this battle, but its essence: it seems to me that was Ernest Gellner’s fundamental intuition of the matter. However, his approach also placed disproportionate emphasis upon the future-oriented factors in the process. He thought modern philosophy was really about industrialisation — the disruptive impact of the future, as it were. ‘Modernisation theory’ in his original formulation could not help overstressing the elements of literal modernity themselves — machine industry, the transformation of vernaculars into literacy, the inventive ‘rediscovery’ of the countryside by the new ‘clerks’ of national movements and so on. Greater attention is invariably given to these motives and instruments of change than to the ‘raw material’ itself — that is, the peasant masses who underwent the change and (like ‘Nicolas Chauvin’) got themselves not only made over into Frenchmen and Czechs but idealised into the very source of nationhood.

In reality, I suspect that the ‘raw material’ has played a far larger part in the overall genesis of nationalism than Gellnerian theory allows for. Czech nationalism was ‘made in Prague’, undoubtedly; but its ethnic characteristics came out of Bohemia, Moravia and the Sudetenland, and were not themselves ‘made’ in the familiar sense of invented, or converted into ideology. Whatever happens to them in the urban vaudeville (or the soap opera) ‘traditions’ are also a real matrix borne forward from past time by individuals and families. The kind of remaking which features in modern nationalism is not creation ex nihilo, but a reformulation constrained by determinate parameters of that past. And the past which has mainly counted here — and gives its ‘bite’ and sentimental incontrovertibility to all ethnonationalist belief-structure — is that of peasant existence.

The most telling critique of Gellner has been that focusing upon his cheerful over-rationalism. In an essay contrasting Weber and Gellner, Perry Anderson accuses the latter of ‘skirting the really spectacular manifestations of 20th century nationalism — not the independence of Czechoslovakia or Morocco, but World War and Nazism’?[268] There is a bias towards economic functionalism in his theory which ends by making nationalism into too much of ‘a wholesomely constructive and forward-looking principle’ — a series of adjustments demanded by entry into the era of modernity, as it were, rather than a life or death trauma. Marxist ‘historical materialism’ used to be denounced for this style of economism, with its propensity to infer everything from alterations in the mode of production. ‘Ironically’ (Anderson continues):

<quote>

there is a sense in which Gellner’s theory might be described as immoderately materialist. For what it plainly neglects is the overpowering dimension of collective meaning that modern nationalism has always involved: that is, not its functionality for industry, but its fulfilment of identity ... In his tour of reenchantments, Gellner has paradoxically missed far the most important of all in the twentieth century. [269]

</quote>

Hence he ‘theorised nationalism without detecting the spell’, in the sense of its binding or passionate attraction, and its capacity to inspire the phenomena of self-sacrifice and genocide.

But where is the ‘spell’ located? Anderson notes its psychological and emotive nature, but suggests no originating source. I believe that by far the most plausible origin lies in the link between most forms of ethnic nationalism and ‘rural’ existence as defined earlier. Those ‘reenchantments’ Gellner faltered over — above all German Aryanism and the Jewish genocide — were examples of unhinged ethnicity which retained a palpable or single-generation connection to peasant existence. The ‘fantasies’ of Hitler and Himmler envisaged forming another, earlier version of Kiernan’s ‘indentured agrarian state’ — that is, a master race of reconstituted Germanic peasant-farmers extending across central and eastern Europe, with unfree Slav labourers doing the hard work on their farms. The anti-modern virulence of this vision derived partly from the very closeness of the traditions thus reinvented and turned into philosophy. German industrialisation had been abrupt and traumatic, and it had indeed given rise to nationalism according to the broad prescriptions of modernisation theory. However, the countershock against this rise, from the ‘raw material’ of a society still mainly rural and ethnically homogeneous, proved even more powerful than the originating shock itself. After the experience of national defeat in 1914–18, it was strong enough to overwhelm and carry modernised German society along a different and regressive trajectory: ethnic chauvinism transmuted into a global mission. [270]

One can put what is really the same point in another way. There is a familiar litany of rather abstract terms employed in both the rhetoric of and speculation on nationalism, like ‘inheritance’, ‘community’, ‘descent’ or ‘blood’, ‘common experience’ and ‘purity’ or its many opposites (‘pollution’, ‘the alien’ and so on). But since most nations conform rather feebly to these categories in any sociological sense, it is often quite hard to discern just where their emotive authority comes from. A clue may be provided by historical situations where this was relatively easy: that is, situations where peasant rurality has been close, recent, still accessible to the people undergoing ‘nationalisation’, and (therefore) still capable of infusing violent personal or familial emotions into its language and rhetoric. The resultant mixture is highly infectious: newly eloquent romantic intellectualism combined with the half-healed wounds of actual or recently transmitted recollection — from a rural life in which ‘inheritance’, ‘community’, ‘roots’ and the other standard nostrums all had a perfectly concrete meaning. The colourful mixture is also tailor-made for the burgeoning media of early literacy and urbanisation — like the Paris vaudeville, the London nineteenth-century musichall (where ‘jingoism’ was forged) and the yellow or tabloid press. Gellner’s ironic rationality tended always to see traditions being falsified into ‘traditions’. But in certain important cases, ‘traditions’ could actually be infused with the blood — not always figurative — of (real) traditions. A reborn Germany or Cambodia found themselves engorged by the flailing life of a peasant social order which, although ‘dying out’ in the epochal sense, was still alive enough for a serious effort to ‘undo history’ (as Kiernan puts it). Ideologies of anti-modernism — from Nietszche to ‘Unabomber’ Ted Kaszinski, via Martin Heidegger — have occasionally been able to pierce into a vein of ‘authentic’ rural despair and resentment, and assist the mobilisation of its violence. Not by chance was ‘authentic’ Heidegger’s favourite word. [271]

Both the intense emotionality and the violence of ethnic nationalism acquire much more meaning when traced to this specific root. The sole alternative would seem to be a frankly psychological one: a story of ‘human nature’, in fact, where feelings of ‘belonging’ or extended kinship are read as the essential realities offended by the circumstances of modernity. One difficulty with Karl Popper’s early rendition of the theme in The Open Society and Its Enemies is of course its sheer familiarity: it is the tale recounted for the last two centuries by the intellectual protagonists of just what we are discussing here — ethnic nationalism. And the theoretical issue which Gellner’s modernisation thesis addressed arose only because that explained nothing. Nationalism is only a question because nationality politics and national identities are not all ‘ethnic’ in the imagined-kinship, fakelore, immemorialist sense. From Hans Kohn’s time onwards one of its key dilemmas has always been making sense of these vital differences: whether as ‘western’ versus ‘eastern’, ‘liberal’ versus ‘closed’, or (more recently) ‘civic’ versus ‘ethnic’ nationalism. [272]

 Beyond the mill-race

How long did this crucial and fertile chaos of waters endure? Unfortunately, the past tense remains inappropriate. The curse endures to this day. It still exists, notably, within the French state which gave birth to ‘Nicolas Chauvin’; that is, in the society also considered by many theorists as archetypally modern, the very hearth of Enlightenment and egalite or even (since the 1980s) the crucial site of postmodernity. Not necessarily under his own name, ‘Nicolas Chauvin’ figures none the less in every Front National speech and pamphlet today. This is not to prophesy his return to earth via a second Perain.[273] However, one might be a little more sanguine on this count, were not the wider European scene so ambiguous. Its institutional modernity remains deeply weighed down by the ball and chain of the Common Agricultural Policy. Though designed to lever the countries of the European Union out of Chauvin’s world for good, by a ‘phasing out’ of peasant cultivation, it has unfortunately been bent by political pressure into an instrument for at least partially preserving it everywhere from Greece to Ireland. Hence the European Union, the principal white hope for ‘civic nationalism’, remains deeply compromised by the very ruralist inheritance which has in the past so often nourished ethnic nationalism.[274]

In a penetrating discussion of violence in nationalist movements, David Laitin has recently underlined this same dimension. ‘Why are some nationalist movements peaceful in strategy and outcome while others create carnage?’ is his leading question, and he searches for an answer less among ‘the great forces of history’ than in ‘micro foundations based upon social organisation in rural and small town life’, plus contributions from ‘fortuitous events’ (like assassinations or acts of state terrorism) and what he calls the ‘tipping phenomena’ of political recruitment (attainment of ‘thresholds’ beyond which violent tactics seem to be paying off) .[275] Thus, the salience of terrorism in the Basque national movement can be contrasted with its remarkably low profile in Catalonia. In the former we find a ‘dense rural social structure’ where considerations of honour are prominent; the Catalans, however, are more organised into economic-based groups and political parties operating at the national and all-Spanish levels (both city-centred). ETA’s long dominance therefore depended upon its links to a specifically rural (or recently rural) society in which ‘nationalist leaders could recruit in small villages and towns in which there are many social groups whose members are bound by codes of honour’. But such honourable bonding derives, surely, from a nexus of peasant custom and heritable tradition — that very ‘raw material’ referred to previously, and infused fairly directly into the idealised nationhood of Euzkadi.

The point is reinforced by the second comparative example Laitin goes on to provide: developments in post-Soviet Georgia and Ukraine. While in Georgia there have been a series of insurgencies and wars, Ukrainian reconstruction remains remarkably free from armed conflict. In general terms it is certainly not obvious why the contrast should be so great. The Ukraine has a host of important minority problems and, in the Crimea, the site of a major three-way conflict among Russians, Tatars and Ukrainians which has constantly threatened escalation into warfare. Yet the new Ukrainian regime has largely avoided violence, whereas 'Georgia's rural social structure appears to have maintained the basis for terrorist organisation.' Nearly 70 per cent of Ukrainians will be living in large urban environments by the year 2000, and one result is that 'the populism that was the hallmark of Ukrainian ideologies in the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries has faded. One can even argue that today the concept of the narod — in the traditional sense of the poor, oppressed peasant masses — no longer occupies a central place in the political thinking ofUkrainians.'[276]

Post-1989 conditions in many parts of Eastern Europe have made them even more the victim of the inheritance which is fading away in Ukraine. In a recent study of the underlying causes of the Bosnian war, Sabrina Ramet points out that whereas Titoist Yugoslavia had attempted (however unsuccessfully) to 'impose the values of the city' on south Slav culture, MiloseviC's 1987 coup 'represented among other things the triumph of the countryside over the city in Serbia (and hence) the rising tide of Serbian nationalism, closely associated with rural perceptions and rural values, albeit often as synthesised and reflected by urban literary elites.'[277] She outlines the primarily rural character of the new Serb national movement and the extremes it attained in Bosnia, where a campaign for 'traditional values' (meaning in the first place a full-scale assault on any claims by women to equal treatment) — 'represents in the clearest possible way a cultural encroachment of the countryside on the city'. Linking this to the perspective of modernisation theory, she concludes that:

<quote>

There is a world of difference between a national movement founded on urban mobilisation (even if it manipulates the symbols and mythologies of the countryside, in its own distorted mirror) and a national movement based, to a great extent, on rural mobilisation ...[278]

</quote>

Outside Europe a similar general pattern is identifiable. Laitin distinguishes his analysis from what he feels to be the abstractness of ‘the great forces of history’; but the analysis itself conducts the reader back to one of these forces, the latent power of a mobilised peasantry and its counter-attack upon the spreading tide of ‘modernisation’, the market economy and the norms of urban liberalism. Although Ben Kiernan’s study does not deal with this, we know that the Khmer Rouge by no means lay down and died after the Vietnamese invasion. Presumably because it still enjoys some real support, it is notoriously still around, and a political as well as a military player. Living partly off the timber and drug business in Cambodia’s western forests, its guerrilla remnant has survived the Vietnamese occupation and successor regimes. On the day I finished reading Kiernan’s book the London Independent ran a main news item titled ‘Pol Pot’s Top Man Quits Khmer Rouge’ (13 August 1996) — quits, alas, not to spend more time with his family but to run for office in Phnom Penh. Sentenced to death years ago for his part in the atrocities, Ieng Sary is planning a new party to contest the next elections. He was a member of the founding Paris elite, and one of Pol Pot’s closest buddies.

Nor is this the sole great rebuke to Gellnerian optimism produced by the 1990s. One paragraph in Kiernan’s book gave me an almost physical shock the first time I read it. It is in his ‘Introduction’, and it is intended as no more than a simple outline of the Cambodian scene for the uninitiated:

<quote>

At first glance, Cambodia seems a society resistant to transformation. It was geographically compact, demographically dispersed, linguistically unified, ethnically homogeneous, socially undifferentiated, culturally uniform, administratively unitary, politically undeveloped, economically undiversified, and educationally deprived. Cambodia was more isolated and landlocked than any other Southeast Asian country except Laos ... [and] mummified by ninety years of a colonial protectorate which preserved, even enhanced the traditional monarchy and social structure ... [and] 80 per cent peasant.[279]

</quote>

I have added the emphasis. What provokes the shock is the fact that, place-names aside, only one further change (‘ethnically homogeneous’) is needed to make this a perfect description of another country altogether, located in another continent: Rwanda.[280]

 A counter-example

Earlier, I mentioned the continuing conflict in Ireland as one of the pointers towards the general significance of rurality for nationalism. But this indicator makes its point still more forcefully when set in a slightly wider context. For Irish nationalism is also the exception within the larger archipelago to which it belongs. In Hans Kohn’s old contrast of western (liberal) versus eastern (ethnic-authoritarian) nationalisms, Ireland was sometimes grouped with the latter: a violent ethnoreligious movement perplexingly located on the farthest geographic fringe of the European west. Physically contiguous and historically intertwined with England — the founding specimen of Kohn’s liberal-institutional, state-formed identity — it none the less seemed much closer in both spirit and methods to the characteristic nineteenth-century formations of central and eastern Europe. The paradox has been heightened by the remarkable post-independence relationship between old monarchy and new republic. Two generations after secession citizens of the latter are still formally treated (and for the most part, informally regarded) as quasisubjects of the former when ‘on British soil’. Yet simultaneously the IRA’s campaign of irredentist violence has led to over 3,000 deaths over a period of almost 30 years, and in the 1990s produced episodes of citycentre devastation upon the same soil.

The enigma is intensified again by broad comparison to the fates of other United Kingdom nationalities. Both Wales and Scotland have generated twentieth-century national movements aiming at secession on Irish republican lines, and since the 1950s these have developed significantly over a generation of general British and imperial decline. Such movements have been frustrated by British counter-tactics (notably around the 1979 devolution referenda) and are now also dogged by a more distinct stirring of English resentment focused upon ‘preserving the Union’ (above all against European influence or encroachment). Yet they have also been almost wholly free from violence. The absence of terrorist ‘persuasion’ is particularly significant among the Scots. As well as representing about 10 per cent of the UK population (easily the largest archipelago minority) their institutions carry forward the traditions of a statehood alive until the eighteenth century, and largely built up in hostility to England. In 1745–6 a Highland-based army made the last attempt to overthrow the post-1688 British state, and the long subsequent experience of empire has generated strong popular traditions of militarism among both Highland and Lowland peoples. However, the fact is that these traditions have (so far at least) had only a marginal effect upon a national movement conducted exclusively in political terms — political, and indeed quite self-consciously civic and pacific terms.

But perhaps this puzzling difference between the two main parts of the ‘British Isles’ yields to analysis along the lines sketched out above.[281] The most striking underlying contrast is the one found between their respective agrarian histories. In England and Lowland Scotland, an early ‘agrarian revolution’ virtually destroyed peasant society, permanently replacing it with a landscape of large estate farms, ‘county towns’ and servant villages. In Ireland it did not. On the contrary, to some extent nineteenth-century land reform reconstructed small-scale agriculture after earlier disaster and depredations, thus laying the foundation for De Valera’s rural Catholic state and — ultimately — for the prosecution of Sinn Fein’s irredentist campaigns at the end of the twentieth century. It was from such radically divergent social trajectories that equally diverse nationality movements arose: a Hibernian one liberating itself only with great difficulty from ‘blood and soil’, and British ones mainly configured within the category of an earlier ‘civic nationalism’, and by the absence (save in romantic fancy) of those elements most propitious for ‘chauvinist’ or blood-and-soil mobilisation. There is even a partial exception which can serve as confirmation: Wales. In that country, both ethnolinguistic motifs and violence have been somewhat more pronounced in the nationalist movements of the twentieth century; and they are rooted in areas where (in spite of early political and legal incorporation by the Tudor dynasty) the subsequent capitalist transformation of the countryside was much less dramatic.

English national identity itself, the original template of modernisation delineated in Liah Greenfeld's Nationalism, finds itself in perhaps the strangest dilemma of any contemporary nationalism.[282] National movements usually arise from what she calls status ressentiment, articulated through a deployment of inherited differentiae — the 'peculiarities' of people and nation. For the English, however, for over two centuries the most important peculiarity has undoubtedly been 'Britain' — the grander personae of multinational state and empire, worn long enough to feel almost like the 'nature' evoked by nationalists. Redefinition upon much narrower ground needs alternative motifs: the rediscovery of another nature, as it were, whose mobilisation could restore the national fortune. But apart from the despairing one of 'race' (used by all current formations of the extreme Right in England) it has become difficult to see what such motifs could be. What appeared to Hans Kohn as an early and exemplary state-led liberalism now appears in a truer light: a thoroughly archaic version of civic nationalism, 1688s crude, early-modern apparatus of absolute parliamentary sovereignty. Hence the first principles of effective national identity — the 'way we do things', etc. — have themselves become major obstacles to the reform of that identity. But this is an historical context in which ethnos can offer no way out or forward. Everywhere in the archipelago it looks as if modern civis is the sole solution; but is that attainable only upon the broader terrain of Europe?[283]

 Conclusion: the fertile womb

By way of over-general conclusion, therefore: the modernisation theory stemming from Gellner's great chapter on 'Nationalism' in Thought and Change and more fully elaborated in Nations and Nationalism had the effect of foreshortening the future; yet part of its great vigour and explanatory power arose from this very effect — from the way it foreclosed so abruptly on the past. Placing too great an emphasis upon all the cultural factors attendant upon industrialisation, it made theorists too confident that modernity had all but prevailed. In spite of his ironic scepticism and his attraction to social conservatism, Gellner was essentially an Enlightenment optimist. And the obverse of such confidence was a tendency to relegate or discount the enduring pressures of rurality itself — the formative weight of that preceding peasant world which, once the constraints of the Cold War were loosened, has shown itself very rapidly to be anything but mere ‘raw material’. Fifteen years ago Arno J. Mayer concluded his masterly synthesis The Persistence of the Old Regime with these words:

<quote>

The old regime ... was too vast, resilient, and resistant a target to be felled by a few terrorist bullets in Sarajevo. It would take the two World Wars and the Holocaust, or the Thirty Years War of the twentieth century, to finally dislodge and exorcise the feudal and aristocratic presumption from Europe’s civil and political societies. [284]

</quote>

And even then (we should now add) the social inheritance that underlay such presumption was not really dislodged. It is, alas, still undergoing exorcism to this day, in Western as well as Eastern Europe, and in many other areas of the world. Two generations before 1914 modernisers like Marx and Mill had treated the demise of the old regime as practically a foregone conclusion. Their heir, Ernest Gellner, gave a picture of the modernisation process far deeper and wider than they could. Yet his picture remained in certain respects configured by the inheritance he shared with them — that is, by certain limitations of the original Enlightenment as well as by its intellectual and moral grandeur. Approaching the year 2000, and trying to peer beyond these frontiers, perhaps it should be conceded that we still do so from among the ruins of that ancient rural world which he understood, and yet also underestimated.

The thunder of its long collapse is still by far the loudest sound in all our ears. From McLuhan to Baudrillard theorists have sought to discern electronic postmodernity through the clouds of dust. But may not such efforts be only the latest style of rationalist foregone conclusion? Many intellectuals want to go on believing it is much later than most people and politicians think, and in spite of his sceptical, disbelieving temperament Gellner too could not help inclining in that direction. Without collapsing in the contrary direction, it may be time to reasonably doubt it. No apologia of atavism is required in order to doubt whether we are quite as modern as some people think. The point is a more cautious one: an alternative reading with puts nationalism nearer the centre of the theory-world will suggest contrary evidence, and make theorists look much more closely (and in a sense, respectfully) at the partly hidden mechanisms of transition from ‘traditional’ into contemporary society. [285] Yes, that womb is fertile still, in Brecht’s famous phrase in Arturo Ui, but not necessarily or only with other versions of fascism or totalitarianism.

The departure of a great mind like Gellner ought therefore to be an occasion for reappraising not just ‘modernisation’, but also our own collective and intellectual location within its process. Neither ‘tradition’ (rurality) nor the vehicles and reformers of tradition (‘intellectuals’) are sufficiently understood, and advance in these areas is what the deepening study of nationalism demands. Gellner’s was essentially an epochal theory. And in that epochal sense, the new fin de siecle may be a lot sooner than most politicians and social theorists want to believe.

[234] C. T6ibin, Walking along the Border, London, 1987.

[235] E. Thompson, The Making of the English Working Class, London, 1963.

[236] B. Kiernan, The Pol Pot Regime: Race, Power and Genocide under the Khmer Rouge, 1975–79, New Haven, 1996, chs. 5 and 6.

[237] Ibid., p. 26.

[238] Ibid., p. 27.

[239] One of the most celebrated of post-1945 denunciations of Marxism, Karl Popper’s The Open Society and Its Enemies, London, 1945, analysed its general appeal as based upon a nostalgia of this kind: longing for a ‘closed society’ unperturbed by the individualism, alienation and choice of modern times. But this analysis remained couched in general and psychological terms: it did not inquire what the effective models of closure were for most populations caught up in the modernisation process.

[240] Kiernan, The Pol Pot Regime, p. 10.

[241] Ibid., p. 437.

[242] As quoted in K. D. Jackson, ‘The Ideology of Total Revolution’, in his Cambodia 1975–1978: Rendezvous with Death, Princeton, 1989, p. 73.

[243] Kiernan, The Pol Pot Regime, p. 460.

[244] Jackson, Cambodia 1975–1978, pp. 74–5.

[245] For details, see Kiernan, The Pol Pot Regime, ch. 2.

[246] In one of the most fascinating accounts of postwar intellectual life in France, Memoires: le voleur dans la maison vide, Paris, 1997, Jean-Fran;ois Revel has described a meeting with the distinguished academic, Maurice Mouillaud, a subtle and imaginative mind who in the 1950s had embraced the most abject Stalinism. Mouillaud could account for his lapse only by:

a sort of enchantment, comparable to that affecting members of a religious sect. He had the feeling of having been invaded, taken over by another personality having no relationship either to his previous self or his furure self ... [however] ... it must be kept in mind that thoroughgoing communism meant the pursuit of total ‘purification’ and the formation of a ‘new man’ in the canonical sense, and this appeared to legitimate physical or lateral liquidation of the ‘old man’. In this sense the most logical of communists had been Pol Pot rather than Stalin or Mao. ‘At least he was willing to kill everyone.’ (pp. 35–7)

Khmer Rouge ideology derived partly from the experience of postwar French communism, a source not unimportant both for its logical nature and its ideas of rural rootedness — on which see further remarks later in the argument.

[247] Autarchy (or ‘autarky’) was the doctrine of absolute economic self-reliance, prominent between the world wars in both fascist states and the USSR. ‘In the 1930s the drive to self-sufficiency or autarky was founded on the desire to achieve ... power to control one’s own destiny, generally by states which were despotic in their internal politics, and felt victimised internationally’ (R. Skidelsky, The World After Communism, London, 1995, pp. 62–3). It represented only an ideal-type extrapolated from Friedrich List’s theory of economic nationalism or protectionism: there are no examples of effectively autarkic states in modern times — with the dubious and transient exception of Pol Pot’s Cambodia.

[248] Kiernan, The Pol Pot Regime, p. 26.

[249] Ibid., p. 464.

[250] Jackson, Cambodia 1975–1978, p. 242.

[251] E. Wolf, Peasants, Englewood Cliffs, NJ, 1966, pp. 106–9.

[252] Kiernan, The Pol Pot Regime, p. 16.

[253] Ibid., pp. 22–3.

[254] Ibid., p. 23.

[255] Ibid., part III.

[256] M. Vickery, Cambodia, 1975–1982, Boston, 1984.

[257] K. Frieson, ‘The Impact of Revolution on Cambodian Peasants, 1970–1975’, Ph.D. Thesis, Monash University, Australia, 1991.

[258] Frieson, ‘The Impact of Revolution’, pp. iii, ii.

[259] Kiernan, The Pol Pot Regime, p. 213.

[260] Ibid., pp. 463–5.

[261] By far the most persuasive analysis of this dimension is that given by Anthony Barnett in ‘Cambodia Will Never Disappear’, New Left Review, no. 180, 1990. He argues that what Pol Pot and the leadership clique absorbed from France was its chauvinism, as well as its variant of Stalinism. Prince Sihanouk ‘was and remains the incarnation of the French myth of Cambodia’, while the radical nationalism of his Khmer Rouge opponents was also ‘expressed within the parameters of the French ideal’. The cult of Angkor Wat and the delusions about the ancient Khmer hydraulic system also find their place in Barnett’s brilliant profile of Cambodian nationalism.

[262] F. Ponchaud, Cambodia: Year Zero, London, 1978.

[263] British television viewers with recollections of the 1960s and 1970s would recognise him instantly as something like ‘Alf Garnett’: comic, tear-jerking, randy, foreigner-despising, royalty-loving and irreversibly Tory. However, Garnett was a Chaplinesque and urban figure of fun, a pre-war Londoner risen (or half-risen) above proletarian origins.

[264] G. de Puymege, Chauvin, le soldat-labourer: contribution a l’erude des nationalismes, Paris, 1993.

[265] On the theme of the relationship between nationalism and the intellectuals, see for the French case C. Charle, Naissance des ‘intellectuels’, Paris, 1990. The same author has more recently carried his analysis on to a much wider canvas with Les intellectuels en Europe au XIXe siecle: essai d’histoire comparee, Paris, 1996. On the specific history of France, Tony Judt’s Past Imperfect: French Intellectuals 1944–56, Berkeley, 1992 gives a vigorous polemical account of what the author sees as the failure of political liberalism in France. A more recent overview is provided by Jeremy Jennings in ‘Of Treason, Blindness and Silence: Dilemmas of the Intellectual in Modern France’, in J. Jennings and A. Kemp-Welch, eds., Intellectuals in Politics: From the Dreyfus Affair to Salman Rushdie (London, 1977). By far the most concrete view ‘from inside’ is that given by Revel, Memoires.

[266] One striking example of this is the nexus of myths and observances attached to French cuisine and gastronomy. This represents an ‘earthy’ (peasant) tradition which is now perfectly urbanised and strongly identified — indeed overidentified — with national distinctiveness. The peculiar salience of la bouffe in contemporary France may arise partly from its function as an uncontroversial cementing factor between two nations of the mind: the land of Chauvin (Perain, Le Pen, etc.) on one hand and that of the neo-Jacobins and Radicals (Zola, Mendes-France, 1968, etc.) on the other.

[267] I stand penitent in the front row of the accused here, having tried to expound a tidily quasi-Marxist theory in ‘Modern Janus’, an unpublished text of 1976, part of which appeared as the chapter ‘Modern Janus’ in my The Break-up of Britain, London, 1977.

[268] P. Anderson, ‘Science, Politics, Enchantment’, inJ. A. Hall and I. C. Jarvie, eds., Transition to Modernity: Essays on Power, Wealth and Belief, Cambridge, 1992, p. 207. It is not irrelevant to the point to recall that, for all his irony about ethnic passion and misrepresentation, Gellner (who was an adept with the mouth-organ) loved playing Czech folk-tunes and would sometimes burst into tears after doing so. In a postcard to me he once wrote: ‘I was brought up among Ruritanians and Megalomanians and to this day can remember and play many folk-ditties (both real and invented) on the mouthorgan. For some reason which escapes me, these seem never to give pleasure to the listeners.’

[269] Anderson, ‘Science, Politics, Enchantment’, p. 208.

[270] A further analysis of the causes of Nazism’s rise was attempted by the anthropologist Emmanuel Todd in his Le Pou et le proletaire, Paris, 1979, where inherited family structure is added to the list of accusation — a theme subsequently elaborated by the author into a general explanation of modern societal variation in L’invention de l’Europe, Paris, 1989. But in the present context that argument may perhaps be left in parentheses: the familial patterns depicted were undoubtedly rural, whether or not they have been transmitted forward in the way Todd suggests.

[271] In a 1934 speech to unemployed workers, Heidegger suggested that this was what urbanisation had brought them. The solution was a return ‘to soil and land’ which could renew German community. In a radio address of the same period, he even compared philosophical reflection to peasant labour: ‘This philosophical work ... belongs right here in the midst of the peasants’ work ... My work is intimately rooted in and related to the life of the peasants [and] comes from a centuries long and irreplaceable rootedness in Alemannian-Swabic soil.’ On these matters, see M. E. Zimmerman, Heideggers Confrontation with Modernity, Bloomington, IN, 1990, pp. 69–70. Another important discussion of the issue is R. Minder, ‘Martin Heidegger et le conservatisme agraire’, Alemagnes d’Aujourd’hui, no. 6, 1967. P. Bourdieu, L’Ontologie politique de Martin Heidegger, Paris, 1988 gives the complete lowdown on his ‘louche’ philosophical rendition of folkish nationalism.

[272] See, inter alia: H. Kohn, The Idea of Nationalism, New York, 1944; J. Plamenatz, ‘Two Types of Nationalism’, in E. Kamenka, ed., Nationalism, the Nature and Evolution of an Idea, London, 1973; R. Brubaker, Citizenship and Nationhood in France and Germany, Cambridge, MA, 1992; L. Greenfeld, Nationalism: Five Roads to Modernity, Cambridge, MA, 1992.

[273] Eugen Weber tries to estimate the limits of right-wing nationalism in contemporary France in ‘Nationalism and the Politics of Resentment’, American Scholar, vol. 63, 1994. But perhaps the most significant limit lies in the postwar transformation described in Henri Mendras, La fin du paysan: suivi d’une reflexion sur la fin du paysan vingt ans apres, Le Paradou, Actes Sud, 1984.

[274] Goran Therborn shows — in European Modernity and Beyond, New York, 1992 — that on the eve of World War II Europe was ‘still a predominantly agrarian society’, and that only in the 1950s to 1970s was ‘the compressed end of immemorial agrarian society’ witnessed — one generation ago, in fact (pp. 65–73). Except in the British Isles and one ‘corridor from Switzerland to Sweden’, industrialisation was rapid, one-way — and remarkably short lived. By the 1980s, de-industrialisation was already under way. In this context of ultra rapid transitions, perhaps what Therborn calls in his general conclusion ‘the cunning survival capacity of historical traditions’ (p. 359) deserves greater emphasis than it has usually received.

[275] D. Laitin, ‘National Revivals and Violence’, European Journal of Sociology, vol. 36, 1995.

[276] Laitin, ‘National Revivals and Violence’, p. 35, where the author is quoting from O. Subtelny’s Ukraine., a History, Toronto, 1988. Roman Szporluk has fortified the same line of argument more recently in ‘Nationalism after Communism: Reflections on Russia, the Ukraine, Belarus and Poland,’ Nations and Nationalism, vol. 4, 1998.

[277] S. Ramet, ‘Nationalism and the “Idiocy” of the Countryside: The Case of Serbia’, Ethnic and Racial Studies, vol. 19, 1996, pp. 70–1. See also her Balkan Babel: The Disintegration of Yugoslavia from the Death of Tito to Ethnic War, Boulder, 1995.

[278] Ramet, ‘Nationalism and the “Idiocy” of the Countryside’, p. 85.

[279] Kiernan, The Pol Pot Regime, pp. 4–5.

[280] On this topic the reader must turn first of all to Gerard Prunier’s brilliant and corrosive study The Rwandan Crisis 1959–1994: History of a Genocide, London, 1995. The parallels to be drawn with Barnett’s profile of Cambodian nationalism in ‘Cambodia Will Never Die’ are especially striking as regards both the ideological origins of the conflicts, and the potentially lethal authority of one-party rule within peasant societies.

[281] It failed to yield much before this author’s earlier effort, The Break-up of Britain, London, 1977, which entirely failed to register the socio-historical dimension emphasised here. Gellner wrote a typically amusing and acerbic notice of this work, ‘Nationalism, or the New Confessions of a Justified Edinburgh Sinner’, in The Political Quarterly, vol. 49, 1978 (reprinted in his Spectacles and Predicaments, Cambridge, 1979).

[282] Greenfeld, ‘God’s First-born: England’, in her Nationalism, ch. 1.

[283] Gellner was an enthusiastic pro-European, but always had difficulty fitting the British Isles into his grand schema of modernisation through nationalism. It seems to me that his most acute critique of his adopted nation’s culture is contained in an early and famously abrasive study of its indwelling philosophical mystique, ‘British Empiricism’, Words and Things, London, 1959. Only an outsider could have dealt such a memorable blow to the native identity. On the other hand, he did become more of an insider, and later always gave the impression that there was much — indeed more and more — to be said in defence of God’s first-born. It was as if a part of the Hapsburg mantle (which he was also quite fond of praising) had fallen upon Windsordom. It may also be worth observing here that the first-born is not really unique. Actually his second- and third-born are in similar sorts of trouble today, as the United States and France also labour towards long-overdue reform of their own almost equivalently gerontocratic versions of ‘the western model’. It looks as if the general fate of revolutionary models is to become out-dated, and then discover what an impossible nuisance is further political revolution.

[284] A. J. Mayer, The Persistence of the Old Regime, London, 1981, p. 329.

[285] One interesting new attempt at analysing social transmission mechanisms in their own right is provided by Regis Debray’s new study, Transmettre, Paris, 1997. Connoisseurs of transmission effects may also observe an odd echoeffect between the lines here. In the 1960s, Perry Anderson and I evolved a theory of Britishness which proclaimed that everything in the United Kingdom was, in effect, far sooner than most opinion then wanted to believe. First published in the New Left Review, the so-called ‘Nairn-Anderson theses’ asserted, not without passion, that the great vanguardstate of European modernity was in truth a pitiable and quasi-feudal reliquary fit only for history’s museum, or perhaps just its dustbin. There too it was asserted that history was more enmeshed in and compromised by the past than liberals and socialists thought. In retrospect, even this denunciation seems inadequate. It did not occur to either of us that the old bone cage would rattle on into the third millennium, or that forty years later a new Labour government might be in power, devoted to pathologically cautious re-arrangement of the relics — for example, phasing out the hereditary principle in the House of Lords while conserving lordship and monarchy themselves.

 5. Nationalism and language: a post-Soviet perspective

David D. Laitin

The collapse of the Soviet Union meant for millions liberation from a regime that created the Gulag archipelago, in which their relatives, their friends and untold numbers whom they never met were incarcerated and/ or murdered; for millions more it meant the possibility to associate and interact freely with people throughout the globe; for still millions more it meant a catastrophic disruption of working life, of social security and of status in a new society they could hardly understand; for millions again it meant a feeling of hope, of security, of future possibility, as a member of a ‘nation’ that would now have its own state. Hardly to be compared with these earth-shattering effects, it is none the less noteworthy that the Soviet collapse has drawn scores of social scientists back to the seminal work of Ernest Gellner, who gave us a framework for analysing how nationalism arises, when it is powerful and when it is weak.

The most important contribution of Gellner’s work on nationalism has been its unrelenting insistence that the existence of a ‘nation’ is not a sufficient condition for the emergence of nationalism; rather nationalism is the result of the uneven diffusion of industrialisation. The theory is evocatively explicated in Gellner’s ‘just-so’ story, related in Thought and Change, which has a robust plot. In it, there are two territories, A and B, which are parts of an overarching empire. Modernisation hits the world ‘in a devastating but untidy flood’, coming first through A, and only later to B. This means that as A finally ploughs through the misery and dislocation of early modernisation, B will still be mired in it. Impoverished and hopeless youth in B will consequently seek to better their lives by migrating to A. From this situation, different sorts of nationalism will arise. If Bs can blend into A without being noticed, and B’s intellectuals get elite positions in A, then there will emerge a wider A-&-B society, on the road to becoming a nation.

Nationalism will be the doctrine of the A-&-B elites seeking to naturalise state power inside the boundaries of A-&-B, through the standardisation of a national culture. However, if Bs cannot blend in — that is, when Bs are radically differentiated from As by race, skin colour, or religion, what Gellner later calls ‘entropy-resistant’ classifications[286] — the discontent from Bs unable to achieve social mobility in A will express itself in a form of separatist nationalism, of an A vs. B type. In both the A-&-B and A vs. B cases, nationalism was impelled not by culture, but rather by the uneven development of modernisation. [287]

As for language, a cultural feature that is not entropy-resistant, Gellner’s story has clear implications. Clerks are the drones of modern society; full citizenship in such a society therefore requires literacy; and practical necessity demands that all clerk/citizens can communicate efficiently with each other in a single language. Small communities with their own language cannot produce the range of specialists needed to run a modern society; therefore the nation-state is the minimal territorial unit in the modern world. And the nation-state will impose a standard dialect or language within its boundaries, more associated with scholastic high culture than the folk cultures of the peasants — demonstrating that the claim by nationalists that they represent the ‘folk’ is a sham — and this new standard language will become the distinguishing mark of the nation. This theory, however, does not predict a universal industrial culture, or a universal language of industrial society, mainly because uneven development will assure break-away nationalisms (from those places where assimilation is blocked by a jealous working class focusing on cultural difference in order to discriminate against migrants) whose leaders will consecrate some dialect or a language that differentiates it from its neighbour.[288]

The motivating factor in this model is the opportunity for bureaucratic and other literacy-demanding jobs that impels rural folk to learn the elite language of the cities to which they had migrated. If mobility prospects are blocked, these migrants will sense higher expected economic returns for having their own nation-state, where the elite dialect of their language would become the basis for white-collar jobs, and these frustrated job-seekers would then become recruits for a nationalist movement. To be sure, Gellner shied away from this bald economism, and claimed that his theory had been ‘travestied’ by others who held that nationalism was based upon calculations. ‘This formulation’, he protests, ‘is a misrepresentation.[289] He points to the real experience of rural migrants into a city ruled by bureaucrats who speak a language absolutely foreign to them. ‘This very concrete experience’, Gellner imagines, helps them learn ‘the difference between dealing with a conational, one understanding and sympathising with their culture, and someone hostile to it’. From this experience, a sort of ‘love’ can emerge for their culture, ‘without any conscious calculation of advantages and prospects of social mobility’. None the less, Gellner admits, ‘had there been such calculation (which there was not) it would, in quite a number of cases ... have been a very sound one [to become nationalists]’.[290] And so, even though his peasant-migrants never calculated, they more-or-less acted as if they had!

It is an intellectual treat to read Gellner’s clear, acerbic and powerful prose, whether battling Kedourie, one-upping Hroch, or elaborating his alternative vision. Yet, Gellner’s work, especially apparent today when modernisation theory has faced generations of critics, is deeply flawed. Its functionalism runs mad. Its reifications deny human agency. And when the theory does include agents, these agents are portrayed in caricature.[291]

In functionalist logic, the identification of a ‘need’ is used to explain an outcome, ignoring the historical reality that many needs go unfulfilled, to the detriment of organisations and individuals. The need itself, it should be apparent, can hardly explain its fulfilment, though Gellner often writes that it can. In Nations and Nationalism, for example, Gellner summarises his explanation of why centralised states monopolise culture within their boundaries. This kind of state, he tells us:

<quote>

must be so. Its economy depends on mobility and communication between individuals, at a level which can only be achieved if those individuals have been socialised into a high culture, and indeed into the same high culture ... Also, the economic tasks set these individuals do not allow them to be both soldiers and citizens of local petty communities ... So the economy needs both the new type of central culture and the central state; the culture needs the state; and the state probably needs the homogeneous cultural branding of its flock ... So the culture needs to be sustained as a culture, and not as the carrier or scarcely noticed accompaniment of a faith. [292]

</quote>

The needs of high cultures, he earlier asserts, explain the modern reality of nation-states. ‘In the industrial world high cultures prevail, but they need a state not a church, and they need a state each’, we are told. ‘That is one way of summing up the emergence of the nationalist age.’[293]

In his subtle and clever posthumous Nationalism, Gellner softens his functionalist view of social causation. ‘In the second zone’, Gellner writes with his focus on Germany and Italy, ‘nationalism could be benign and liberal; it had no inherent need to go nasty (even if in the end it did).’[294] Here ‘needs’ could not explain fascism. But for Gellner, that is an anomaly. Usually, needs create fulfilling outcomes.

As in many functionalist accounts, Gellner relies on a technique of reification, giving human attributes to unspecified globs of humanity or territory. ‘Mankind is irreversibly committed to industrial society’, Gellner preaches. [295] How precisely one can feel, or see, or measure this commitment, or find precisely where it resides, is left to the readers’ imaginations. ‘Cultural minorities’, we are told, ‘refrain from developing an effective nationalism because they have no hope of success ... ‘[296] How do groups of people, most of whom don’t know each other, we can ask, ‘refrain’ from doing anything? Elsewhere: ‘advanced lands do not have any interest in sharing their prosperity with the ill-trained latest arrivals’. [297] How can we attribute ‘interests’ to lands?

Reifications come from all corners of his work. In his chapter on ‘What is a Nation?’ in Nations and Nationalism, he affirms that ‘Polities then will to extend their boundaries to the limits of their cultures ...’; that ‘[N]ationalism uses the pre-existing, historically inherited proliferation of cultures ... and most often transforms them radically’; that ‘The cultures [nationalism] claims to defend and revive are often its own inventions’; that ‘[S]ocieties worship themselves brazenly and openly ... in a nationalist age’; that ‘[Nationalism has its own amnesias ... which ... can be profoundly distorting’; and that ‘Modern ... society ... believes itself to be perpetuating ... a folk culture.’[298] And in Nationalism, he writes that in his second zone, that of Prussia and Italy, ‘A nation wanted its own state in addition to its own main poet ... ‘[299] In these snippets, polities, nationalism, and societies are humanised, and are given intentions and goals. His argument with Hroch is revealing. In it, Gellner points out that Hroch ‘faces one of the most persistent and deep issues in this field: is it nations, or is it classes, which are the real and principal actors in history?’ [300] Gellner never even suggests that it may be ‘people’.

To be sure, actors are not entirely absent from Gellner’s writings. In Nationalism, Gellner introduces more fully the goals and aspirations of the ‘nationalist’, thereby overcoming some of his functionalism and reification. But his view of nationalists is quite caricatured. Nationalists are in fact aware, ‘with great bitterness’ that their nations did not always exist.[301] Perhaps, though, some were aware with a sense of irony, or maybe were not aware due to self-imposed amnesia, that their nation did not always exist.[302] And immediately following, Gellner writes, ‘The nationalist squares the assumption of the universality of nationalism with its widespread absence ... by claiming that it was there ... but ... asleep.’[303] ‘Reawakening’ is indeed a common trope by nationalists; but the presentation of this line of nationalist thought hardly captures the complex set of reasons that motivates real nationalists. Caricatured visions of actors are an insufficiently powerful substitute for a functionalist logic without any actors at all.

Gellner’s use of functionalism, reification and caricature, in my judgement, were for him a shorthand, to elide the issue of mechanisms, in order to get at the basic structure of nationalism. In that regard — where nationalism is firmly placed into a social calculus — I am thoroughly in debt to Gellner’s work. What I propose to do is to purge Gellner’s theory of its excessive functionalism and reification in order to specify more precisely the mechanisms he chooses to ignore. Thus I want to construct a more plausible micro component as a complement to Gellner’s macro theory.

One way to do this, as I have already suggested, is to assume that people are oftentimes the principal actors in history. Don’t misunderstand; I’m not a radical methodological individualist. By no means am I opposed to macro-theorising, in analysing the structural effects of industrialisation, of state construction, and of interstate conflicts of interest. Rather, I believe that our macro stories must be made consistent with parallel stories told on a micro level. That is to say, the predictions of the macro and micro stories need to be calibrated. It may be the case, for example, from a macro perspective, that cultural minorities ‘refrain’ from nationalism due to low probability of success. None the less, a convincing theory would need to show that for all (or most) members of that set, there would be no individual interest in developing a nationalist programme, and insufficient resources to ‘sell’ it to the putative members of that nation. To be sure, Gellner often reconciles the micro and macro stories, especially when writing about the role of the intelligentsia in the forging of nationalism. [304] But the typical story line has macro-historical forces (industrialisation and modernisation) impelling unspecified actors (minorities, states, lands, classes) — explained by the needs of those conglomerates — into nationalist movements. This requires revision.

What I am proposing is that we discharge some of the weight carried by the functionalist logic in Gellner’s formulation; and replace it with a model that takes individual incentives more strongly into account. In light of this goal, I shall begin by summarising a micro-based story of national revival I have elaborated elsewhere;[305] relying on this model, and data I collected in four of the post-Soviet Union Republics (Estonia, Latvia, Ukraine and Kazakhstan), I then seek to account for nationalist sentiments and actions by the Russians now living in diaspora. The data, once examined on a micro level, allow me to complement Gellner’s theory with a non-functionalist micro-calculus, a calculus that does not require a pure job-mobility motivation that Gellner knew to be inadequate.

 National revivals and the tipping game

Under a variety of conditions — a rationalising state seeking to fashion a common standardised nation within the boundaries of rule; a rebellious region within a state seeking economic, political and cultural autonomy; a wave of migrants moving from one cultural/linguistic zone to another — there will be pressures on people to alter their (or their children's) language repertoires. These pressures often (as with immigrants in the United States to English) seem inexorable; in other cases (for example, the Poles in Russia) they meet with strong resistance; and in still other cases the tides change (as in Catalonia, to Spanish and back to Catalan). As I have already suggested, Gellner has addressed the dynamics of language shift under these precise conditions, but he all too often explained individual shifts based on macro-sociological needs. The theory was at its weakest in translating macro forces into individual actions. Thomas Schelling, in his 'tipping game' models, has made great headway in addressing problems of this sort; in this section I shall put my 'language' version of Schelling's tipping game in a nutshell.[306] Here the focus will be on the pressures faced by the Russian diaspora in the nationalising states of the former Soviet Union.

Consider Figure 5.1. The x axis represents the percentage of Russians who speak the titular language.[307] (Alternatively, and as a much better indicator of assimilation, it could represent the percentage of Russian-speakers who send their children to titular medium of instruction schools). The numbers of Russian parents who have done so is so low as of this writing, that the model does not have much interest. Readers might assume that at a certain point along the x axis — say at around 50 per cent of Russians who speak the titular language — a second tipping game — that involving sending your children to a titular medium of instruction school — is triggered. Meanwhile, the y axis portrays the average pay-off (less learning costs) for a Russian-speaker in the population who acquires facility in the titular language (or who sends her child to a titular medium of instruction school). The utility function represents the pay-off for maintaining a monolingual Russian repertoire; and ITT represents the pay-off for developing a Russian/titular bilingual repertoire (with the medium of instruction tipping game, would represent Russian-language dominance and ITT would represent titularlanguage dominance).

The structure of this game makes for a powerful story about language shift. For one, there are only two stable equilibria, at 0 per cent speaking the titular language or 100 per cent. Anywhere to the left of 'k', the tipping point, the average pay-off for learning the titular language is less than maintaining monolingualism in Russian. Those who speak the titular language will have little incentive to maintain facility in it, or to pass it on to their children. The long-term consequence of this situation is for the society to return to a 0 per cent equilibrium. Anywhere to the right of ‘k’, however, the incentives are reversed. And any Russian speaker who is monolingual will see that her likely pay-off will be higher if she acquires facility in the titular language. If all remaining Russian monolinguals make the same calculation (which would be rational for all those facing more-or-less average costs of learning and pay-offs for success), the trend would be towards 100 per cent facility in the titular language, the second stable equilibrium.

[[j-a-john-a-hall-the-state-of-the-nation-2.jpg][Figure 5.1 Tipping game: Russians into titular society]]

A second crucial element of the tipping game plot is that the difference between the average pay-off for R at 0 per cent and the average pay-off for T at 100 per cent plays almost no role in individual choice. Suppose the average individual pay-offs for Russian-speakers at 100 per cent along the x axis were much higher than the average individual pay-offs for Russian-speakers at 0 per cent along the x axis. Here, we might say that there were strong macro (economic, political or social) incentives for assimilation. But if the status quo were at 0 per cent, there would be no incentive for a particular individual to shift her language repertoire. In this case, the ‘needs’ of the society would not be met by the actions of its members. This portrays graphically the flaw in Gellner’s functionalist formulations.

Each of the utility functions has an unusual shape, and this merits some comment about two assumptions hidden in those curves. My first assumption is that at 0 per cent along the x axis, there will be extremely high rewards for a few Russian-speaking individuals to serve as what Abram de Swaan calls ‘monopoly mediators’ between the elites of the nationalising state and the cultural minority. [308] These mediators serve as translators of the laws and regulations of the polity to their community; and serve also as interlocutors to the state apparatus on behalf of members of their community who need special services from the state. If there are virtually no bilinguals, and if bilingual titulars abjure playing such a role (or are not trusted by the minority community) the returns on learning the titular language (for some Russians) would be great, raising the average pay-off, making it come close to the pay-off for at 0 per cent on the x axis. This is why TT drops at first before rising as more and more Russian-speakers become fluent in the titular language.

My second assumption is that as the society moves towards 100 per cent of Russian-speakers (and their children) who are fluent in the titular language, many people in that community will feel a sense of wistfulness that their culture is disappearing as a viable aspect of the society/polity in which they live. (This is especially the case amid the second game, in which the choice is whether to send your child to a Russian or titular medium of instruction school.) While people will yearn for the days of yore, when the culture of the immigrant community was intact, only a few individuals will have an incentive to maintain monolingualism in Russian. Those who do (when most other members of the Russian-speaking community have become either bilinguals or monolinguals in the titular language) will become cultural heroes. Elsewhere I have called them the 'lonely philologists and half-forgotten poets' who pine for the day when interests change, and the pay-offs favouring a Russian language revival increase.[309] These philologists would become the vanguard of the revival. But with no revival in sight, they will get honour and respect from members of the assimilated community who remember their roots, and perhaps receive professorships in Russian culture in the national university, and their pay-offs at will begin to rise as the society moves towards the right-hand equilibrium.

Economists (and Gellner, in some of his formulations) would have little trouble in calculating the pay-off functions R. and "TT. They would be the expected economic returns for each language repertoire depending on how many other people of the Russian-speaking community had the same repertoire or a different one. If, for example, Russian-speakers project that as the society moves towards its tipping point, it would be impossible to get a job as a sales clerk, as a customs official, as a production manager, or as a teacher, unless one spoke the titular language, they would set their expected economic returns for speaking the titular language as significantly higher than if they maintained their monolingual repertoire.

Utility functions, at least when it comes to language issues, are not nearly so simple. People will be reluctant to reposition (or better, represent) themselves culturally — say by assimilating — if they know people who share their background will taunt or ostracise them or their children. They will be equally reluctant if they know that assimilation is like being an Alice on the Queen’s chessboard. The closer they get, the more the fashion leaders of the high culture change their styles in order to create a moving target. Gellner hinted at these factors, but never specified them in his Just-So stories.

In light of these considerations, and relying on Petersen, who addressed issues of assimilation in the realm of volunteering for military service, I postulate two other variables that help constitute the language utility function, both having more to do with status than income.[310] First, there is the value of in-group status. Suppose Russian-speakers who attempt to learn the titular language (through seeking social relations, or even relations of affection) suffer ridicule, ostracism or even bodily harm from members of their own community. To the extent that vigilantes within the migrant society can impose costs on potential assimilators into the titular culture, the pay-off for TT will be reduced. Secondly, there is the value of out-group acceptance. Suppose Russian-speakers who learn the titular language are easily identified by titulars, and are barred from enjoying the fruits of assimilation. Titular clubs, social groups and spouses remain off-territory for assimilators, or nouveaux-titulars. Under such conditions (even if they could get decent employment that requires knowing the titular language), the returns for TT, compared with RR, will be lowered.

A number of important questions relating to this model and its predictions in regard to assimilation versus a separating nationalism will remain unanswered. First is the question as to how the three elements of the language utility function get combined, and with what weighting. Secondly, there is the question of how to build into the model the opportunities and constraints set by the policies of the nationalising state. It makes a big difference if the state subsidises language instruction for its minorities, or whether the governments refuse even to sponsor the publication of textbooks oriented to teaching the outside group how to speak the national language. There may be precious little ‘choice’ involved if there are no opportunities to learn it. Thirdly, there are a range of other realms in which assimilation can take place — in dress, in surnames, in diet. The relationship of language assimilation to these other forms, and how they play into one another, awaits specification. Despite these theoretical lacunae, the data analyzed below demonstrate that expected economic returns cannot tell the whole story of assimilation, at least at the early stages of language rationalisation in the newly nationalising states of the former Soviet Union. And furthermore, I shall demonstrate that concerns of in-group and out-group status can be made part of a rational calculus in questions of assimilation and nationalism.

 Russians in the post-Soviet diaspora

The 25 million Russians living in the now-independent states that were formerly Union Republics of the Soviet Union find themselves somewhat like ‘Bs’ in Gellner’s just-so story of nationalism. In the course of Russian and then Soviet modernisation, Russians moved, or were forced to move, where there was land or jobs. Similarly, non-Russians moved in large numbers into Russia and into areas ‘foreign’ to them. In a variety of ways, often quite distinct from the standard stories of state-building, the leaders of Russia and the Soviet Union sought to create a wider national identity that would incorporate all Bs (Tatars, Georgians, Estonians, Ukrainians, etc.) into an A-&-B nation-state. With the collapse of the Union in 1991, however, the As have become Bs: Russians are the migrants living in ‘nationalising states who seek social mobility within those states’, but are also subject to discrimination there and are therefore potential recruits for a counternationalism as ‘Russians’, whether through secession, regional autonomy movements, or out-migration. [311] The question of the fate of these 25 million Russians, a sort of ‘beached diaspora’, remains unanswered.

An economistic interpretation would have us look at the relative modernisation of the nationalising state and Russia. To the extent that the former is ahead of Russia (e.g. Estonia and Latvia), the diaspora would remain in the titular republic; to the extent that it is behind (e.g. in Kazakhstan), the diaspora would migrate back to Russia in search of the better things in life associated with advanced modernisation. In the former case, where the Russians remain, the theory would then demand that we look to social mobility prospects within the nationalising state for Russians. If they are more-or-less equal to that of the titulars (and this would happen where the working class could not easily distinguish titulars from Russians, for example in Ukraine), the theory would predict assimilation by Russian-speakers into the standard language of the titular republic. If the Russians face discrimination through easy detection (for example in Estonia or Latvia), the theory would predict a counter-nationalism, led by the Russian-speaking disaffected intelligentsia living in the titular republic.

To put these predictions to the test, but with more of a focus on individual incentives than Gellner's formulations would have demanded, I collected data on the adaptations of Russians to their diasporic condition in four former Union Republics — Estonia, Latvia, eastern Ukraine and northern Kazakhstan. In this chapter, I will report on only two elements in this organic chain of data. The first is a high-n random survey, comparably administered in each of these republics, where we asked titulars and Russians about their knowledge of languages, their use of the titular and Russian language in a variety of domains, their social and demographic situation, and their attitudes and expectations about assimilation, out-migration, and mobilisation for nationalist goals.

The second research technique used in the project and to be reported on here is called the 'matched-guise' test, first administered in Montreal by Lambert, and revised by Woolard in her research in Catalonia. [312] My research team and I administered the test based on Woolard's standards in the four republics in which we had our high-n survey. The goal of this test is to ascertain the degree of status people receive for speaking a particular language, independent of knowledge about the speaker's economic achievements or failures. I used these data to get 'scores' for the in-group and out-group status variables that partly constitute the utility functions in the tipping game.

To administer the matched-guise test, you need to recruit two bilinguals (in Russian and the titular language). We chose one bilingual whose first language was Russian; and another whose first language was the titular language. We then translated a neutral passage (about a mathematical concept) into Russian and the titular language. Each bilingual read the passage into a tape recorder twice, once in each language. We alternated the four 'voices' on the tape so that the same person did not speak consecutively, and we played the tape in front of audiences of secondary school students. Never in our administration of the tests (nor in Lambert's or Woolard's) did any student pollute the research by noticing aloud that a single person was speaking in two different guises. Mter the test, students were generally surprised and delighted to hear about the 'trick'.

Students were asked to 'judge' each voice on a scale of 1 to 6, telling us what sort of person they imagined, just by hearing the voice. The students were given a variety of criteria in which to judge the voices, such as pleasant, attractive, spiritual, witty, cultured, open, magnanimous, intellectual, educated, self-confident, proud, having leadership qualities, diligent. Through confirmatory factor analysis, we differentiated the rankings into two primary factors, that of respect and friendship. Students were also asked to speculate about what sort of job they thought the speaker held, and these were coded by levels of status. From the answers to our questions, we were able to rank the degree of friendship and respect accorded to a single person, whether she was speaking in the titular language or Russian.

Relevant data from the surveys, from the matched-guise tests, and from a few other sources of published data, are presented in Table 5.1. The dependent variable that is of consequence for a test of Gellner's theory is the reaction of the diasporic population to the nationalising projects of their new states in which they are now citizens/subjects. Consequently, I shall focus here upon the openness of Russian-speakers to assimilation into titular society. As Table 5.1 shows, five survey questions (rows 2–7) tapped different levels of openness in the four republics.

On the dependent variable, openness to assimilation, Latvia's Russians are by far the most open. Nearly half of the Russian respondents answered that assimilation represents the best future for Russians in their republic, more than twice as many as Russian nationals in Ukraine (row 2). The figures for Estonia and Kazakhstan are considerably lower. Similarly, on the question of whether all Russians in the titular republic should be fluent in the titular language, over 70 per cent of Latvia's Russians in our survey agreed. Here Estonia's Russians were in second place, followed by Ukraine and then Kazakhstan. On the question of whether Russians in the republic should abjure claims to territorial autonomy (row 5), over 70 per cent of Latvia's Russians agreed. Here Ukraine was second, Kazakhstan (surprisingly, given the reported sentiments in the Russian press of Russians in the north of the republic) third, and Estonia fourth, as Russians in the north-east of the country showed a strong desire for autonomy. On the question of whether the titular language should be a required subject in all schools in the republic (row 4), there was widespread agreement among Russian respondents in all four republics, with those in Latvia coming in a close second to the Russians in Estonia; those in Kazakhstan were most reluctant to be required to study Kazakh. Finally, there was a question of how the respondent would react if a state official addressed an inquiry to him or her in the titular language. In which language, we asked, would you respond? For respondents who speak the titular language with great difficulty (row 6), those in Latvia were most likely to respond in the titular language, accommodating to the state language. The answers get more interesting when we look at that sub-set of respondents who claim to speak the titular language well (row 7). Among Latvia's Russians, most would respond in the language of the questioner, and in the language they know well. But in the other three republics, there is strong resistance to this accommodation norm. Note well that 36 per cent of Ukrainian Russians who speak Ukrainian freely would none the less respond in Russian. The figures for Estonian and Kazakh Russians show similar resistance. Overall, on a single dimension of openness to assimilation, it appears that Latvia's Russians are most open, that Estonian and Ukrainian Russians are a far second, and Kazakh's Russians are least open to assimilation in Kazakh culture.

Table 5.1 Explaining openness to assimilation: Russians in Four Republics

| Estonia | Latvia | Kazakhstan | Ukraine |

| Variable |

| 1. Tipping Axis (% of Russians who speak titular language (1989 Census; those who think it it or speak it freely, from survey) | 13.8; | 21; | 0.86; | 33.3; |

| | 6.4 | 20. l | 3.5 | 26.4 |

| Dependent variable: Openness to assimilation |

| 2. Best future for Russians in this Republic | 7.9 | 48.4 | 7.7 | 23.l |

| is to assimilate (survey, only Russian respondents) |

| 3. All permanent residents should be | 58.2 | 70.6 | 23.0 | 36.9 |

| fluent in the titular language, % of Russian respondents who agree (survey) |

| 4. Titular language should be a required | 95.8 | 95.2 | 64.4 | 84.7 |

| subject in school, % of Russian respondents who agree (survey) |

| 5. Russians in this republic have no right | 24.2 | 71.5 | 46 | 49 |

| to territorial autonomy, % of Russian respondents who agree (survey) |

| 6. Of all Russian respondents in survey | 45.3; | 48; | 16.5; | 20.6; |

| who speak titular language with difficulty; | 5.3 | 14.9 | 3.6 | 8.0 |

| and with great difficulty, % who will answer the question of a government official in the titular language |

| 7. Of all Russian respondents in survey | 25; | 16.7; | 50; | 16.7; |

| who ‘think in’ the titular language; speak | 11.8 | 0 | 33.3 | 36 |

| it freely, % who will answer the question of a government official, asked in the titular language, in Russian. |

| Independent variable: expected economic returns |

| 8. Regression analysis: job status explained based on knowing titular language (B; SE B), from survey | 0.4313; | -0.237; | -0.0043; | 0.3456; |

| | 0.0826 | 0.0998 | 0.0588 | 0.0539 |

| 9. Matched-guise: mean quality of job — for Russian in Russian guise less quality of job for Russian in titular guise (positive number means higher prestige for Russian speaker, speaking Russian) | 0.349 | 0.268 | 0.225 | 0.949 |

| 10. Economically useful to learn titular language (from survey) | 72.2 | 49.5 | 51.6 | 59.2 |

| 11. % of Russians in unskilled labour; ratio of % of Russians in unskilled labour to % ofall respondents in survey | 26.0; | 10.1; | 9.4; | 5.2; |

| | 1.42 | 1.07 | 1.54 | 1.08 |

Table 5.1 (contd)

| Estonia | Latvia | Kazakhstan | Ukraine |

| Independent variable: status returns |

| 12. Loss of in-group status in friendship for speaking titular language (matched guise) | 0.52 | 0.43 | 0.37 | 0.25 |

| 13. Loss ofin-group status in respect for speaking titular language (matched guise) | 0.41 | 0.34 | 0.49 | 0.35 |

| 14. Gain in out-group status in friendship — for speaking titular language (matched guise) | 0.28 — | 0.26 — | 0.21 | -0.33 |

| 15. Gain in out-group status in respect — for speaking titular language (matched guise) | 0.34 — | 0.29 — | 0.45 | -0.49 |

| Independent variable: titular accommodation |

| 16. % of titular respondents in survey who fully accept internationality marriage of son; of daughter | 14.5; | 24.7 | 14.3; | 52.8; |

| | 13.9 | 23.0 | 12.4 | 50.8 |

| 17. Citizen/job rights for Russian monolinguals (judgment of research team) | low/ | pending/ | high/ | high/ |

| restricted | restricted | few | high |

| 18. % of titular respondents in survey who | 65.2; | 88.4; | limitations |

| 39.1; | 32; |

| agree strongly; agree, that titular language | 21 | 6.7 | 21 | 10.7 |

| should be the sole state language of the Republic |

| Intervening sociological variables |

| 19. Linguistic difference of titular language from Russian | high | medium | high | low |

| 20. Religious distance of titulars from orthodoxy | medium | medium | high | low |

| 21. % of Russians in capital city (1897; | 16; 35; | 16; 43; | 58; 70; | 54; 23; |

| 1970; 1989) | 42 | 47 | 59 | 21 |

| 22. % of Russians in republic (1989 Soviet census) | 30.3 | 34.0 | 37.8 | 22.1 |

| Intervening variable: options for exit |

| 23. % of Russians who migrated 1991–93, | 8.26 | 5.95 | 5.80 | 3.14 |

| based on 1991 population |

| 24. Cost of out-migration: % who want to migrate less per cent that thinks it very likely they will migrate (from a 1990 survey) | 23–12=1l | 16–3=13 | 20–2=18 | 26–16=10 |

Notes: Precise questions in the Survey, and all data from it, are available at the Data Archive at the IPSR, University of Michigan. The surveys were conducted from 1993–95. Except for Ukraine (where the survey was conducted only in Kiev and Donets), random samples were interviewed from all regions of the country. Details on the matched-guise data will be published in a related article. It should be noted here, however, that the 'Russian' speaker in Kazakhstan was in actuality a Russified Kazakh who spoke fluent Russian and rudimentary Kazakh. The research team that made judgements for rows 17, 19, and 20 include the author (Estonia), Dominique Arel (Ukraine), Bhavna Dave (Kazakhstan) and Vello Pettai (Estonia and Latvia). Source for row 21: Chauncy D. Harris (1993) 'The New Russian Minorities: A Statistical Overview', Post-Soviet Geography 34:1, pp. 18–19. Source for row 23: Federal Migration Service numbers compiled from RFE/ RL Research Institute. Slavic, Baltic, and Eurasian Archive. Russia and CIS Today: Media News and Feature Digest, 30 July, 1994, no. 518: pp. 39–40. Press Survey: Integratsiya Respublik SNG: Protsess poshel, 'Pereseleniye Narodov Prodolzhaetsya vse dorogi vedut v Rossiyu (po dannym FMS RF)'. Vek No. 28: 29/07-04/08/94, c.7), kindly compiled for me by Lee Schwartz, of the US Department of State, Office of the Geographer and Global Issues. Source for row 24: Survey performed by Moscow News, only of Rusians, compiled by RFE/RL, 15 November 1991. Census data are from the 1989 Soviet census.

The tipping model, if presented as a monotonic process in which positive attitudes towards assimilation increase to the extent that other members of your group have already assimilated, would require some revision in light of these data. If the point on the x axis of the tipping model is coded based on the percentage of Russians who speak the titular language (row 1), one would expect Ukrainian Russians to be most open to assimilation, with Latvians in second, Estonians in third and Kazakhs in fourth place.

What then explains the point on the x axis for each republic at the time of the survey, shortly after the Soviet collapse? From the data on Table 5.1, the answer seems clear: social distance. The proximity of religious doctrine (row 20) and language group (row 19) accounts for Ukraine's Russians (with a Slavic language and Orthodox religion) who are on the point furthest towards assimilation, followed by Latvia (an Indo-European language and Christian in religion), then by Estonia (a non Indo-European language but Christian) and finally Kazakhstan (a non Indo-European language and Islamic). Furthermore, consider the 1989 figures for percentage of Russians in the capital city (row 21) and in the entire Republican population (row 22). The lower the number, a demographic perspective would assume, the higher probability of language assimilation, as the probability of interacting with a non-Russian would be higher. Again, these data are nearly consistent with each republic's point on the x axis (with Estonia and Latvia reversed).

Does this mean that a choice model is not useful for studying assimilation? If cultural distance and demographics can explain placement on the x axis, where do calculations about economic returns and social status come into play? The answer is that under Soviet rule, the pay-offs in status and economic returns for speaking the titular language for Russians hovered around zero; those who learned it did so passively, and the closer you are to native speakers (in terms of cultural or geographic distance), the more likely you will pick up the language at virtually no cost.

In the post-Soviet period, due to the language policies of the nationalising states, where the expected returns for speaking the titular language are much higher, Russian-speakers need to calculate more consciously the potential pay-offs for learning the titular language. Therefore, while a choice model would have had very little value-added in an explanation for bilingual repertoires among Russians living in titular republics during the Soviet era (but much value-added as an explanation for titulars learning Russian!), such a model has greater importance in the present era. In fact, the ordering of the four republics in terms of where they stand on the x axis and where they stand regarding openness to assimilation in the survey suggest that the incentives to learn the titular language have changed in the post-Soviet era. For Russians in the Soviet successor states, as demonstrated by the different rankings on the x axis and on the openness to assimilation variable, there is a new prospective market in language learning; that is to say, it is now a long term humancapital investment worthy of consideration. Let us now examine the utility functions of Russians in their new states (based on survey data) to tease out criteria of their early decisions.

If the tipping model relied solely on expected economic returns and probabilities for occupational mobility, these data present an insurmountable challenge. The data show that the economic returns for speaking the titular language are highest in Estonia, second highest in Ukraine, neutral in Kazakhstan and negative in Latvia. Job prospects and occupational mobility cannot therefore be the principal motor for assimilation. In the four surveys, I regressed job status ofrespondent on his/her knowing of the titular language (row 8). In Estonia, for each level of increase in knowledge of Estonian, Russian respondents' job status category went up nearly a half; in Ukraine, it went up by about a third; in Kazakhstan it was neutral; but in Latvia, it went down by nearly a quarter level! This is reflected in respondent attitudes (row 10), as over 70 per cent of Russians in Estonia agreed that it was economically useful to learn Estonian; 59 per cent of Ukrainian Russians similarly agreed; and again Latvian Russians, of the four republics, agreed in lowest numbers.

The same results are partially confirmed in the matched-guise test (row 9). To be sure, only in Estonia was the job attributed to the Russian-speaker in her titular guise higher in status than in her Russian guise. In the other three republics, the job status of the Russian-speaker in her titular guise was lower than in her Russian guise. But the relative standing is what is of interest. Here respondents in Ukraine had the highest bias in favour of the Russian in her Russian guise. Students in Ukraine envisioned the Russian voice speaking the titular language as having a far worse job than that same person speaking Russian. Latvia and Kazakhstan stand in the middle, where the Russian-speaker in her Russian guise is clearly seen to have a better job, but not overwhelmingly so. Finally, an examination of respondents' actual jobs (row 11) — with the notion that a high percentage in unskilled labour would give the greatest incentive to assimilate, as clerk jobs are the next step up for the children of unskilled labour — suggests that opportunities for social mobility through learning the titular language should be highest in Estonia, which comes in a far third in openness to assimilation. Openness to assimilation, pace the predictions of a pure job-mobility theory, cannot be explained by jobs associated with speaking the titular language and the opportunities in the titular republics for occupational mobility.

The status variables, however, can help account for variations in openness to assimilation that are missed by models that rely primarily on expected economic returns. To be sure, Gellner's writings do not ignore status. In his Encounters with Nationalism, he writes:

<quote>

Modern man enjoys, or suffers from, no ... rigid and reinforced ascribed status. He makes his own position, not by a single contract, but by a vast multiplicity of minor contracts with his fellows. In order to negotiate and articulate these contracts, he must speak in the same idiom as his numerous partners. A large, anonymous and mobile mass of individuals, negotiating countless contracts with each other, is obliged to share a culture. They must learn to follow the same rules in articulating their terms. Cultural nuance no longer symbolises status, for the status is no longer given: but a shared, standardised culture indicates the eligibility and ability of participants to take part in this open market of negotiable, specific statuses, to be effective members of the same collectivity. [313]

</quote>

But for Gellner, in modern society there is no value in sharing, for its own sake, outside of the requirements of the macro-economy, a set of customs or a language. In contrast to this view, the status variables that I elucidated in the discussion of the tipping game, which are captured by the matched-guise test, stand independently from economic rewards or occupational standing.

And they play some role in individual decisions about whether assimilation is desirable.

In-group status — the degree to which respondents of the minority group accept as friends those conationals who are seeking to assimilate — is measured here by the relative scores on friendship and respect measures given to the Russian-speaker in her Russian and her titular guises. The higher the former score in relationship to the latter, the lower is the value of in-group respect for potential assimilators. In all four republics, the mean score (for both Russian and titular respondents) for the Russian-speaker in her Russian guise was more positive (on both friendship and respect dimensions) than for the Russian-speaker in her titular guise. None of the speakers gained points for speaking the titular language for the Russian students making their evaluations. Yet the relative status loss was different in each republic. As Table 5.1 shows (row 12), the Russian-speaker in Ukraine lost least on the friendship dimension in her Ukrainian guise; the Russian-speaker in Estonia lost most. On the respect dimension (row 13), the Russian-speaker in Latvia lost least in her titular guise while again, the Russian-speaker in Kazakhstan lost most. The Russian-speaker in Ukraine had the lowest cumulative loss, followed by the Russian-speaker in Latvia. The Russian speaker in Kazakhstan had the third lowest cumulative loss, and in Estonia the fourth.

As for out-group status — measured here by the degree to which respondents in the titular group accept in friendship and respect members of the Russian-speaking community who seek to assimilate -1 have measured that based on the differential score for titular respondents between the Russian-speaker in her Russian guise and in her titular guise. It is curious — but this point will need to be developed elsewhere — that in all four republics, Russian-speakers suffered a status loss among titulars for speaking in their titular guise! The question here, as with ingroup status, is that of relative losses between republics. On the friendship dimension (row 14), the Russian-speaker in Kazakhstan lost least in her titular guise; the Russian-speaker in Ukraine lost most. On the respect dimension (row 15), the Russian-speaker in Latvia lost least and the Russian-speaker in Ukraine lost most. On the cumulative score, the Russian-speaker in Latvia lost least, the one in Estonia second least, the one in Kazakhstan third least and the one in Ukraine lost most.

Two other measures of out-group acceptance add to the data from the matched-guise test. From material in the survey, but also in actual political life, I sought data on whether Russians were accepted as potentially equal to titulars in the social and political domains. The more accepted, the higher the ‘out-group status’ score, and the greater the likelihood of assimilation. First, in the survey, we asked respondents what they thought of a marriage of their son (and then their daughter) to a person of another nationality. Of the titular group who responded to this question (row 16), Ukrainian respondents were most willing to accept non-Ukrainians as members of their family, while Kazakh respondents were least willing to do so, with the Estonian respondents quite close to the Kazakhs. Secondly, in an examination of citizenship and language laws (row 1 7), I sought to rank the four republics based on the degree to which Russians were accepted immediately and without question as citizens, and eligible for sensitive government jobs (these jobs I consider measures of status, and not so much for expected income). These would be tests of the degree to which there were restrictions put upon Russian-speaking permanent residents of the republics in the immediate post-Soviet period. The greater the restrictions, the lower the out-group status. As Table 5.1 indicates, Ukraine was the most accommodating of the four republics; Latvia second (it is far in front of Kazakhstan on the first and weakly behind in the second), Kazakhstan third and Estonia fourth. In an average of the four indicators of out-group acceptance, Ukrainians are most accommodating, Latvians a close second, Kazakhs third and Estonians last.

How best to understand the lay-out of the dependent variable, openness to assimilation? The high assimilationist attitudes of Russians in Latvia (despite low economic returns) and the low assimilationist attitudes of Russians in Estonia (despite high economic returns) are worthy of special comment. Russians in Latvia, based on calculations of economic returns for learning Latvian, should all remain monolingual and have little interest in assimilating. Yet in our survey they show a greater willingness than respondents in the other four republics to do so. An examination of status returns — that Russians in Latvia do not abandon fellow Russians who are seen to be speaking Latvian as much as Russians in two of the other republics; and that Latvians do not scorn assimilationist efforts by Russian-speakers as much as the titulars in all three other republics, coming quite close to Ukraine's score — may well be part of the answer. Concern for friendship and respect of one's own in-group, and a sense of acceptance ofassimilationist moves by members of the out-group, irrespective of occupational returns, play an important role in calculations about assimilation. Similarly, Estonia's high score for economic returns for assimilating is counteracted by the low (in-group and out-group) status scores received by Russians who speak Estonian. [314] This helps explain the relatively low scores in Estonia on the dependent variable. Further research, applying the model to cases that were not used to fine tune the theory, is obviously necessary to work out the precise weighing of the components of the tipping model. But it should be clear already that status concerns, by both in-group and out-group, motivate orientations to assimilate or to sustain cultural difference. And while a simple occupational mobility calculus is clearly inadequate, a theory of nationalism based on calculations of economic and status concerns does not do injustice to social reality. In fact, in ethnographic fieldwork that complemented the data collection for this project, my colleagues and I found it quite normal for Russian-speakers in these republics to calculate the expected value oflinguistic assimilation.[315]

Consistent with the tipping model, but ignored in my earlier formulations of actor utility functions, are calculations concerning the possibility of return to one's homeland through emigration. Here the data help make sense of why Ukrainian Russians are far less open to assimilation than the position on the x axis would have predicted.[316] It also helps make sense of why Estonian Russians, who are closer to Kazakhstan's Russians on the x axis, and rebuffed strongly by Estonian policies, are as open to assimilation as are Ukrainians. As can be seen in rows 23 and 24 in Table 5.1, in the 1991–3 period, a lower percentage of Russians from Ukraine migrated to Russia than any of the other three republics included in this study. Yet of the four republics, more Russians in Ukraine claim they want to migrate, and more claim they think it likely they will migrate. What this suggests is that Russians in Ukraine in the Soviet period were passively picking up Ukrainian, without giving it much political or economic significance. Once Ukraine became independent, they feared that assimilation would be at the expense of their Russianness, and developed anti-assimilationist attitudes. Few have left because there has been little pressure on them to Ukrainise; but they know it will be easy (compared with other republics) to do so if necessary.

The high expectation along with the low realisation of migration suggests a community that will resist assimilation, if forced upon them, through out-migration.

Estonia, on the other hand, has had relatively the highest out-migration of Russian-speakers, along with the second highest score for Russians wanting to out-migrate. This suggests that the Russians who remained were those most accepting of Estonian society. Even though in the 1989 census less than a quarter as many Russians in Estonia than Russians in Ukraine claimed to speak the titular language — in the survey the figure was less than half as many, suggesting that most of those who left were those who knew no Estonian — Russian respondents in Estonia on the dependent variable of this study were about equal to those in Ukraine. Not only did the economic returns help explain the closing of the incentive gap, but the possibilities and actualities of exit also played an important role.

More work needs to be done in conceptualising the role of exit for assimilation. On the one hand, high levels of exit might lower incentives for assimilation. Because foreign residents can say that if things get tough, they can always leave, the possibility of exit should lower the incentive to assimilate. On the other hand, high levels of exit might indicate that the anti-titulars are all leaving, with only those willing to assimilate remaining. With a lower percentage of Russians in the republic, due to high exit, it might also make the chances for a binational republic (the Belgian model) seem more remote, thus adding incentives to assimilate. This is why I have not yet included out-migration figures, or the cost of out-migration, into the tipping calculus at this time. But the three variables — economic returns, in-group status and out-group acceptance — have given us an excellent first cut into the issue of the possibilities for A-&-B national states in the liberated Union Republics of the former Soviet Union.

The true test of the tipping model, at least in its former Soviet republics domain, will not be available for many years. The model predicts that in cases where the expected returns for assimilation begin to appear positive for a few social or demographic groups of Russians in the post-Soviet republics, this will alter the pay-offs for closely related social or demographic groups. There should then be a slow but steady growth of potential assimilators. But at some point in this process, there should be a rapid acceleration, as all Russians come to believe that assimilation is inevitable. As we near the tipping point, the incentives for Russian political entrepreneurs, whose status is based on representing the Russian-speaking population as Russians, would be strong to coercively induce fellow Russians to resist assimilation, and to return to ‘their’ culture. In republics where growth is slow, with few Russians having positive expected returns for assimilation, the model predicts stagnation or negative growth intergenerationally in assimilators. In this case, Russian political entrepreneurs will maintain their representative monopolies to speak for the Russian-speaking population, and they will likely bargain for regional autonomy, as have the Flemish population in Belgium. Obviously, the data in the early moments of nationality politics in the Soviet successor states, which produce only a snapshot, cannot pick up these trends. But future research can and should. Ernest Gellner’s work opened the gates to the study of social and economic sources of nationalism and assimilation; the possibility for long-term comparative study to refine Gellner’s models — thanks to the Soviet collapse — is too inviting to disregard.

 Notes

The research for this chapter was supported principally by a grant from the National Science Foundation, Grant POLS/SES92125768, David Laitin and Jerry Hough, principal investigators. The surveys could not have been completed without the aid of Jerry Hough, Susan Lehmann, Michael Guboglo, Tanya Guboglo, Aksel Kirch, Maria Kirch, Tarmo Tuisk and the NSF-supported field team that worked with me: Dominique Arel, Bhavna Dave and Vello Pettai. Presentations of earlier drafts of this chapter at UCLA, All Souls College, and at the Central European University in Prague all provoked stimulating comments, many of which have been incorporated into the published version. I would like to thank Jeff Frieden, Diego Gambetta and John A. Hall for those invitations. James Fearon and Ernst Haas read and commented on an earlier version of this chapter leading to substantial revisions.

[286] E. Gellner, Nations and Nationalism, Oxford, 1983, ch. 6.

[287] Gellner, Thought and Change, London, 1965, pp. 166–8.

[288] Ibid., pp. 158–63. In Nations and Nationalism, Gellner writes about ‘assimilation’ without providing a formal definition. Because many citizens throughout the globe are fully incorporated into political life without having assimilated, it seems unduly provocative, as Alfred Stepan pointed out at the Prague presentation of this paper, to hold this to be the criterion of ultimate loyalty of a nation-state. None the less any theory of the nation needs to have a criterion of culture shift in line with a national standard, for which the term assimilation is perfectly appropriate. In ‘Marginality: A Microperspective’, Rationality and Society, vol. 7, 1995, I defined assimilation as ‘the process of adoption of the ever changing cultural practices of dominant society with the goal of crossing a fluid cultural boundary separating marginal groups from dominant society’. I believe this definition to be consistent with Gellner’s use of the term.

[289] Gellner, Nations and Nationalism, p. 61.

[290] Ibid., p. 61.

[291] Gellner’s core argument, in what he refers to as the LSE debate on nationalism (Encounters with Nationalism, Oxford, 1994, p. 61), is that the motivating factor in inducing nationalism is industrial society. In my judgement, especially when he considers sub-Saharan Africa, he uses fancy footwork to ignore disconfirming evidence. African nationalism clearly was not motivated by industrialisation. So Gellner substitutes (Nations and Nationalism, p. 82) the dubious fact that nationalism developed in Africa because Europeans were intent on setting up an ‘eventually industrial type of society’. Intentions (such as they were) to set up an industrial society are quite a different matter from industrialisation itself. This chapter is not concerned with the causes of nationalism, and it will not enter the LSE debate. Rather, this chapter is concerned mainly with the elaboration of the mechanisms which translate the macro forces (whether they are from industrialisation, modernity or ideas) into micro incentives for people to assimilate into a cosmopolitan culture or to seek fulfilment as a member of a separate nation, built on cultural materials recognisable from their rural roots.

[292] Gellner, Nations and Nationalism, pp. 140–2.

[293] Ibid., pp. 72–3.

[294] E. Gellner, Nationalism, London, 1997, p. 54.

[295] Gellner, Nations andNationalism, p. 39.

[296] Gellner, Thought and Change, p. 174.

[297] Ibid., p. 167.

[298] Gellner, Nations and Nationalism, pp. 55, 56, 58.

[299] Gellner, Nationalism, p. 53.

[300] Gellner, Encounters with Nationalism, p. 194.

[301] Gellner, Nationalism, p. 8.

[302] See, for example, J. Diez-Medrano’s discussion of Sabino de Arana in Divided Nations: Class, Politics and Nationalism in the Basque Country and Catalonia, Ithaca, 1995.

[303] Gellner, Nationalism, p. 8.

[304] Gellner, Thought and Change, pp. 169–70.

[305] D. Laitin, Language Repertoires and State Construction in Africa, Cambridge, 1992.

[306] T. Schelling, Micromotives andMacrobehaviour, New York, 1978, ch. 7.

[307] Because the now-independent former Union Republics each had a major language group after which it was named, they are commonly referred to as ‘titular’ nationalities, who are now, as leaders of nationalising states, promoting the titular language of their republic.

[308] A. de Swaan, In Care of the State, Oxford, 1988, ch. 3.

[309] D. Laitin, ‘Language Games’, Comparative Politics, vol. 20, 1988.

[310] R. Petersen, ‘Rationality, Ethnicity, and Military Enlistment’, Social Science Information, vol. 28, 1989.

[311] R. Brubaker, ‘National Minorities, Nationalizing States, and External National Homelands’, Daedalus, vol. 124, 1995.

[312] W. Lambert, Language, Psychology and Culture, Stanford, 1972; K. Woolard, Double Talk, Stanford, 1989.

[313] Gellner, Encounters with Nationalism, pp. vii-viii.

[314] As suggested to me by Terry Martin, the long periods of cooperation between Russians and Latvians, for example in their mutual participation in the prerevolutionary Social Democratic Movement, may help explain the feelings of mutual respect shown in the matched guise. Russians and Estonians have not had similar types of mutual cooperation. Furthermore, the greater neighbourhood mixing of Russians in Riga, as compared to Russians in Tallinn, due mostly to relative size of groups, may also play a role. Whatever the deep causes of difference, this chapter is emphasising the mechanisms — having to do with status concerns that show up differently in the two Baltic Republics — that drive everyday behaviour.

[315] This theme is elaborated in my Identity in Formation: The Russian Speaking Populations in the Near Abroad, Ithaca, 1998.

[316] Perhaps it is not the perceived ease of exit, but rather the quasi-utopian belief by Russians in Ukraine that one day there will be an Anschluss, that weakens incentives for them to learn Ukrainian. This possibility was drawn to my attention by Valeri Khmelko, whose data show the strength of desire for re-Union with Russia among Russians in eastern Ukraine.

 6. Ernest Gellner’s theory of nationalism: some definitional and methodological issues

Nicos Mouzelis

 Nationalism and industrialisation

A standard criticism of Gellner’s theory of nationalism is that he tries to establish too contiguous a link between industrialisation and nationalism, whereas in fact the two phenomena are not always very closely linked. It is quite possible to have industrialisation without nationalism (for example, the proto-industrialisation of several regions in western Europe), or nationalism without industrialisation (as in the nationalist movements of the Balkans and Latin America in the nineteenth century).

Gellner has replied to this criticism in two ways. First, he has stressed that he uses the term industrialisation in a broad sense:

<quote>

which includes the earlier commercialisation of society, which only becomes ‘industrial’ in a narrower sense (power machinery, large scale production) later, thereby however allowing the social changes already initiated by commercialisation to be preserved, extended, and to become entrenched. [317]

</quote>

Secondly, he has pointed out that his theory focuses on the emergence rather than the subsequent diffusion of nationalism. Once nationalism is seen as rooted in the industrialised west, its adoption in several nonindustrial parts of the globe does not create any special problems for his theory.[318]

Both these points of defence present certain difficulties. The problem with the first is that the motor force that brought about a special type of social structure which, according to Gellner, ‘requires’ a nationalist ideology might have to do less with industry or the market than with the development of the state. As Michael Mann, Anthony Giddens and others have pointed out, it was geopolitical competition between European states that — via the development of military technology, the building up of national armies eventually based on conscription, the spectacular increase of taxes through the centralisation and rationalisation of tax-gathering techniques, and so on — finally destroyed political, economic and cultural localism. [319] This break-up generated unprecedented processes of social mobilisation, in the course of which a large number of people, whose lives had previously been embedded within the rigid structures of traditional local communities, were brought into the politico-administrative centre. This in turn resulted in a marked shift in orientations and loyalties from the local periphery to the ‘imagined community’ of the nation-state.

One might well say that this politico-military ‘bringing in’ was greatly facilitated by market developments. But even if this is conceded, as well as the close and dialectical relation between state and market developments, it is still perfectly plausible to argue that, in the eighteenth century, it is military rather than economic technologies that primarily explain the spectacular development of state bureaucracies and their unprecedented penetration of the societal periphery. This ‘infrastructural’ development of the state, to use Mann’s terminology, [320] eventually led to the transformation of absolutist states into nation-states, and of ‘subjects’ into ‘citizens’. In other words, the vast evolution of state infrastructures cannot be viewed as a merely ancillary, derivative process; it was at the very centre of the development that brought about the type of transformation of orientation and identity that is at the centre of Gellner’s work.

Gellner’s defensive argument about the diffusion of nationalism to non-industrialised parts of the world also faces serious difficulties. It is easy to explain why nineteenth-century Greek merchants became nationalists:

<quote>

Greek navigators and traders on, say, the island of Hydra, when they supported and financed the Greek nationalist revolution, must have been fully aware that traders in, say, Marseilles, were safer, freer and richer than they, and the idea that they would share these advantages in a Greek, non-Ottoman state, if they succeeded in creating it, could hardly have been long in coming.[321]

</quote>

All this is perfectly true. However, it is rather less easy to explain without reference to internal social structures how these nationalist sentiments spread to the lower echelons of the social pyramid, at a time when both commercial and industrial capitalism was very weak. [322] In other words, if the processes of diffusion and imitation explain quite well the development of elite nationalism, it does not help to explain the shift from elite to mass nationalism in the nineteenth-century Balkans. For this shift to become understandable requires taking into account the partial destruction of localism in these societies by the enormous development of state bureaucracies and national armies.[323] In the Balkans, therefore, more dramatically than in western Europe, the ‘bringing-in’ process was primarily initiated and sustained by a politico-military rather than economic-industrial logic and dynamic.

Although all cases of nation-building involve the destruction of localism, the shift of orientations from the periphery to the centre and the creation of broader ‘national’ arenas, the major force bringing about this huge and unprecedented change was not always or predominantly industry- or market-related. This becomes still more obvious if we consider nation-building in post-1945 African societies. In these cases, the creation of national armies, public bureaucracies and wide mass media networks had more to do with nation-building and national ideologies than with the development of industrial or commercial capitalism.

These criticisms do not, of course, invalidate Gellner’s theory: they simply suggest that it should be modified in specific ways. Once one accepts, as I do, an elective affinity between nationalist ideology and the type of centralised non-segmental broad arenas brought about by interrelated state and market expansion, then Gellner’s thesis is still relevant if the term ‘industrialisation’ is replaced by the more inclusive ‘modernisation’. If modernity is taken to mean the kind of social arrangements that were institutionalised after the English industrial and French political revolutions, that is, if the term describes the destruction of localism and the creation via unprecedented social mobilisation, of broad social areas in the social, political, economic and cultural spheres, then we can argue that the elective affinity that Gellner tries to establish is not between nationalism and industrialisation, but between nationalism and modernity. In some cases modernity came about via predominantly market means, in others via predominantly politico-military means.

If this is accepted, then Gellner’s tripartite neo-episodic typology of history (that is, his division between pre-agrarian, agrarian and industrial eras)[324] is less usefol for understanding the emergence and development of nationalism than a political coercion based typology of say, stateless societies, societies with traditional state structures, and societies with highly ‘penetrative’ and ‘infrastructurally’ effective strong states.

 Gellner’s functionalism

A second, and by now standard, critique of Gellner’s theory of nationalism focuses on the functionalist character of his basic idea that a certain type of society (marked by social mobility, fluid relative egalitarianism, anonymity, semantic/communicative rather than physical work, and so on) requires a context-free medium of communication — i.e., a nationalist ideology based on mass literacy/education. This immediately conveys the impression that the needs of ‘Industria’ are illegitimately transformed into causes which more or less automatically create nationalism.

Gellner has defended his position by arguing, as have Merton and others, [325] that functionalist analysis is not necessarily teleological. He posits that one can avoid the illegitimate transformation of needs into causes by spelling out the mechanisms that link Industria’s functional requirements with the emergence and consolidation of a literacy-linked, context-free nationalist idiom. These mechanisms are related to the fact that people who fail or refuse to acquire such a nationalist idiom feel frustrated, disadvantaged, second-class citizens. More precisely:

<quote>

Political and economic forces, the aspiration of governments for greater power and of individuals for greater wealth, have in certain circumstances produced a world in which the division of labour is very advanced, the occupational structure highly unstable, and most work is semantic and communicative rather than physical. This situation in turn leads to the adoption of a standard and codified, literacy-linked (‘High’) idiom, requires business of all kinds to be conducted in its terms, and reduces persons who are not masters of that idiom (or not acceptable to its practitioners) to the status of humiliated, second-class members.[326]

</quote>

All of this can be usefully be represented schematically:

(A) the advanced division of labour, unstable occupational structure, and so on;

is linked to

(B) adoption of a literacy-linked idiom:

is linked to

(C) the refusal to accept or adopt the idiom being so ‘dysfunctional’ for the individual that attempts at resistance are peripheralised or peter out.

I find the linkages between (A), (B) and (C) convincing if they are conceptualised not causally, but in terms of compatibility and noncompatibility — that is, in terms of elective affinity. Any move from elective affinity to causality proper — or, to use Sahlins and Service’s terminology,[327] any move from general to ‘specific evolutionary’ analysis — requires much greater context specificity in respect to history and agency, and particularly to questions of collective agency.

So in order to establish linkages between (A), (B) and (C) in one or several countries or cases, it is necessary to bring into the analysis not only vague ‘meanings’ but real actors, playing specific games. For instance, what kind of groups or individuals created the literacy-linked idiom, and were there struggles for the construction of competing idioms? Which groups or categories of actors were against all literacy-linked idioms, and which were in favour of a nationalist solution? To what degree was the idiom that prevailed consciously constructed, and to what degree was it an unintended consequence of different struggles or games? Which groups or categories of people were unwilling/willing to learn the nationalist idiom, and what form did their peripheralisation take?

Brendan O’Leary makes a point similar to mine when he argues that a way out of Gellner’s difficulties is to replace a functionalist explanation by what Elster calls a ‘filter’ explanation.[328] This is an explanation that shows how the intentions of actors operate as filters linking favourable conditions with the construction of nationalism:

<quote>

Modernising elites believe that nationalism is essential for modernisation, precisely because it breaks down barriers to modernising success. Nationalbuilding nationalists recognise the beneficial consequences of nationalism, and this fact helps explain its political diffusion.[329]

</quote>

O’Leary is only partly right here. There is no doubt that ‘recognition’ and/or the adoption of conscious strategies is an important mechanism linking functional requirements — or, to use a more fashionable terminology, favourable conditions of existence — with nationalism. But the importance of this mechanism varies from one case to another. Sometimes recognition and conscious strategies do play a central role, at other times they are less prominent. In the latter case, unintended consequences such as those Gellner mentions (for example, the petering out of anti-idiom reactions due to their greater dysfunctionality) are much more crucial.

This leads us to the conclusion that the passage from elective affinity to causality proper requires contextual specification via the more serious introduction of actors as not only products but also producers of their social world. This is to say that the shift from functional to causal analysis requires both O'Leary's 'recognition/conscious strategy' and Gellner's 'peripheralisation/petering-out' mechanism. The latter is more closely linked to the notion of unintended consequences, in the sense that it considers the emergence of nationalism in effect with reference to the method of elimination: it explains why alternative solutions to the adoption of a nationalist idiom failed. [330] Needless to say, it is an empirical question whether the former or the latter mechanism is the more important, given that their respective weight varies from one case to the next. For instance, for obvious reasons conscious strategies of nation-building are more prominent in late modernisers, such as the Greek traders mentioned by Gellner himself.

 Is a general theory of nationalism possible?

The discussion about the linkages between functional and causal explanations brings me to my third and final point. This is that Gellner's theory is less a substantive theory (Generalities III in Althusserian terminology) than a very useful conceptual framework (Generalities II in the same framework), with the help of which one can raise interesting questions and investigate in more historically and culturally specific ways and in a more finite, context-bound but still comparative manner, nationalist developments in various parts of the globe.[331]

Another way of saying this is to argue that, despite what Gellner himself says, his industrialisation/nationalism thesis is less of a theory than an ideal type suggesting an elective affinity between industrialism (or, better, modernity) and the literacy-linked idiom we call nationalist or nationalist ideology. From this point of view, the methodological similarity with Weber's Protestant ethic thesis is quite striking. In the same way that Weber's famous thesis establishes an elective affinity between Protestantism and 'bourgeois rational capitalism in the West', so Gellner, following the same procedure, establishes compatibilities between Industria and nationalism. In neither case has adequate causality been achieved, though this is claimed by the authors. It was not achieved for the very simple reason that one cannot provide adequate causal linkages by the sweeping, ‘armchair’ manner in which both these theorists attempted to establish this connection. The only difference between them in this context is that Weber was more cautious, or more aware of the ideal-typical nature of his theory, than was Gellner. The latter has great faith in the ability of the social sciences to produce very general, substantive theories (Generalities III, in Althusserian terminology) about such global phenomena as nationalism, industrialism and revolution.

As for myself, I am more in accord with Weber than with Gellner in this regard. I do not think that a theory of nationalism both general (that is, applying to all types of nationalism) and substantive (that is, telling us non-trivial things) is possible. Or, to put it more cautiously, I believe that a general as well as substantive theory about the linkages between industrialisation and nationalism is bound to be either true but trivial, or wrong — in the sense that its statements will apply in only certain conditions which, given the theory’s generality, will have to remain unspecified. This point of view does not necessarily imply that generalisations are impossible in the social sciences. It rather leads to the idea, which is quite explicit in Weber’s methodology, that interesting generalisations in the social sciences take one of two forms:

(i) that of a finite, context-sensitive substantive generalisation based on a historically and culturally sensitive comparative methodology (generalisations such as are found, for instance, in the works of Barrington Moore and Michael Mann);

(ii) that of ideal types constituting conceptual tools useful for investigating interesting problems, and for preparing the ground for the construction of more substantive, that is, more context-sensitive, theories.

In other words, I accept Ken Minogue’s objection that Gellner’s theory cannot greatly help to explain the specific course taken by the linkage between industrialism and nationalism in France, Germany or India.[332] But if we consider, as I do, his theory to be a conceptual framework, an ideal-type, then I think it is a highly useful instrument for raising interesting questions and producing a myriad of suggestive points that a more historically-oriented sociologist can take up to construct more substantive, context-bound theories of nationalism.

 Conclusion

In contrast to Gellner, I see his theory of nationalism not as a substantive theory but as an ideal-type — an ideal type which, in its conceptual ingenuity and heuristic utility, compares quite favourably with Weber's equally ideal typical theory about the connection between Protestantism and capitalism. I also think that, contrary to the standard claim of his critics, Gellner's functionalist reasoning, being non-teleological, is perfectly legitimate and highly useful. One simply has to be aware that it establishes linkages between Industria and nationalism on the level of elective affinity, rather than on the level of historical causality; to move from the former to the latter requires a greater recognition of collective actors and their games than is present in Gellner's work — and indeed in functionalism more generally.

[317] E. Gellner, 'Reply to Critics', in J. A. Hall and I. C. Jarvie, The Social Philosophy of Ernest Gellner, Amsterdam, 1996, p. 638.

[318] Ibid., pp. 632ff.

[319] M. Mann, Sources of Social Power. Volume One: A History of Power from the Beginning to 1760 AD, Cambridge, 1986 and 'The Emergence of Modern European Nationalism', in J. A. Hall and I. C. Jarvie, eds., Power, Wealth and Belief, Cambridge, 1991; A. Giddens, The Nation-State and Violence, Oxford, 1985.

[320] M. Mann, ‘The Autonomous Power of the State: its Origins, Mechanisms and Results’, European Journal of Sociology, vol. 25, 1984.

[321] Gellner, ‘Reply to Critics’, p. 632.

[322] N. Mouzelis, Modern Greece, London, 1978 and Post-Marxist Alternatives, London, 1990, pp. 103–10.

[323] For the marked discrepancy between the politico-military growth of bureaucracies and the persistent backwardness of Balkan economies in the nineteenth century, see L. S. Stavrianos, The Balkans since 1453, New York, 1968.

[324] E. Gellner, Plough, Sword and Book, London, 1988.

[325] R. K. Merton, Social Theory andSocial Structure, Glencoe, IL, 1963, ch. 1.

[326] Gellner, ‘Reply to Critics’, pp. 629–30.

[327] M. D. Sahlins and E. R. Service, eds., Evolution and Culture, Ann Arbor, 1960.

[328] J. Elster, Ulysses and the Sirens, Cambridge, 1979, p. 30.

[329] B. O’Leary, ‘Ernest Gellner’s Diagnoses of Nationalism: A Critical Overview, or, \What is Living and What is Dead in Ernest Gellner’s Philosophy of Nationalism?’, this volume, p. 52.

[330] For an early discussion of these mechanisms as the only legitimate means to move from functional to causal analysis, see R. Dore, ‘Function and Cause’, American Sociological Review, vol. 26, 1961.

[331] On levels of theory, see N. Mouzelis, Sociological Theory:: “What Went Wrong?, London, 1995.

[332] K. Minogue, ‘Ernest Gellner and the Dangers of Theorising Nationalism’, in Hall and Jarvie, The Social Philosophy of Ernest Gellner.

* Part III: Bringing politics back in

 7. Nationalisms that bark and nationalisms that bite: Ernest Gellner and the substantiation of nations

Mark Beissinger

Anyone familiar with Ernest Gellner’s work cannot help but be struck by the tension that runs throughout it over the inevitability and the contingency of nationalism. On the one hand, Gellner identified the rise of nationalism with the global, secular transition from Agraria to Industria. Challenging liberal and Marxist claims that nationalism was in fundamental conflict with the requirements of modern society, Gellner maintained that nationalism rather was rooted in industrialism — and specifically, its generalisation of a ‘high culture’ as a means for effecting a complex and constantly shifting division of labour. As Gellner wrote, ‘Although those who participate in it generally, indeed almost without exception, fail to understand what it is that they do, the movement is none the less the external manifestation of a deep adjustment in the relationship between polity and culture which is quite unavoidable.’[333]

At the same time, Gellner consistently maintained that nationalism in its specific manifestations was ‘a contingency, not a universal necessity’. For Gellner, it was the dog that failed to bark that provided the vital clue to understanding nationalism and, specifically, the arbitrariness of its particular incarnation, in sharp contrast to the primordial and inevitabilist claims of nationalists themselves; as he argued, ‘most potential nationalisms must either fail, or, more commonly, will refrain from even trying to find political expression.[334] ‘Nationalism as such is fated to prevail’, he wrote, ‘but not any one particular nationalism.[335] While nationalism may be inevitable, the concrete materialisation of nationalism — the outcomes of its struggles and the forms it assumes — are a matter of circumstance.

The argument is at once brilliant and problematic. Nationalism no longer belonged to the history of ideas, nor could it be represented as a mere reawakening of suppressed identities. In the modern world we are fated to invent a universe of contending nationalisms, and if one nationalism were to disappear, another, Gellner tells us, would quickly fill the void. In a world of the universalisation of high culture the nonnational escapes the imaginable, as nations become the vessels within which the modern state and economy must operate. ‘[Nationalism’, Gellner wrote, ‘is like gravity, an important and pervasive force, but not, at most times, strong enough to be violently disruptive.’[336]

But Gellner’s argument takes nationalism out of the realm of the accidental only to deposit it there once again. How is it possible that the processes that produce the phenomenon in general have nothing to do with the processes that produce the phenomenon in its specifics? If most nationalisms are fated to fail, why do any succeed? Is a theory of nationalism which is utterly indifferent to explaining the great variety of forms which nationalism has assumed in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries — from genocide to the multicultural state — an adequate accounting of the phenomenon? Are all of these divergent acts in the name of the nation caused by the same civilisational shift from Agraria to Industria and its accompanying adjustment between polity and culture, and, if so, in what sense?

Like a Marxism without a theory of revolution, Gellner's theory provides no coherent vision of how nationalism works its way into the realm of substantive human action. Certainly, Gellner identified the agents of this nationalist world of our making: the modern state and the nationalist movement. But he stopped short of placing these agents in motion or connecting their acts with the larger social forces which he argued were central to their emergence. At most he pointed to stages through which nationalism naturally developed or 'time zones' in which particular types of nationalist struggles predominated. As he noted on the eve of his death, his theory largely sought to explain 'why nationalism, relatively inconspicuous in the past, is so very salient in our age'. But it 'does not explain why, for instance, German nationalism should have become quite so virulent during the Nazi period. Or again, it fails to explain the firm commitment of anglophone Canadians to the existing Canadian political unit, notwithstanding the fact that anglophone Canadians at any rate have not the slightest difficulty operating within the polity of the USA.'[337] Without a mechanism tying broad social forces to concrete human action, Gellner's ideas can never really be subjected to a rigorous empirical test. 'It may seem convenient for a theory that it should lack specific consequences in a certain area which could help to test its truth', Gellner wrote in Thought and Change. 'Still, the arbitrariness of nationalism was not invented in order to make the theory harder to refute ... '[338]

It is not difficult to deduce that by arbitrariness and contingency what Gellner really had in mind was politics — a subject which, as John Breuilly reminds us,[339] is central to nationalism, and one which is naturally full of arbitrariness and contingency. By directing our attention to the contingent character of nationalisms, Gellner was actually pointing us towards thinking about nationalism and its manifestations as the outcomes of political processes. Gellner provided us with a clear answer (albeit a debatable one) to the question of why the human agents of these processes should care about (and indeed, are often obsessed with) national outcomes: in a civilisational context in which culture matters, the rationalisation of language and education, the determination of the limits of state membership, and the definition of the physical boundaries of the state are central not only to a state’s ability to foster societal wealth on its territory and to state capacity and legitimation, but also affect tremendously the life chances of individuals (or at least are expected to affect them). But Gellner failed to provide us with a coherent answer to the questions of how populations come to care about these things and why actors who care about these things should behave so differently from one another. By relegating the politics of nationalism to the residual category of ‘arbitrary’, Gellner left us without a theory of what might be called the substantiation of nations — i.e. the process by which categories of nationhood take on meaning for large numbers of people and become potent frames for political action. The blackboxing of nationalist politics was hardly unique to Gellner; it is rather typical of genetic and developmental approaches to the subject. [340] But as much as we are interested in knowing why we are national, we are naturally even more interested in knowing why we are national in the ways that we are.

These two questions are hardly separable, for obviously there can be no nationalism without assertions of nationhood, without categories of nationhood becoming a basis for political action. Nationalism achieves political potency only in the form of collective discourse, mass mobilisation or state practice, although it manifests itself in other areas of social behaviour as well. In this sense, a nation must be understood as both a claim and a condition. It is a claim that is inherently ambiguous and contestable, as well as a condition of the generalisation of such claims, their spread beyond a narrow circle of claimants and their translation into human action. As Seton-Watson observed, ‘a nation exists when a significant number of people in a community consider themselves to form a nation, or behave as if they formed one’.[341] But it is not because people ‘think the nation’[342] that we believe that nations exist, but rather because people ‘behave the nation’. They engage in collective behaviours and actions which signal to us that the nation is a category of substance. In spite of the tendency of much scholarship on nationalism to focus on the role of leaderships and ideas in this process, the substantiation of nations is ultimately a mass behavioural phenomenon, not merely an elite or attitudinal affair.

The spread of nationalist behaviours may take place gradually over a protracted period of time (as was true, for instance, in the crystallisation of Russian national identity in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries) or be concentrated in a few defining historical moments (as among Eastern Ukrainians in the fall of 1990 and early 1991). It may be a state-led process (as was true for the French in the late nineteenth century) or a process accomplished by activists and intellectuals (as was true of the French in the late eighteenth century). It may manifest itself in acts of extreme loyalty to the state (as in Japan in the first half of the twentieth century) or in open revolt against the state (as among Tamils in Sri Lanka in the late twentieth century). But if we take politics as the central aspect of the substantiation of nations, then we must reject the notion that the forms assumed by each nationalism are embedded somehow in its cultural code, predetermining its character for all time. The contingency towards which Gellner pointed us means that nationalisms take shape out of interactive processes, not out of essences.

Taking contingency seriously also means introducing path dependency into our understanding of nationalism. Indeed, the variety of behavioural paths which nationalisms may follow is quite substantial. Nationalisms may, in Gellner's phrase, bark or fail to bark. And even when they do bark, it is far from certain that they will bite. It is also hardly apparent whether, where, and how their bites will find their intended target. States may attempt to shape the identities of their populations, normalise boundaries, and alter patterns of language use. But recent history is littered with failures as well as successes, including cases in which apparent success subsequently developed into spectacular failure (witness Gellner's Czechoslovakia). Likewise, intellectuals who propagate nationalist ideas may indeed be in place; they may even attempt to mobilise populations in pursuit of nationalist aims. But whether their messages resonate within populations is very much a matter of context. Nationalists may be forced, for example, to bark behind fences — to operate under severe political constraints which render it impossible for their messages to find resonance in mass behaviour. According to Uzbek nationalists, for example, in spite of a strong sense of Uzbek identity vis-a-vis Russian domination, the high degree of repression carried out against nationalists in 1989 by local authorities and the successful attempts by the state to divide the nationalist movement undermined the efforts of nationalists to mobilise the Uzbek population against Soviet rule.[343] It is natural for us to read history backwards and to project an aura of inevitability, in Candide-like fashion, around those nationalisms which succeed and those which fail. Gellner warned precisely against this tendency. But it is ultimately human agency which shapes how nationalism manifests itself in politics, so that a theory of nationalism without a theory of agency presents serious problems.

Here, we also face the abiding problem of how we know whether categories of nationhood have obtained substance. Anyone can declare a nation into existence. Contrary to Renan, nations are not daily plebiscites; rather, they are punctuated and irregular plebiscites whose timing is largely determined by the rhythms of political authority. The nation may be the largest community to which we pay allegiance when the chips are down. However, in politics the chips are usually not on the table, and it is only in uncommon circumstances that the choice between competing allegiances must be made. Certainly, the resonance of nationalist claims and identities within populations varies considerably over time and is always subject to evolution and change. But in most contexts it is rare when a plebiscite is actually conducted — when categories of nationhood are actually put to the test. The nation usually exists as a form of state or elite discourse, while nationalist frames gain resonance within larger segments of the population only at critical junctures in time. As Merab Kostava, the Georgian nationalist leader, told hundreds of thousands of Georgians massed outside of the House of Government in Tbilisi in April 1989, ‘Every nation has several moments which may be called great.[344]

A nation whose tangibility is never affirmed through its behaviours — through unimpeded and inclusive public discourse, voluntary support for state action, or autonomous mass mobilisation — can hardly be said to exist other than in name only. Elites may believe such a nation exists, and may even act in its name. But unless the nation extends into the beliefs and behaviours of society, such a farce runs a great risk of eventually being punctured. For states and elites to sit on top of society and declare that they represent the nation is without doubt a powerful influence on social behaviour, but it does not in itself make a nation. The barking of nationalism is only one dimension (and perhaps not the most critical dimension) of the substantiation of nations. More important to those of us who actually encounter this animal is whether it bites: whether the noise that we hear is merely a cowardly deception by a weak and harmless creature, the greeting of a loyal friend, or the signal for an impending and savage leap for the jugular.

This chapter takes Gellner’s insight about the contingency of nationalism seriously in order to probe the substantiation of nations as political process. My intention is neither to take contingency out of nationalism nor to turn nations into accidents (both of which, Gellner rightly tells us, are impossible in any case). Rather, the goal here is to place the contingencies of nationalism into a larger understanding of the politics involved in the substantiation of nations in order to help us focus more clearly on what needs to be explained and how we might go about explaining it. I see this as a pre-condition for any empirically based attempt to connect nationalism to the broader social forces of which Gellner wrote, for we cannot answer why we are fated to be national without also answering why we are national in the ways that we are.

 Nationalist contention and the state

I begin by reframing nationalism as a contentious politics in which states vie with societal actors or with other states for control over a certain set of political objects: over the crystallisation of the state’s physical, human or cultural boundaries. As a form of contentious politics, nationalism is a politics of normalisation and contestation, not a teleology of time zones and stages. The outcomes of this interactive process — the resonance or lack of resonance of nationalist frames, the forms of nationalist action which these frames evince and the consequences that these actions leave on the ground — are, as Gellner asserted, unpredictable a priori. The politics of the substantiation of nations always involves significant indetermination, precisely because it involves human agency. But like any path-dependent process, it is neither so opaque nor so erratic as to lack structure altogether. The factors which give shape to outcomes are connected in part with how actors provoke, weather and use to advantage the larger social transformations that have brought nationalism into being. But these connections must be demonstrated rather than assumed. At the same time, outcomes are also influenced by how actors are affected by and utilise to their own advantage the behaviours of others. For nationalism in its concrete manifestations is not an isolated contingent event, but rather a chain of connected contingent events which assume a larger pattern and meaning, especially to those who effect them. In this regard, even a series of connected contingencies that produce an outcome contains a certain structure and regularity which, when subjected to systematic analysis, tell us much about why the beast behaves as it does.

Unlike Gellner, I do not view nationalism merely as a principle or claim, nor do I view it as necessarily an industrial phenomenon per se. It is rather a set of political behaviours oriented towards certain objects in politics: the enclosure of the polity — the drawing of its physical, human and cultural boundaries.[345] These objects are intrinsic qualities of the modern state, and elements which distinguish it from earlier forms of political organisation, such as empires, city-states and kingships. Few premodern polities contained what we would call today a mass membership, elevated mass culture to a central aspect of rule or recognised fixed boundaries (as opposed to frontiers) to their authority. Nationalism emerged concomitantly with the rise of the modern state and the notions of popular sovereignty that materialized in opposition to the modern state's growing appetite and ambitions. These were arguably part of the civilisational transformation which Gellner lumped under the rubric of 'industrialism', and which others have described as 'modernity'. I focus specifically on the modern state rather than industrialism, for it acts as both the central object and subject of nationalist politics and as the principal provocateur of the contingencies of which Gellner wrote. War, repression, mass revolt and popular resistance obviously predate the rise of nationalism. But the nature of these activities was irrevocably transformed by the rise of the modern state and the emergence of mass politics.

The enclosure of the modern state is part of its mode of legitimation and operation. But the physical, human and cultural boundaries of the state are also objects that are inherently ambiguous and controversial. Interests are closely bound up with any given crystallisation of state boundaries, and there is no objective answer to the question of what the proper bounds of the state should be. As Gellner recognised, nationalism attempts to convert the intrinsically ambiguous and controversial into the conventional and seemingly natural.[346] In this sense, nationalism is not simply about imagined communities; it is much more fundamentally a struggle for control over defining communities — and particularly a struggle for control over the imagination about community. In an age of mass politics, when states claim to represent rather than rule over populations, state institutions seek to promote a hardening of boundaries within popular consciousness and among potential challengers by establishing a frame of discourse aimed at moulding attitudes to the ‘reality’ which these institutions project, turning boundaries, in Ian Lustick’s words, into ‘unquestioned features of … public life’ and ‘part of the natural order of things for the overwhelming majority of the population’.[347] Nationalist movements, by contrast, seek to undermine such claims; as Elie Kedourie declared, they ‘make use of the past in order to subvert the present’.[348]

The boundedness of a particular state may be challenged both from above (through war, diplomacy and irredentist activity) or from below (through mobilisation and resistance). As a Janus-faced institution, the state confronts challenges to its boundedness both domestically and internationally. In an age of mass politics all interstate wars are nationalist wars, conducted in the name of nations and purportedly in their interests. As states have increasingly turned to international norms as a way of shoring up boundaries, inter-state war has become an exceptional outcome in the politics of nationalism. Nationalism has become a contest fought primarily within rather than between states, although the battlefields on which these intrastate contests are fought are global and transnational as well. Within this world of bounded but inter-related polities that claim to represent the interests of their memberships, the struggle for control over imaginations defines the possibilities for contestation; as Murray Edelman has put it, ‘government affects behaviour chiefly by shaping the cognitions of large numbers of people in ambiguous situations’.[349]

Necessarily looming large in this struggle for control over imaginations is what Gellner called the ‘cultural equipment’ of the state: its coercive, material and normative power. To paraphrase Gellner, states normalise and contest boundaries through the gun, the dollar and the book. In wielding their coercive power, states not only shape their boundaries and memberships and enforce their rules of cultural interaction. They also attempt to make challenge impossible through the normalising influence of the seemingly immutable reality which state institutions project. There is a strong tendency for individuals to adjust their beliefs to the limits of the possible, accepting a given institutional arrangement as unalterable, natural and even necessary precisely because it cannot be changed. Over time under such conditions, dissonant collective memories are disrupted, undermined and at times supplanted. Gellner, of course, placed great emphasis on the role of states in advancing cultural homogeneity in their efforts to promote wealth. Economic interaction also exercises a powerful normalising effect on the modern state. Within a functioning capitalist (and less so, socialist) context there are powerful material incentives for individuals (even members of ethnic or racial underclasses) to accept dominant conceptions of nationhood and to work within the given parameters of the state. Upward mobility and maintenance of livelihood usually require, at a minimum, acquiescence to boundary rules and tend to promote identification with and internalisation of such rules?[350] Moreover, the linkage of national economies into a global economy further constrains boundary change, since transnational economic actors function through the receptacle of the state and have always demonstrated a penchant for the stability of state units. As Gellner asserted, 'The interdependence of society's diverse parts seems to make it susceptible to conformity.'[351] States also shape imaginations about boundaries directly through their ability to inculcate ideas and shape expectations. Here, it is not only the roles played by education and the universalisation of high culture in the consolidation of conceptions of nationhood that is important. States also naturalise their preferred conceptions of nationhood through their ability to dominate public discourse. They establish and enforce international norms (such as the norm of state sovereignty) that are intended to shape expectations and fend off challenges to boundary regimes. And they establish and manipulate symbols in an attempt to generate identification with them.

But nationalism would not be the troublesome force that it is, nor would states have to wield this equipment, were it not for the fact that the efforts of states to define their physical, human and cultural boundedness engender controversy and evoke opposition. As a political activity nationalism always involves two types of interacting participants — those who defend a given order, and those who challenge it or are viewed as challenging it. Indeed, contestation was embedded in the state's rationale for inventing national communities in the first place. Historically, nationalism emerged concomitantly with the appearance of both the national state and the nationalist movement, the latter pitting challengers 'against the people who run national states'.[352] Like the modern state, the social movement also is a product of modern civilisation. The notions of boundedness and the revolutions in technology, economy and communications which gave rise to the national state also gave rise to the national movement as a vehicle for opposing the claims of the state. States sought to pre-empt these oppositions through the creation of national communities, but also evoked these oppositions through the cultural interests embedded in them.

Nationalist movements contest prevailing conceptualisations of the physical, human and cultural boundedness of states through various forms of disruption, resistance and mobilisation. The aim of such contestation is to seize control of the state in order to remake its boundaries and rules or to cause sufficient disturbance so that those who control the state accede to such claims. Those who challenge a given crystallisation of state boundedness must convince populations that such shifts are not only desirable, but also possible. The role of hegemony and compliance in the constitution of belief is precisely why opportunities are critical in the politics of identity. By attempting to disrupt the boundaries of the permissible and the possible, nationalist movements not only seek to convince target populations and opposing forces of the correctness and desirability of change. They also seek to embolden people to express ideas which activists believe lie repressed beneath the surface of outward behaviour. In Soviet Latvia on the eve of perestroika, for instance, most Latvians ‘appeared to take Soviet institutions for granted’ and viewed Soviet control as ‘a permanent state of affairs’, even though there was an implicit awareness among a large number of Latvians that they lived in an occupied country. But in the summer and fall of 1988, as nationalist movements ‘tested the limits of the permissible’, public opinion shifted towards support for Latvian independence. Even so, as one astute observer notes, ‘not all were prepared to say that their lot would be improved by totally separating from the larger system’.[353] Public opinion surveys conducted in June 1989 revealed that only 55 per cent of Latvians favoured independence for Latvia. One year later the proportion of Latvians that supported independence had risen to 85 per cent.[354] Only over a two-year period of protracted challenge and mobilisation and after nationalists had gained control over segments of the state did a generalised desire for independence crystallise among Latvians.

In linking the politics of the possible and the thinkable, the contingencies of which Gellner wrote begin to loom in front of us more sharply. Nationalism is not a constant, but a variable over time. Nationalist politics is punctuated by broader cycles of contention — parabolas of mobilisation and disruption which rise and fall largely as the possibilities for challenge shift. These opportunities are primarily shaped by what takes place within and to state institutions.[355] Splits within ruling coalitions, an opening or liberalisation of the parameters of permissible discourse, severe stresses on the capabilities of states caused by war or other external factors, fundamental realignments of forces within a ruling coalition, and the example of analogous challenges elsewhere to the state — all these are widely known to evoke nationalist eruptions. The crises of the state and its institutional order provide the circumstances for the conduct of plebiscites of nationhood. Opportunities do not in themselves create challenge. Rather, they transform the ways in which challenges manifest themselves in politics, and they become occasions by which the hitherto inconceivable, impossible and ambiguous can come to be viewed by large numbers of people as thinkable, necessary and transparent. In this regard, cycles of nationalist contention are central to the process of identity-change, for they provide the context in which a massive reimagining of the nation becomes possible. For groups challenging the state, these ‘moments of madness’, when the social world turns upside-down and that which was formerly anathema comes to be embraced as convention, are critical elements in the substantiation of nations and the rise and institutionalisation of identities. [356]

For most individuals the nation as behavioural form exists as a mere moment in time, receding in the aftermath of the consolidation of state authority to the back corridors of consciousness and relinquishing its place to more mundane and everyday concerns. In the aftermath of mobilisation the nation may become institutionalised as a ubiquitous and implicit assumption of social life, or it may remain the object of continued contention by states and nationalist movements in anticipation of another plebiscite looming on the horizon. It may be an object of guilt rather than glorification for acts committed in the emotional fever of contention, or an artificial and senseless category embraced at a peculiar political juncture in response to problems which no longer exist. No matter which of these outcomes emerges, nationalism needs to be understood as a protracted, iterative and connected series of efforts to contest and normalise the boundedness of states, albeit a process which clusters in time and across space.

 Contingency and the substantiation of nations

Of course, not all acts of nationalist contention build into cycles; some are cut short through repression or cooptation, while in other cases the frames put forward by nationalist movements fail to resonate significantly within populations. A significant amount of nationalist contention occurs outside of mobilisational cycles, both in the actions taken by states to eliminate potential sources of contention and by challengers who refuse to accept state authority and behave dissonantly. A great deal of focus in the study of nationalism has been on this ‘quiet’ politics of nationalism outside of mobilisational cycles — and in particular, on the cultural equipment wielded by the state and the challenges posed by nationalist intellectuals.[357] In phases of quiescence states attempt to institutionalise behaviours and identities to prevent challenges to official conceptions of nationhood, while nationalist challengers seek to counter these efforts through disruption and to prepare populations for moments when direct contestation becomes possible. This they do by strengthening and implanting supportive attitudes and behaviours that can act as resources when opportunities for challenge materialise. The persistence of nationalist beliefs and practices under conditions of severe state repression (and even their transmission intergenerationally) is accomplished by embedding them in diffuse social networks that are relatively less susceptible to state influence.[358] Social psychologists have noted the persuasive influence that can at times be exerted by disruptive minorities — in particular from consistent disruptive behaviour over time that indicates conviction and commitment — especially among those who are minimally committed to a pre-existing position. Persistent conflict ‘transforms the worth of the substance of what the minority asserts’ and exercises an independent influence over the beliefs of majorities.[359]

The myriad nationalisms which Gellner calculated never emerged are largely a function of this ‘quiet’ politics of nationalism and the failure of some categories of cultural difference to produce a web of activists (a failure to bark). Gellner saw the paradox of nationalisms which failed to develop as the key to the arbitrary (i.e. political) character of nationalism’s specific manifestations. But he did not adequately represent the politics that informs this outcome. For one thing, state practices and the meanings which they have for individuals establish the basis for constituting otherness within populations, causing some divisions rather than others to take on meaning in social life. Those who contest the enclosure of states may, for instance, emphasise commonalities with those with whom they are similar linguistically in common opposition against particular centres of power, while a short time later, when sharing the same political space, they enter into competition with one another, emphasising the differences among them — as occurred among the South Slavs in the first half of the twentieth century. The drawing of administrative boundaries (as in the colonial partitions of Africa, South Asia and Latin America) reinforces or undermines already existing cultural identities simply by constituting centres of authority around which identities coalesce and oppositions crystallise. The failure of some nationalisms to materialise (in the example given by Gellner, why a Scottish nationalism should emerge but not a Highland nationalism) has in part to do with ways in which state authority inspired and consolidated oppositions to itself — at times in spite of cultural markers that could have constituted a basis for difference among those challenging the state.

The politics of the possible also exercises an independent effect on whether nationalisms bark — particularly with regard to group size and geographic dispersal. The reservation of the right to self-determination in the form of independent statehood in international norms to groups with large populations and the difficulties involved in attempting to mobilise small or dispersed populations have in some cases prevented nationalisms from ever emerging, although the rise of global communications networks has helped to overcome these obstacles to some extent.

Gellner focused in particular on the ‘cultural equipment’ of the state in the consolidation of nations and the assimilation of groups. To be sure, the state remains the most powerful force shaping conceptions of nationhood. Its very existence and the aura of authority that surrounds its actions exercise a pervasive normalising effect over its conceptions of boundedness. Indeed, in the wake of the collapse of state authority (as, for instance, occurred after World War I and with the disintegration of the USSR in 1991) numerous nation-building projects emerge with almost limitless imagination[360] demonstrating that the institutional constraints imposed by the functioning state confine the ways in which we think about nationhood. There are other goals and trade-offs in how states wield their cultural equipment, and the capacity of states to wield it has differed dramatically from one case to another. The ability of the French state to marginalise nationalist challenges so that they rarely exceed the bounds of quiescence contrasts markedly with the incapacity of the Ethiopian state, in spite of heavy coercion, to penetrate its society and to exercise effectual control over its territories. In cases of permanent state breakdown (as in quasi-states) a ‘quiet’ politics of nationalism may never materialise, with nationalist contestation marked by perennial mobilisation punctuated by phases of exhaustion.

There is a sense today that it is much more difficult for states to wield their cultural equipment than in the past. While it still may be widely practised, the forceful resolution of nation-building is no longer an acceptable solution from the point of view of international norms — an advantage which the English and the French enjoyed over the Kazakhs and the Ukrainians. International norms of human rights and selfdetermination constrain state actions and provide resources to challenging groups, while integration into the global economy renders states all the more vulnerable to disruption and external influence for violation of these norms. The global communications revolution also creates opportunities and resources for those who would contest states by easing barriers to the creation and functioning of networks and movements. Of course, these very same factors — international norms, the global economy and the communications revolution — also constitute powerful tools in the hands of states for nationalising their societies, suppressing minorities, and defining boundaries. Thus, both states and those who challenge states have greater resources available to them today to contest nationalist issues than was the case a century ago. Today, more nationalisms that challenge states from within may bark than in the past. They may even attempt to bite more frequently, making nationalism a more prevalent disruptive force than previously (although not necessarily a more intense disruption). But in general it is more difficult today to break-up a state than it was a century ago. In spite of the disruptive effects of nationalism globally, the outcomes of nationalist struggles are still considerably weighted in favour of states.

In periods of quiescence, state ideologies and institutional practices carve out differential spaces by which groups can engage in quiet challenges to dominant conceptions of nationhood. Indigenous peoples in the United States have contested their sovereignty over natural resources through the legal system of the American state and by appealing to the federal government for intervention vis-a-vis local government. Indigenous peoples in Siberia, by contrast, have sought instead to obtain a foothold within the ethnofederal system of Russia, which they seek to use to consolidate their control over the extraction of wealth from their territories. Ethnofederalism is a good example of an institutional practice established by states in order to co-opt challenging groups, usually as a last resort against widespread claims to secession, but a practice which, contrary to the intentions of its creators, tends to consolidate cultural groups and to provide them with an institutional base for conducting a ‘quiet’ politics of nationalism. But in essence challengers seek to use whatever institutional forms with which they are presented to achieve these same ends. In periods of quiescence challengers attempt to ‘metamorphise the dominant order’, to make it ‘function in another register,[361] either by assimilating it or undermining its integrity. Different institutional configurations present different opportunities for challenging the state, so that state ideologies and organising principles play a large role in shaping the ways in which nationalism takes form.

The ambiguity of goals among challengers — to reform or subvert a given order — ensures that the boundary between within-system and extra-system politics remains fuzzy and imparts a degree of uncertainty and anticipation into the interactions between states and nationalist oppositions. Can states trust nationalist oppositions to act ‘responsibly’ within the confines of a given system of authority? Or are the espoused aims of these movements merely Trojan horses for a more radical agenda? Can nationalist oppositions trust the openings which states provide to them to pursue their goals within the framework of the system? And how should they frame their demands and tactics so as to achieve their longer-range goals?

The transformation of the ‘quiet’ politics of nationalism into a ‘noisy’ politics of nationalism is replete with uncertainties such as these. In the former Soviet Union in the early glasnost period, for instance, nationalist challenges could have been shut down through repressive means, and indeed most nationalist activists expected that this would occur. But Gorbachev viewed these challenges as part of his larger efforts to reform the state, believed that they could be contained, and even encouraged them to some extent. Systems of compliance create their own expectations within populations, and understandings embedded in periods of quiet struggle define how challengers frame opportunities and openings. [362] ‘Our cadres consider non-coercive methods a sign of weakness’, Gorbachev once observed.[363] Given embedded expectations such as these, it is hardly surprising that the switch from coercion to consensusbuilding that glasnost initiated gave rise to an explosion of nationalist challenges.

The ‘quiet’ politics of nationalism shapes many of the resources that challengers and states can deploy and the expectations that they bring with them in periods of ‘noisy’ contention. Still, the ‘noisy’ politics of nationalism, occurring as it does in a transitional context, contains a great deal of indeterminacy. Nationalist violence, for instance, grows in part out of embedded mistrust produced from prior contestation. But a relatively small number of conflict situations actually produce violence, and an even smaller number result in prolonged violent conflict. The strategic interaction between state and society is key in determining whether mistrust builds into violence or takes other forms. Waves of nationalist violence almost always emerge in the wake of significant nonviolent contestation, and chains of precipitating events usually escalate gradually into violence, with small acts of contention creating reactions that move towards a larger violent outcome. The roles played by state institutions in providing channels for non-violent resolution of conflict and in signalling acquiescence and even support for violent actions are critical to the emergence and sustainment of nationalist violence. In many cases state institutions themselves initiate violence directly as a way of consolidating authority against nationalist challengers. The forms assumed by nationalism are shaped in the context of interaction, as embedded assumptions about contenders interact with the constraints and opportunities afforded by political authority.

Within the context of a mobilisational cycle, specific state actions can crystallise opinion around new cultural norms, altering fundamentally the landscape of politics and identities. These significant events exercise a ‘transformative power that goes beyond such obvious political effects as redistribution of power or reshaping of political strategies’. They change ‘the cultural meanings or significations [of] political and social categories’ and ‘fundamentally shap[ing] people’s collective loyalties and actions’.[364] The backlash effects of repression, the outrage that erupts from intergroup violence, the anger that materialises out of specific governmental decisions — all these transform the opinion climate of politics, affecting the prisms through which individuals relate to authority and understand their identities.[365] These actions do not take place in a cultural vacuum; basic categories of conflict are well established by prior contestation. But the manifest assertion of the implicit and the rejection of the overt are themselves bold acts that transform consciousness. Such situations are often characterised by those who live through them as an ‘awakening’, ‘rebirth’ or ‘spiritual revolution’. Gellner was correct to reject the ‘sleeping beauty’ images implied by such discourse. Nevertheless, transformative events often bear a cathartic and even euphoric character — as Anatol Lieven put it, ‘the songs, the tears, the sense of relief as people were able to say in public things which for fifty years they had been scared even to whisper in private’.[366] In this sense, nationalist behaviour must be seen as both a dependent and an independent variable. ‘On the one hand, the social construction of meaning precedes collective action and determines its direction; on the other, collective action in its turn determines the process of meaning construction.’[367]

Understanding the power of the significant event to undermine authority and to transform opinion, nationalist movements consciously attempt to precipitate such events so as to bring about a discursive shift within target populations. In Soviet Georgia in late 1988 and early 1989, for instance, the population’s commitment to independence remained equivocal, to the chagrin of radical nationalists. As one reliable source notes, ‘the majority of people were still not prepared to give them [the nationalists] their active support ... The nation still slept, and it was necessary to awaken it.’[368] In early April 1989 nationalist movements utilised public outrage over Abkhaz demands to separate from Georgia as a lever for shifting the frame of public discourse towards support for Georgian independence. But after the Georgian government took steps to defuse the Abkhaz challenge, Georgian demonstrators ‘had begun to grow tired. It was decided to continue for a couple of days, and then to disperse, in order to gather strength for the next attack, since now ... the sharpness of the issue with which everything had begun had fallen.’[369] Instead, the violent dispersal of a crowd encamped outside the House of Government by Soviet army troops in the early hours of 9 April forever altered the nature of Georgian politics. If, on the eve of the Tbilisi crackdown, the degree of support for independence was confined to a sizeable minority, after the Tbilisi massacres public opinion polls showed that 89 per cent of Georgians believed that Georgia should be an independent country.[370]

As a politics of the possible, cycles of nationalist contention contain many of the characteristics of ‘tipping’ games, in which expectations of success or failure have great influence over whether nationalisms resonate within populations. In Estonia ‘for the majority independence seemed either a pipe dream in 1987, or something one could think about only after meaningful autonomy was attained’.[371] But from June through September 1988 an extraordinary wave of mobilisation in response to openings afforded by glasnost brought about a remarkable transformation in national consciousness. Still, by April 1989 public opinion polls showed that only 56 per cent of Estonians supported complete independence, while another 39 per cent preferred a confederal arrangement within the USSR.[372] By September 1989, as revolt spread to the Transcaucasus, Ukraine and Moldova, the proportion of Estonians favouring independence had climbed to 64 per cent. The East European revolutions of autumn 1989 and the republican elections of January 1990 transformed a large block of Estonian opinion, so that by January 1990 81 per cent of Estonians favoured independence, while only 15 per cent preferred a confederal arrangement within the USSR. By March 1990, when Lithuania declared independence from the USSR, the proportion of Estonians favouring independence had risen to 94 per cent.[373] Nothing breeds identity so strongly as the prospect of success.

But as the above example also illustrates, nationalism takes place within a transnational context in which the behaviours of other populations strongly influence the ways in which a given population thinks and acts. Analogy and example are critical elements in the spread of nationalism, and nationalisms need to be understood as transnational and inter-related phenomena, not merely a collection of individual and isolated national stories. The transnational context of nationalisms overflows the boundaries of any given state, in part because of the ways by which states reinforce their existence through the example of like units.[374] States share common personas — an interconnectedness produced by common institutional characteristics, ideologies or modes of domination which are mutually reinforcing. It is precisely this interconnectedness which becomes a powerful force for spreading nationalism across state boundaries. Families of states sharing similar state personas (and often connected through alliance) are the most directly affected by transnational tides of nationalist contention. Successful nationalist contestation in one state through its example weakens the political order in others and raises expectations among challengers that the boundaries of the state can be contested. Political opportunities are linked transnationally through the linkages of polities themselves. Moreover, those who challenge authority frequently attempt to spread their challenge so as to afford it legitimacy, much like states seek safety through their own reproduction. By demonstrating their power through numbers, both movements and states seek to generate bandwagoning processes, lowering the social esteem of those who fail to identify with them. For precisely these reasons, nationalist challenges tend to strike multiple states simultaneously, encompassing particular regions of the world or families of polities.[375] The barking of one nationalism attracts and incites noise from other animals, and when nationalisms do attack, they tend to do so not as strays, but in packs.

 Reflections on contingency, conformity, and social change

Gellner was quite right in focusing our attention on the arbitrariness and contingencies involved in the manifestation of individual nationalisms. As is evident from the above discussion, there are numerous turning points that any potential nationalism must traverse before it can bark or bite, and whether, where, and how these bites find their targets are also highly conditional. But if the limits of the possible, the interactions between state and society, the role of analogy and transnational influence, bandwagoning processes and transformative events play such conspicuous roles in the substantiation of nations, what then is left of the larger social forces which Gellner identified as the determining factors in the emergence of nations? Does not the politics that Gellner recognised as lying at the centre of nationalism undermine the necessity which his theory prescribed?

Perhaps. Unlike the deterministic relationship between modernity and nationalism advanced by Karl Deutsch or the randomness and accidental character of nationalism posited by Elie Kedourie, Gellner occupied a middle ground between necessity and contingency in the manifestation of nationalism. He confined the influence of both by assuming a world in which human action was profoundly conditioned by larger social forces, but not necessarily determined by them. As he wrote in Thought and Change:

<quote>

The human situation is most conspicuously unlike that of the condemned man. Characteristically, the condemned man is in a situation of most unusual clarity ... and some physical comfort. He knows exactly what his end will be, and when it will come ... Human life is totally unlike this. The end may be certain, but not its date or manner. In the meantime, there is constant opportunity, indeed necessity, for seeking postponement of the verdict and for improving one's condition. [376]

</quote>

Gellner's theory of nationalism attempts to explain the ends for which nationalist politics strives, not the means, manner or context in which that politics must play itself out. But if we are to accept Gellner's explanation as to why the end is ultimately inescapable, the factors which cause it to be inevitable should be leaving their traces on the human actions which effect that outcome. For Gellner's theory to prove true, the contingencies which give shape to specific nationalist outcomes must be connected to the ways in which actors utilise and survive the larger civilisational transformation that, he argues, produces its inexorable result.

To the degree that these contingencies represent autonomous and insular social processes isolated from the broad social transformations that Gellner describes, they present serious problems for the theory. Some of the evidence presented above supports at least the notion of the limited autonomy of these processes, although the boundaries of this autonomy were not interrogated. If nationalist behaviour is determined in large part by the limits of the possible, indeterminant interaction, the example of like behaviour by others, bandwagoning and the influence of singular events irrespective of how the large-scale social forces portrayed by Gellner have played themselves out, the theory at a minimum requires qualification, and possibly revision or rejection. If conformity is responsible for the national behaviour of most individuals, what role then does the transition to industrialism play in making nationalism inevitable and universal?

Gellner of course focused on nationalism in general, not nationalism in its specificity. He eschewed the kind of empirical research that would be necessary to demonstrate the linkages between his theory and substantive nationalist behaviour. As he argued, those who make history may not be cognisant of their connection to any larger force or rationale, but their actions may nevertheless be conditioned by these forces. But Gellner did not prove this to be so. A robust theory of nationalism must provide a connection between what Charles Tilly has called the ‘two rhythms’ of history — the larger social forces that condition social action, and the specific contexts in which social action occurs.[377] One can attempt this either by starting from a theory of social change and exploring how the broad social forces that appear to evoke nationalism into being in the first place come to take form as concrete nationalist action; or one can start from the empirical study of nationalist action, searching for the larger social forces which seem to inform it. Gellner chose the first of these approaches, although he never succeeded in linking his theory of social change with a coherent theory of agency. His blackboxing of nationalist politics was an astute recognition of the ways in which interactive behaviour informs the emergence of specific nationalisms, but is troublesome for the larger theory of social change. In this chapter I have approached the subject from its opposite end — as a theory of agency — without elaborating an adequate theory of social change.

It may be, as Gellner’s theory would seem to assume, that specific aspects of the transition to industrial society condition acts of enclosure by states and the emergence of notions of nationhood, that the punctuated plebiscites that characterise the substantiation of nations are really part of larger crises of transition to industrialism, and that repertoires of nationalist behaviour and the processes that influence the outcomes of nationalist struggles are connected with the transition to industrialism in subtle ways. Alternatively, industrialism per se may have little to do with these phenomena, whose roots rather inhere in the institutions of the modern state itself, as this chapter has conjectured. As appealing as a theory that cannot be proved or disproved undoubtedly is, Gellner’s theory, with its bracketing of the politics of nationalism, cannot be accepted on the basis of faith in the power of industrialism as a force of social change alone. Until we explore systematically and empirically concrete nationalist behaviour and the traces left on it by larger social forces, our explanations for why we are fated to be national and why we are national in the ways that we are will likely remain detached.

[333] E. Gellner, Nations and Nationalism, Oxford, 1983, p. 35.

[334] Ibid., pp. 43, 47.

[335] Ibid., pp. 6, 47.

[336] E. Gellner, Encounters with Nationalism, Oxford, 1994, p. xi.

[337] Ibid., pp. 44–5.

[338] E. Gellner, Thought and Change, London, 1965, p. 174.

[339] J. Breuilly, Nationalism and the State, Chicago, 1982.

[340] Liah Greenfeld, for instance, in her recent study of nationalism, argues that the effects of nationalism in the political realm can be attributed to the original definition of nationalism by nationalist intellectuals: ‘Its effects, in the political, social, and cultural constitution of the respective nations, as well as their historical record, are attributable to this original definition which set the goals for mobilisation, not to the nationalisation of the masses.’ (L. Greenfeld, Nationalism: Five Roads to Modernity, Cambridge, MA, 1992, pp. 22–3).

[341] H. Seton-Watson, Nations and States: An Enquiry into the Origns of Nations and the Politics of Nationalism, Boulder, 1977, p. 5.

[342] B. Anderson, Imagined Communities: Reflections on the Origin and Spread of Nationalism, rev. edn, London, Verso, 1991.

[343] Urnid/Hope, vol. 1, 1992, p. 39.

[344] Ekspress khronika, no. 15, 10 April 1 990.

[345] On nationalism as the enclosure of polities, see R. Brubaker, Citizenship and Nationhood in France and Germany, Cambridge, MA, 1992, pp. 21–34.

[346] As Gellner pointed out (Thought and Change, pp. 150–1), ‘The central mistake committed both by the friends and the enemies of nationalism is the supposition that it is somehow natural ... These assumptions are so much part of the air we breathe that they are generally taken for granted quite uncritically ... The theoretical problem is to separate the quite spurious “national” and “natural” justifications and explanations of nationalism, from the genuine, time- and context-bound roots of it.’

[347] I. S. Lustick, Unsettled States, Disputed Lands: Britain and Ireland, France and Algeria, Israel and the West Bank-Gaza, Ithaca, 1993, pp. 41 and 44.

[348] E. Kedourie, Nationalism, 4th edn, London, 1985, p. 70.

[349] M. Edelman, Politics as Symbolic Action: Mass Arousal and Quiescence, Chicago, 1971, p. 7.

[350] A. L. Epstein, for instance, distinguished, in his Ethos and Identity: Three Studies in Ethnicity (London, 1978, pp. 102–3), between what he called positive identities, resting on ‘self-esteem, a sense of the worthiness of one’s own group’s ways and values’, and negative identities, based on ‘the internalized evaluations of others’, with ‘much of one’s behaviour ... prompted by the desire to avoid their anticipated slights or censure’. As Epstein argued, ‘elements of negative identity are nearly always present where ethnic groups occupy a position of inferiority or marginality within a dominance hierarchy’. Rejection of a subordinate identity and the adoption of an identity associated with dominance is a widespread social strategy connected with attempts to achieve upward social mobility.

[351] E. Gellner, Plough, Sword and Book: The Structure of Human History, Chicago, 1988, p. 234.

[352] C. Tilly, ‘Social Movements and National Politics’, in C. Bright and S. Harding, eds., Statemaking and Social Movements: Essays in History and Theory, Ann Arbor, 1984, p. 304.

[353] A. Plakans, The Latvians: A Short History, Stanford, 1995, pp. 162, 172.

[354] R. Karklins, Ethnopolitics and Transition to Democracy: The Collapse of the USSR and Latvia, Washington, 1994, p. 50.

[355] S. Tarrow, Power in Movement: Social Movements, Collective Action and Politics, Cambridge, 1994.

[356] For an elaboration, see M. R. Beissinger, ‘How Nationalisms Spread: Eastern Europe Adrift the Tides and Cycles of Nationalist Contention’, Social Research, vol. 20, 1996, pp. 97–146.

[357] M. Hroch, for instance, focuses his attention on what he terms Phase B in the development of nationalism (the period of patriotic agitation), which he calls ‘the most important phase’, largely ignoring how and why the emergence of nationalist counter-elites leads to the rise of mass national movements (Phase C), although he notes that ‘Phase B was not necessarily destined to pass over into Phase C.’ On this, see M. Hroch, Social Preconditions of National Revival in Europe, Cambridge, 1985, pp. 22–4.

[358] See H. Johnston, ‘Religion and Nationalist Subcultures in the Baltics’, Journal of Baltic Studies, vol. 23, 1992, pp. 133–48.

[359] S. Moscovici, ‘Innovation and Minority Influence’, in S. Moscovici, G. Mugny and E. Van Avermaet, eds., Perspectives on Minority Influence, Cambridge, 1985, p. 30.

[360] See, for instance, M. R. Beissinger, ‘Demise of an Empire-State: Identity, Legitimacy, and the Deconstruction of Soviet Politics’, in C. Young, ed., The Rising Tide of Cultural Pluralism: The Nation-State at Bay?, Madison, 1993, pp. 109–10.

[361] M. de Certeau, The Practice of Everyday Life, Berkeley, 1984, p. 32.

[362] W. A. Gamson and D. S. Meyer, ‘Framing Political Opportunity’, in D. McAdam, J. D. McCarthy and M. N. Zald, eds., Comparative Perspectives on Social Movements: Political Opportunities, Mobilising Structures, and Cultural Framings, Cambridge, 1996, pp. 275–90.

[363] M. Gorbachev, Zhizn’ i reformy, vol. II, Moscow, 1995, p. 515.

[364] W. H. Sewell, Jr, ‘Collective Violence and Collective Loyalties in France: Why the French Revolution Made a Difference’, Politics and Society, vol. 18, 1990, p. 548.

[365] S. Tarrow, ‘Contentious Event Analysis: Event-fol History, Event Histories, and Events-in-History’, paper presented at the Workshop on Collective Action Research, Wissenschaftzentrum-Berlin, June 1995.

[366] A. Lieven, The Baltic Revolution: Estonia, Latvia, Lithuania and the Path to Independence, New Haven, 1993, p. 219.

[367] B. Klandermans, ‘The Social Construction of Protest and Multiorganisational Fields’, in A. D. Morris and C. Mueller, eds., Frontiers in Social Movement Theory, New Haven, 1992, p. 82.

[368] A. Sobchak, Tbilisskii izlom, iii Krovavoe voskresen’e 1989 goda, Moscow, 1993, p. 49. Sobchak studied these events in detail as head of the USSR Supreme Soviet commission investigating the April 1989 Tbilisi massacres.

[369] Sobchak, Tbilisskii izlom, p. 106.

[370] Vesti iz SSSR, vols. 19/20-2, 1989, p. 7.

[371] R. Taagepera, Estonia: Return to Independence, Boulder, 1993, p. 127.

[372] Vesti iz SSSR, vols. 7/8-4, 1989, p. 10.

[373] J. F. Hough, ‘Editor’s Introduction’, Journal of Soviet Nationalities, vol. 1, 1990, p. 7.

[374] H. Spruyt, The Sovereign State and its Competitors, Princeton, 1994, pp. 167–71.

[375] See Beissinger, ‘How Nationalisms Spread’, pp. 129–36.

[376] Gellner, Thought and Change, p. 145.

[377] C. Tilly, Popular Contention in Great Britain, 1758–1834, Cambridge, MA, 1995.

 8 Nationalism and modernity

Charles Taylor

 I

Nationalism is much talked about these days. I suppose it’s obvious why. The postcommunist massacres in the ex-Soviet Union and ex-Yugoslavia are reason enough. And suddenly this kind of frightening outburst seems in danger of becoming more the rule than the exception. For some people all this is the more shocking in that it seems like a throwback. We thought we had got past this. The Bosnian savagery comes across to these people as an atavistic return, as though primeval identities, and ageless mutual hatreds were being resurrected at the end of the twentieth century. But this can’t be quite the right take on things, because so much in nationalism is quintessentially modern. The Serb-Croat wars disconcert us because they mix an unquestionably modern discourse — self-determination, rule by the people, etc. — with other elements which seem to us alien to (what we understand as) modernity.

Can we hope to understand this? Is there even a ‘this’ to understand here? I mean: is there a single phenomenon? Maybe we’re making things even harder for ourselves by assuming that there is something called ‘nationalism’ which is the same wherever people make demands in the name of ethnic/cultural self-determination, so that Bosnian Serbs and Quebecois are put in the same category.[378] The differences are explained by the first being more ‘extreme’ than the second; rather on the analogy of: neat whisky knocks you out, but taken diluted makes you mellow.

I want to argue that there are big differences here, but also some links. Sorting this out will require thinking in more than one register. One-line theories of nationalism are as bad as such theories invariably are in social science. I am going to try to explore the ways in which various nationalisms are linked to modernity, both to central features of its political culture, and to the stresses and malaises to which it gives rise.

There are explanations which take it up from this latter perspective. Nationalism is an outbreak of emotion which is understandable when people are under strain, because of, say, a disorienting social and economic transition, especially if this is accompanied by hard times. So we understand why lots of Russians voted for Zhirinovsky, even though we deplore it; just as we understand why Algerians voted for the Front Islamique du Salut (FIS) in their last election. Now if things had been going better, if people had felt more secure, or if there hadn’t been so much unemployment and hardship, these extreme and dangerous parties would not have made the headway they did.

There is very often a lot of truth in this last counterfactual proposition. But it does not tell us what is really interesting to know: why nationalism, or Islamic ‘fundamentalism’ are the candidates which are waiting to take up the angry, disoriented protest vote. And this has a lot to do with the progress of what I am calling ‘modernity’, even, perhaps especially, where it seems to take ‘anti-modern’ forms.

 II

So I want first to trace the ways in which nationalism arises out of modern society and the modern state form. Gellner's interesting theory is of just this kind.[379] His is in a sense a functional account. It concentrates on modern societies as economies which by their very nature need to be serviced and (to some degree) managed by the state.

A modern economy is by definition one undergoing growth and change. As such it requires a mobile population, both occupationally and geographically. People no longer will necessarily stay in the same metier throughout their whole careers; and certainly there cannot be the hereditary handing down of metier from parent to child which characterised many premodern societies. This flexibility can be attained only by a high level of general education, literacy and numeracy, one unmatched by any previous society in history. The modern division of labour is multiform but shallow. That is, it is taken for granted that people can be retrained, or at least that their children can. Vocations are no longer linked with the standing status divisions which marked many earlier societies, of which the extreme case is the traditional Indian caste system.

Moreover, this generalised and high level of culture has to be homogeneous. We need people who can communicate with each other, and generally understand each other without having to rely heavily on familiarity with particular contexts of family, clan, locality, provenance, etc. To 'do business' with each other, operate a system of courts, run a bureaucratic state apparatus and the like, we need millions who can communicate without difficulty in a context-free fashion. There has to be a standard language, replacing all the local and class dialects which abounded earlier.

Society needs in a sense a homogeneous culture, in which people have to be inducted to be able to do business with each other across all the particularities of context and background. But how can they be inducted into this culture? Here is where the modern state takes on a specially important role.

In earlier ‘agro-literate’ societies, the high culture was confined to a class, literati and perhaps other top strata. The job of handing on this culture could be assumed by families in some cases, or by special institutions which might take some distance from the state (e.g. the church in premodern Europe). But in the modern context, the task of educating everybody up to scratch is too imposing and too vital to be left to the private sector. Both the scale of the educative enterprise and its essential uniformity dictate that it be assumed by the state. Modern societies/economies are all serviced, inescapably, by a state system of education.

A homogeneous language and culture is fostered and diffused, and hence also to some degree defined by the state. Modern societies necessarily have official languages, almost official cultures. This is a functional imperative. Gellner takes issue with Kedourie: it is not so much that nationalism as a sentiment, as a political aspiration, has imposed homogeneity. Rather homogeneity is a requirement of the modern state, and it is this ‘inescapable imperative [which] eventually appears on the surface in the form of nationalism’.[380]

Now up to this last quote, I think Gellner is basically right. There can be differences in the detailed account, but it seems to me an undeniable feature of modern market, growth-oriented, industrial economies, embedded as they are in bureaucratic polities, that they force a kind of homogeneity of language and culture, both designedly, as through the education system, and by the very way they operate, as through their media. And it seems that this could not very well be otherwise. The demands of this kind of society in trained personnel, above all in retrainable personnel, capable of taking on ever new technologies and operating by ever new methods, the needs for intercommunication across vaster and vaster networks, pushes inevitably to the diffusion of standardised, context-free languages, embedding within themselves a multiplicity of expert ‘language games’. [381] As a consequence of this, earlier ‘network’ identities, linked to family, clan, locality, provenance, tend to decline, and new ‘categorical’ identities, which link us to a multitude of others nationally or even globally — on the basis of confession, profession, citizenship — take on more and more importance.[382]

Compared to earlier societies, which tended to be divided between a ‘high’ culture, the apanage of a restricted class, and a set of partly overlapping ‘folk’ cultures, this modern form tends to universalise a species of ‘high’ (literate) culture, putting a larger and larger proportion of its population through tertiary education, inculcating into many of them a ‘canon’, as ‘high’ cultures have always tended to do to their initiates. As Gellner puts it, ‘a high culture pervades the whole of society, defines it, and needs to be sustained by that polity. That is the secret of nationalism.[383]

All this seems true, but how does it account for nationalism? This seems evident enough to Gellner. If a modern society has an ‘official’ language, in the fullest sense of the term, that is, a state-sponsored, state-inculcated, and state-defined language and culture, in which both economy and state function, then it is obviously an immense advantage to anyone if this language and culture is theirs. Speakers of other languages are at a distinct disadvantage. They either must go on functioning in what to them is a second language, or they get on an equal footing with speakers of the official language by assimilating. Or else, faced with this second distasteful prospect, they demand to redraw the boundaries of the state, and set up shop in a new polity/economy where their own language will become official. The nationalist imperative is born.

People have raised objections to Gellner’s theory on a number of grounds, most notably that it seems to have trouble explaining the rise of nationalism in preindustrial contexts, such as nineteenth-century eastern Europe, and twentieth-century Africa. But I don’t want to dwell on these difficulties, for which there are probably answers anyway. What concerns me is the incompleteness of the explanation.

Some peoples assimilate; they go without much protest into the mixmaster of school and army, and lose their regional dialects. They enter as peasants, and emerge as Frenchmen.[384] Why do some put up a fight and create nationalist movements, while others do not? Or again, if there are two languages widely spoken in a given state, why is it so difficult to come to some arrangement around a form of bilingualism. This does happen, of course, but alas, much more rarely than it should; and it is often fraught with strife and difficulty even where it has been adopted. Why should this be so?

Some people might think that the problematicity of bilingualism needed no explanation. It is so much easier to operate in a single language. The answer is: easier than what? If everyone were willing to agree happily to operate in a single language, we'd be crazy to insist on two. But if the alternative is strife, resentment, separatist movements, perhaps even the dissolution of the state, well, bilingualism isn't really that complicated. In my (admittedly jaundiced) experience of living in a bilingual state, pleas about the trouble and expense of bilingualism are generally technological pretexts for a chauvinism which dare not declare itself openly.

But if that is so, then the crucial explanatory bit is missing from Gellner's account. The reason why some minorities assimilate and others fight back has to be referred to the nationalism of these latter. The reason bilingual solutions are hard is not because they are so complicated and expensive, but because they are resisted (i.e. under the bad faith pretext that they are complicated and expensive) on fundamentally nationalist grounds. That is, nationalism is still figuring in the account as an explanans, not as a successfully accounted for explanandum.

What Gellner has done, which is very valuable, is define some of the very important stakes of nationalist struggle. Just because the modern state does sustain an official language/culture, it becomes of ultimate significance to those with a strong national identity to get some kind of control of a state. The state focus of so much modern national sentiment and national identity, which Gellner makes a matter of definition, is thereby partly explained, and this is no small matter. But the original energy fuelling these struggles remains to be understood. Unless one takes the cynical view (espoused, for instance, by Pierre Trudeau in relation to Quebec independentism) that the whole thing is powered by the ambition of social elites to establish a monopoly of prestigious and remunerative jobs. The refusal of bilingualism is then easily explained: under this regime, our gang get 50 per cent of the jobs, under unilingualism, we get 100 per cent.

Once again, this certainly explains something, but far from everything. It can not explain, for instance, why non-elites are so easily recruited into the nationalist enterprise. Nor does it explain the solidarity of the elites themselves. If you are one of those holding down a top job within the 50 per cent allocated to your language group, why should you upset everything so that some as yet unfavoured compatriots can take over the other 50 per cent? Why side with compatriots against fellow top-job-holders? Of course, not everybody does, but it is one of the remarkable things about the moral pressures of nationalism that many feel they should, and lots do. Where does nationalism get its moral thrust? Totally cynical explanations are powerless to illuminate this.

Lastly, I wonder if we should make the state focus definitional for modern nationalism as Gellner does. Granted, it overwhelmingly takes this form, but not invariably. Thus French-Canadian nationalism, from the nineteenth into the twentieth century, had two forms, of which the dominant one was turned away from the state, and promoted non-state institutions, especially the church. The more familiar, state-centred mode was also there, at least since the rebellion of 1837, but it remained the less powerful strand; that is, until the turn-over of 1960, after which it has taken over the whole field, with the resultant rise of independentism, and the identity switch from ‘Canadien-frarn;ais’ to ‘Quebecois’. Nevertheless, during those many decades before 1960, there were people whom everybody, including themselves, referred to as nationalistes who lacked the state focus. The emotional and moral sources on which they drew were different, but not totally distinct from Quebec nationalists today. We gain nothing by excluding this phenomenon from our purview by definitional fiat.

So the ultimate sources of modern nationalism still escape us. (Perhaps they always will.) But at least we understand better some of the things at stake in modern nationalist struggles, and hence their focus, thanks to Gellner’s account. Before I try my hand at defining the sources, I would like to supplement Gellner’s picture of what is at stake, by bringing to the fore other functional requirements of the modern state.

 III

Modern nation-states are ‘imagined communities’ in Benedict Anderson’s celebrated phrase.[385] We might say that they have a particular kind of social imaginary, that is, socially shared ways in which social spaces are imagined. There are two important features of the modern imaginary, which I can best bring out by contrasting them in each case with what went before in European history.

First, there is the shift from hierarchical, mediated-access societies to horizontal, direct-access societies. In the earlier form, hierarchy and what I am calling mediacy of access went together. A society of ranks — ‘society of orders’, to use Tocqueville’s phrase — like seventeenthcentury France, for instance, was hierarchical in an obvious sense. But this also meant that one belonged to this society via belonging to some component of it. As a peasant one was linked to a lord who in turn held from the king. One was a member of a municipal corporation which had a standing in the kingdom, or exercised some function in a Parlement with its recognised status, and so on. By contrast, the modern notion of citizenship is direct. In whatever many ways I am related to the rest of society through intermediary organisations, I think of my citizenship as separate from all these. My fundamental way of belonging to the state is not dependent on, or mediated by any of these other belongings. I stand, alongside all my fellow citizens, in direct relationship to the state which is the object of our common allegiance.

Of course, this does not necessarily change the way things get done. I know someone whose brother-in-law is a judge, or an MP, and so I phone her up when I am in a jam. We might say that what has changed is the normative picture. But underlying this, without which the new norm could not exist for us, is a change in the way people imagine belonging. There were certainly people in seventeenth-century France, and before, for whom the very idea of direct access would have been foreign, impossible to clearly grasp. The educated had the model of the ancient republic. But for many others, the only way they could understand belonging to a larger whole, like a kingdom, or a universal church, was through the imbrication of more immediate, understandable units of belonging (parish, lord) into the greater entity. Modernity has involved, among other things, a revolution in our social imaginary, the relegation of these forms of mediacy to the margins, and the diffusions of images of direct access.

This has come about in a number of forms: the rise of a public sphere, in which people conceive of themselves as participating directly in a nation-wide (sometimes even international) discussion; the development of market economies, in which all economic agents are seen as entering into contractual relations with others on an equal footing; and, of course, the rise of the modern citizenship state. But we can think of other ways as well in which immediacy of access takes hold of our imaginations. We see ourselves as in spaces of fashion, for instance, taking up and handing on styles. We see ourselves as part of the worldwide audience of media stars. And while these spaces are in their own sense hierarchical — they centre on quasi-legendary figures — they offer all participants an access unmediated by any of their other allegiances or belongings. Something of the same kind, along with a more substantial mode of participation, is available in the various movements, social, political, religious, which are a crucial feature of modern life, and which link people translocally and internationally into a single collective agency.

These modes of imagined direct access are linked to, indeed are just different facets of, modern equality and individualism. Directness of access abolishes the heterogeneity of hierarchical belonging. It makes us uniform, and that is one way of becoming equal. (Whether it is the only way is the fateful issue at stake in many of today's struggles over multiculturalism.) At the same time, the relegation of various mediations reduces their importance in our lives; the individual stands more and more free of them, and hence has a growing self-consciousness as an individual. Modern individualism, as a moral idea, does not mean ceasing to belong at all — that is the individualism of anomie and breakdown — but imagining oneself as belonging to ever wider and more impersonal entities: the state, the movement, the community of humankind. This is the same change — seen from another angle — that I described above in terms borrowed from Craig Calhoun: the shift from 'network' or 'relational' identities to 'categorical' ones.

The second important feature of the modern social imaginary is that it no longer sees the greater trans-local entities as grounded in something other, something higher, than common action in secular time. This was not true of the premodern state. The hierarchical order of the kingdom was seen as based in the Great Chain of Being. The tribal unit was seen as constituted as such by its law, which went back ‘since time out of mind’, or perhaps to some founding moment which had the status of a ‘time of origins’ in Mircea Eliade’s sense. The importance in premodern revolutions, up to and including the English civil war, of the backward look, of establishing an original law, comes from this sense that the political entity is in this sense action-transcendent. It cannot simply create itself by its own action. On the contrary, it can act as an entity because it is already constituted as such; and that is why such legitimacy attaches to returning to the original constitution.

Seventeenth-century social contract theory, which sees a people as coming together out of a state of nature, obviously belongs to another order of thought. But it was not until the late eighteenth century that this new way of conceiving things entered the social imaginary. The American Revolution is in a sense the watershed. It was undertaken in a backward-looking spirit, in the sense that the colonists were fighting for their established rights as Englishmen. Moreover they were fighting under their established colonial legislatures, associated in a Congress. But out of the whole process emerges the crucial fiction of ‘we, the people’, into whose mouth the declaration of the new constitution is placed.

Here the idea is invoked that a people, or as it was also called at the time, a ‘nation’, can exist prior to and independently of its political constitution. So that this people can give itself its own constitution by its own free action in secular time. Of course the epoch-making action comes rapidly to be invested with images drawn from older notions of higher time. The ‘Novo Ordo saeclorum’, just like the new French revolutionary calendar, draws heavily on Judaeo-Christian apocalyptic. The constitution-founding comes to be invested with something of the force of a ‘time of origins’, a higher time, filled with agents of a superior kind, which we should ceaselessly try to reapproach. But, nevertheless, a new way of conceiving of things is abroad. Nations, people, can have a personality, can act together outside of any prior political ordering. One of the key premises of modern nationalism is in place, because without this the demand for self-determination of nations would make no sense. This just is the right for peoples to make their own constitution, unfettered by their historical political organisation.

What is immensely suggestive about Anderson's account is that it links these two features. It shows how the rise of direct-access societies was linked to changing understandings of time, and consequently of the possible ways of imaging social wholes. Anderson stresses how the new sense of belonging to a nation was prepared by a new way of grasping society under the category of simultaneity: society as the whole consisting of the simultaneous happening of all the myriad events which mark the lives of its members at that moment.[386] These events are the fillers of this segment of a kind of homogeneous time. This very clear, unambiguous concept of simultaneity belongs to an understanding of time as exclusively secular. As long as secular time is interwoven with various kinds of higher time, there is no guarantee that all events can be placed in unambiguous relations of simultaneity and succession. The high feast is in one way contemporaneous with my life and that of my fellow pilgrims, but in another way it is close to eternity, or the time of origins, or the events it prefigures.

A purely secular time-understanding allows us to imagine society 'horizontally', unrelated to any 'high points', where the ordinary sequence of events touches higher time, and therefore without recognising any privileged persons or agencies — such as kings or priests — who stand and mediate at such alleged points. This radical horizontality is precisely what is implied in the direct access society, where each member is 'immediate to the whole'. Anderson is undoubtedly right to argue that this new understanding could not have arisen without social developments, like that of print capitalism, but he does not want to imply by this that the transformations of the social imaginary are sufficiently explained by these developments. Modern society also required transformations in the way we figure ourselves as societies. Crucial among these has been this ability to grasp society from a decentred view which is no-one's. That is, the search for a truer and more authoritative perspective than my own does not lead me to centre society on a king or sacred assembly, or whatever, but allows for this lateral, horizontal view, which an unsituated observer might have — society as it might be laid out in a tableau without privileged nodal points. There is a close inner link between modern direct-access societies, their self-understandings, their refraction in categorical identities, and modern synoptic modes of representation in 'the Age of the World Picture':[387] society as simultaneous happenings, social interchange as impersonal ‘system’, the social terrain as what is mapped, historical culture as what shows up in museums, etc. [388]

 IV

What light can these considerations about the social imaginary throw on modern nationalism? It can help illuminate what is at stake in nationalist struggles, just as Gellner’s account did, an account which these considerations in a sense complement. Gellner showed the phenomenon of a state-fostered official language as a functional requirement of a modern state and economy. And in an analogous way there are functional requirements which attend the modern social imaginary.

The horizontal, direct-access society, given political form by an act of the people — this forms the background to the contemporary source of legitimate government in the will of the people. This principle is getting harder and harder to gainsay in the modern world. It comes close to being the only acceptable basis for any regime which does not declare itself as merely temporary or transitional, with the partial exception of so-called ‘Islamic’ regimes — although this does not prevent it from being used to justify the most terrible tyrannies. Communist regimes were also supposedly based on popular sovereignty, and fascism was supposed to emanate from the united will of a conquering people.

Now this has certain functional requirements. Let us first of all take the case where the attempt is made to live out the principle of popular sovereignty through a representative democracy. Now the nature of this kind of society, as with any other free society, is that it requires a certain degree of commitment on the part of its citizens. Traditional despotisms could ask of people only that they remain passive and obey the laws. A democracy, ancient or modern, has to ask more. It requires that its members be motivated to make the necessary contributions: of treasure (in taxes), sometimes blood (in war) and always of some degree of participation in the process of governance. A free society has to substitute for despotic enforcement with a certain degree of self-enforcement. Where this fails, the system is in danger. For instance, democratic societies where the level of participation falls below a certain threshold cease to be legitimate in the eyes of their members. A government elected in a turn-out of 20 per cent can not claim to have the mandate of the people. It can only claim to have got there by the rules, which is much weaker defence if ever it affronts a crisis.

So democracies require a relatively strong commitment on the part of their citizens. In terms of identity, being citizens has to rate as an important component of who they are. I am speaking in general, of course; in any society, there will a wide gamut of cases, stretching from the most gung-ho and motivated to the most turned-off internal exiles. But the median point of this gamut has to fall closer to the upper than the lower limit. This membership has got to be one that matters. In particular, it has to matter more than the things that can divide the citizens.

In other words, the modern democratic state needs a healthy degree of what used to be called patriotism, a strong sense of identification with the polity, and a willingness to give of oneself for its sake. That is why these states try to inculcate patriotism, and to create a strong sense of common identity even where it did not previously exist. And that is why one thrust of modern democracy has been to try to shift the balance within the identity of the modern citizen, so that being a citizen will take precedence over a host of other poles of identity, such as family, class, gender and even (perhaps especially) religion. This may be promoted in a deliberate way, on the basis of an express ideology, as in the case of French Republicanism. Or it may be fostered in more indirect ways, as a consequence of the injunction to render other modes of description — gender, race, religion, etc. — irrelevant in the operation of public life.[389]

But the effect is the same, and we can see that it complements the factors Gellner highlights. Parallel to the homogeneity of language and culture that the modern state-economy can not help fostering, is this homogenisation of identity and allegiance that it must nourish for its survival. In both cases, the features which divide us, which distinguish us into sub-groups and partial publics, fade, either altogether, or at least in their importance and relevance.

How does this connect with nationalism? Well, one obvious link is that nationalism can provide the fuel for patriotism. So much so that we can have trouble distinguishing them. But it is important to keep them distinct, if we want to understand our history. If we think of patriotism as a strong citizen identification, then nationalism is one basis for patriotism, but not the only one. We can speak of nationalism when the ground of the common political allegiance is some ethnic, linguistic, cultural or religious identity which exists independently of the polity. If I am a nationalist, I owe allegiance to this state because it is the state of the Xs, where X is my national identity, one I bear whether or not we are lucky enough or strong enough or virtuous enough to have a state. The whole nationalist idea supposes this pre-political identity, as I said above.

But patriotism can also have the meaning it had for the ancients. I love my fatherland, and what makes it essentially mine is its laws. Outside of these, it is denatured, and no longer really mine. There is no reference to a pre-political identity here; on the contrary, the patria is politically defined. Now this is important, because this was the form that patriotism took initially, in the two great inaugural revolutions of the liberal age, the American and the French. Neither was initially nationalist. In both cases, the nation was taken as given out of previous history (or constructed, in the American case, out of an alliance based on an obvious commonalty of historical predicament), and the patriot was one who sought its freedom. It was later, when (the elites of) other peoples began to feel that they could not attain real freedom by simply revolutionising the existing (often imperial) political structures, or find their place within a liberal empire (ofNapoleon), that nationalism raises its head.

But subsequently, so much does nationalism become the rule, as a basis for patriotism, that the original prenationalist societies themselves begin to understand their own patriotism in something like nationalist terms. Instead of seeing liberal institutions as uncomplicatedly universal, the prevalence of nationalism accredits the idea that in each society they must be tailored to the particular genius of the people. But then even in their original countries of origin where they were at first understood universalistically, they now come to be seen as coloured by particular circumstances and history.

Be that as it may, nationalism has become the most readily available motor of patriotism. So that when leaders want to unite a country, and lift people out of their warring partial allegiances, they appeal to a broader national identity, telling a story which makes this central to the history of their society, rather than the partial identities they are trying to supersede. Thus Nehru in his Discovery of India tells a narrative of Indian identity, the basis of a pan-Indian secular nationalism which would take precedence over the potentially warring communal allegiances, Hindu and Muslim.[390]

There is thus a sort of dialectic of state and nation. It is not just that nations strive to become states; it is also that modern states in order to survive strive to create national allegiances to their own measure. This is a point parallel to Gellner's correction of Kedourie above. Nationalism is not only the motor behind the homogenisation of modern societies; it can also sometimes be the upshot. In order to see this, we have to keep in mind the functional requirement of patriotism.

But this still does not 'explain' modern nationalism because (a) lots of nationalisms arise outside of this state-building process,[391] and (b) we still have to explain why some state-sponsored enterprises of patriotism succeed, and others founder on unconquerable existent identities. (Is the Nehruvian secular Indian nationalism among the casualties?) The ultimate insight still eludes us.

It does however further define the form of the struggles that nationalism gives rise to, clarifies what is at stake in them, in a way parallel and complementary to Gellner's account. This showed how the modern economy and bureaucratic state push towards a state-fostered common language and culture, and thus showed that if a given minority group did not want to assimilate, and ifthe majority was unwilling to give them a place through some regime of bilingualism, then they face the unenviable lot of being forever disadvantaged, and feeling the assimilative pressure on their members inseparable from this lot, and hence ultimately risking the feared outcome of assimilation. So that trouble and strife is built into such a situation.

Analogously here, we see that the modern state must push for a strong common identity. And thus, if a group feels that this identity does not reflect it, and if the majority will not accommodate by modifying the definition of common identity to include this group, then its members feel like second-class citizens, and consequently experience an assimilative pressure. Trouble of some sort must follow.

What this does not tell us is what makes these ‘if’ clauses true when they are. What it does help us to see is that once they are true, then the distressing scenarios of nationalist struggles: separatist movements, assimilation policies, tense compromises, and the like, are not just the result of gratuitous bloody-mindedness, even less of some regression to premodern tribal identities, but are very much the product of a situation of rivalry which is quintessentially modern in its structure and stakes.

A further word here might be helpful about how this latter kind of struggle plays itself out, based on further reflections on the functional requirements of democratic rule. The model of democratic legitimacy requires that the laws we live under in some sense result from our collective decisions. The people for these purposes is thought to form a collective unit of decision. But we do more than decide on issues which are already clear-cut. If that were the case, the best way to do things would be to put everything to a referendum. We also have to deliberate, clarify things and make up our minds. So that the people also has to be conceived of as a collective unit of deliberation.

Now in the meaning of the act, the people is also seen as made up of equal and autonomous members. Because to the extent that this is not the case, and that some are dependent on others, the decision would be held to emanate from the influential part, and not from the whole people.

If we put these two together, we have the idea of a process of deliberation and decision in which everybody can be heard. Of course, if we were very exigent, this would always turn out to be utopian. In fact, democratic societies are usually satisfied with some approximation in principle to this norm. But if it appears that in some systematic way, there are obstacles to certain sections of the population being heard, then the legitimacy of democratic rule in that society is under challenge.

Now there are a number of ways a case can be made out that a certain segment of the population is being systematically unheard. A case of this kind was made on behalf of the working class in earlier times, could be made today with great plausibility on behalf of the non-working, marginalised poor and is often vigorously made on behalf of women. What concerns me here is the way that a case of this kind can be made in relation to an ethnic or linguistic group.

A minority group can come to feel that (a) their way of seeing things is different from the majority and (b) that this is generally not understood or recognised by the majority, that consequently (c) the majority is not willing to alter the terms of the debate to accommodate this difference, and therefore that the minority is being systematically unheard. Their voice cannot really penetrate the public debate. They are not really part of the deliberative unit.

How this feeling could arise must emerge from our ever-deferred search for the sources of nationalism. But we can see from here how destabilising this type of challenge is in a modern democratic society; and that is because it strikes at the very basis of legitimacy in this kind of society. Part of understanding modern nationalism is seeing how vulnerable our societies are to it.

 V

That being said, can we now come to the sources of nationalism? If I could listen to the voice of prudence, I would now plead lack of space, and leave this to some other occasion. But I am going to ignore the trembling of angels, and rush in anyway. Nationalism, I have wanted to say, can not be understood as an atavistic reaction. It is a quintessentially modern phenomenon. It might be thought that the above discussion clears the way for a picture of it as both. What is modern would be the context of nationalist struggles, the stakes and predispositions to struggle, given national sentiment, as these have been outlined by Gellner, supplemented by my remarks (in turn, inspired by Anderson). What is primeval would be the sentiment itself; and so the two can be neatly combined.

But I think that even the sentiment is one which could only arise in modernity, and that is what I now want to explain. Why does nationalism arise? Why could not the Germans just be happy to be part of Napoleon's liberalising empire, as Hegel would have liked? Why did not the Algerians demand the full French citizenship to which they would have been entitled according to the logic of TAlgerie, c'est la France', instead of going for independence? And so on, through an immense range of similar questions.

First, it is important to see that in very many situations, the initial refusal is that of certain elites, generally the ones who are most acquainted with the culture of the metropolis they are refusing. Later, in a successful nationalist movement, the mass of the people is somehow induced to come on board. This indicates that an account of the sources of such a movement ought to distinguish two stages.

So let me try to tackle the first phase: why do the elites refuse metropolitan incorporation, even, perhaps especially when they have accepted many of the values of the metropolis? Here we have to look at another facet of the unfolding process of modernity.

From one point of view, modernity is like a wave, flowing over and engulfing one traditional culture after another. If we understand by modernity, inter alia, the developments discussed above: the emergence of a market-industrial economy, of a bureaucratically organised state, of modes of popular rule, then its progress is, indeed, wave-like. The first two changes, if not the third, are in a sense irresistible. Whoever fails to take them on, or some good functional equivalent, will fall so far behind in the power stakes as to be taken over, and forced to undergo these changes anyway. There are good reasons in the relations of force for the onward march of modernity so defined.

But modernity as lived from the inside, as it were, is something different. The institutional changes just described always shake up and alter traditional culture. They did this in the original development in the west, and they have done this elsewhere. But outside of those cases where the original culture is quite destroyed, and the people either die or are forcibly assimilated — and European colonialism has a number of such cases to its discredit — a successful transition involves a people finding resources in their traditional culture to take on the new practices. In this sense, modernity is not a single wave. It would be better to speak of alternative modernities, as the cultures which emerge in the world to carry the institutional changes turn out to differ in important ways from each other. Thus a Japanese modernity, an Indian modernity and various modulations of Islamic modernity will probably enter alongside the gamut ofwestern societies, which are also far from being totally uniform.

Seen in this perspective, we can see that modernity — the wave — can be felt as a threat to a traditional culture. It will remain an external threat to those deeply committed against change. But there is another reaction, among those who want to take on some version of the institutional changes. Unlike the conservatives, they do not want to refuse the changes. They want of course to avoid the fate of those aboriginal people who have just been engulfed and made over by the changes. What they are looking for is a creative adaptation, drawing on the cultural resources of their tradition which would enable them to take on the new practices successfully. In short they want to do what has already been done in the west. But they see, or sense, that that cannot consist in just copying the west’s adaptations. The creative adaptation using traditional resources has by definition to be different from culture to culture. Just taking over western modernity could not be the answer. Or otherwise put, this answer comes too close to engulfment. They have to invent their own.

There is thus a ‘call to difference’ felt by ‘modernising’ elites which corresponds to something objective in their situation. This is part of the background to nationalism. But there is more. The call to difference could be felt by anyone concerned for the well-being of the people concerned. But the challenge is lived by the elites concerned overwhelmingly in a certain register, that of dignity.

Western modernity has been a conquering culture, because the changes described above confer tremendous power on the societies adopting them. In the relation of conquest, there grow presumptions of superiority and inferiority which the conqueror blithely accepts, and the conquered resist. This is the challenge to dignity. To the extent that traditional elites can remain insulated from the relationship, they feel the challenge less. But those involved in modernisation, whether it be in a colony, or a country overshadowed and threatened, have before them constantly what they also see as a state of backwardness which they are concerned to make up. The issue is whether they can.

Thus the urge on the part of elites to find their own path is more than a matter of concern for their compatriots. It is also a matter of their own dignity. Until they can find their own creative adaptation, and take on the institutional changes while remaining themselves, the imputation of inferiority against the culture they identify with remains unrefuted. And of course, the imputation is liberally made by members of the dominant societies. Their word tends (irrationally but understandably) to have weight, just because of their success and power. They become in a sense important interlocutors, whose recognition would count for a lot if they gave it. In the face of non-recognition, this importance will frequently be denied, but sometimes with a vehemence which makes it suspect.

I am trying to identify the source of the modern nationalist turn, the refusal — at first among elites — of incorporation by the metropolitan culture, as a recognition of the need for difference, but felt existentially as a challenge not just as a matter of valuable common good to be created, but also viscerally as a matter of dignity, in which one’s selfworth is engaged. This is what gives nationalism its emotive power. This is what places it so frequently in the register of pride and humiliation. So nationalism can be said to be modern, because it is a response to a modern predicament. But the link is also more intimate. I said above that nationalism usually arises among ‘modernising’ elites. The link can be understood as more than accidental. One facet of nationalism, I have been arguing, is a response to a threat to dignity. But modernity has also transformed the conditions of dignity.

These in effect could not but change in the move from hierarchical, ‘mediated’ societies to ‘horizontal’, direct-access ones. The concept of honour, which was in place in the earlier forms, was intrinsically hierarchical. It supposed ‘preferences’, in Montesquieu’s terms.[392] For me to have honour, I had to have a status that not everyone shares, as is still the case with an ‘honours list’ of awards today. Equal direct-access societies have developed the modern notion of ‘dignity’. This is based on the opposite supposition, that all humans enjoy this equally. For instance, the term as used by Kant designates what is supposed to be the apanage of all rational agents.[393] Philosophically, we may want to attribute this status to all; but politically, the sense of equal dignity is really shared by people who belong to a functioning direct-access society together.[394] In this typically modern predicament, their dignity passes through their common categorical identity. My sense of my own worth can no longer be based mainly on my lineage, my clan. A goodly part of it will usually be invested in some other categorical identity.

But categorical identities can also be threatened, even humiliated. The more we are inducted into modern society, the more this is the form in which the question of dignity will pose itself for us. Nationalism is modern, because it is a typically modern way of responding to the threat represented by the advancing wave of modernisation. Elites have always been able to experience a dramatic loss of dignity in the face of conquering power. One way of responding is to fight back or come to terms with the conquerors out of the same traditional identity and sense of honour. Another is to force a new categorical identity to be the bearer of the sought-for dignity. It is (a sub-species of) this second reaction that we call nationalist; but it is essentially modern. The 1857 Mutiny in India was in part an attempt to expunge this perennially available loss of dignity in a premodern context. In this sense, it was not a nationalist movement, as Congress later was.

The modern context of nationalism is also what turns its search for dignity outward. No human identity is purely inwardly formed. The other always plays some role. But it can be just as a foil, a contrast, a way of defining what we were not, for better or for worse. So the aboriginals of the newly ‘discovered’ world figured for post-Colombian Europeans. The ‘savage’, the other of civilisation, was a way Europeans defined themselves, both favourably (applying ‘civilised’ to themselves in selfcongratulation), and sometimes unfavourably (Europeans as corrupted in contrast to the ‘noble savage’). This kind of other reference requires no interaction. Indeed, the less interaction the better, else the stereotype may be unable to resist.

But the other can also play a role directly, where I need his/her recognition to be confident of my identity. This has been standard for our relation to our intimates, but it was not that important in relation to outsiders in the premodern period. Identities were defined by reference to the other, but not out of the other’s reactions. Where this latter becomes so, of course, the way we interact is crucial — or perhaps we should say: the way the interaction is seen by the parties, because of the big part played by illusion here. But the crucial point is that the interaction is understood to be crucial by the identity-bearers themselves.

I would like to argue that identities in the modern world are more and more formed in this direct relation to others, in a space of recognition. I can not argue the general case here,[395] but I hope that this is evident for modern nationalism. Modern nationalist politics is a species of identity politics. Indeed, the original species: national struggles are the site from which the model comes to be applied to feminism, to the struggles of cultural minorities, to the gay movement, etc. The work of someone like Frantz Fanon, written in the context of the anti-colonial struggle, but whose themes have been re-played in other contexts, illustrates the connections.[396] Strong national sentiment among elites usually arises in the first phase because an identity is threatened in its worth.

This identity is vulnerable to non-recognition, at first on the part of the members of the dominant societies; but later, there has developed a world public scene, on which peoples see themselves as standing, on which they see themselves as rated, which rating matters to them. This world scene is dominated by a vocabulary of relative advance, even to the point of having to discover periodic neologisms in order to euphemise the distinctions. Hence what used to be called the ‘backward’ societies began to be called ‘underdeveloped’ after the war; and then even this came to be seen as indelicate, and so we have the present partition: developed/developing. The backdrop of modern nationalism, that there is something to be caught up with, each society in its own way, is inscribed in this common language, which in turn animates the world public sphere.

Modern nationalism thus taps into something perennial. Conquest, or the threat of conquest, has never been good for one’s sense of worth. But the whole context in which this nationalism arises, that of successive waves of (institutional) modernisation, and the resultant challenge to difference, that of the growth of categorical identities, as well as the creation of a world public sphere as a space of recognition, this is quintessentially modern. We are very far from atavistic reactions and primal identities.

 VI

Hence the first phase of modern nationalism, the refusal of incorporation, arises from the felt need for difference in the context of modernisation, but lived in the register of dignity, of an identity potentially threatened in its worth, and in a growing space of recognition.

Let us suppose this is all true (a proposition with a very low antecedent probability); it still only accounts for the first phase. How does nationalism become generalised, galvanise whole populations? How does it break beyond the elites?

The answer to this question will be even more unsatisfactory than that to the previous one. There does not seem to be a single mechanism. Sometimes, a charismatic leadership, with great imaginative power, linking the national aspiration to a host of existing complaints, can make nationalism a mass movement. This is the case of Gandhi and the Salt March, for instance. Often, the movement spreads slowly down, from the original elites, to those who strive to emulate them, accede to them, take them as their model. And when we take account of the fact that modernity itself, as we saw above, tends to generalise a transformation of the original high culture, we can understand how more and more strata of the population may come to experience their situation in the terms originally espoused by elites.

These are ways in which the mass of the people can come to share in the original nationalist aspiration, and sense of vulnerable identity. But there are other ways in which nationalism can become a mass movement, where ordinary people are recruited into it without necessarily sharing the original outlook. Sometimes active minorities, themselves actuated by nationalist fears and aspirations, can contrive to sow discord, distrust and hatred between populations which hitherto had lived in some amity side by side. Terrorist killings can accomplish this, or atrocities committed by armed gangs, identified as from one group, against the members of the other community. Then uninvolved people can begin to mistrust their neighbours, even though these may be uninvolved as well. Each community draws together among their own members, in fear and for protection. But the result is that they begin to condone, or at least not protest at the actions of their self-appointed ‘self-defence’ squads, as these perhaps begin to clear out the now untrustworthy neighbours. The scenario is all too depressingly familiar from recent developments in Croatia and Bosnia.

At the end of the day, each community is ranged against the other, perhaps even geographically separated into ‘ethnically cleansed’ pockets, full of a hatred and fear fed on atrocity stories, and often feeling betrayed and bewildered. Each community is now in the grip of a powerful nationalism, hell-bent on their own form of ethnically pure ‘self-determination’, but for the masses the motivation may have little to do with a call to difference, and a sense of threatened identity. It is a nationalism born of a sense of physical threat, of the fear of displacement, even extermination, by a hostile other. Each community has the sense that the other united first against its unsuspecting members, and that its own mobilisation is secondary and defensive in nature. The tragedy is that often neither is right; the split was in a sense engineered by determined and violent minorities, playing a game of provocation and counter-provocation, objectively allied in gradually unravelling ties of conviviality, even intermarriage, which may be of centuries’ standing. [397]

Many of today's mass nationalisms are ofthis secondary and defensive variety, a response to the perceived threat of expulsion or genocide. The infernal circle of killings between Armenians and Azeris, between Georgians and Abkhazi, and so on, are of this kind. But this is not to say that such nationalisms are of an entirely different kind. Because somewhere in the causal story is usually the action of minority elites, who were actuated by the classic motivation to difference that I described above. What does distinguish them, however, is that the diffusion of the nationalist movement does not come through more and more strata coming to share the original aspiration, through a conversion to the nationalist vision, as with Gandhi and the Salt March, but rather through the (often manipulated) politics of division and mutual threat. Not an identity threat in this case, but a physical threat, of exile or annihilation. I want to call this kind of mass nationalism defensive; but we have to remember that usually at its origin is a minority nationalism of aspiration. And of course, it may also happen that over time, in a third phase, a mass nationalism of defence can be gradually won over to some version of the original aspiration.

The rise of communal 'nationalisms' in India illustrates these mechanisms. Before the mass agitations of the twentieth century, Hindus and Muslims often enjoyed a degree of conviviality difficult to imagine today. Both communities participated in a form of syncretism. In certain parts of the sub-continent,[398] Hindus would attend the celebration of Moharram, and Muslims would attend Dussehra feasts. Protests, around the turn of the century, begin to come from elites in both communities, who were concerned to create and propagate a purer, more consistent version of their respective religious identities.

The motivations for religious reform and purification are, of course, always plural and complex. But I would maintain that part of the motivation is the one I described above. Hindu reform, for instance, from Rammohan Roy on, was partly stimulated by the fact of domination, by admiration for the powers of discipline and organisation of the dominators, and by the desire to find Hindu sources for an identity which could sustain the same reformed practices. It was an unavoidable by-product of this that popular syncretism, along with many other practices of popular Hinduism, was judged unacceptable. In Arya Samaj terms, it was 'idolatry'.

A similar reproach, couched in the same terms, comes from the side of Muslim reform. These reform movements, turning to a purer, often more Sharia-oriented Islam, and condemning various popular practices, sometimes including various aspects of Sufism, have been a feature of the last century or so. Indeed, they begin somewhat earlier, if we include the Wahhabi. Again, it would be wildly over-simple to explain them entirely as the response to a ‘call to difference’. But the need to respond to a conquering west, and the wounds to Islam’s self-esteem as itself an erstwhile conquering civilisation, have almost certainly given a stimulus to these movements.

The move to sever syncretic conviviality, then, comes from elites concerned, at least in some important part, with the call to difference and the threat to identity. And indeed, the Arya Samaj did so call for Hindus to cease participating in Moharram;[399] and to complete the connection, members of the Arya Samaj formed part of the nucleus out of which emerged the Rashtriya Swayamsevak Sangh (RSS), and later the Bhartiya Janata Party (BJP), standard bearers of contemporary Hindu communalism.

But between pure-minded calls to renounce syncretism and the present communal violence and mistrust lies the second phase. My argument is that, unlike the pan-Indian nationalism of Gandhi, followed by Nehru, which was popularised by diffusion of the aspiration concerned, communalism made inroads into syncretic conviviality mainly through clashes and conflicts which raised ever stronger reactions of defence. For Jinnah and those around him, the impulse to Pakistan had a lot to do with the preservation of a modernised (and in Jinnah’s case, rather secularised) Muslim identity against the danger of being overwhelmed in a Hindu state. Their own ‘call to difference’ risked being drowned out, they feared, in India’s answer to her call. But when the Muslim League swept the Muslim areas of India in the elections of 1941, the popular slogan was ‘Islam in danger!’ What was being conjured up here was a threat of a more direct and aggressive kind. The ideology ofPakistan propagated itself as a defensive nationalism.

Of course, since then, in a third phase, the original positive aspiration may have propagated itself downward in Pakistani society. How much, it is not easy to judge, because defensiveness and threat still seem an important mainstay of Pakistani unity.

 VII

I have been trying to fill in the explanatory hole that I saw in Gellner's account, and my Anderson-inspired complement to it. These told us something about the context of modern nationalist struggles, even about what can make them virtually inevitable. But the sources of nationalist aspirations escaped us. They offered us Hamlet without the Prince. I have tried to explain the missing bit by invoking the context of expanding modernity, and the call to difference which it raises in peoples in the path of that expansion. This call, lived by elites in the register of dignity, can become the basis of a mass movement in a number of ways, including some rather sinister and destructive ones which have little to do with the call itself.

What does this tell us about the kinds of nationalism? Can we think of it as something homogeneous? Here there are lots of difficulties, and I can see my theory already in danger of unravelling. Because it is plain that my account places phenomena like the various modes of Islamic 'fundamentalism' in the third world (Iran, Algeria) in the same category as nationalism. Indeed, in so far as I am trying to account for nationalism as a call to difference in face of the wave of 'modernisation', lived in the register of threatened dignity, and constructing a new, categorical identity as the bearer of that dignity, I could also be talking of the rise of Marxist parties in certain Third World contexts.

This does not by itself worry me. As Liah Greenfeld argues (and I feel my account has a lot in common with hers),[400] this may even be a plus for the account. We should not make a fetish of our preliminary vocabulary of distinctions. So what if the categories which emerge from the explanation include more than what we antecedently called 'nationalism'? If some common element is really illuminated, then we have gained.

Now with the very important reservation that I do not want to reduce Islamic integrism to a single mode of explanation and that we are dealing with a complex, many-sided, over-determined, reality, I nevertheless would like to argue that its various manifestations have some features of the profile I have just outlined. The sense of operating on a world scene, in the register of threatened dignity, is very much present; as is the over-vehement rejection of the west (or its quintessence, America, the ‘great Satan’), and the tremendous sensitivity to criticism from this quarter, for all the protestations of hostility and indifference. Islamic societies are perhaps if anything more vulnerable to a threat to their self-esteem from the impact of superior power, in that Islam’s selfimage, as indicated above, was of the definitive revelation, destined to spread outward without check. The Islamic sense of Providence, if I may use this Christian expression, can cope with the status of conquerors, but tends to be bewildered by the experience of powerlessness and conquest.

Again, for all their protestations of faithfulness to the origins, this integrism is in some respects very modern. It mobilises people in a modern fashion, in horizontal, direct-access movements; it thus has no problem using the ‘modern’ institutional apparatus of elected legislatures, bureaucratic states and armies. While it would reject the doctrine of popular sovereignty in favour of a species of theocracy, it has also delegitimated all the traditional ruling strata. The Iranian revolution was carried out against the Shah. Those enjoying special authority are exclusively those who ‘rationally’ merit this, granted the nature and goals of the state, viz., the experts in God’s law; not to speak of the Ayatollah Khomeini’s media-oriented abuse of the Islamic judicial forms in issuing his fatwa against Salman Rushdie.

Indeed, this seems true of all fundamentalisms, that they paradoxically are most modern where they think they are most faithful to tradition. Starting with the original home of the term, in the Protestant sectarian doctrines of Biblical inerrancy; this is in fact a doctrine only defended in recent centuries. But more important, one can doubt that the issue would even have been clearly understood by Christians in earlier centuries. It supposes a modern conception of the literal truth in secular time, one which owes something to our social imaginary and our science. Earlier Christian centuries lived in a world in which secular time was interwoven with various orders of higher time, various dimensions of eternity. From within this time sense, it may be hard to explain just what is at stake in the issue of whether ‘day’ in Genesis means ‘literally’ the twenty-four hours between sunset and sunset, let alone get the people to see why they should be concerned about it.

Moreover, seeing nationalism, proletarian internationalism and religious fundamentalisms in the same register may help us to understand their interaction, that they are so often, in fact, fighting for the same space. Arab nationalism gives way to Islamic integrism,[401] just as the demise of Soviet Marxism opens the way for virulent nationalisms. The search for a categorical identity, to answer the call to difference, and be the bearer of the sought-for dignity, can take many forms. It is understandable that the discrediting of some must strengthen the appeal of others.

Moreover, this kind of diversity and rivalry shades into that between different definitions of nationalism. In many countries, less and more inclusive national identities have vied for people’s allegiance: Quebecois and Canadian, Slovak and Czechoslovak, Scots and British. Indeed, one could class the struggle between Nehruvian and ‘Hindutva’ nationalism in India as another such rivalry, rather than as a struggle between a national and a religious identity. In all the struggles invoked in this and the preceding paragraph, it is as though there were a space waiting to be filled. I am not unduly worried that my account may lead us to bring things together that we now class under different headings. Understanding nationalism in terms of a ‘call to difference’ allows for a great variety of different responses. The aspiration to take on certain forms of modernity, but on the basis of one’s own cultural resources, can obviously be played out in many different ways, depending on what you want to take over, and what the cultural resources are you hope to sustain it with. The considerations Gellner adduces, as well as others, certainly explain why one thing that people will generally want to take over is state power; hence the near universal validity of his definition of nationalism. But we can also see why in special circumstances, a phenomenon like pre-1960 Quebec ‘nationalism’ can arise.

But there is one difference which is worth commenting on here, that between liberal nationalism, like, for example, contemporary Quebec ‘independentism’, on one hand, and what we now see raging in Bosnia on the other. There are some common roots, as captured in my scheme, but there are also clear qualitative differences. The idea that these are both manifestations of the same force, but just differing in virulence, is a serious mistake. It is not just that the second phase in Bosnia was a purely ‘defensive’ one, in my sense. More fundamentally, nationalisms differ, as I have just said, in regard to what they want to take over.

Now there are some nationalisms where part of what is defined as the desirable modernity is the liberal regime of rights and equal citizenship, attributed to all members of the political unit, regardless of differences, even of ethnicity. These nationalisms have taken over, one might better say have never lost, the aspirations to patriotism of the founding revolutions anterior to nationalism. The original ‘nations’ which these revolutions sought to liberate were held to consist of all free men living in the historically defined societies. The fact that ‘free men’ excluded, in one way women, and in another, more grievous way, Afro-American slaves, did not totally blunt the force of this principle. On the contrary, this force was part of the complex of factors which eventually led to the lifting of these exclusions.

The first wave of nationalisms in Europe, those which grew up in opposition to the Holy Alliance, were of this liberal sort. They retained the original Verfassungspatriotismus of the Revolutions; their sense of nation incorporated the constitutional principles of liberalism. Contemporary Quebec nationalism is of this kind.

Of course, liberal nationalism suffers strains. All are citizens without distinction, and yet the state has its raison d’etre in a cultural nation to which not all citizens belong. There are tensions here to be managed.[402] But there is no question of sacrificing universality on the altar of the nation. For this would be a betrayal of identity.

Quite different are the modes of nationalism where what is to be taken over does not include this liberal patriotism; even in some cases, as in proto-Nazi German movements, where this patriotism is rejected as an alien element, a bit of Civilisation which is contrary to the Kultur of the nation. Or where liberal politics has never had a toe-hold, as in the Balkans. There one can have forms where the aspiration includes state power, economic development, even something like an abolition of traditional hierarchies in the name of popular sovereignty. But nothing stands in the way of defining the nation purely ethnically, even racially. Where this is so, the elements of modern politics which are taken up are no help. Rather, they aggravate things. At least traditional societies recognised some moral limits, however frequently transgressed, in the treatment of outsiders. But in the face of the sovereign national will, source of all right, nothing else can stand.

Premodern societies often incorporated different groups in a sort of hierarchy of complementarity, where each one had its niche — as Greeks, for instance, were frequently merchants in the Ottoman empire. This was a far cry from equal rights, but it did confer a semi-secure status. But the outsider has no place in a regime of popular sovereignty, where the people is ethnically defined. Moreover, under the rules of selfdetermination, outsiders in sufficiently large numbers can contest one's right to the territory. Add to this the sense of threat in defensive nationalism, and the scene is set for ethnic cleansing.

It is clear that this type of nationalism, while having partly similar roots to the liberal one, and like this growing and operating within the context of modernity, is nevertheless a wholly different animal, obeying a different dynamic. The account I am offering should lead us not only to see other phenomena (e.g. some 'fundamentalisms') as very similar to nationalism, it should also help us to distinguish rather different modes within the category.

There are all sorts of further objections which I have not begun to meet. But enough is enough. I have tried to present an account of nationalism on two levels, as it were: one a description of the social and state context in which national struggles are played out, and by which the stakes of these struggles are defined; and a second level, which it was more foolhardy to venture on, where I have tried to say what gives rise to nationalist aspirations and national movements. Whatever the inaccuracy of my remarks on this second level (or indeed, on the first), I am convinced that nationalism needs to be tackled in this two-pronged way, and I hope to have helped clarify some of the thorny issues which impede our vision of this absorbing, and disturbing, but seemingly inescapable feature of our modern world.

 Notes

An earlier version of this chapter appeared in R. McKim and J. McMahon, eds., The Morality of Nationalism, New York, 1997.

[378] We might follow Gellner (Nations and Nationalism, Oxford, 1983, p. 1) in defining nationalism as the ‘political principle, which holds that the political and the national unit should be congruent’. The basic idea is that a people defined antecedently by unity of culture, or language or religion, should be allowed to give itself its own political forms. This certainly picks out a class of movements, sentiments, political ideas — forces in the contemporary world, viz., those related to that principle. The question I am raising is whether they all have the same causes and are moved by the same dynamic.

[379] Ibid.

[380] Ibid., p. 39.

[381] There is an interesting discussion of modern languages as context-free in something like this sense in A. Macintyre, IWhose Justice? Which Rationality?, Notre Dame, 1988.

[382] I am borrowing this term from Craig Calhoun. See for instance his ‘Nationalism and Ethnicity’, American Review of Sociology, no. 19, 1993, p. 230. I draw heavily on Calhoun’s work later in my characterisation of ‘directaccess’ societies.

[383] Gellner, Nations and Nationalism, p. 18. I have dealt at length here on only one facet of Gellner’s theory, that which stresses the homogenisation which is functionally necessary to a modern economy. But the move to a modern, homogenised society was driven by other forces besides. The modern European bureaucratic state has been growing for a number of centuries, increasing its outreach, invading the lives of its citizens and administering its territories, far and near, by uniform principles. Not all this was powered by economic motives (though much undoubtedly was). But the upshot proves essentially the basis from which Gellner's account takes off: this historical development has landed us with the homogeneous state with its uniform language and cultures, indispensable as well to our kind of economy as to our type of polity and our administrative procedures. And it is this which accounts for nationalism.

[384] E. Weber, Peasants into Frenchmen, London, 1979.

[385] B. Anderson, Imagined Communities: Reflections on the Origins and Spread of Nationalism, 2nd edn, London, 1991.

[386] Ibid., p. 37.

[387] M. Heidegger, 'Die Zeit des Weltbildes', in his Holzwege, Frankfurt, 1977.

[388] Calhoun, 'Nationalism and Ethnicity', pp. 234–5. I want to reiterate how much the discussion in this section owes to Calhoun's recent work.

[389] I have not discussed the case of non-democratic regimes based on popular will, but these plainly push in the same direction, indeed, even farther and faster. Just because emanating from the common will is essential to their legitimacy, they cannot leave their citizens alone in a condition of obedient passivity, as earlier despotic regimes were content to do. They must always mobilise them into repeated expressions of unshakeable, unanimous will: phoney elections, demonstrations, May Day parades and the like. This is the essence of modern ‘totalitarianism’ in its distinction from earlier despotism.

Calhoun stresses, however, how easily the search for national identity, even in democratic contexts, leads to an attempt to induce people to suppress their other (gender, religious, minority-cultural) identities in favour of a ‘national’ one. The modern quest for patriotism is full of dangers.

[390] Jawaharlal Nehru, The Discovery of India, Delhi, 1989.

[391] Although many are ‘produced’ at an earlier phase where a movement begins to unite disparate populations under the same banner, in the name of a supposed common history. Thus a great many official languages today result from the imposition of one dialect as the ‘true’ language on a whole people who earlier spoke a scatter of similar dialects. National vernaculars have almost always had to be ‘invented’ in this sense.

Too much has perhaps been made of this point in a spirit of debunking nationalist claims. A lot of nationalist history hovers between myth and lies. But as Calhoun cogently argues, this does not by itself invalidate the claims that contemporaries may make in terms of their shared sense of national identity. ‘Ethnicity or cultural traditions are bases for nationalism when they effectively constitute historical memory, when they inculcate it as habitus ... not when (or because) the historical origins of the claims are accurate (‘Nationalism and Ethnicity’, p. 222).

[392] C. L. Montesquieu, The Spirit of the Laws, Cambridge, 1989, book 3, chapter 7.

[393] I. Kant, Groundwork of the Metaphysic of Morals, New York, 1964.

[394] This does not have to be a political society. It can be a dispersed common agency, like a religious confession of an ethnic group.

[395] But see my ‘The Politics of Recognition’, in A. Gutman, ed., Multiculturalism and ‘the Politics of Recognition’, Princeton, 1992.

[396] F. Fanon, The Wretched of the Earth, New York, 1966.

[397] Fortunately, this tactic does not always succeed. There are signs that ties between Hindus and Sikhs in the Punjab were in many cases strong enough to withstand the atrocities perpetrated by the murderous bands of Khalistan supporters, though a self-feeding process of distrust and division was clearly the aim of those terrible acts. Again, after the massacres of Partition in 1947, the communities in India seemed to draw back from the brink. Secularism was for a while strengthened. It took some time for the forces of Hindu chauvinism to make the progress which they have recently registered.

[398] My source here is a paper by John Roosa, ‘Composite Culture and Communalism’, presented at the conference on Culture, Community and Nation, Hyderabad, India, December 1993.

[399] Roosa, ‘Composite Culture and Communalism’.

[400] L. Greenfeld, ‘Transcending the Nation’s Worth’, Daedalus, vol. 122, 1993 and Nationalism: Five Roads to Modernity, Cambridge, MA, 1992.

[401] M. Kramer, ‘Arab Nationalism: Mistaken Identity’, Daedalus, vol. 122, 1993.

[402] I have discussed this theme at greater length in ‘Les sources de l’identite moderne’, in G. Laforest, ed., Lesfrontieres de l’identite, Quebec, 1996.

 9 Modern multinational democracies: transcending a Gellnerian oxymoron

Alfred Stepan

By 1986, three years before the walls came down, two new important bodies of literature were in place that should have helped us to think carefully about the difficult relationship between democratisation and nationalism. Ernest Gellner published his magisterial Nations and Nationalism in 1983, the same year that saw the publication of another modern classic on nationalism, Benedict Anderson’s Imagined Communities: Reflections on the Origin and Spread of Nationalism.[403] In 1986 the four-volume work edited by Guillermo O’Donnell, Phillipe C. Schmitter and Laurence Whitehead, Transitions From Authoritarian Rule was released and immediately created the field of ‘transitology’. [404]

What now strikes me as amazing is that these two bodies of literature, which in retrospect should have learned so much from each other, were virtually separate and non-communicating discourses. In the four volumes on democratic transitions, nationalism is never thematised as a major issue, or even given one separate chapter. Indeed, the word ‘nationalism’ only appears in the index of one of the four volumes, that on southern Europe, and the reader is only referred to one page on Spain, one page on Portugal and two pages on Greece. The name of Ernest Gellner does not appear in the index of any of the four volumes, nor does the name of Benedict Anderson. As the author of one of the comparative papers in this series, I of course must share responsibility for the oversight.

For their part, on the other hand, neither Gellner in Nations and Nationalism, nor Anderson in Imagined Communities, in any way thematises democracy, and indeed the word does not enter into the index of either book. [405]

In my judgement, two of the most urgent problems facing modern democratic theorists and practitioners are how to reconcile nationalism and democracy, especially in multiethnic settings, and how to improve the quality of consolidated democracies. This chapter is devoted to the first question but it has implications for the second. Obviously, if we are to make advances concerning the first question, then the two previously non-communicating discourses must come into constant dialogue with one another.

As an analyst of democratisation, and as the first rector of the Central European University, I mentioned this problem of our non-communicating discourses, and the opportunity to contribute to overcoming it, to Ernest Gellner, the founder of CEU's Centre for the Study of Nationalism. With his characteristic collegial generosity and energy he immediately accepted the challenge to bring the discourses together. He attended a series of four lectures I gave in CEU Prague on the relationship of democratisation to nationalism, and personally typed eight pages of suggestions in 1994 on an early draft of what is now a book Juan Linz and I have co-authored on the problems of democratisation.[406] Obviously, my attempt to relate democratisation to Gellner's thoughts on nationalism is only a shadow of what it could have been had Gellner lived to flail me. But let me now turn explicitly to what Gellner says, and does not say, about the relationship of nationalism and democracy in his last great book, Conditions of Liberty: Civil Society and Its Rivals.

 Gellner's bounded world of nation-states

Ernest Gellner stated his functionalist argument for 'one nation one state' especially forcefully in Conditions of Liberty:

[T]he new imperative of cultural homogeneity ... is the very essence of nationalism ... [F]or the first time in world history a High Culture ... becomes the pervasive and operational culture of an entire society ... The state has not merely the monopoly of legitimate violence, but also of the accreditation of educational qualification. So the marriage of state and culture takes place, and we find ourselves in the Age of Nationalism ... For the average person, the limits of his culture are ... the limits of his employability, social acceptability, dignity, effective participation and citizenship. [407]

But what happens if there are one or more conscious nations in the territory, nations which do not partake of this state-culture congruence? Gellner, as always, was direct: ‘Under the new social regime, this[condition] becomes increasingly uncomfortable. Men then had two options, if they were to diminish such discomfort: they could change their own culture, or they could change the nature of the political unit.’[408]

Gellner did not really develop the full implications of the above assertions, but for the sake of even more brutal clarity I shall call the major cultural change option assimilation, and the major political change option boundary change. In this chapter I will explore what implications Gellner’s argument properly has, and does not properly have, for the crafting ofmultinational democracies.

Later in the book, Gellner, in his brilliant and sweeping way, used the metaphor of marriage to discuss the four time-zones, as he conceived them, of Europe. For Gellner, in ‘time-zone’ I, encompassing roughly the Atlantic coast of Europe (Ireland and parts of northern Spain being the major exceptions), historically strong dynastic states correlated with high cultural areas. According to him, ‘If nationalism requires the marriage of state and culture, then in this zone the couple had been cohabiting long before their union was acclaimed by nationalist Manifest Destiny ... History had made a present to nationalism ... ‘[409]

‘Time-zone’ II, to the east, was different. It was an area of ‘quite exceptional political fragmentation’, but ‘was exceedingly well-equipped with pre-existing, codified, normative High Cultures’.[410] Thus for Gellner, in what is now Germany and Italy, there was some — but not great — need for state-building, because, ‘An existing High Culture had to be endowed with a political roof worthy of it and capable of giving it shelter. It took a certain amount of military and diplomatic activity, but not much else.’[411]

In time-zone III, most of which is now central and eastern Europe, no dominant states existed. This time-zone ‘presented the greatest problems from the viewpoint of the implementation of the nationalist principal of one culture, one state’.[412] For Gellner, ‘If the eventual units were to be compact and reasonably homogeneous, more had to be done: many, many people had to be either assimilated, or expelled or killed.’ [413]

In Gellner’s view, the path in the czarist empire, which concerns his time-zone IV, was roughly similar to that in time-zone III until what he calls the ‘Leninist Umma’ emerged. Then, ‘The new ideocracy and the institutions it spawned controlled the entire territory with ease, and obliged its inhabitants to proclaim that their nationalist aspirations were satisfied. This fiction was maintained well into the 1980s ...’[414]

Gellner argued that the postcommunist situation in most of the former Soviet Union was even more complicated than in time-zone III because not only was it an area ‘[w]here neither the political bridegroom nor the cultural bride was available for the required marriage of nation state and national culture, but where the search for them was delayed by seventy or forty years of Bolshevik ideocracy ... [415] It is this special context, according to Gellner, that explains why the economic and political aspects of civil society in postcommunist Europe are difficult to bring into being, while ‘ethnically based and defined associations appear to be capable of almost immediate formation and firm as well as rapid crystallisation’. [416]

Where does Conditions ofLiberty leave democratisation crafters and/or theorists interested in the prospects of democratisation outside of territories that are actually a part of, or analogous to, time-zones I and II? The central implication of Conditions of Liberty is that if a single high culture, and a state broadly supportive of that culture, do not coexist in one territory, the crafting of a democracy will be substantially more difficult than if they do. Unfortunately for those like myself who personally value the quality of life in a culturally diverse society, the existing empirical evidence would seem to indicate that Gellner's argument is justified.

We should also note for the record that some of the world's most influential liberal and democratic theorists can be seen to be in fundamental agreement with Gellner. For John Stuart Mill, for instance, it was almost axiomatic that, 'free institutions are next to impossible in a country made up of different nationalities. Among a people without fellow-feelings, especially if they read and speak different languages, the united public opinion necessary to the working of representative institutions cannot exist ... '[417] In our own time, Dankwart Rustow, the seminal founder of the dynamic-conflict approach to modern democratisation theory, argues that his model of democratisation 'starts with a single background condition — national unity ... National unity ... must precede all the other phases of democratisation.'[418] The leading American theorist of pluralism and democracy, Robert A. Dahl, does not argue that multinational democracies are impossible, but he does suggest that if there is no clarity about which groups or individuals are members of a political community 'we cannot solve the problems of the scope and domain of democratic units from within democratic theory. Like the majority principle, the democratic process presupposes a unit.'[419] The contemporary Oxford political philosopher, David Miller, argues on grounds of quasi-Humeian moral sentiments that 'democratic states that have successfully pursued policies aiming at social justice have a unifying identity'. Miller goes on to suggest that a high degree of trust and solidarity are necessary for democratic redistributive policies, and 'for that reason socialists should be more strongly committed than classical liberals to the nation-state as an institution ...' For Miller the positive consequences of solidarity and cultural homogeneity are such that 'political authorities are likely to function most effectively when they embrace just a single national community'.[420]

What can democratic theorists and practitioners learn from Gellner and where, why and how must we attempt to go beyond him?

In my judgement, the legitimate insight that Gellner makes, and that in different ways is implicit in the work of Mill, Rustow and Dahl, is that if there is only one homogeneous high culture in the territory, and the vast majority of long-term residents identify with that culture, and that culture has a supportive state, many of the problems that will nonnally appear in the effort to democratise a multinational community are simply not on the agenda in such ‘one nation one state’ polities. On balance, David Miller’s book is probably also right that national homogeneity may make certain state-wide policies concerning social justice more politically feasible than in a multinational, multicultural polity. But let us return to Gellner’s time-zones. How far will they take us, even metaphorically? First, we must recognise the well-documented fact that there are very few states in the entire world that are relatively homogeneous nation-states and approximate Gellner’s time-zone I.[421] But the evidence from those that did begin their democratic process in timezone I supports Gellner’s thesis.

For those territories that are analogous to Gellner’s time-zone I, whatever other problems they had or have, they did not have to manage the culture-state incongruence problem. Japan is the clearest example. Long before any western polity, Japan had culture-state congruence. Portugal, as western Europe’s longest standing dictatorship, faced many problems when it began its democratisation process in 197 4. However, because it was one of the world’s oldest and most homogeneous nationstates, culture-state incongruence was not an issue, notwithstanding the return of an overseas population proportionately five times greater than that which France had to absorb after Algeria.

Democratisation in Greece and South Korea was somewhat more analogous to time-zone II than to time-zone III because these countries had relatively homogeneous high cultures. Of course, at various times in their history they had some time-zone III qualities because their high common culture lacked a political roof due to the existence of foreign rule or occupation. However, when Greece and South Korea began their democratisation processes in the 1970s and 1980s, respectively, they conformed to what Gellner would label time-zone II. Though the diaspora in Greece, and the geopolitics of ‘two Koreas’, presented some congruence problems, these problems complicated, but ultimately did not prevent, democratisation.

Some parts of the world's map are of course more culturally homogeneous in the 1980s than they were in the 1930s, but in Poland and in Czechoslovakia this was 'helped' first by Nazi genocide of Jewish and Gypsy minorities and later by the Soviet-backed expulsion of the Germans, an expulsion which the Allies accepted. As the millennium turns, Croatia is now nearly homogeneous, but at the cost of ethnic cleansing and the creation of an ethnocracy. These are not useable templates for the practice and theory of democracy.

The hard reality is that, in the vast majority of the world's countries that are not now democratic, homogeneous high cultures do not coexist within one state. Thus, if we want to avoid ethnic cleansing, if time-zone I territories cover little of the planet, and if much of the world is in timezones III or IV, what is left in the Gellnerian world to produce culturestate congruence in a democratic way? According to Gellner, there are only two options: changing the political boundaries democratically, or voluntary and democratic cultural assimilation. Unfortunately, probably neither route can expand democratic boundaries in the world very much. Why?

In principle there is no democratic reason to oppose the democratic division of one state into two or more states. However, a democratic division is facilitated greatly if the groups to be divided live in relatively clearly demarcated cultural zones. The Czech and Slovak parts of Czechoslovakia satisfied this criterion. But, in many countries, redrawing of the boundaries to produce culture-state congruence is simply not an available democratic option. For example, in Latvia, Russian is the dominant language in the seven largest cities; in India, the 115 million Muslims are found in numerous parts of the federation; in the Ukraine and Estonia, though major concentrations of Russian-speakers are indeed clustered on the borders with Russia, the inescapable reality is also that the capitals of Ukraine (Kiev) and Estonia (Tallinn) are located in the centres of the countries and are culturally and linguistically defacto multinational.

Gellner's second option involves consensual change in cultures so as to produce a culture-state congruence. This is of course conceivable for many individuals, and if voluntarily done, does not involve a violation of individual rights. However, for entire cultural communities, such as Muslims in Orthodox Christian or Hindu cultures, or working-class Russophones in linguistically distant cultures such as Estonia, cultural assimilation may not be desired, or even if desired, may be extremely difficult to achieve in less than two or three generations.

The historical question of assimilation in some time-zone I or timezone II states probably needs to be re-examined with greater care. In some countries with a high codified culture (such as France, Germany and Italy) Gellner certainly understates the state-craft and power involved when, in a casual aside, he writes that congruence only entailed ‘a certain amount of military and diplomatic activity, but not much else’.[422] Near cultural homogenisation in France was in fact, as Eugene Weber has so meticulously documented, the result of the assiduous combination of state sanctions and inducements concerning language, dress, education and military service.[423]

Could such state sanctions be democratically and effectively used in many time-zone III or IV areas to produce congruence via voluntary cultural assimilation? Given the significant technological changes that have occurred since the late nineteenth-century state-induced homogenisation processes so well described by Eugen Weber, and the analytically distinct but related emergence of what Charles Taylor calls the ‘politics of recognition’, there are grounds for thinking such processes are now less available.[424] Most of the world’s minorities can keep in cultural contact with their home cultures via radio, cassettes and cheap air travel to a vastly greater extent than was possible a hundred years ago. Also, due to advances in literacy and communications, more minority communities have semi-professional ‘cultural carriers’, in the Weberian sense of Trager, than a hundred years ago. Normative changes in the form of increased desire for cultural autonomy in some minority (especially Muslim) communities — contested by rising anti-foreign sentiment in the majority cultures that reduces the integrating capacity that in theory the majority culture would like — probably have contributed to greater cultural will, and greater cultural capacity, for minorities to resist cultural assimilation.

Furthermore, the original territorial source of immigration (e.g. Sudan or Guatemala) and the location of emigration (e.g. to England or to the United States) are becoming ‘deterritorialised’. For reasons of sociology, politics and even census-recording, new identities (given or adopted) and new communities (e.g. ‘Muslims’ in England, ‘Latinos’ in the United States) are emerging with at least some of the affective power previously associated only with nationalism. [425]

My point is that voluntary cultural assimilation into the dominant host culture is in many parts of the world now more complex and problematic than it was in the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. If I am right in these reflections, cultural congruence via minority community choice and/or via state inducements is, not surprisingly, a waning, rather than a growing, force in our globalising societies.

 Living democratically outside of nation-states

An urgent question for democratic theorists and practitioners concerns whether there is anything that can be done to improve the chances of successfol democratic consolidation in polities that are actually multinational. This is a huge and complicated question, but in order to focus the debate on the possibility of multinational democracies, I will make two sets of simplifying assumptions to start our analysis.

The first is that we are talking about a polis that does not now have culture-state congruence (i.e. there are at least two self-conscious cultures or nationalities in the territory), and for which voluntary and effective minority cultural assimilation to the dominant culture in the middle range, say twenty-five years, seems extremely unlikely, and where peaceful democratic secession is virtually impossible. This is where our reflections about Gellner’s argument, and our assessment of contemporary polities, leave us in many countries in the world.

The second set of assumptions is that, for whatever reasons (their current democratic values, their desire to join a prestigious international organisation that only admits democracies, or simply out of fear of dangerous ethnic or cultural conflict if a democratic future can not be crafted), at least some important policy-making leaders from the dominant culture or nation, and of the non-dominant cultures or nations, want the polis to become a consolidated democracy or to remain a consolidated democracy. [426]

For those interested in polities which meet the above assumptions, three connected but analytically distinct clusters of practices and concepts should be on the political and/or research agenda. First, we must analyse how the policies of nation-state building, and the policies of democracy building, are in such a polity conflicting logics. Secondly, we should explore how to contribute to the construction of complementary identities. Thirdly, we have to search for political formulas that do what many liberal democratic theorists argue is dangerous, or even impossible, that is create policies that reconcile group rights and individual rights.

 Crafting integration and difference into democratic institutions

For Rogers Brubaker, leaders who pursue nation-state policies assume that the state is of and for the dominant cultural nation.[427] If there is only one culturally conscious demos in the polity, nation-state building and democracy building are, as David Miller would argue, mutually reinforcing political logics. But, if there are two or more culturally conscious demoi in the polity, nation-building policies of and for the dominant nation would imply restricted citizenship, or at least unequal citizenship, for many of the long-standing minority residents in the state. Formally, and prudentially therefore, in multinational or multicultural polities, nation-state building policies and democracy-building policies are conflicting political logics. Would-be democracy crafters in such a polity have to recognise this political reality and search for an alternative set of policies to that of a ‘nation-state’.

If the goal is to further advance towards democratic consolidation in a multinational polity, leaders of political and civil society will have to explore a range of state and governmental institutions that encourage political integration and loyalty towards the democratic regime, while simultaneously guaranteeing the right of minorities to organise and express cultural and national differences.

In cultural areas like schools, access to radio or the media, some politically crafted power sharing institutional formats and practices that Arend Lijphart calls ‘consociational’ are almost certainly called for in multiethnic democracies.[428] Non-territorial forms of representation need to be explored much more carefully.[429]

If the choice is between parliamentary versus presidential systems, the ‘non-winner take all’ aspects of parliamentarism, and parliamentarism’s greater ‘coalition requiring’ and ‘coalition sustaining’ properties, are worth serious consideration. [430] Electoral systems should also be studied thoughtfully for their impact on minority representation; in general, we can say that proportional representation systems are better at representing minorities than are strong majoritarian formulas such as ‘first past the post’ in large single-member districts.

Among the forms of territorial representation that are particularly important to consider if groups are spatially concentrated in a multinational polity is federalism. Unfortunately, there is virtually no modern high-quality comparative research on the relationship between democracy and federalism so we must have a brief excursus on this topic.

 Excursus on federalism and institutional choice in multinational polities

Postcommunist Europe points out the need to be careful about federalism. If one excludes the case of ‘one nation in two states’ in Germany, then we can say that there were eight European states with communist political systems. Five of these were unitary states (Hungary, Poland, Romania, Albania and Bulgaria). Three were federal states (USSR, Yugoslavia and Czechoslovakia). Seven years after the ‘annus miraculous’ of 1989, the five unitary states remain five unitary states. But, the three federal states have fragmented into twenty-two states.

Clearly, federal systems must be crafted carefully, or instead of attenuating the problems of multinationality, they can aggravate them. For the cases of the three European communist federal ruptures, one of the major causes was that none of these federal systems was designed to operate in a context where competitive democratic elections were decisive. They only worked as long as the centralised party-state played the major coordinating role.

In the standard literature on federal systems, often no distinction is made between democratic and non-democratic federal systems.[431] For modern democratic theorists this makes such literature of limited value. If federalism is to be a useful concept to employ in the comparative analysis of democratisation, we will have to re-state what should be the minimal requirements of democratic federalism. Democratic political systems probably should not be called federal systems unless they meet two criteria. First, within the state there must exist some territorial political sub-units whose electorate is exclusively drawn from citizens of the sub-unit and which have areas of legal and policy-making autonomy and sovereignty that is constitutionally guaranteed.[432]" Secondly, there must be a state-wide political unit, which contains at least one chamber elected by the state-wide population, and which has some law and policy-making areas that are constitutionally guaranteed to fall within the sovereignty of this state-wide body.

Two conclusions immediately flow from these criteria. If the sub-units do not in theory and practice have at least one significant policy-making area where they are relatively autonomous vis-a-vis the centre, then the political system is defacto centralised. But, if the centre does not have a policy-making area or areas where it is relatively autonomous to make policy, the political system is not a federal system but a confederation or even only an alliance.

If one accepts these arguments it also follows that in a robust democratic federal political system, the more the citizens feel a sense of separate allegiance to two democratically legitimated sovereignties, each with its constitutionally guaranteed scope of action, the more democratically secure the federation. Ideally, therefore, citizens within a democratic federation should have dual but complementary political identities. This is so because, as citizens of a territorial sub-unit, if they and their elected leaders of the sub-unit do not feel that the centre provides some goods, security or identities that they consider valuable, and which are not available from the sub-unit alone, then their loyalty to the centre will be weak. Potentially they will provide a constituency for the politics of secession. In the very least, they might provide a constituency for a politics of alienation, or a sense of exploitation, neither of which will help democratic consolidation. Likewise, if many citizens of the federal state and leaders of the centre feel that the federal system entails few benefits, but imposes many political and economic costs, and that the costs of intervention (or encouraged exit) are relatively low, the democratic federation will be endangered.

Federalism is an attractive formula for some types of multinational polities, but the politics of building and maintaining dual and complementary identities needs more thought and research.

The most widely known example, and emulated model, of democratic federalism is that crafted in 1787 in Philadelphia. But the American model has two major characteristics that are not essential to democratic federalism and should be open to debate, negotiation and challenge. Both characteristics concern the second chamber. All modern democratic federations have second chambers. The rationale of such second chambers is that they pay particular attention to issues of special relevance to the sub-units of the federation. Not as a point of principle, but rather, as a part of the historical ‘grand compromise’ between the big and small states, the representatives of the big states in 1787 made two major concessions which violated formal democratic equality. First, they gave the small states equal representation, or more accurately, massive over-representation. Secondly, with less awareness of the implications, they made the policy scope of both houses basically the same. These two decisions that I will call ‘disproportionate representation’ but ‘symmetrical scope’ are a fundamental part of the US formula. But should they necessarily be a part of modern democratic federalism?

How disproportionate is the US Senate? When Robert Dahl did the calculation for the United States in the 1950s, he came to the conclusion that ‘an average vote cast in Nevada has eighty-five times as much weight as an average vote cast in New York, other things being equal’.[433]

In 1988, after twenty-one years of direct military rule a Brazilian constituent assembly, following almost two years of intense debate and discussion, created what was thought to be a very democratic constitution. However, almost no discussion was devoted to the senate. [434] Following Dahl’s logic of presentation and the data provided by Mainwaring, I have to assert that ‘an average vote cast in Roraima has 276 times as much weight as a vote cast in Sao Paulo, other things being equal’.[435]

Such massive over-representation is not a necessary feature of democratic federalism. If an ethnic or cultural minority in a federation was over-represented by such a drastic number in the upper chamber, and if the chamber had a scope equal to that of the more democratically elected house, this would almost certainly create problems of allegiance to the federation by some leaders at the centre. There can be, and there is, a great degree of variation in the representation formulas in the second chamber of democratic federal systems. The democratic federal system with the least over-representation is Austria with a Gini Index of Inequality co-efficient of representation of only .05.[436] Germany is .36 and Canada is . 31. But, the US has a Gini co-efficient of representation in the second chamber of .50, and Brazil is close to .60.[437]

To compound the democratic inequalities introduced by the US model, we have only to look at the policy scope of the second chamber. The US model, as I have mentioned, gives the second chamber symmetrical scope with the first chamber. The first chamber in the US follows a principle of reapportionment every ten years in order to approach perfect equality of representation. The reapportionment is based on a census taken at the end of each decade. What is important theoretically and politically, especially given our concern with multinational federations, is that the second chamber has a special role to play in all areas of fundamental importance to the federation. In a multinational federation, issues of special interest to the minority cultures and nations such as language, religion, education and citizenship should fall within the areas where they can vote and indeed exercise possibly an absolute, but normally a relative, over-ridable veto requiring a special majority of the lower house. However, it is important to insist that neither democratic theory nor modern democratic practice requires that a chamber with massive disproportionality be given symmetry of scope with the near-perfectly proportional chamber. For example, I have not seen a serious charge that the second chamber in Germany, the Bundesrat, is treated unfairly or undemocratically because of its delimited scope. The more proportional first chamber, the Bundestag, which represents all the voters in the states of Germany, has the exclusive power to elect and dismiss the chancellor. Germany's famous 'constructive vote of no confidence' is only voted in the lower chamber. Likewise, the second chamber only has special veto powers in areas concerning half of the bills, and all of those which are of special interest to the Lander.

This difference in scope between the US model and what eventually became the German federal model was absolutely understood — and resisted — by the American Occupation authorities during the drafting of the Bonn constitution. According to the eminent scholar of political institutions, Herman Finer, the Americans had been strongly 'convinced of the desirability of a weak federal authority. They were persuaded by the kind of arguments for federalism and the separation of powers needed in the nascent USA in 1787, namely, to keep government weak for the sake of a durable and democratic (that is, atomised) system. This caused the SPD [The German Social Democratic Party] to go into opposition.' Eventually the SPD prevailed over American objections and 'secured that, broadly speaking, the second chamber should not be of the dominant state-powerful type over the lower chamber'. [438]

So German federalism is less disproportionate than US federalism, and less symmetrical in scope than US federalism. On both dimensions, therefore, German federalism is more formally (and I believe substantively) democratic. [439]

Does the fact that US federalism entails both of these democratic shortcomings make any difference? For the most widely cited author on modern federalism, William Riker, it does not matter very much because 'If we understand ... that states are agents of the society in just the same way as any government, the worst one could expect of them is minor perversities, no matter how pronounced the federalism.[440] Indeed, elsewhere Riker even asserts that ‘federalism makes no particular difference to public policy’.[441] These assertions simply do not hold up to close scrutiny.

The potential for blockage of the majority by a very small minority, about something that has nothing to do with a federal policy issue per se, is actually immense. Robert Dahl captures this succinctly:

<quote>

The eight largest states with 54 per cent of the voters have the same number of votes in the Senate as the eight smallest with less than 3 per cent of the voters. A majority of votes in the Senate can be cast by Senators representing less than 15 per cent of the voters. Thus a policy preferred by the representatives of 85 per cent of the voters could be vetoed by the representatives of 15 per cent of the voters.[442]

</quote>

In newly democratising Brazil, the actual figures are even worse. Moreover, the relatively oligarchic small states in the north are often in a blocking position on federation-wide issues concerning, for example, higher standards of treatment towards indigenous peoples, or higher standards vis-a-vis the environment. In Brazil under the reform president, Fernando Henrique Cardoso (1994-present), the difficulty of implementing a policy agenda is substantially, but by no means exclusively, due to the narrow voter base and wide policy scope of the Senate, a Senate which has exercised its blocking powers in such a way as to hinder efforts to enforce the efficacy and legitimacy of Brazil’s new democracy.

In a multinational democracy the strains on efficacy and legitimacy, for reasons that we have already mentioned, are likely to be particularly high. Federalism, especially if the policy scope of the upper house is wide enough to have a major say on issues of particular importance to regional minorities, can help engender identification with the centre. Likewise, if the cost of federalism, in terms of disproportional weight on policy areas of legitimate interest to all members of the federation, is reduced by narrowing the policy scope of the second chamber, the potential for disaffection of the centre will be diminished, and centre leaders are more likely to accept the necessary costs of the federal democratic bargain. If approached in this way, a balanced democratic federalism in a multinational polity can help integrate citizens into the political regime while constitutionally privileging a degree of sub-unit autonomy and difference.

 Multiple and complementary identities in a multinational democracy

So far I have argued that democratic federalism entails two constitutionally guaranteed areas of relative policy-making autonomy, and that the legitimacy of such systems is enhanced to the degree to which citizens in the federation have a fairly high degree of multiple and complementary identities. This argument calls for explicit discussion of the phrase ‘political identities’. Linz and I have discussed how many writings on nationalism focus on ‘primordial’ identities and the need for people to choose between mutually exclusive identities. However, our research into political identities has shown two things. First, political identities are not fixed or primordial in the Oxford English Dictionary sense of ‘pertaining to, or existing at (or from) the very beginning; first in time, earliest, original, primitive, primeval’. Rather, they are highly changeable and socially constructed. Secondly, if nationalist politicians, by the atmosphere they create (or social scientists and census-takers with their crude dichotomous categories) do not force polarisation, many people may prefer to claim multiple and complementary identities. In fact, along with a common political ‘roof’ of state-protected rights for inclusive and equal citizenship, the human capacity for multiple and complementary identities is precisely one of the key factors that makes democracy in multinational states possible. Because political identities are not fixed and permanent, the quality of democratic leadership is particularly important. Multiple and complementary political identities can be nurtured by political leadership. So can polar and conflictual political identities. Before the conscious use of ethnic cleansing as a strategy to construct nation-states in Bosnia-Herzegovina, Sarajevo was a multinational urban area, whose citizens had multiple identities and one of the highest rates of interfaith marriages of any city in the world. Sadly, we know how such multiple and complementary identities can be eroded. Yet, building on my joint work with Juan Linz, let me show how multiple and complementary identities can be socially constructed in a nurturing and highly interactive way.

In the first four years after the death of Franco, sentiments in favour of independence virtually doubled in the Basque Country, and tripled in Catalonia. However, after a sequence of state-wide elections for a constituent assembly, consensual crafting of a constitution, a referendum on the constitution, negotiations between elected officials from the centre and the regions concerning devolution of power to the regions, a referendum in Catalonia and the Basque Country to approve the parameters of such devolution, and the subsequent implementation of Spain's new federal system of 'autonomias', sentiment in favour of independence declined sharply. Indeed, three years after the consensual creation of Spain's new federal system, of five possible identities that respondents in a 1982 survey could choose from ('Catalan', 'More Catalan than Spanish', 'Equally Catalan and Spanish', 'More Spanish than Catalan', and 'Spanish'), the modal self-identification chosen was 'Equally Catalan and Spanish'. Even when one breaks down the survey respondents to 'both parents born in Catalonia', or 'neither parent born in Catalonia', the modal category among both groups of respondents was 'Equally Catalan and Spanish'. In another survey among Catalans, 82 per cent were 'Proud to be Catalan', 73 per cent were 'Proud to be Spanish', and 83 per cent were also in favour of 'Unification of Europe via the European Community'.[443]

The best proof is an existence proof. Clearly the data from Spain and Catalonia prove three things:

(i) political identities are not permanent but can be highly changeable and socially constructed;

(ii) human beings are capable of multiple and complementary identities;

(iii) people can simultaneously identify with, and give loyalty to, different types of complementary political sovereignties. In Catalonia, the evidence indicates that citizens were strongly and positively identified with a national sub-unit of a federation (Catalonia), the state of the multinational federation (Spain), and a potential suprastate confederation (the European Union).

Let us go to a more difficult case of multiple and complementary identities — that of Russophones in Estonia. Many ethnic Estonian political leaders would like Estonia to be a nation-state — to be, to use Rogers Brubaker's phrase, of and for ethnic Estonians. However, at independence less than 65 per cent of the long-term residents of Estonia were 'ethnic Estonians'. Indeed, about 35 per cent were Russophones. Less than 5 per cent of the Russophones had any plans to leave Estonia voluntarily. One should also note that there was great linguistic distance between Estonian and Russian, and that many of the Russophones were adults in industrial or manual labour jobs. Thus, on linguistic grounds alone, I would argue that the Russophone population in Estonia was absolutely culturally unassimilable into a democratic nation-state for one or two generations. However, I would also argue, on the basis of numerous different indicators, that the Russophone population in Estonia could be almost immediately politically integratable as loyal citizens within a democratic state if a 'roof of rights' were to be extended over their heads. Why?[444]

While it is true that the vast majority of Russophone adults who were born in Estonia never learned Estonian, the political context after independence changed drastically. Since over 90 per cent of the Russo-phones are making no plans to leave Estonia, their children's life chances will be significantly improved if they learn Estonian in school (and presumably learn Russian at least in their homes). The critical piece of evidence that supports the thesis that Russophones want to broaden the cultural and employment portfolio of their children is the following evidence from a work in progress by David Laitin. In answer to a question as to whether the best future for Russians in Estonia was to assimilate, only 7.9 per cent of the Russophones said 'yes'. Attitudes like this of course would be pointed out as evidence by some nationalist ethnic Estonian politicians as supporting their argument that such Russophones should not be citizens. However, 58 per cent of the Russian respondents agreed with the statement that all permanent residents should be fluent in Estonian. Given the difficulty for a Russophone adult to learn

Estonian, this strikes me as high, but no doubt would still be unacceptably low for an Estonian nation-state advocate. But for me, the key Russophone response was in answer to the question of whether Estonian should be a compulsory subject in schools; 95.8 per cent of the Russophones agreed. [445]

Crafting democracy is probably more about attitudes towards the future than behaviour in the past. The Russophones' answer to the question concerning the status of the Estonian language in schools indicates that they accept the authority of the Estonian state to demand that their children learn Estonian. This means that within two generations, if the Estonian state provides adequate language facilities, the overwhelming majority of Russophones under 40 will also be Estonian-speakers. They will have the ability, and probably the propensity, to have dual and complementary political identities. They will probably still not be 'ethnic Estonian', but they well might be loyal citizens of Estonia and identify with the 'state-nation' of Estonia.

 Conclusion: transcending the individual rights versus group rights tension

An assumption of many thinkers in the liberal tradition is that all rights are individual and universal. This assumption should properly be seen as a normative preference. Advocates of such a liberal approach are prone to look on any deviation from individualism and universalism with suspicion. [446]

Thinkers associated with the liberal tradition of rights are particularly skeptical of group rights, and thus at least implicitly, of many of the 'consociational practices' that I and thinkers such as Arend Lijphart believe could be used to craft democracy in a multinational polity.

As a student of the historical development of democracies, and as an empirical democratic theorist, let me conclude this chapter with four observations about what I think could be, and at times actually have been, democratic 'group specific rights', to use Will Kymlicka's phrase.

First, individuals are indeed the primary bearers of rights and no group right should violate individual rights in a democratic polity. In our example of a democratic multinational federal state, this means that something like a bill of individual rights should be a property of the federal centre and that any laws and social policies that violate this statewide bill of individual rights must fall outside the constitutionally guaranteed policy scope of sub-units.

Secondly, while individual rights are universal, it is simply bad history to argue that in actual democracies all rights have been universal. Frequently, the struggle to reconcile the imperatives of political integration and to recognise the legitimate imperatives of cultural difference has meant according group specific rights such as those given to the Maori in New Zealand, to Spanish-speakers in Puerto Rico, to religious and language culture councils in Belgium and to Muslim family courts in India.[447] The key point is that it is the obligation of the democratic state to ensure that no group specific right violates universal individual rights. As long as this political condition obtains, there is no contradiction between individual rights and group specific rights.

Thirdly, while individuals are the bearers of rights there may well be concrete moments in the crafting of a democracy where individuals cannot develop and exercise their full rights until they are active members of a group that struggles for some collective goods common to most members of the group.[448] Some of the cases I have discussed in this chapter illustrate this point. If Catalans (who under Franco were not allowed to organise Catalan organisations or to have Catalan language radio and television programmes) had not been given some group specific rights, it is not clear that they could have developed as individual democratic activists. It was partially the group rights won by Catalans that contributed to them having the power to argue, vote and negotiate for a form of devolution and power sharing in the newly constructed Spanish federation. Many of the individuals' multiple and complementary political identities I have discussed emerged after some collective goods had been won by Catalan groups.

In Estonia, after an initial period when some ethnic nationalists tried to freeze Russophones out of politics and to argue against their right to organise and have Russian television channels, the recognised group right of Russophones to organise was crucial in helping some Russophones to participate as individuals (and as members of groups) in Estonian political life. As I have already suggested, effective individual rights for Russians may well only be won initially in a context of groups. Indeed, if compulsory language education in Estonian goes forward with the active assent of the organised Russian community, and if more extensive rights of national citizenship are won (partly due to the Russophone group struggles), then one could expect more extensive individual rights for more long-term residents. Such a process could also contribute to deepening the loyalty of Russophones to the state that gave them a roof of rights over their heads. If all this occurs, the incidence of multiple and complementary identities among what is now the Russophone community will grow.

Fourthly, the types of group specific rights I have discussed in the three points above may not be consistent with some nineteenth-century tenets of Anglo-Saxon liberal democracy, or the French idea of citizenship in a nation-state, but they are consistent with a polity in which group rights do not violate individual rights and where effective democratic citizenship and loyalty is broadened. They are in fact some of the few ways to craft democracy in the more difficult and more populous world than those found in Gellner’s time-zones I and II.

[403] E. Gellner, Nations and Nationalism, Oxford, 1983; B. Anderson, Imagined Communities: Reflections on the Origins and Spread of Nationalism, London, 1983.

[404] G. O’Donnell, P. C. Schmitter and L. Whitehead, eds., Transitions from Authoritarian Rule: Prospects for Democracy, Baltimore, 1986. This comprised four paperback volumes devoted respectively to theory, southern Europe, Latin America and comparison.

[405] Gellner’s central preoccupation in Nations and Nationalism is with the relationship of the emergence of nationalism to the advent of industrialisation. In private correspondence, he said that he viewed democratisation as a complicated offshoot of industrialisation. Obviously, in the overall corpus of his work, especially in one of his last books, Conditions of Liberty: Civil Society and its Rivals, London, 1994, he is concerned with democratic practices. Conditions of Liberty will be the main focus of my comments in this chapter.

[406] J. J. Linz and A. Stepan, Problems of Democratic Transition and Consolidation: Southern Europe, South America andPost-Communist Europe, Baltimore, 1996, especially chs. 2, 6, 19 and 20 which relate to some of the themes of this chapter. See also our joint article ‘Political Identities and Electoral Sequences: Spain, the Soviet Union and Yugoslavia’, Daedalus, vol. 121, 1992 and Linz’s ‘De la crisis de un Estado unitario al Estado de las autonomias’, in F. F. Rodriguez, ed., La Espana de las autonomias, Madrid, 1985, and ‘State Building and Nation Building’, European Review, vol. 1, 1993 and my ‘When Democracy and the Nation-State are Competing Logics: Reflections on Estonia’, European Journal of Sociology, vol. 35, 1994.

[407] Gellner, Conditions of Liberty, pp. 105–8.

[408] Ibid., p. 108.

[409] Ibid., p. 113.

[410] Ibid., p. 114.

[411] Ibid., p. 115.

[412] Ibid., p. 115.

[413] Ibid., p. 116.

[414] Ibid., p. 117.

[415] Ibid., p. 123.

[416] Ibid., p. 126.

[417] J. S. Mill, Considerations on Representative Government, first published London, 1861, now in J. S. Mill, Utilitarianism, On Liberty, Considerations on Representative Government, London, 1993, p. 396.

[418] D. Rustow, ‘Transitions to Democracy: Towards a Dynamic Model’, Comparative Politics, vol. 2, 1970, pp. 350–1.

[419] R. A. Dahl, Democracy and its Critics, New Haven, 1989, p. 207.

[420] D. Miller, On Nationality, Oxford, 1995, pp. 90–3.

[421] In the early 1970s, Walker Connor calculated — in ‘Nation-Building or Nation-Destroying?’, World Politics, vol. 24, 1972, p. 322 — that only 12 of the world’s 132 existing states were ‘essentially homogeneous from an ethnic viewpoint’. For later discussions using somewhat different criteria that also arrived at very low estimates of the number of true nation-states in the world, see H. Wiberg, ‘Self-determination as an International Issue’, in I. M. Lewis, ed., Nationalism and Self-determination in the Horn of Africa, London, 1983; G. T. Kurien, The New Book of World Ranking, New York, 1 991; and the various articles brought together in W. Connor, Ethnonationalism: The Questfor Understanding, Princeton, 1994.

[422] Gellner, Conditions of Liberty, p. 115.

[423] E. Weber, Peasants into Frenchmen: The Modernisation of Rural France, 1870–1914, Stanford, 1976.

[424] For the argument that the recognition of difference is a growing claim in the contemporary theory and practice of democracy, see C. Taylor, ‘The Politics of Recognition’, in A. Gutmann, ed., Multiculturalism and the ‘Politics of Recognition’, Princeton, 1992.

[425] See, for example, the interesting discussion of the ‘deterritorialisation’ of ethnicity in D. F. Eickelman and J. Piscatori, Muslim Politics, Princeton, 1996, especially chs. 5 and 6. See also R. G. Rumbaut, ‘The Americans: Latin American and Caribbean Peoples in the United States’, in A. Stepan, ed., Americas: New Interpretative Essays, Oxford, 1992.

[426] In some polities of course there is not a significant set of such leaders and, until something happens to change that democracy is not on the agenda.

[427] R. Brubaker, Nationalism Refamed: Nationhood and the National Question in the New Europe, Cambridge, 1996.

[428] See various works by Arend Lijphart: ‘Consociational Democracy’, World Politics, vol. 21, 1969; Democracies: Majoritarian and Consensus Patterns of Government in Twenty-One Countries, New Haven, 1984; and ‘The Puzzle of Indian Democracy: A Consociational Interpretation’, American Political Science Review, vol. 90, 1996.

[429] Alternative solutions to territorial autonomy as a means of cultural resolution are beginning to receive scholarly attention, but they remain undertheorised. One usefol work is J. Coakley, ‘Approaches to the Resolution of Ethnic Conflict: The Strategy of Non-territorial Autonomy’, International Political Science Review, vol. 15, 1994.

[430] One of the earliest theoretical works on this question is J. J. Linz’s, ‘Excursus on Presidential and Parliamentary Democracy’, in J. J. Linz and A. Stepan, eds., Breakdown of Democratic Regimes: Crisis, Breakdown, Re-equilibration, Baltimore, 1978. This ignited subsequent debate and quests for data to substantiate the claims made regarding parliamentarism’s properties. See in particular the two-volume work J. J. Linz and A. Valenzuela, eds., The Failure of Presidential Democracy, Baltimore, 1994 and A. Stepan and C. Skach, ‘Constitutional Frameworks and Democratic Consolidation: Parliamentarism versus Presidentialism’, World Politics, vol. 46, 1993.

[431] See the classic studies by W. H. Riker, Federalism: Origins, Operation, Significance, Boston, 1964 and ‘Federalism’ in F. I Greenstein and N. W. Polsby, eds., Handbook of Political Science. Volume Five: Governmental Institutions and Processes, Reading, 1975. For Riker, the United States, Canada, Yugoslavia and the USSR all fit the criteria of federal systems. Indeed, according to Riker (‘Federalism’, p. 101), the United States and Yugoslavia fit the same sub-type of ‘centralised federalism’.

[432] R. A. Dahl, in a short but classic discussion of federal systems in a democracy, uses the phase ‘constitutionally guaranteed’ in his Democracy, Liberty and Equality, Oslo, 1986, especially pp. 114–26.

[433] R. A. Dahl, A Preface to Democratic Theory., Chicago, 1956, p. 116.

[434] S. Mainwaring, The Party System and Democratisation in Brazil, Stanford, 1998, especially ch. 9.

[435] Ibid., p. 134.

[436] The Gini Index of Inequality simply measures the degree of inequality among variables, where an index of zero denotes complete equality and an index value approaching the theoretical maximum of 1.0 denotes complete inequality (which would mean here that one state has all the representatives). On this see Lijphart, Democracies, pp. 173–5.

[437] Ibid., p. 174. The Gini co-efficient for Brazil is estimated on the basis of data in Mainwaring, The Party System and Democratisation in Brazil, Table 5.3.

[438] H. Finer, Governments of Greater European Powers: A Comparative Study of the Governments and Political Culture of Great Britain, France, Germany and the Soviet Union, London, 1956, p. 690.

[439] On German federalism, and more specifically on the German constitutional concept of Bundestreue (often translated as ‘federal trust’ or ‘comity’), see B. de Villiers, ‘Bundestreue, The Soul of an Intergovernmental Partnership: Comparative Analysis of the Principle underlying Bundestreue in the Federal Republic of Germany, Switzerland and Belgium’, Konrad Adenauer Stiftung Occasional Papers, Johannesburg, 1995.

[440] Riker, ‘Federalism’, p. 147.

[441] Ibid., p. 143.

[442] Dahl, A Preface to Democratic Theory, p. 116.

[443] For these surveys, see Linz and Stepan, Problems of Democratic Transition and Consolidation, pp. 98–107.

[444] See ibid., chs. 2 and 20 for a much more extensive argument concerning Latvia, Lithuania and Estonia.

[445] The details of these surveys are taken from D. Laitin, ‘Nationalism and Language: a Post-Soviet Perspective’, this volume, p. 148. Full details of this research are now available in his Identity in Formation: The Russian Speaking Populations in the Near Abroad, Ithaca, 1998.

[446] For an excellent discussion of this tradition and its discomfort with ‘group rights’, see W. Kymlicka, Multicultural Citizenship: A Liberal Theory of Minority Rights, Oxford, 1994, especially ch. 4.

[447] Ibid.; Lijphart, Democracies and ‘The Puzzle oflndian Democracy’.

[448] An elegant development of this argument is found in J. Raz, The Morality of Freedom, Oxford, 1986, especially chs. 8 and 10. See too Raz’s Ethics in the Public Domain: Essays in the Morality of Law and Politics, Oxford, 1994, especially the preface and chs. 1, 6 and 8.

* Part IV: Wider implications

 10 Nationalism and civil society in central Europe: from Ruritania to the Carpathian Euroregion

Chris Hann

Ernest Gellner’s interests embraced the whole of human history. He cooperated with archaeologists such as Paul Mellars in investigating the origins of human society; supported the work of hunter-gatherer specialists like James Woodburn, his colleague for many years at the London School of Economics; and he himself carried out extended fieldwork among tribesmen in Morocco. But I suspect that he is probably best known for his work on the transition to industrial society, and in particular, for his analysis of the links between industrialisation and nationalism. In this chapter I shall consider this powerful general theory of modernity in the context of an area that had preeminent significance in his life, if not always in his scholarly output. He spent his formative years in Czechoslovakia, in many ways the most remarkable of the ‘successor states’ to emerge after World War I. It enjoyed a real measure of democracy, and the Bohemian region had already taken significant steps towards a modern industrial society. Despite the name, it was also a country of rather more than two ethnic components: in addition to Czechs and Slovaks, there were large numbers of Ruthenians, Hungarians, Germans, Jews and Gypsies, to name only the most numerous.

The Prague where Gellner had a base in the last years of his life was the capital of a very different country. The Jews mostly vanished during World War II, as did the Gypsies. The Germans and Ruthenians were mostly excluded when new frontiers were determined in its aftermath. Slovaks remained, together with their large Hungarian minority, throughout the period of socialist federalism. But following the ‘velvet divorce’, the Czechs have come close to achieving the ideal of a nationstate, in which the political and the national unit are fully congruent. [449] Of course, perfection is hard to attain. Many awkward questions still surround the claims of Sudeten Germans, and many Czechs are still gravely irritated by pockets of Gypsies in their society as Michael Stewart has recently shown in a striking film. [450] Even so, this part of Central Europe has clearly undergone a rather drastic transformation in the course of one man’s lifetime.

But Gellner did not just live through these transformations; he also did much more than most to help us to understand them and to theorise them. I shall focus on his ideas concerning industrialism, nationalism and civil society, a fundamental triad in the oeuvre. [451] I shall be critical, since I do not think Gellner ever liked hagiography. Also in line with his own preferences, I shall be concrete. I find his ideal-types ‘good to think with’, but very wide of the mark in the specific contexts of my own recent fieldwork. In this way I hope to provoke some reassessment of contemporary history in Central Europe and to stimulate debate on issues of vital importance to this region.

 Ruritanian ideal: east Galician reality

Gellner’s depiction of ‘Ruritania’ is a marvellous, colourful caricature of how nationalism is created in agrarian societies that have no history of nationhood:

The Ruritanians were a peasant population speaking a group of related and more or less mutually intelligible dialects, and inhabiting a series of discontinuous but not very much separated pockets within the lands of the Empire of Megalomania. The Ruritanian language, or rather the dialects which could be held to compose it, was not really spoken by anyone other than these peasants. The aristocracy and officialdom spoke the language of the Megalomanian court, which happened to belong to a language group different from the one of which the Ruritanian dialects were an offshoot.

Most, but not all, Ruritanian peasants belonged to a church whose liturgy was taken from another linguistic group again .... The petty traders of the small towns serving the Ruritanian countryside were drawn from a different ethnic group and religion still, and one heartily detested by the Ruritanian peasantry.[452]

The reader is later given to understand that this model of nationalism was prevalent in eastern districts of Habsburg Europe, but no more precise location is offered. It surely falls within the third of his ‘time zones’.[453] Perhaps Gellner had the Slovaks in mind, or perhaps even his former Ruthenian compatriots. [454] He hints that he first encountered this kind of cultural nationalism as a member of a Prague youth movement, perhaps taking trips to the remote eastern provinces in an age when the peasants were not yet collectivised and the Carpathian foothills not yet tamed by tractors and modern means of communication. [455]

I am grateful to Gellner for allowing his readers to keep their options open. For me, Ruritania lies neither in Czechoslovakia nor in the Balkans: it is code for the Austrian regions of eastern Galicia. Never one of the empire’s wealthier possessions, this was none the less in the later Hapsburg period a province of considerable political and strategic importance because of the threat from tsarist Russia. This external power also played a significant role in the debates about national identity that were beginning in eastern Galicia at exactly this time. Many inhabitants looked to Moscow for their political salvation. The Austrians exacted a heavy price for this Panslavism during World War I, when Karl Polanyi, Ludwig Wittgenstein and many other late Habsburg intellectuals served their emperor on this Eastern Front. In eastern Galicia, even before this war, both Panslavism and an autonomous ‘Ruthenian’ orientation had been largely superseded by a new movement among eastern Slavs, that of Ukrainian nationalism. It is difficult to explain this movement in terms of the direct impact of industrialisation, since there was so little industry here at this time. However, a broader interpretation of Gellner’s theories, one which emphasises uneven development rather than industrialisation per se, and which recognises that positions in rapidly expanding secular bureaucracies may have the same sociological consequences as industrial jobs, nevertheless shed some light on the Ukrainian case. At any rate, the Austrians did little to stifle this new nationalism, since it promised both a buffer against Russia and a counterweight to the increased assertiveness of the Poles. The latter were dominant in western Galicia, where they generally formed the most numerous group in both towns and villages. They had turned Cracow into the cultural capital of a Polish nation which as yet lacked political frontiers. But in eastern Galicia the Poles were heavily outnumbered by eastern Slavs in most rural areas, while in the towns and cities Poles and Ukrainians had to jostle for position alongside large Jewish populations, and also smaller communities such as Armenians.

All these people had their own languages, their own churches, their own educational systems. They co-existed over centuries in a framework that exemplifies what Gellner termed ‘the Agrarian Age’, in which cultural diversity is compatible with political unity. Also in line with Gellner’s model, this society had rather little social mobility: people were born into particular communities, and they acquired the characteristics and skills (such as they were) of their forebears. In eastern Galicia Roman Catholic Poles generally had the upper hand, as landowning aristocrats and as cultured townspeople, while the mass of the peasantry spoke dialects of what gradually came to be known as Ukrainian. Those east Slavs who did become wealthy were likely to become ‘Polonised’, often altering their names as well as their language. Sometimes they also altered their religion, a process known as ‘latinization’. At lower levels there were also many cases of Roman Catholic peasants and Poles of the impoverished gentry class becoming, ‘Ruthenised’, i.e. adapting the language and religion of the dominant rural population. Although the division between western and eastern Slavs generally corresponded quite closely to that between the western (Latin) and eastern (Byzantine) traditions of Christianity, the fit was by no means perfect on either side.

This was an extremely poor agrarian society, and this poverty probably got worse in the closing decades ofimperial rule. Vienna invested in railways and in fortifications, but there was little in the way of public or private industrial accumulation. The expanding rural population had little alternative to overseas emigration. Huge numbers crossed the Atlantic, where the new communities they formed contributed to the formation of new identities both in America and in the ‘homelands’.

So, with a high degree of cultural diversity and inequality, we can say that eastern Galicia down to the demise of Franz Josef meets the main criteria of Gellner’s model of agrarian society. Poles, Ukrainians and Ruthenians were all busy in this period, promoting their collective causes in the Ruritanian manner. Poles had better resources to work with in some ‘objective’ historical sense, given the long history of Polish statehood. However, this was by no means self-evident on the ground where ‘Polish’ villagers were seldom any more conscious of their national identity than were their East Slav neighbours. They were not even called Poles, a name that frequently was applied only to wealthy landowners, i.e. to the Pan.

Before poking fun at these embryonic nationalists and taking ‘Megalomania’ to be an unambiguously negative evaluation of the House of Habsburg, we should also note a virtue of this political formation. As Gellner himself liked to point out, so long as that empire lasted you could travel from eastern Galicia to the shores of the Adriatic without a passport.[456] He saw the Hapsburgs as permitting the development of benign forms of cultural nationalism within the framework of an increasingly federal polity — still in essence the solution which commends itself to many intellectuals who debate the demise of nation-states and a ‘Europe without frontiers’ at the close of our century. I shall return to this theme below.

 Three transformations: plus fa change

Where Gellner’s theoretical model offers essentially one transformation from the agrarian age to the industrial era, eastern Galicia has in the course of this century experienced at least three major political convulsions. The extent to which the region can be called industrialised is still rather debatable, even at the end of the century. The collapse of Ruritania (in Anthony Hope’s sense rather than in that of Gellner) was best symbolised by that day in 1915 when the tsar arrived in Przemysl to inspect his conquering army. Przemysl was the Austrian military stronghold in eastern Galicia and one of the jewels in the Hapsburg crown. But the tsar himself was soon swept aside, and the Austro-Hungarian empire disintegrated in 1918. With almost everything up for grabs, the future of eastern Galicia was decided less by diplomacy in Paris than by direct action on the ground. The peacemakers reinvented the state of Poland, but spontaneous risings of eastern Slavs succeeded temporarily in creating an independent Ukraine. This initiative was soon squashed. The military strength of the new Poland proved stronger than that of Bolshevik Russia. Eastern Galicia, with all its cultural diversity, was forcibly incorporated into the new Poland.

This drastic political change was not accompanied by accelerated industrial development. In the fields of education and administration the Poles preserved a good deal of the Austrian legacy. Promises to create a Ukrainian university were broken, and large numbers of Polish colonists were given help to settle in the region, while Ukrainians were disqualified from purchasing land that they badly needed. Although the rhetoric of ‘poor Galicia’ became less fashionable, emigration opportunities were now severely restricted. Overall, the interwar decades were characterised by intense depression and poverty. This period was marked by an intensification of ethnonational conflicts. The Poles could find solace for their economic problems in the glorious re-emergence of their state and their new military strength. Ukrainians resorted to ‘terrorist’ organisations to pursue their cause, since the prospects for achieving any form of autonomy by constitutional means seemed gloomier than they had been under the Austrians. In multiethnic cities like Przemysl and, increasingly, in the countryside as well, the accommodations of the past were now more difficult to sustain. These tensions were most evident in religion: there was pressure on all Poles to conform to the Latin variant of Catholicism, while the Greek Catholic church became even more firmly identified with the cause of Ukrainian nationalism and experienced political repression from Warsaw as a result. Both western and eastern Catholics participated in anti-Jewish activities.

These tensions led to tragedy on a massive scale in the 1940s. Przemysl became a divided city when Poland was partitioned by Germany and the USSR in 1939. Many Ukrainians, victims of Polish oppression in preceding decades, were persuaded by Nazi assurances that cooperation with the occupying power would lead in time to full Ukrainian independence. After 1941, when the Nazis attacked the USSR, the levels of violence in eastern Galicia escalated still further. The Jewish population was exterminated. As German and Soviet armies moved back and forth across this region, other groups, both Polish and Ukrainian, perpetrated their own horrors, often against their close neighbours. This mutual ‘ethnic cleansing’ was in effect formally ratified at the end of the war when the new border was set by the so-called ‘Curzon Line’, just a few miles east of Przemysl. Further agreements led to the ‘voluntary repatriation’ of millions of Poles from the eastern districts, many of them to be resettled in the far west of the country, in lands ‘regained’ from Germany, while large numbers of east Slavs were transported from Poland to various points of the Ukraine. The Greek Catholic Church was suppressed, following the Soviet precedent. The cleansing policy culminated in 1947 when the Polish authorities, embarrassed by the continued campaign of the ‘terrorist organisation UPA’ in the Carpathian mountains, took decisive action by deporting the entire remaining east Slav civilian population and scattering it across areas in the far north and west of the country previously inhabited by Germans.

In the space of a few years the ethnic map of eastern Galicia and all adjacent regions had altered dramatically. Socialist Poland, unlike its predecessor, could claim to be almost where the Czechs are today, one of the most ethnically homogeneous states in Europe. It had, of course, given up most of the old east Galician lands to the Ukraine. Ukraine itself was rather less homogeneous because of the large Russian presence in the east; but in the Galician districts, even in cities such as L’viv, formerly largely Polish, Ukrainians became virtually as dominant on their side of Curzon’s Line as the Poles became in cities such as Przemysl and their hinterlands.

The socialist period that was inaugurated with such bloodshed was later marked by many other changes in Poland. Economic progress was significant. Even if the south-east received relatively little investment, the large plants established in locations such as Silesia and Nowa Huta ensured that once again opportunities for emigration were opened up. At the same time educational opportunities made it possible for large numbers of peasant children to aspire to white-collar work. Consequently, the early decades of socialist rule showed high rates of intergenerational social mobility. It is true that later these rates began to decline and that the prestige of some of the traditional professions remained as high as ever, whatever socialists might attempt in terms of levelling salaries and tinkering with university entrance systems. The picture is a complex one, and it is perhaps still too early to draw up a final balance sheet. But, though the socialists soon produced their own distinctive forms of stratification, I suggest that in this period Poland began to approximate to Gellner’s ideal type of a modern industrial society. Socialist Poland achieved a high degree of meritocratic mobility, thanks to an effective national education system that used a single standardised national language and fostered a basic sense of equality among all citizens of the state, the great majority of whom felt themselves to be members of one Polish nation.

This relative success in accomplishing a modern industrial society was flawed in a number of ways. One of the most significant was the political failure to proceed with the collectivisation of agriculture after the disturbances of 1956. This failure had especially dire consequences in the Galician districts, given the extreme sub-division of farms here that dated back to Austrian times. These villagers still tended to have more than twice as many children as town dwellers. Some of these children took their chance in Silesia, some became commuters to their local market town, but even these would often return to settle in the village because of the urban housing shortages. The rural sector was characterised by an almost complete absence of investment in production and the persistence of an irrational structure of land ownership and use. Yet faute de mieux a very large proportion of the population still carried out most of its consumption here.

The more serious flaw in the Polish People’s Republic’s claim to modernity was that it was advanced in the name of socialism. The sad consequence of this fact is that much of the real progress that was made down to 1989 has been undone since then, in the chaos unleashed by ‘shock therapy’. It is generally agreed that Poland has experienced one of the more extreme ‘transitions’ to market economy. It is less frequently noted in the west that this was not a path chosen by Polish voters; on the contrary, they voted at the first opportunity for a ‘reform socialist’ style of government. In effect it has been the west, in collaboration with various elites, most of them concentrated in the capital, that has dictated the course of Poland’s third great period of convulsion this century. It is obviously premature to assess the final outcomes, but visiting the country recently I found it hard to agree with those economists and politicians who assert that ‘shock therapy has worked’. Certainly the economy now appears to be growing rapidly, after several years of catastrophic decline. But how do we assess the social costs? A society that had banished the threat of unemployment must now recognise this as part of its everyday reality. Another part of this reality is having to step over the beggars on every railway station and every urban underpass.Yet there is no doubt that consumers who remember the shortages of past decades are grateful for the market conditions that prevail today, however bitterly they may complain about the prices.

It seems to me that the chief price being paid in Poland’s present transition relates to those elusive ideals of meritocracy and equality. Already weakening in the later socialist decades, they have crumbled dramatically since 1989. The village children of the south-east, whose parents at least had the opportunities to move elsewhere in the country and some chance of joining the bureaucracy, are in some ways back to where their grandparents or greatgrandparents were, with few opportunities for mobility of any kind. In Przemysl county today more than half of the population lives in villages. The voivode (prefect), himself born into a peasant family and a beneficiary of socialist policies, is brutally frank about the prospects of young people today. He was recently quoted as saying:

In the past villagers had alternatives. They could go off to other regions of the country, to Silesia, to large cities and industrial agglomerations. At the same time Przemysl itself offered relatively cheap flats in the cooperative system and — albeit for lousy wages — jobs. In the new conditions there are no such alternatives. It is therefore necessary to create conditions for young people to build their future where they are born, in the countryside. This is where they ought to find jobs, build their accommodation, organise their lives, not necessarily in agriculture ... it is therefore necessary to restructure the countryside. [457]

Lest this be dismissed as locally specific, and therefore irrelevant, by those who believe in the redemptive powers of market capitalism in this region, let me quote also the careful assessment of some Warsaw sociologists whose research has focused upon the impact of recent political and economic changes on the occupational structure. They have concluded that:

although we have been able to trace some positive developments undoubtedly modernising Polish occupational and sectoral structures, these developments were outweighed by tendencies leading in the opposite direction ... Job moves from the state sector to the private did not produce any upgrading effect on either sectoral or occupational structure ... Downward mobility was on the rise, and women seemed to lose more mobility chances than men did. [458]

None of this augurs well for Poland, whose imperfect approximation to Gellner's ideal-type of modernity looks like becoming more imperfect still in the new capitalist conditions.

 Civil society and Euroregions

I wish now to return to the themes of ethnicity and nationalism in the context of some very recent events in the city of Przemysl.[459] I used to visit this city regularly between 1979 and 1981, when I was doing fieldwork in a village some 60 miles away across the mountains, Przemysl was the diocesan centre for both the Roman Catholic and Greek Catholic churches and I found archival materials related to my village stored by the state in an ecclesiastical building confiscated after the Greek Catholics were suppressed in 1946. The building had retained all its essential features externally, and even internally it was most unlike any other archive or library I have known. This was my introduction to the city's complicated history. Later I heard more about past conflicts surrounding more famous churches in the city centre. In 1982, when 'martial law' was still in force, the highest representatives of the Greek Catholic church in the city, surviving in semi-clandestine form under the 'protection' of the Roman Catholics, told me of the antagonism they continued to experience not so much from the socialist coteries as from the highest levels of the Roman Catholic hierarchy.

Some of this history of antagonism became evident for all the world to see after the collapse of socialist government in Poland. In 1991 the Pope asked the Roman Catholics to return the cathedral church of the Carmelites to the Greek Catholics, to whom it had belonged before 1946. However, as an inscription at the entrance to the church today informs visitors, 'a part of the local society' declined to accept this message from the head of the universal Catholic church. The building was the focus of a campaign by Polish nationalists which eventually forced the Pope to back down. The Greek Catholics have had to make do with another building, with which they have no historic ties, while the Carmelite church is now adorned with every kind of nationalist sloganising, with a huge map engraved onto an interior wall showing Poland with its pre-1939 frontiers. This is part of what the reassertion of 'civil society' has meant in Przemysl. The slogan of civil society has been generally used by western commentators and a few local intellectuals in the same unambiguously positive sense as ‘market economy’. The general argument is that free, mediating institutions between persons and families on the one hand, and the state on the other, were ruthlessly suppressed under communism. The reassertion of this civil society is held to be a key part of the reconstruction of democracy and an effective ‘public sphere’, at local as well as national levels. However, the realities on the ground have often been very different.

It is worth recalling that, following protracted ‘round table’ negotiations, Poland elected a non-communist government several months before the more dramatic, revolutionary upheavals elsewhere in eastern Europe at the end of 1989. It was only after the impact of these external developments that the political atmosphere in Przemysl was transformed. Where free association had previously been discouraged or prohibited, under new legislation you needed to muster just fifteen members to register your voluntary association. Many such groupings emerged on the nationalist right, mostly with overlapping if not identical memberships. In fact a single individual was the driving force behind most of this activity. He was said to be an ex-communist, indeed, a former KGB agent, who had been born and raised in those former eastern lands that Poland had lost to the Ukraine. Most of his new organisations were more or less overtly anti-Ukrainian. They included groupings to commemorate those who had fought against Ukrainians in the city in 1918–19, and those murdered by Ukrainian terrorists during and after World War II. These national activists were the prime organisers of the opposition to the Pope’s wish to restore property to the Greek Catholics. They have made astute use of the local press: the text of their ‘letters to the editor’ is sometimes shorter than the list of signatures, each followed by the full formal title of the organisation and the individual’s status within it. (One of the established small businesses to do well out of the new civil society has been the manufacturer of ink stamps: the taste for these trappings of organisational power provides a strand of continuity not only with socialist bureaucracy, but also with the age of Musil and Kafka.) The nationalists have been able to put pressure on the city council e.g. to object to the Ministry of Culture’s plans to organise a festival for Poland’s Ukrainian minority in Przemysl in 1995 (in the end the festival went ahead, but in an atmosphere poisoned by — among other atrocities — an arson attack on the local Ukrainian club). They have also lobbied effectively at national level, e.g. in securing the removal of a county conservation officer who was allegedly spending too much of his budget on the preservation of Ukrainian cultural monuments in the region. Employees of the city council have been forced out of their jobs simply for being suspected of having Ukrainian blood in their families. At one stage the leader of the rightist groupings had himself appointed deputy voivode of the county. That did not last very long, and he has never held any significant elective office. Nevertheless he is in many ways the most powerful man in the city, whose views must be taken constantly into consideration by elected counsellors, newspaper editors, the voivode, the police chiefs etc. There is no countervailing power of any sort at the other end of the political spectrum, while the country's major centre-liberal party, the Union of Freedom, which has done much to promote cultural tolerance at the national level, performs very badly in Przemysl. These are not the conditions of liberty, and I think it is because he saw these problems very clearly that Gellner recognised the continuing need for strong central authorities to restrain ethnic extremists in postsocialist conditions.[460]

A fine illustration of the workings of the new local political culture is provided by events surrounding the inception of a 'Carpathian Euroregion'. This idea was taken up in the early 1990s by a voivode of whom the local nationalists disapproved because of his alleged Ukrainian descent. This idea caught on in several neighbouring countries, particularly when a number of western organisations took interest and offered funding. The ostensible motives were straightforward: to simplify and encourage cross-border contacts in this crossroads of Europe, in both cultural and economic spheres. It is possible that, to some, the Euroregion had some vague Habsburgian appeal. From the point of view of western sponsors, notably the Institute for EastWest Studies with its headquarters in New York, the object was simultaneously to promote a strong civil society and to further the goals of the privatisation campaigns by enabling the new entrepreneurs to launch cross-border initiatives and avoid the red tape associated with the socialist planned economy. The western sponsors added the standard rhetoric about support for the 'nonprofit sector' .[461] Liberal enthusiasts of civil society, such as Adam Michnik in Warsaw, wrote messages of support for this initiative: it was self-evidently a good thing for people to forge closer ties with their close neighbours and become less dependent on the overcentralised Polish state and its remote capital.

Unfortunately no one reckoned with the nationalist reaction in Przemysl. Having emerged victorious from their tussle with the Pope over ecclesiastical property, the right-wingers were determined to obstruct what they saw as a potentially dangerous external intervention. They had no wish to weaken borders or to promote respect for neighbouring cultures. They argued that any relaxation of frontier controls would only lead to an uncontrollable influx of cheap labour from the east, accentuating the city's rising unemployment problem. Taking full advantage of legislative provisions designed to enhance local democracy, in summer 1993 they mounted a campaign for signatures to call for a referendum to prevent the elected councillors from taking Przemysl into the Euroregion. This signature campaign was aggressive (people were accosted on the streets) and soon met the target required to force a referendum. Following complex legal manoeuvring by the authorities, this was not held. The county did join the Euroregion, and although the city councillors eventually resolved in 1995 to withdraw from it, this is not considered to have any legal force. The county remains a full member, along with the neighbouring county of Krosno, and other counties in eastern Slovakia, north-eastern Hungary and western Ukraine. (Romanians have also participated, but only as 'observers'.) There is a secretariat that was based for a time in Poland, but has since transferred to Hungary. Foreign ministers have signed agreements, and lots of newsletters have been produced in Atlanta, Georgia, by the Institute for EastWest Studies. This Institute regards the creation of this Euroregion as a success story, a positive example of the measures that can be taken to promote private enterprise and break down the power of centralised states over their subjects. It claims that non-governmental organisations have been the driving force in this campaign, and that the Euroregion has been 'run entirely by the representatives of local communities' .[462]

Local people in Przemysl are agreed in rejecting this interpretation. [463] One of my friends there describes the Euroregion as simply 'fiction': no cultural or economic contacts have been promoted that would not have developed in any case. The most important form of cross-border contact remains the bazaar sector, the myriad forms of petty trading to which not even the nationalists object, recognising how vital they are to postsocialist survival strategies in the city, even though the mess and disorder of these market contacts inevitably fuel stereotypes of the typical Ukrainian as a 'dirty trader'. [464] All the Euroregion has really done is supply a further opportunity for the nationalists to whip up antiUkrainian sentiment, and to combine this with the ever-present powerful resentment felt towards superfluous bureaucracy. The Euroregion may have created a few more jobs for officials and inspired liberals to much wishful thinking, but surely some better use could have been found for the western resources it has absorbed. [465]

 Conclusion

This chapter has ranged over roughly a century of central European history, but it is obvious that my principal concern is with understanding the impact of the region's most recent transition. I find it difficult to be optimistic about the present state of the Polish 'nation-state', and my main conclusions can be summarised as follows.

First, in terms of the general structure of society it is clear that the shift from Agraria was slow in getting started in eastern Galicia. The most significant progress was made in the socialist period, when for the first time all members of a relatively homogeneous integrated national society could participate on the basis of a high degree of equality in a labour market that offered significant opportunities for social as well as geographical mobility. But much of that progress is now being undone and recent research suggests that the ideals of social mobility and meritocracy are now being further undermined. It is true that in industrial societies, relative rates of social mobility have shown remarkable continuity over time, despite the increase in absolute mobility rates. [466] However, it is this increase in absolute rates, brought about through the progressive modernisation of labour markets, which has had the more significant material impact on populations as a whole. But in contemporary Poland, primarily because of its antiquated agrarian structure, the absolute indicators would seem to be adverse. One would not expect Gellner to pay much attention to the relativist arguments, but the present shift towards intensified absolute inequality is in sharp contradiction with his ideal-type of modern industrial society.

Secondly, these depressing socio-economic trends seem to be associated with an upsurge in more virulent styles of nationalism. In this chapter I have charted the emergence of ethnically more homogenous states in this region, the most decisive events being those of the 1940s. The tensions of recent years in Przemysl suggest that the ‘time-zone’ distinctions made by Gellner, whatever their validity in the past, have now collapsed. The propagation of a certain version of ‘civil society’ has in practice enabled a small minority of Polish nationalists to dictate the policies of the city and county, and to have a pervasive poisoning impact on Polish-Ukrainian relations. The creation of a Carpathian Euroregion, with overseas funding linked in part to the privatisation campaigns, presented these groups with an excellent opportunity to assert their nationalist values.

I conclude by suggesting that Gellner’s apparent nostalgic sympathy for the Franz Josef prototype of Euroregion is misplaced. This was never anything like a federation of culturally diverse but equal nations. Ruritanians under Hungarian rule, including those inherited by Czechoslovakia, were subject to ruthless Magyarisation. Galician Ruritania was initially predicated on Austrian domination, but the ground that the Austrians later conceded to Poles was not ground the latter were ever willing to concede to the Ukrainians, or the Ukrainians to Ruthenians or regional groups such as the Lemkos. It was all thoroughly unstable. Only socialism brought any kind of stability and egalitarianism to this region, though at a terrible price. Socialism did not last long enough for the memories of ethnic hatreds to die away. In a climate of great political and economic instability, elite policies designed to promote local democracy and western interventions to strengthen ‘civil society’ in this region are helping to fan the flames of these past hatreds.

 Notes

This chapter was drafted in September 1995 following a number of brief visits to the city of Przemsyl in south-east Poland. These visits were linked to an ESRC research project, ‘The Politics of Religious Identity: the Greek Catholics of Central Europe’ (reference number R00023071).

[449] Cf. E. Gellner, Nations and Nationalism, Oxford, 1983, p. 1.

[450] Stewart’s ‘What Magdalena Said’ was shown on BBC I ‘Everyman’ programme in January 1994. Cf. A. Tucker, ‘The New Jews’, Telos, vols. 98–9, 1993–4.

[451] See, in particular, Gellner, Nations andNationalism and Conditions of Liberty, London, 1994.

[452] Gellner, Nations andNationalism, p. 58.

[453] Gellner, Conditions of Liberty, pp. 113–18.

[454] Gellner, Nations and Nationalism, p. 59. Miroslav Hroch has informed me that the locations were almost certainly Slovak. According to Hroch, Gellner never forgot the Slovak folk songs that he heard on these trips.

[455] See P. R. Magocsi, ‘Made or Re-made in America: Nationality and Identity Formations among Carpatho-Rusyn Immigrants and Their Descendants’, in P. R. Magocsi, ed., The Persistance of Regional Cultures, New York, 1993.

[456] Personal communication at a seminar in Cracow in May 1994.

[457] S. Bajda, Zycie Prsemskie, 3 May 1995.

[458] B. W. Mach and K. M. Slomczynski, ‘Occupational Structure and Mobility in the Transition from Communism to Post-Communist Capitalism’, in E. Wnuk-Lipinski, ed., After Communism: A Multidisciplinary Approach to Radical Social Change, Warsaw, 1995, pp. 135–51.

[459] For further information, see C. Hann, ‘Ethnic Cleansing: Poles and Ukrainians Beside the Curzon Line’, Nations and Nationalism, vol. 2, 1996.

[460] Thus Gellner often disagreed with those other analysts who wished to see the fastest possible dismantling of the centralist socialist state. For example, he did not think that postsocialist Russia should acquiesce in the secession of relatively homogenous peoples like the Chechens (personal communication). Cf. E. Gellner, ‘The Rest of History’, Prospect, May 1996.

[461] According to the most recent report I have seen (K. J. Ners and I. T. Buxell’s Assistance to Transition Survey, Warsaw, 1995, p. 78), ‘in 1994 the Michiganbased Charles Steward Mott Foundation provided the IEWS (Institute for EastWest Studies) with a grant of $3.9 million to establish a Fund for the Development of the Carpathian Euroregion (FDCE), which will focus particularly on cross-border interactions. The Fund’s initial mission will be to strengthen the capacity of non-profit organisations and local governments to address community problems and needs and is a step closer to the development of a civil society in the countries of the region.’

[462] Ibid., p. 78.

[463] For an extremely mild version of the common criticisms (because written by a public official), see D. Iwaneczko, ‘Euroregion karpacki jako przyklad wspolpracy transgranicznej’ (The Carpathian Euroregion as an example of cross-border cooperation), Fraza, vol. 4, 1995.

[464] See J. Jestal, ‘Stereotyp Ukramca w swiadornosci mlodziezy Polski poludniowo-wschadniej (The Stereotype of the Ukrainian in the Consciousness of Young People in South-East Poland), Fraza, vol. 4, 1995.

[465] For example, resources might be deployed to counter Przemysl’s nationalists with a campaign to promote awareness of the city’s multicultural traditions.

The Ukrainian population today is tiny, and yet in the absence of any countervailing education or information it is generating the same ‘phantom limb’ effect often noted in connection with the country’s Jews — on which see R. Wisse, ‘Poland’s Jewish Ghosts’, Commentary, vol. 83, 1987.

[466] R. Erikson and J. Goldthorpe, The Constant Flux: A Study of Class Mobility in Industrial Societies, Oxford, 1992. I am grateful to Rosemary Crompton for advice on the formulation of this point.

 11 From here to modernity: Ernest Gellner on nationalism and Islamic fundamentalism

Dale F. Eickelman

Islam is one of the basic ‘bricks’ in Ernest Gellner’s political thought, along with segmentation, psychoanalysis, nationalism, Marxism and the transition to the Enlightenment.[467] The Islamic ‘brick’, like the others, emerges as a ‘neat, crisp model’. In Gellner’s words: ‘Any structure, any theory will do — not because it’s true but because it makes you notice that evidence goes against it or for it.’[468] Islam held a particular fascination for Gellner. He regarded ‘Muslim society’ as the exception to the pervasive trend towards a shared culture of nationalism, with its ensuing fruit of modernity — commonly educated, mutually substitutable, atomised individuals with the potential for participating in a Civil Society — Gellner’s capitals — which, among other features, precludes an ‘ideological monopoly’.[469] This chapter argues that Gellner’s Islamic brick made readers notice evidence which went for and against it more than it described historical or contemporary developments and that Muslim politics and society, far from being an exception to worldwide trends, exemplify them.

 The Islamic ‘brick’

Gellner’s depiction of Islam in Conditions of Liberty, the last book published during his lifetime, reiterates his long-standing convictions about ‘Muslim society’. He preferred the single, society, to the plural, societies, in writing about Islam because he regarded Islam as a faith as imposing ‘essential’ constraints on the conduct and thought of those committed to it. [470] For Gellner, Islam was a ‘closed system’ of thought for which he had a ‘horrified fascination’.[471] With the collapse of Marxist regimes, only Islam, he argued, continued to resist the universal trend towards secularisation and nationalism. In the West, ‘the essence of nationalism ... is that a ‘high — literacy-linked — culture becomes the pervasive, membership-defining culture of the total society’. In Islam, in contrast, fundamentalism becomes the essence of total society, so that regimes are judged by ‘the religious norms of sacred law, rather than the secular principles of a Civil Society’. For Gellner, the collective Islamic self-representation provides a new and powerful self-image for ‘an anonymous mobile mass society produced by modern conditions’, one no longer able to identify with smaller, primordial entities. On its downside, this vision of Islam ‘exemplifies a social order which seems to lack much capacity to provide political countervailing institutions or associations’ and ‘operates effectively without intellectual pluralism’.[472]

Gellner’s argument resonates strongly with certain Western assumptions that the Muslim world offers an ‘exception’ to the emergence of both nationalist movements and civil society elsewhere. As a means to provoke argument and capture the reader’s imagination, it ranks alongside Samuel Huntington’s ‘West versus Rest’ claim of a coming crisis pitting the ‘West’ against ‘Confucian’ and ‘Muslim’ civilisations.[473] Paradoxically, Huntington refuted the basic tenets of his ‘cultural’ argument prior to the publication of his 1993 Foreign Affairs article: ‘Confucian democracy may be a contradiction in terms, but democracy in a Confucian society need not be’, and the dynamism inherent in any cultural tradition can radically transform it, even in remarkably short time spans. Thus Huntington argues that ‘Spanish culture’ was described as ‘traditional, authoritarian, hierarchical, deeply religious, and oriented towards honour and status’ in the 1950s, but by the 1970s, ‘these words had virtually no place in a description of Spanish attitudes and values’.[474] Gellner made no major revision to his views on Islam.

Indeed, there is a remarkable consistency between Gellner’s first presentation of his argument on Islam in the 1960s and his final ones. He believed, along with Daniel Lerner, that the Muslim world faces a stark choice: ‘Mecca or mechanisation’. [475] ‘Islam’ for Gellner constituted the ‘one very real, dramatic and conspicuous exception’ to the overall post-Enlightenment trend to the decline of religious faith and observance, leading to few celebrated forms of community ‘other than possibly the national state’. [476] Gellner writes: ‘To say that secularization prevails in Islam is not contentious. It is simply false. Islam is as strong now as it was a century ago. In some ways, it is probably much stronger.’ [477]

Gellner’s argument is nothing if not bold. Although his basic image of Islam is a Morocco-inspired contrast between walled towns as islands of a literate urban elite surrounded by a vast sea of tribes people, well over half the world’s billion Muslims, from the southern Philippines to North Africa, live in areas where the contrast between a ‘High Islamic’ town and a ‘Low Islamic’ tribal hinterland, questionable even for ‘premodern’ Morocco, is even less applicable. [478] Two centuries after the advent of Islam in 622 CE, Arab Muslims were outnumbered by the Muslim populations of South Asia, Southeast Asia, Central Asia and Africa, to whose ranks are now added the growing Muslim populations of Europe and North America. All these groups contribute to the diversity of Muslim expression and practice.

Gellner eventually conceded that he overstated the contrast between a Protestant-like scriptural puritanism and a more particularistic rural/ tribal Islam tied to saint worship and that the two ‘patterns’ of religious comportment largely co-existed. [479] Yet what Gellner acknowledges in passing in relation to the modern era for Muslim societies — multiple interpretations of religious tradition and experience — applies equally to the long, unspecified years of premodernity, as is also the case for Christianity. One need only think ofPeter Brown’s discussion of the cult of saints in early

Latin Christianity or Ernst Troeltsch's characterisation of the Christian tradition as one of shifts at various levels and times between compromise and non-compromise with the social world. [480]

The premodern Muslim tradition shows similar creative tension, involving scripture and practice, tradition and interpretation, that cannot readily be reduced to monochromatic contrasts between rural and urban, high and low. Saints also exist in towns; renowned scholars often resided in the Moroccan countryside (and one person's saint was often another's religious scholar); and the zar cults in the Sudan or visits to shrines in Turkey suggest ways in which both women and men, now and in the past, conceive of alternate social realities and collaborate in religious practices.[481] Similarly, notwithstanding the pious fiction of some Muslim jurists that there can be no change in the divinely revealed law (shari'a), emendations and additions have occurred throughout Islamic history, and at an increased pace since the mid nineteenth century. The supposedly complete divine law has also been circumscribed by the growth of parallel legal traditions, as in the case of Ottoman reforms from 1839 through 1876.[482]

Just as Pope Pius X in 1907 declared modernism (which for him encompassed a heresy, including democracy, religious tolerance, science and 'rationalism'[483]) conservatives in the Muslim world have reacted vigorously to the accelerated pace of innovation in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. Even if a significant degree of political activity in the Muslim world is legitimised in religious terms, however, this does not mean that the political activity of Muslim activists is a throwback to a premodern era. As James Piscatori has argued, the premodern era in the Muslim world has been characterised by a defacto secularisation, just as contemporary states, even while claiming adherence to Islamic principles, conduct their business and secular affairs in a manner indistinguishable from, and as diverse as, their non-Islamic counterparts.[484]

With the exception of Turkey, secularisation in most of the Muslim world has been, as Sadik al-Azm points out in luxuriant Geertz-like prose, 'slow, informal, hesitant, adaptive, absorbent, pragmatic, gradualistic, full of halfway houses, partial compromises, transient marriages of convenience, and plenty of temporary retreats and unending evasions, but no striking moment of high drama’. [485] This de facto secularisation is no less real for its lack of drama. Expert opinion similarly predicted that an ‘unchanging bedrock of Islamic identity’ would emerge with the collapse of Communist regimes in Central Asia — such identity has emerged as merely one possibility among many.[486]

 Muslim politics today

There is a sense in which ‘Muslim politics’ can be used legitimately without recourse to the kiln of bricks from which Gellner extracted his Islamic one and without having to assert that Muslims are more driven by dogma and belief than adherents of other world religious traditions. Politics are ‘Muslim’ when they relate to a widely shared, although not doctrinally defined, tradition of ideas and practice. The awareness of participating in a world-wide religious movement empowers Muslims in France, Egypt and elsewhere, encouraging them to call for social and political reforms. The November 1979 attack on the Great Mosque in Mecca and the 1981 assassination of Egypt’s President Sadat show how some Islamic groups use violence to confront political authority, but the 1989 head-scarf controversy in Creil, France, temporarily resolved by the state remanding the issue to local authorities rather than provoke a major political crisis, is also an example of Muslim politics.

Gilles Kepel has suggested that the 1989 head-scarf dispute in Creil was a ‘Copernican revolution’, signalling a shift among French Muslims from regarding France as a land of work opportunities (terre de contrat) in which they temporarily reside to regarding it as a land of mission (terre de mission) in which they are permanently settled.[487] Muslim groups calling for democratisation in such countries as Jordan, Egypt, Tunisia, and Morocco indicate how Muslims as self-conscious religious actors use the instruments of existing political systems to magnify their political voice and intensify pressure for reform. State authorities inevitably see both forms of assertiveness as challenging official ideologies and control over policy. Even when asserting universality, however, Muslim politics assume distinctly national and local forms, and their political claims reflect considerable internal debate. The statements of the leaders of the Algerian Front Islamique du Salut (FIS), like those of political movements elsewhere, range from moderation to radical populism, but this divergence is not unique to Islamic movements.[488] Before FIS was outlawed in March 1992, this internal debate was publicly sustained within and without the movement, although FIS equated its political voice with Islam and legitimacy (‘another form of democracy’) and opposition to western-dominated ‘democrats’.[489] Muslim politics, like all politics, operates in distinct national spheres.

A useful way of looking at politics, including Muslim politics, is to conceive of it as the setting of boundaries between decision-making units in society and the enforceable rules for resolving jurisdictional disputes among them. Even when self-consciously Muslim groups accept the existing political hierarchy, they do not necessarily acquiesce to existing boundaries. For instance, the religious authorities (‘ulama) in Egypt vigorously protested President Sadat’s 1979 effort to liberalise family law — specifically, women’s rights in marriage. They saw Sadat’s efforts as an intrusion on their authority. Muslim politics, like politics elsewhere, involves a contest over the extent of state control — locating the boundaries oflegitimate state and non-state activity.

The notion of politics as centred on power relations and ‘interests’ does not take account of relations among individuals in a society or between societies that are based on what they think is right, just or religiously ordained.[490] The idea of politics as ‘a struggle about people’s imaginations’ is a corrective to some conventional thinking. [491] More broadly, politics can be conceived of as cooperation in and contest over symbolic production and control of the institutions — formal and informal — which serve as the symbolic arbiters of society. [492] Politics as Leviathan is thus decisively abandoned in favour of politics as symbol maker. Of course, this perspective involves understanding culture as contested, temporal and emergent. Even Gellner, a firm believer in ‘culture-transcending truth’, acknowledges that in most circumstances ‘preaching across cultural boundaries’ is ‘a fairly pointless exercise’.[493]

Gellner’s claim that ‘fundamentalism’ is the essence of a monolithic Muslim society runs counter to the highly diverse political and religious currents which suffuse Muslim societies and Muslim-majority polities. The fascination of Western commentators with ‘fundamentalist’ Muslim discourse has meant that there has been less attention paid to the rising tide of Muslim moderates responding to what they see as the bankruptcy of traditionalist religious discourse. These significant other voices, like the fundamentalists, are distinctively modern, in that they break with earlier forms of conventional religious authority. A case in point is Muhammad Shahrur’s 800-page al-Kitab wa-l-Qur’an (The Book and the Qur’an), which booksellers in Kuwait and Morocco claim is ‘worse than Rushdie’ because the author, a Muslim civil engineer with wide-ranging intellectual interests, attacks the ‘classical’ religious authorities of whom they approve. Banned in Saudi Arabia and initially in Egypt, but with at least 10,000 clandestine photocopies in each of these countries and on the open market in Egypt since late 1993 and personally approved for circulation by Sultan Qaboos of Oman, Shahrur’s book and others like it can be seen as experiments in capturing a new readership and in defining Islam as involving dialogue and interpretation in opposition to populist street slogans asserting the ‘true’ meaning of Islam. [494] Paradoxically, the element of mass education, which Gellner sees as an essential component of Western nationalism and modernity, equally pervades the Muslim world, where it is profoundly altering how people conceive of religion and politics.

 Mass higher education and the political imagination in the Muslim world

Religious fundamentalism, the claims of its adherents notwithstanding, is a distinctively modern phenomenon. [495] Its supporters are the beneficiaries of mass higher education, and it is not the sole or principal product of the massification of education and communications. Mass education, important in itself, also suggests basic transformations in ideas of what people accept as legitimate political authority. An exclusive focus on fundamentalism deflects attention from the more profound changes taking place throughout Morocco, Egypt, Jordan and other places in the Arab world which are correlated with mass higher education and mass communication, factors which have begun to profoundly affect how people think about authority and responsibility in the domains of religion and politics.

Throughout the Muslim majority states, mass higher education has expanded significantly since the 1960s, reshaping conceptions of self, religion, nation and politics. It is as significant as the introduction of printed books in sixteenth-century rural France. Ironically, however, we know more about literacy in medieval and premodern Europe than in the contemporary Muslim and Arab worlds. Many scholars have noted linkages between advanced education and religious activism, but the focus on extremism deflects attention from basic conceptual innovations and emerging networks for communication and action.

For the most part, mass higher education is a recent phenomenon throughout the Muslim world. It began in earnest only in the 1950s, with Egypt's commitment to universal schooling following the 1952 revolution. By the 1970s, large numbers of students had begun to complete the advanced educational cycles. The timing of educational expansion varies for other countries and regions. For example, major educational expansion in Morocco began after independence in 1956, accelerated in the 1960s, and today almost matches the rate of population growth.

A complementary measure of change is the circulation of books and the proliferation of magazines. The Moroccan writer Mohammed Bennis recalls his student days in Fes in the 1970s, when the first 'little' intellectual journals began to flourish in Arabic, rather than French, which had been the dominant language of the educated elite. In lectures and public meetings, students began to insist that teachers and their classmates express themselves in Arabic and that they not use French words when Arabic words and phrases were available.[496]" The shift from French to Arabic, important in the massification of education in France's former North African colonies, and the growing enrolments in higher education significantly increased participation in debates about politics, culture and society. The intellectual effervescence of the 1970s which Bennis describes saw the emergence of the first cohort of Moroccans to acquire their pervasive 'habits of thought' in Arabic, the country's national language. As elsewhere, pressure from this cohort created a demand for 're-imagining' Islam and politics and produced a significant readership for 'quality' books in Arabic. In spite of the rising rate of unemployment among university graduates, reading has for them become a means of 'appropriating, organising, and making objective ideas of society, politics, and self'. [497]

As a result, new books and new markets for them have developed, which suggests a sea change in images and vocabulary and affecting the prospects for political thinking. Egypt provides an excellent case study of the changing market for books and magazines. Although studies of readership in Egypt, as elsewhere in the Arab world, are weak, the few that are available suggest that only 1 to 2 per cent of the population read books regularly. But discussions about books — through word of mouth, the broadcast media or newspapers and magazines — reach much larger segments of the population. Even censors draw attention to books by banning them or attempting to restrict their circulation. [498] The most rapid growth is occurring in publications with religious content: the growth of secular mass education has increased attachment to Islamic culture. During the Nasser era in Egypt (1952–70), religious books were of marginal importance, at least in terms of official production figures. [499] With the opening of the book market in the 1970s, the relaxation of censorship controls, and subsidies from the oil-rich states, religious books became much more common. In recent years, books have became a part of mass culture in Egypt, and ‘products’ intended for the consumption of a literary elite have become an endangered species.

Such mass culture ‘Islamic books’ are growing rapidly in popularity. These are inexpensive, attractively printed texts, accessible to a readership that lacks the literary skills of the educated cadres of an earlier era. The style is often a breezy mix of oral style and colloquial diction. The covers take advantage of modern printing technologies and are designed to be both readily accessible and eye-catching, with titles such as Shaykh ‘Abd al-Hamid Kishk’s Ayyuha l-Muslimun, Ufiqu (O Muslims, Awake!), the cover of which shows a bearded Muslim (bright blue), seated at a table in front of a red-covered Qur’an, covering his eyes in order to sleep. An orange and blue serpent hovers above him, poised to strike. [500]

Other covers are reminiscent of pamphlets distributed by the Jehovah’s Witnesses. Layla Mabruk’s Rihla ila ‘alam al-khulud: ‘adalatyawm al-qiyama (A Trip to Eternity: Justice on Judgment Day) shows a weakened hand sticking out of a bright red pool, while above the title at the right and encircled by a green garland, two Muslims, oblivious to the scene below, pray. [501] A Saudi pamphlet with a curious cover showing a bright red ball plunging into a well in an otherwise parched desert, explains that democracy, which is ‘creeping’ (tatasa-rrub) into the Muslim world, is incompatible with Islam because Islam offers governance by the Creator (al-khaliq) as understood by a properly instructed religious elite, whereas democracy, a non-Arabic term, necessarily implies rule by the created (al-makhluqin), in which unbelievers and the ignorant have an equal say in governance and usurp God’s rule. [502] In many parts of the Muslim world, including North Africa, this style of argument — in some respects a mirror image of Samuel Huntington’s ‘West versus Rest’ — is regarded with amusement by many, but it also offers a style of argument more accessible than that sustained by Muslim moderates who argue for political pluralism in the mainstream Arab print media. [503]

‘Islamic’ books seek to capture the religious — and with increasing explicitness the political — imagination of a new generation. In them, readers find echoes of what they already know and have their questions about religion and conduct answered. Conventional intellectuals may accord no legitimacy to the commercial entrepreneurs who benefit from a market which allows Shaykh Sha’rawi to sell 250,000 copies of a book when the sale of I 0,000 books is regarded as a success and 50,000 as a best-seller. However, few can fail to recognise the significance of an emerging and distinctive ‘popular culture’ in which the ‘Islamic’ book has become a massified commodity.[504]

In retrospect, the 1952 Egyptian revolution appears less a break with the past than an intensification of the prior monarchical vision of directing change from above, a notion visualised by King Farouk’s personal bookplate, which shows a printing press directly under his name, a crown in the upper left and a city and minarets in the background.[505] A learned man in front of the press passes a book to a peasant kneeling next to his plough and oxen. This self-image of the distribution of knowledge was not significantly challenged in the years of the military junta and Nasser’s presidency, and it was largely compatible with the versions of modernisation theory then prevailing. The real revolution in ideas of authority came later, as mass education created a new public for the printed word. In retrospect, the economic reforms set in motion in the 1970s unintentionally created the space for a cultural and intellectual reorientation through ‘market forces’ which favoured ‘Islamisation from below’ — uncontrolled and uncontrollable by state forces.

In a general sense, the implications of mass higher education and mass communication include a changed sense of authoritative discourse, the emergence of a sense of religion and politics as system and object, and altered conceptions of language and community. First, mass education fosters a sharp break with earlier traditions of authority, with direct — albeit selective — access to the printed word. Belief and practice are now expressed publicly without reference to the authority of traditionally educated religious elites and are more directly related to political action than was the case earlier. The rise of this new dominant discourse affects both the expressive forms of the state and its religious and secular opposition.

Secondly, mass education and mass communication encourage the conception of religion and politics as self-contained systems which can incorporate features from other systems. Mass education encourages this by treating Islam as one subject among many, even as students are told that ‘Islam is one’ and all-encompassing. Changes in the successive editions of Sayyid Qutb’s Social Justice in Islam (first edition 1949; seventh edition 1974) show how he refined his view of Islam as ‘an inwardly consistent and harmonious “system” ... making it possible for it to be at once flexible, comprehensive, and distinctive’.[506] Even radical Islam ‘accepts much that is borrowed from the West’, although such borrowings are often denied or unrecognised.[507] ‘Moderates’, as opposed to radicals, are more likely to acknowledge such borrowings, arguing that while Islamic principles are eternal, the way they are implemented can be adjusted to historical context.

This point was brought home by a religious activist in the Arab Gulf. In 1978 he explained that al-dimuqratiyya [democracy] would never take hold in the Muslim world because it was a concept alien to shura, which was Qur’anic and Islamic. In 1990 he asserted that Al-dimuqratiyia was compatible with Islam. When reminded of what he had said a decade earlier, he replied: ‘Now we know better. Shura is not a major concept in the Qur’an, and its few usages there are ambiguous. Democracy can be adapted to Islamic ideals.’ Likewise, when Islamic activists in Morocco declare that they are engaged in the ‘Islamisation’ of their society, they make explicit their sense of one system of ideas and practices — theirs — acting against the system of beliefs and practices held by other members of society. Among the Ibadiyya of Algeria and Oman, modern education and intensified contact with other Muslims have encouraged such phenomena as catechisms, videos and pamphlets to help Ibadi students explain their doctrines to Muslims liable to misunderstand them.[508]

Finally, the standardised language of mass higher education encourages new senses of community and affinity. In India, the templemosque dispute at Ayodhya in December 1992 went from a local matter to a national crisis in Hindu-Muslim relations because of ‘a massive expansion in the availability of television and the ending of the Indian government’s carefully managed news monopoly’. The BBC World Television reporting of the incident, widely followed by English-speakers in India, was a model of balance, but the pictures acted ‘as recruiting banners for the militants on both sides’.[509] The video clips fed to Oman television by an American network at the time of the massacres in the Sabra/Shatila refugee camps in Beirut in 1982 had a similar effect, as did footage of the Hebron/al-Khalil killings and their aftermath in February 1994. Benedict Anderson argues that the rise of written vernacular languages in Europe and the spread of print technology have created language communities wider than those of face-to-face interactions yet narrower than the communities created by shared sacred languages.[510] With modifications, this premise can be transposed to the Arab world, in which there has been intensified access to the printed word and, in terms of the spoken word, to a more standardised Arabic. In Arab countries where languages such as Berber or Kurdish are spoken, there is increased use of Arabic as the principal language of education and formal communication.

 Conclusion

This shift in the religious and political imagination of a younger, educated generation in many parts of the Muslim world constitutes a fundamental break with prior structures of religious and political authority. Mass education empowers citizens to talk back to state and religious authorities, fragmenting religious and political authority by making the state one actor among many and eroding the authority of traditional religious scholars. Although the scale and intensity of this fragmentation of authority is unique to the last decades of the twentieth century, it is an ongoing element of the political life of Muslims. As a system of belief, Islam may be no more secularisable than Roman Catholicism or Christian fundamentalism, but Muslims, and Muslim societies, are secularisable, and the process is well advanced. Civil society may be fragile or in short supply in much of the Middle East and elsewhere in the Muslim world, but the causes of this are not inherent to Islam. Religion and state (din wa-dawla), far from being indissoluble in the Muslim world, became separable not long after the death of the Prophet Muhammad and the establishment of dynastic rule,[511] and nationalism is alive and well throughout the Muslim world. In a word, Gellner's Islamic 'brick' is friable — a brittle abstraction which fits awkwardly with known history and historical context. In thinking about Islam, however, Gellner's bold design has made us notice the evidence which goes 'against it or for it'. The prospects for 'Civil Society' may be uncertain, but a lasting element of Gellner's legacy is a standard of civility in thinking about religion, society and politics which is often hard to match.

 Notes

The author wishes to thank Deborah Hodges for comments on an earlier version of this chapter.

[467] John Davis, 'An Interview with Ernest Gellner', Current Anthropology, vol. 12, 1991,p. 71.

[468] Ibid., p. 70.

[469] E. Gellner, Conditions of Liberty: Civil Society and its Rivals, London, 1994, p. 211.

[470] Davis, 'Interview with Ernest Gellner', p. 7 0 captures the tenacity with which Gellner held to his core convictions concerning the Islamic brick. Referring to his research among the Ihansalen in Morocco's High Atlas in the 1950s he remarked: ‘When I read ethnographies of other parts of the Muslim world I have the feeling that I am utterly familiar with this pack of cards. It happens to be shuffled a bit differently, but I know the cards.’

[471] Ibid., p. 69.

[472] Gellner, Conditions of Liberty, especially pp. 22, 29. In contrast A. R. Norton argues vigorously (‘Introduction’, in his Civil Society in the Middle East, Leiden, 1994, p. 25) that civil society is ‘theoretically, conceptually, normatively, and ontologically’ part of political discourse in the Middle East.

[473] S. P. Huntington, ‘The Clash of Civilisations?’, Foreign Affairs, vol. 72, 1993.

[474] S. P. Huntington, The Third Wave: Democratisation in the Late Twentieth Century, Norman, 1991, pp. 310–11.

[475] The alliterative quotation is from D. Lerner, The Passing of Traditional Society: Modernising the Middle East, New York, 1964, p. 405, although the notion is fully consonant with Gellner’s conception of progression from agrarian to industrial society.

[476] E. Gellner, Postmodernism, Reason and Religion, London, 1992, pp. 4–5.

[477] Ibid., p. 5.

[478] For a review of Gellner’s model of religious development as it applies specifically to Morocco, see D. F. Eickelman, ‘New Directions in Interpreting North African Society’, in H. Barakat, ed., Contemporary North Africa: Issues of Development and Integration, London, 1985, with additional references. Discussions concerning the applicability of Gellner’s version of segmentation theory were most intense in the 1970s and early 1980s. Also see, however, H. Munson, ‘Rethinking Gellner’s Segmentary Analysis of Morocco’s Ait ‘Atta’, Man, vol. 28, 1993, which argues that Gellner’s depiction of the Ait ‘Atta is ‘fundamentally flawed’. Gellner’s reply in ‘Segmentation: Reality or Myth?’, Journal of the Royal Anthropological Institute, vol. 1, 1995 (which also includes Munson’s reply) stresses that segmentation is an ‘absolutely indispensable’ tool for understanding ‘agrarian’ societies, another important ‘brick’ in his conceptual apparatus. For fuller discussion of the difficulties in assuming a ‘great divide’ between tradition and modernity in Muslim societies, see D. F. Eickelman and J. Piscatori, Muslim Politics, Princeton, 1996, pp. 22–37; for Hinduism, see P. van der Veer, Religious Nationalism: Hindus and Muslims in India, Berkeley, 1994, pp. 12–18.

[479] E. Gellner, Muslim Society, Cambridge, 1981, pp. 214–20; see also his Conditions of Liberty, pp. 16–20.

[480] P. Brown, The Cult of Saints in Early Latin Christianity, Chicago, 1981; E. Troeltsch, The Social Teaching of the Christian Churches, New York, 1960.

[481] See, for example, J. Boddy, Wombs and Alien Spirits: Women, Men, and the Zar Cult in Northern Sudan, Madison, 1989 and N. Tapper and R. Tapper, ‘The Birth of the Prophet: Ritual and Gender in Turkish Islam’, Man, vol. 22, 1987.

[482] Eickelman and Piscatori, Muslim Politics, p. 26.

[483] Cited in Sadik J. al-Azm, ‘Islamic Fundamentalism Reconsidered: A Critical Outline of Problems, Ideas, and Approaches’, South Asia Bulletin, vol. 13, 1993, p. 102.

[484] J. Piscatori, Islam in a World of Nation-States, Cambridge, 1986. See also S. Zubaida, ‘Is There a Muslim Society? Ernest Gellner’s Sociology of Islam’, Economy and Society, vol. 24, 1995 and Sadik J. al-Azm, ‘Is Islam Secularizable?’, Jahrbuch fur Philosophie des Forschungsinstituts fur Philosophie Hannover, vol. 7, 1996.

[485] al-Azm, ‘Is Islam Secularizable?’, p. 22.

[486] Ibid., p. 23.

[487] Cited in H. Tineo, ‘L’Islam de France se radicalise’, Le Monde, 12 August 1994, pp. 1, 3.

[488] For a selection ofFIS writings, see M. al-Ahnaf, B. Botiveau and F. Fregosi, L ‘Algerie par ses islamistes, Paris, 1991.

[489] Abdelasiem el-Difraoui, ‘La critique du systeme democratique par le Front Islamique du Salut’, in G. Kepel, ed., Exils et royaumes: les appartenances au monde arabo-musulman aujourd’hui, Paris, 1994, pp. 123–4.

[490] P. G. Cerny, The Changing Architecture of Politics: Structure, Agency and the Future of the State, London, 1990, pp. 17–18.

[491] K. Pekonen, ‘Symbols and Politics as Culture in the Modern Situation: The Problem and Prospects of the “New”’, in J. R. Gibbins, ed., Contemporary Political Culture: Politics in a Postmodern World, London, 1989, p. 132.

[492] See, for example, C. Geertz, The Interpretation of Cultures, New York, 1973, pp. 193–233.

[493] Gellner, Conditions of Liberty, p. 214.

[494] See D. F. Eickelman, ‘Islamic Liberalism Strikes Back’, Middle East Studies Association Bulletin, vol. 27, 1993.

[495] An earlier version of the argument concerning mass education appeared in D. F. Eickelman, ‘Mass Higher Education and the Religious Imagination in Contemporary Arab Societies’, American Ethnologist, vol. 19, 1992.

[496] Interview with Mohammed Bennis, Mohammediya, Morocco, 16 July 1992.

[497] R. Chartier, The Cultural Uses of Print in Early Modern France, Princeton, 1987, pp. 6–11.

[498] Y. Gonzalez-Quijano, ‘Les gens du livre. Champ intellectuel et edition dans l’Egypte republicaine (1952–1993)’, Institut d’Etudes Politiques de Paris, Ph.D. Thesis, 1994, pp. 398–408.

[499] Ibid., pp. 159–60.

[500] ‘Abd al-Hamid Kishk, Ayyuha l-Muslimun, Ufiqu [O Muslims, Awake!], Cairo, 1989.

[501] L. Mabruk, Rihla ila ‘alam al-khulud: ‘adalat yawm al-qiyama [A Trip to Eternity: Justice on Judgement Day], Cairo, 1989.

[502] Muhammad Shakir al-Sharif, Haqiqat al-Dimuqratiya [The Truth about Democracy], Riyadh, 1992, pp. 16–18.

[503] Note, however, that Islamic activists and fundamentalists come from all social classes and educational levels, with the ‘mix’ across national and class lines varying state by state. See M. Tessler and J. Jesse, ‘Gender and Support for Islamist Movements: Evidence from Egypt, Kuwait, and Palestine’, Muslim World, vol. 86, 1996, pp. 214–15. For an example of ‘liberal’ writing on Islam, see Sa’id Binsa’id, ‘al-hiwar wa-1-fahm la al-qat’iyya wa-1-jahl’ [Dialogue and Understanding, Not Alienation and Ignorance], Al-Sharq Al-Awsat [The Middle East], London, 7 July 1993, p. 10. This generally liberal, Saudi-financed newspaper is one of the most widely circulated newspapers of the Arab world.

[504] Gonzalez-Quijano, ‘Les gens du livre’, pp. 270, 412.

[505] Reproduced in ibid., p. 96b.

[506] W. Shepard, ‘The Development of the Thought of Sayyid Qutb as Reflected in Earlier and Later Editions of Social Justice in Islam’, Die Welt des Islam, vol. 32, 1992, pp. 200, 211.

[507] W. Shepard, ‘Islam and Ideology: Towards a Typology’, International Journal ofMiddle East Studies, vol. 19, 1987, p. 315 and ‘Islam as a “System” in the Later Writings of Sayyid Qutb’, Middle Eastern Studies, vol. 25, 1989, pp. 31–50.

[508] Ahmad bin Hamad al-Khalili, W’hio Are the Ibadhis?, Zanzibar, 1988.

[509] ‘Feeding Fundamentalism’, The Economist, 21 August 1993, p. 36.

[510] B. Anderson, Imagined Communities: Reflections on the Origin and Spread of Nationalism, London, 1991.

[511] Eickelman and Piscatori, Muslim Politics, pp. 46–57.

 12 Myths and misconceptions in the study of nationalism

Rogers Brubaker

The resurgence of nationalism in eastern Europe and elsewhere in the last decade has sparked — with only the shortest of lags — an even stronger resurgence in the study of nationalism. As a certifiably ‘hot topic’, nationalism has moved rapidly from the front pages to the journal pages, from the periphery — often the distant periphery — to the centre of numerous scholarly fields and subfields. [512] This new centrality is a mixed blessing. On the one hand, the robust demand for knowledge about — and ‘fixes’ for — nationalism brings new opportunities, resources and attention to the field. On the other hand, the rapid expansion of the field has strengthened analytically primitive currents in the study of nationalism, [513] threatening to erode (or simply — given the volume of the new literature — to overwhelm) the analytical gains previously made in sophisticated works by Benedict Anderson, John Armstrong, John Breuilly, Ernest Gellner, Anthony Smith and a number of other scholars.[514]

Borrowing Charles Tilly’s phrase, this chapter addresses six ‘pernicious postulates’, six myths and misconceptions that, newly strengthened by the dizzying expansion in the literature and quasi-literature on the subject, inform, and misinform, the study of ethnicity and nationalism.[515] Although I draw illustrative empirical material mainly from postcommunist east central Europe and the former Soviet Union, the theoretical debates I engage are central to the study of nationalism generally. [516]

Nobody took greater pleasure, or displayed greater vigour, in demolishing myths than Ernest Gellner; and the trenchancy with which he punctured nationalists' own myths — as well as other myths about nationalism — was exemplary. I would like to think, therefore, that the present chapter is Gellnerian in spirit. The chapter is not, however, about Gellner's theory of nationalism; it engages his theory only incidentally. Gellner approached the study of nationalism from Olympian distance, situating the emergence and vicissitudes of nationalism in world-historical perspective. My concerns in this chapter are rather less global and do not, for the most part, directly engage Gellner's arguments.

I begin by addressing two opposed appraisals of the gravity and 'resolvability' of national conflicts. The first is the 'architectonic illusion' — the belief that the right 'grand architecture', the right territorial and institutional framework, can satisfy nationalist demands, quench nationalist passions and thereby resolve national conflicts. Most conceptions of grand architecture have involved the reorganisation of political space along national lines, based on an alleged right of national self-determination or on the related 'principle of nationality'. Against this, I want to argue that nationalist conflicts are in principle, by their very nature, irresolvable, and that the search for an overall 'architectural' resolution of national conflicts is misguided.

Sharply opposed to the meliorist optimism of this first view is the dire pessimism of the second. This is the 'seething cauldron' view of ethnic and national conflicts. This gloom-and-doom perspective sees all of eastern Europe — and many other world regions — as a seething cauldron of ethnic and national conflict, on the verge of boiling over into violence. More generally, it sees nationalism as the central problem in these regions, and sees national identities as strong and salient. Against this, I want to assert that ethnonational violence is neither as prevalent, nor as likely to occur, as is often assumed; and that national feeling is less strong, national identity less salient and nationalist politics less central than is often assumed.

Next, I will address two opposed views of the sources and dynamics of resurgent nationalism. The first is the ‘return of the repressed’ perspective. In its specifically eastern European form, this view sees national identities and national conflicts as deeply rooted in the precommunist history of eastern Europe, and as subsequently frozen or repressed by ruthlessly anti-national communist regimes. With the collapse of communism, these pre-communist national identities and nationalist conflicts have returned with redoubled force. Against this, I will stress the pervasive shaping and structuring of national identities and nationalist conflicts by communist regimes.

Categorically rejecting the primordialist understanding of nationhood that often accompanies the ‘return of the repressed’ view, and refusing to see national identity and nationalist conflicts as deeply encoded historically, is the ‘elite manipulation’ view. This perspective sees nationalism as the product of unscrupulous and manipulative elites, who are seen as cynically stirring up nationalist passions at will. While conceding, of course, that unscrupulous elites often do seek to stir up nationalist passions, I want to argue against this view that it is not always so easy for elites to stir up nationalist passions; and that it is mistaken to see nationalism in purely instrumental terms, to focus solely on the calculating stances of self-interested elites.

The fifth perspective I call that of ‘the realism of the group’. Based on a ‘groupist’ social ontology, this view sees nations and ethnic groups as real entities, as substantial, enduring, sharply bounded collectivities. It sees the social world, like a Modigliani painting (to borrow Gellner’s image), as composed of externally bounded, internally homogeneous cultural blocs. Against this, I will argue that the ‘Modiglianesque’ vision of the social world is deeply problematic, that ethnic and national groups are not well conceived as externally sharply bounded, internally culturally homogeneous blocs.

Finally, I address the ‘Manichean’ view that there are, at bottom, only two kinds of nationalism, a good, civic kind and a bad, ethnic kind; and two corresponding understandings of nationhood, the good, civic conception, in which nationhood is seen as based on common citizenship, and the bad, ethnic conception, in which nationhood is seen as based on common ethnicity. Against this, I will argue that the distinction between civic and ethnic nationhood and nationalism is both normatively and analytically problematic.

 I

I begin with the ‘architectonic illusion’. This is the belief that if one gets the ‘grand architecture’ right — if one discovers and establishes the proper territorial and institutional framework — then one can conclusively satisfy legitimate nationalist demands and thereby resolve national conflicts. There have been many different conceptions of just what the proper grand architecture should look like. But most of these have appealed in one way or another to the idea of national self-determination or to the so-called principle of nationality.

The principle of national self-determination assigns moral agency and political authority to nations; it holds that nations are entitled to govern their own affairs and, in particular, to form their own states. The principle of nationality asserts that state and nation should be congruent; it thereby provides a powerful lever for evaluating, and redrawing, state boundaries, for legitimating, or delegitimating political frontiers according to a kind of ‘correspondence theory’ of justice.

These principles underlay, albeit imperfectly, the post-World War I territorial settlement in central and eastern Europe; the mid-twentiethcentury wave of decolonisation in Asia and Africa; and the recent reorganisation of political space in eastern Europe and the former Soviet Union. In each of these cases, the period preceding the reorganisation of political space along national lines was one of intensifying nationalist movements. In each case, the demands of these nationalist movements were viewed with sympathy by much of world public opinion. In each case, it was widely believed that a new ‘grand architecture’, involving the reorganisation of political space along national lines, would satisfy the demands of these national movements and contribute to regional peace and stability by resolving national tensions.

[517] Yet, in each case, this expectation was disappointed. Political reconfiguration did not resolve national tensions but only reframed them, recast them in new (and in some cases more virulent) form.

I am not arguing that the reconfiguration of political space along ostensibly national lines in these cases was necessarily a bad thing (though I think in some cases — such as the former Yugoslavia — it was unfortunate). I am arguing, instead, against the idea that nationalism is a problem that can somehow be solved by ‘correct’ territorial and institutional arrangements; and, more specifically, against the idea that nationalist demands can be satisfied and national conflicts resolved by applying the principle of national self-determination or redrawing political boundaries according to the principle of nationality.

Today, of course, this argument is less likely to be advanced than it was a few years earlier. Several years after the last major reorganisation of political space along national lines, it is all too evident that national conflicts have not been resolved, and that the most virulent conflicts have occurred after rather than before the reorganisation of political space. But it is worth remembering that only a few years ago, a great deal of hope was invested in national self-determination. The prospect of the break-up of the Soviet Union and Yugoslavia was welcomed as a story of national liberation; the prevailing narrative was one of national imprisonment and liberation. The rising curve of enthusiasm for national self-determination, as communist regimes began to crumble, did not, to be sure, reach the apogee of seventy-five years earlier, when the first wholesale reorganisation of previously multinational political space along national lines was undertaken. Yet the fin-de-siecle re-enchantment with national self-determination was substantial enough, incautious enough, and — in view of the disastrous sequel to the early twentiethcentury experiment in national self-determination[518] — puzzling enough to give us pause.[519] Moreover, even if the re-enchantment has since yielded to a new disenchantment, even if yesterday’s narrative of national imprisonment and liberation today seems one-sided, mischievous or even downright pernicious, still the underlying way of thinking about nationalism that has historically accompanied appeals to the principle of national self-determination remains robustly entrenched.

The principle of national self-determination and the related principle of nationality are of course normative, not analytical principles; and I do not want to make here an argument in normative political theory. [520] But for a century and a half, the appeal to the principle of nationality or to an alleged right of national self-determination has been closely related to a particular — and I believe mistaken — account of the sources and dynamics ofnationalism. And it is this account that I would like to dwell on for a moment.

This account is fundamentally a nation-centred understanding of nationalism. It is grounded, as Gellner observed,[521] in a ‘social ontology’ that posits the existence of nations as real entities whose tendency or telos - at least under modern social and political conditions — is to seek independent statehood. Nationalism, on this view, is thus nation-based, state-seeking activity.

If this understanding of nationalism were correct, then one might indeed expect the reorganisation of political space along national lines to resolve national conflicts by fulfilling nationalist demands. The imagery here is that nationalism has a self-limiting political career. Fundamentally oriented towards independence, national movements in a sense transcend themselves, and wither away in the very course of realising their aims. When nationalist demands for statehood are fulfilled, the nationalist programme is satisfied; it exhausts itself in the attainment of its ends.

However, I do not think nationalism can be well understood as nation-based, state-seeking activity. In the first place, nationalism is not always, or essentially, state-seeking. To focus narrowly on state-seeking nationalist movements is to ignore the infinitely protean nature of nationalist politics; it is to ignore the manner in which the interests of a putative ‘nation’ can be seen as requiring many kinds of actions other than, or in addition to, formal independence; it is to be unprepared for the kinds of nationalist politics that can flourish after the reorganisation of political space along national lines, after the break-up of multinational states into would-be nation-states. It is to be unprepared for the fact that nationalism was not only a cause but also a consequence of the break-up of old empires and the creation of new nation-states.

In the new or newly enlarged nation-states of interwar central and eastern Europe, and in the new nation-states of postcommunist eastern Europe today, several kinds of nationalism have flourished as a result of the reorganisation of political space along ostensibly national lines. Here I would like to briefly characterise four such forms of non-state-seeking nationalism.

The first is what I call the ‘nationalising’ nationalism of newly independent (or newly reconfigured) states. Nationalising nationalisms involve claims made in the name of a ‘core nation’ or nationality, defined in ethnocultural terms, and sharply distinguished from the citizenry as a whole. The core nation is understood as the legitimate ‘owner’ of the state, which is conceived as the state of and for the core nation. Despite having ‘its own’ state, however, the core nation is conceived as being in a weak cultural, economic or demographic position within the state. This weak position is seen as a legacy of discrimination against the nation before it attained independence. And it is held to justify the ‘remedial’ or ‘compensatory’ project of using state power to promote the specific (and previously inadequately served) interests of the core nation. Examples of such nationalising nationalisms abound in interwar Europe and the postcommunist present. [522]

Directly challenging these ‘nationalising’ nationalisms are the transborder nationalisms of what I call ‘external national homelands’. Homeland nationalisms are oriented to ethnonational kin who are residents and citizens of other states. Transborder homeland nationalism asserts a state’s right — indeed its obligation — to monitor the condition, promote the welfare, support the activities and institutions, and protect the interests of ‘its’ ethnonational kin in other states. Such claims are typically made, and typically have greatest force and resonance, when the ethnonational kin in question are seen as threatened by the nationalising policies and practices of the state in which they live. Homeland nationalisms thus arise in direct opposition to and in dynamic interaction with nationalising nationalisms. Prominent instances of homeland nationalism are furnished by Weimar (and in a very different mode) Nazi Germany, and by Russia today. [523]

The third characteristic form ofnationalism found in the aftermath of the reorganisation of political space along national lines is the nationalism of national minorities. Minority nationalist stances characteristically involve a self-understanding in specifically ‘national’ rather than merely ‘ethnic’ terms, a demand for state recognition of their distinct ethnocultural nationality, and the assertion of certain collective, nationality-based cultural or political rights. Salient examples include Germans in many eastern European countries in the interwar period and Hungarian and Russian minorities today.

The fourth form is a defensive, protective, national-populist nationalism that seeks to protect the national economy, language, mores or cultural patrimony against alleged threats from outside. The bearers of such putative threats are diverse but can include foreign capital, transnational organisations, notably the IMF, immigrants, powerful foreign cultural influences and so on. This kind of nationalism often claims to seek a ‘third way’ between capitalism and socialism, is often receptive to anti-Semitism, brands its political opponents as antinational, ‘un-Romanian’, ‘un-Russian’, etc., is critical of the various ills of ‘the west’ and of ‘modernity’, and tends to idealise an agrarian past. The social and economic dislocations accompanying market-oriented reforms — unemployment, inflation, tighter workplace discipline, etc. — create fertile soil for the use of such national populist idioms as a legitimation strategy by governments or as a mobilisation strategy by oppositions.

Nationalism, then, should not be conceived as essentially or even as primarily state-seeking. Nor, as Gellner emphasised, should it be understood as nation-based, that is as arising from the demands of nations, understood as real, substantial, bounded social entities. Nationhood is not an unambiguous social fact; it is a contestable — and often contested — political claim. Consequently, neither the principle of national selfdetermination nor the principle of nationality can provide an unambiguous guide to the reorganisation of political space.

Claims to nationhood are often disputed — think, for example, historically, about the Macedonians, or about the dispute concerning whether interwar Czechoslovakia was one nation or two. Or, more recently, think of the Kurds, the Palestinians, the Quebecois, and of a host of west European ethnoregional movements. And even when the status of nationhood itself is not disputed, the territorial or cultural boundaries of the putative nation are often contested, as is the manner in which nationhood ought to be construed for purposes of implementing the right of self-determination or of redrawing frontiers along national lines.

Given the very large number of more or less serious (and often conflicting) claims to nationhood, how are we to identify the national selves who are to enjoy the right or privilege of self-determination? And once we have identified these favoured national selves, how are we to determine their bounds and contours? This is not a theoretical quibble, but a question of the utmost practical import.

Take for example the case of Yugoslavia. Even if one could have agreed that the national selves who were to enjoy self-determination were the officially recognised constituent nations of Yugoslavia (but why not the Albanians? Why not the Hungarians in Voivodina?), one still could not have avoided the question of how those national selves were to be construed. To put the question in its simplest form, supposing we agreed that self-determination was to be exercised by Serbs, Croats and Muslims. How, then, were these self-determining units to be construed? Was the right of self-determination to be exercised by Serbia or by Serbs? By Croatia or by Croats? By Bosnia-Hercegovina or by Yugoslav Muslims? By territorial entities, that is, or by boundary-transcending ethnocultural nations? Were all the inhabitants of the Croatian republic to enjoy a single right of self-determination? And similarly for all the inhabitants of the Serb republic, and of Bosnia-Hercegovina, by majority vote? Or rather, was self-determination to be exercised by the Croatian, Serb and Muslim ethnonations, whose populations spilled over republican borders? In practice, the international community opted for the former — but perhaps without realising the tremendous difference between the two modes of construing self-determination for the same national units. [524] And the consequences were catastrophic.

There are of course many other examples of conflicting claims about how national selves should be construed. The negotiations concerning the post-World War I settlement furnished a whole catalogue of such conflicting claims, many involving a clash between historic-territorial and ethnocultural versions of nationhood, with parties typically opportunistically advancing whichever claim would benefit them.

On a more philosophical level, we arrive here at the inescapable antinomies of national self-determination. Self-determination presupposes the prior determination of the unit — the national self — that is to enjoy the right of self-determination. But the identification and boundaries of this self cannot themselves be self-determined: they must be determined by others. Just as the boundaries of the demos that is presupposed by democratic institutions cannot themselves be democratically determined, [525] so too the boundaries of the national self that is presupposed by national self-determination cannot themselves be selfdetermined. Only in practice, the problem with national selfdetermination is more serious than with democracy. For in the routine functioning of democracy, the bounds of the demos are simply taken as given and unproblematic. But since national self-determination is precisely about setting the initial boundaries of the demos, there is no analogue in the sphere of self-determination to the routine functioning of democracy within the frame of a taken-for-granted demos. Since the whole point of invoking national self-determination is to change unit boundaries, such boundaries cannot be taken for granted — especially given the pervasively contested, conflicting and overlapping nature of claims to nationhood.

Against the architectonic illusion, then, against the illusion that nationalist conflicts are susceptible of fundamental resolution through national self-determination, I am asserting a kind of ‘impossibility theorem’ — that national conflicts are in principle irresolvable; that ‘nation’ belongs to the class of ‘essentially contested’ concepts; that chronic contestedness is therefore intrinsic to nationalist politics, part of the very nature of nationalist politics; and that the search for an overall ‘architectural’ resolution of national conflicts is misguided in principle, and often disastrous in practice.

In criticising this naively optimistic view I should emphasise that I do not want to adopt a gloom-and-doom perspective. In fact the next myth I want to criticise is precisely the gloom-and-doom view of the region. My point is not to substitute a pessimistic for an optimistic reading, but rather to suggest that the search for solutions and resolutions of national conflicts — especially grand, ‘architectonic’, isomorphic, ‘one-size-fits-all’ solutions and resolutions — is misguided. To assert the irresolvability of national conflicts is not to assert anything about their salience, intensity or centrality. Indeed I believe, as I am about to argue, that their salience, intensity and centrality are generally overstated. The search for some fundamental architectural resolution of national conflicts, then, is not only philosophically problematic and practically misguided; it is often, also, simply unnecessary.

To criticise the search for solutions and resolutions of national conflicts is not to suggest that institutional design does not matter. On the contrary, it matters a great deal.[526] Clearly, institutional design can either exacerbate or ameliorate ethnic and national conflicts. But it cannot solve such conflicts. Rather, good institutional design can give political actors incentives to work around ethnic and national conflicts, to disregard them for certain purposes, to frame political rhetoric and political claims in non-ethnic or trans-ethnic terms. Moreover, institutional design is unlikely to have even these limited (but very important) effects if carried out in a grand, architectonic, one-size-fits-all mode. Good institutional design is more likely to be subverted than informed by grand architectural principles like the principle of national self-determination or the principle of nationality. Good institutional design has to be contextsensitive in a strong sense, that is, sensitive not only to the gross features of differing contexts but to finer details as well; it presupposes relatively ‘thick’ understandings of the local contexts in which it is to apply.[527]

In my view, national conflicts are seldom ‘solved’ or ‘resolved’. Somewhat like conflicts between conflicting paradigms in a Kuhnian history of science, they are more likely to fade away, to lose their centrality and salience as ordinary people — and political entrepreneurs — turn to other concerns, or as a new generation grows up to whom old quarrels seem largely irrelevant. We need to devote more attention to studying how and why this happens — not only how and why politics can be pervasively, and relatively suddenly, ‘nationalised’, but also how and why it can be pervasively, and sometimes equally suddenly, ‘denationalised’.

II

The second misconception that I want to discuss is in some ways the opposite of the first. If the architectonic illusion is characterised by the naively optimistic view that national conflicts are capable of a final resolution, the second misconception is characterised by a bleakly pessimistic appraisal of east European nationalism. I will call this the ‘seething cauldron’ view, since it sees the entire region as a seething cauldron of ethnic conflict, on the verge of boiling over into ethnic and nationalist violence, or, in another metaphorical idiom, as a tinderbox that a single careless spark could ignite into a catastrophic ethnonational inferno. [528]

This might also be called the ‘orientalist’ view of east European nationalism, since it often involves, at least implicitly, an overdrawn, if not downright caricatural, contrast between western and eastern Europe, built on a series of oppositions such as that between reason and passion, universalism and particularism, transnational integration and nationalist disintegration, civility and violence, modern tolerance and ancient hatreds, civic nationhood and ethnic nationalism.

Indisputably, there are important differences, conditioned by historical traditions and present economic, cultural, political and ethnodemographic realities, between prevailing forms of nationhood and nationalism in western Europe and eastern Europe. Yet one must reject the complacent and self-congratulatory account of western Europe that is implicit or explicit in this orientalist, ‘seething cauldron’ view of eastern European nationalism. After all, the ‘Europhoria’ that surrounded discussions of European integration a few years ago was dissipated by the unforeseen (and partly nationalist) resistance to the Maastricht treaty; and nationalist and xenophobic parties have established a secure place in the political landscape of almost all western European countries.

One must also reject the ‘seething cauldron’ account of eastern Europe. It is this gloom-and-doom view of the east, rather than the paired complacent view of the west, that I address here. I focus on two problematic aspects of this account. The first concerns violence, the second the strength and salience of nationalism and national identities.

The violence in the region — in the former Yugoslavia, in Transcaucasia and the North Caucasus, in parts of Soviet Central Asia — has indeed been appalling. But the undifferentiated image of the region as a hotbed of ubiquitous, explosive, violent or at least potentially violent ethnic and national conflict is quite misleading. Violence is neither as prevalent, nor as likely to occur in the region, as is generally believed.

Journalists and scholars have focused on spectacular but atypical cases of violence (the former Yugoslavia) rather than on unspectacular but more typical cases of ‘routine’ ethnic and nationalist tensions, and they have tended to generalise from the atypical cases to the region as a whole. This case selection bias is one reason for the overemphasis on violence. [529]

Not only the actual incidence of violence, but also the danger of future violence is overestimated. Violence is often presented as an omnipresent possibility. ‘If it happened in Yugoslavia’ — so goes the argument — ‘it could happen anywhere.’ I think this is mistaken. I have done some work, for example, on Hungarian minorities in neighbouring states, especially Romania and Slovakia. In this setting, several forms of nationalism are intertwined. The most important are the autonomyseeking nationalism of the Hungarian minorities; the ‘nation-building’ or ‘nationalising’ nationalisms of Slovakia and Romania; and the ‘homeland’ nationalism of Hungary, oriented to protecting the rights and interests of its co-ethnics in neighbouring states. Yet I think the danger of large-scale ethnic violence or nationalist war is minimal in this case. This is not because these national tensions can somehow be ‘resolved’. I do not think they can be. These interlocking, mutually antagonistic nationalisms of national minority, nationalising state and external national homeland are intractable and are likely to persist as chronic tensions and conflicts. But their intractability should not be conflated with explosiveness or with a potential to engender large-scale violence.

If I am right about this, it raises the analytical question of what prevents these chronic, intractable, interlocking nationalist conflicts from escalating into violent confrontation. This neglected question of how to explain the absence or containment of violence, as political scientists James Fearon and David Laitin have recently argued, [530] is as important as the much more studied question of how to explain the occurrence of violence. In the case of Hungary and its neighbours, I would propose three reasons for the absence of violence. [531] The first is that Hungarians in the neighbouring states have enjoyed an accessible and relatively attractive ‘exit’ option — the possibility of emigrating to or working in Hungary. This has functioned as a ‘safety valve’ and has worked against the radicalisation of ethnonational conflict, especially in Romania. Secondly, the embeddedness of national conflicts in regional processes of European integration has ‘disciplined’ central political elites, especially in the foreign policy domain. This has induced Hungary to limit its support for transborder co-ethnics to support for Hungarian culture and to scrupulously avoid inciting destabilising political activity on the part of its co-ethnics. This is true even of the national-populist Antall government of the early 1990s, despite its strong rhetorical commitment to transborder co-ethnics. Third, the absence of credible narratives linking past ethnonational violence to present threat makes it difficult for radical, violence-oriented ethnopolitical entrepreneurs, whose stock in trade is fear, to succeed. By contrast, such narratives of danger and threat, linked to past violence, were strikingly evident in the former Yugoslavia before war broke out.[532]

Nor is this an isolated case. Estonia, for example, has been in the news a lot in recent years in connection with its bitterly contested citizenship laws and, more generally, in connection with the status of its large Russian minority. Rhetoric has been heated, indeed overheated: Russians (more frequently Russians in Russia than local Russians) have accused Estonia of apartheid and ethnic cleansing; Estonian nationalists have spoken of the Russian minority as colonists or illegal immigrants. Yet despite this overheated rhetoric, there is little fear of violence on the ground.[533]

It is not only violence that is overemphasised by the seething cauldron view. More generally, the strength, salience and centrality of national feeling, national identity and nationalist politics also tend to be overestimated. Consider for example nationalist mobilisation. There have, of course, been dramatic, even spectacular, moments of high nationalist mobilisation. One thinks, for example, of the ‘human chain’ across the Baltics in August 1989, or of the great crowds that filled the main squares of Yerevan, Tbilisi, Berlin, Prague and other cities in 1988–90. These searing moments, transmitted worldwide by television, are etched forever in our memories. But they have been the exception, not the rule. Moments of high mobilisation — where they did occur — proved ephemeral; ‘nation’ was revealed to be a galvanising category at one moment, but not at the next. On the whole, people have remained in their homes, not taken to the streets. In conspicuous contrast to interwar east central Europe, demobilisation and political passivity, rather than fevered mobilisation, have characterised the political landscape. Much has been written on the strength of nationalist movements in the former Soviet Union; not enough has been written on their comparative weakness. And while the weakness of nationalism in certain regions (especially exSoviet Central Asia) has indeed been noted, too much attention has been given to variation across space in the intensity of nationalist mobilisation, too little attention to variation over time. Declining curves of mobilisation have been particularly neglected, although they are as common, as deserving of explanation, and as theoretically challenging as the more sexy ascending curves.

Even where national conflicts and national identity remain salient in the political sphere, they are not necessarily salient in everyday life. Nationalism may occur in the legislatures, in the press, in some branches of the state administration without occurring in the streets, or in the homes. [534] There is a loose coupling, or lack of congruence, between nationalist politics — which seems to run in a sphere of its own, unmoored from its putative constituencies — and everyday life. People do not necessarily respond particularly energetically or warmly to the nationalist utterances of politicians who claim to speak in their name. This general lukewarm responsiveness or even non-responsiveness to nationalist appeals of politicians is a legacy of a more general cynicism towards and distrust of politics and politicians. An ‘us’ versus ‘them’ distinction was indeed central to the way people understood politics under communism, and one might think this would be easily transposed into an exclusionary nationalism. Under certain circumstances, it may indeed be so transposed. In general, however, the ‘us’ — ‘them’ distinction divided not one ethnic or national group from another, but ‘the people’ from ‘the regime’. ‘They’ — representatives of the regime — were assuredly not ‘us’, even when they claimed to speak in our name (as they always did, of course, under communism). Nor did this change with the collapse of communism: deploying the idiom of ethnonationalism (rather than that of class solidarity or socialist internationalism) is no guarantee that ‘they’ will be able to persuade ‘us’ that ‘we’ belong together, separated not by position in the mode of domination but by ethnic nationality from an external ‘them’.

Nor are national identities in the region as strong as is often assumed. I return to this theme below; suffice it to observe here that, given the overwhelming evidence of contextual and situational shifts in self- and other-identification, one should be skeptical of the oft-repeated emphasis on the deep historical encoding of national identities in the region, and alert to the danger of over-historicisation. [535]

Incipient but not insignificant cosmopolitan tendencies in the region, finally, have been obscured by the orientalist opposition between western supranationalism and eastern nationalism. Consider again Hungarians in Romania. It is no doubt true that, since the fall of Ceau§escu, the Hungarian national element in their self-understanding has become more pronounced. The linguistic, cultural, religious, historical and economic ties that link them to Hungary as anyaorszag or ‘mother country’ have become more palpable, more ‘real’. But there is not necessarily an inverse relationship between national and cosmopolitan self-understandings. At the same time that they have become more aware of and concerned with their trans-state Hungarian nationality, they have also become more aware of and concerned with the wider European world.

Television has played an interestingly ambivalent role here. The establishment, relatively lavish financing, and diffusion from Hungary of Duna TV, a channel intended chiefly for Hungarians in the neighbouring states, has reinforced the Hungarian national self-understanding of Transylvanian Hungarians. At the same time, however, the high prestige of French, German and English-language channels (Eurosport, BBC, etc) — widely available in Transylvania through cable and satellite systems — has probably had a certain (though admittedly hard to measure) denationalising or transnationalising effect. [536] An anecdote reveals the national ambivalence of television. Romanian authorities were distressed when they learned that a particular cable package was to include MTV To them, this meant Magyar TV, i.e. the state television from Hungary. In fact, of course, it was the American music video channel that was at issue. And to the Transylvanian Hungarians, the American MTV was no doubt far more interesting than the Hungarian.

In sum, ethnic and nationalist conflict has been both less violent, and less salient, than many commentators have suggested; and where such conflict has occurred, it has often been chronic and low-level, a kind of ‘background noise’ occurring far from the focus of everyday life, rather than acute and explosive.

 III

So far I have considered two overall appraisals of nationalist conflicts in the region, an optimistic view that sees them as resolvable through reorganising political space along national lines, and a pessimistic view that sees them as deeply entrenched, pervasive, destabilising, and on the verge of violent explosion.

I would now like to turn to two opposed accounts of the sources and dynamics of nationalist resurgence. The first of these is the ‘return of the repressed’ view. The gist of this account is that national identities and national conflicts were deeply rooted in the precommunist history of eastern Europe, but then frozen or repressed by ruthlessly anti-national communist regimes. With the collapse of communism, on this account, these precommunist national identities and nationalist conflicts have returned with redoubled force.

This view can be expressed in (and often seems to draw at least implicitly on) a quasi-Freudian idiom. Lacking the rationally regulative ego of self-regulating civil society, the communist regimes repressed the primordial national id through a harshly punitive communist superego.

With the collapse of the communist superego, the repressed ethnonational id returns in full force, wreaking vengeance, uncontrolled by the regulative ego.

(The quasi-Freudian idiom makes clear the orientalist inflection of this view, and its close relation to the myth of the seething cauldron.)

Obviously, communist regimes of eastern Europe and the Soviet Union did repress nationalism. But the ‘return of the repressed’ view mistakes the manner in which they did so. It suggests that these regimes repressed not only nationalism, but nationhood; that they were not only anti-nationalist but anti-national. It suggest further that a robust, primordial sense of nationhood survived in this period in spite of strenuous regime efforts to root it out in favour of internationalist and class loyalties and solidarities.

This view is fundamentally mistaken. Let me suggest why with a few words about the Soviet case. [537] To see late- and post-Soviet national struggles as the struggles of nations, of real, solidary groups who somehow survived despite Soviet attempts to crush them — to suggest that nations and nationalism flourish today despite the Soviet regime’s ruthlessly anti-national policies — is to get things nearly backwards. To put the point somewhat too sharply: nationhood and nationalism flourish today largely because of the regime’s policies. Although antinationalist, those policies were anything but anti-national. Far from ruthlessly suppressing nationhood, the Soviet regime pervasively institutionalised it. The regime repressed nationalism, of course; but at the same time, it went further than any other state before or since in institutionalising territorial nationhood and ethnic nationality as fundamental social categories. In doing so it inadvertently created a political field supremely conducive to nationalism.

The regime did this in two ways. On the one hand, it carved up the Soviet state into more than fifty national territories, each expressly defined as the homeland of and for a particular ethnonational group. The top-level national territories — those that are today the independent successor states — were defined as quasi-nation states, complete with their own territories, names, constitutions, legislatures, administrative staffs, cultural and scientific institutions, and so on.

On the other hand, the regime divided the citizenry into a set of exhaustive and mutually exclusive ethnic nationalities, over a hundred in all. Through this state classification system, ethnic nationality served not only as a statistical category, a fundamental unit of social accounting, but also, and more distinctively, as an obligatory ascribed status. It was assigned by the state at birth on the basis of descent. It was registered in personal identity documents. It was recorded in almost all bureaucratic encounters and official transactions. And it was used to control access to higher education and to certain desirable jobs, restricting the opportunities of some nationalities, especially Jews, and promoting others through preferential treatment policies for so-called ‘titular’ nationalities in ‘their own’ republics.

Long before Gorbachov, then, territorial nationhood and ethnic nationality were pervasively institutionalised social and cultural forms. These forms were by no means empty. They were scorned by Sovietologists — no doubt because the regime consistently and effectively repressed all signs of overt political nationalism, and sometimes even cultural nationalism. Yet the repression of nationalism went hand-inhand with the establishment and consolidation of nationhood and nationality as fundamental cognitive and social forms.

Nationhood and nationality as institutionalised forms comprised a pervasive system of social classification, an organising ‘principle of vision and division’ of the social world, to use Bourdieu’s phrase. They comprised a standardised scheme of social accounting, an interpretive frame for public discussion, a dense organisational grid, a set of boundary-markers, a legitimate form for public and private identities. And when political space expanded under Gorbachev, these already pervasively institutionalised forms were readily politicised. They constituted elementary forms of political understanding, political rhetoric, political interest and political identity. In the terms of Max Weber’s ‘switchman’ metaphor, they determined the tracks, the cognitive frame, along which action was pushed by the dynamic of material and ideal interests. In so doing, they transformed the collapse of a regime into the disintegration of a state. And they continue to shape political understanding and political action in the successor states.

Similar points could be made about Yugoslavia. [538] In other states of east central Europe, to be sure, the case is somewhat different; and there was not the same degree of public support for and pervasive institutionalisation of national identities. However, even in these cases, communist regimes made various, albeit limited, accommodations to the sense of nationhood; and the repression of nationhood, especially in the postStalinist era, was not so consistent as is widely assumed.

In emphasising the codification and pervasive institutionalisation of nationhood and nationality by the Soviet and Yugoslav regimes, I am not making a claim about the strength or depth of the ethnonational identities thus institutionalised. It is important to distinguish between the degree of institutionalisation of ethnic and national categories and the psychological depth, substantiality and practical potency of such categorical identities. The former was unprecedentedly great in the Soviet Union, but the latter were highly variable, and in some cases minimal. At the limit — widely instantiated among some of the smaller officially recognised nationalities within the Russian Federation — strongly institutionalised categorical identities masked the near-complete absence of distinct cultural identities or distinct ethnonational habitus. In this limiting case, members of different ‘groups’ differed only in the official categorical ethnonational markers they bore; these categorical markers did not represent cultural or ethnic differences, but replaced them. [539] I do not mean to imply that this limiting case was the general one in the former Soviet Union. But the general point remains. A strongly institutionalised system of official ethnonational identities makes certain categories available for the public representation of social reality, the framing of political claims, and the organisation of political action. This in itself is a fact of great significance. But it does not assure that these categories will have a significant, pervasively structuring role in framing perception or orienting action in everyday life. Institutionalised categorical group denominations can not be taken as unproblematic indicators of ‘real groups’ or of strong ‘identities’.

There is a version of the ‘return of the repressed’ argument to which I am more sympathetic. This is relevant especially in Yugoslavia, but also in parts of the former Soviet Union. The argument is that the tabuisation of certain themes — in Yugoslavia the taboo preventing discussion of the fratricidal violence of World War II — prevented any kind of Vergangenheitsbewaltigung (mastery of the past) of the sort that occurred in Germany. There was simply no way to publicly work through arguments about the massive wartime atrocities. This does not imply that discussing these openly would have resolved them: of course this would not have happened. Discussion would have engendered bitter conflicts. But still, the public discussion of these might have deprived them of some of their potency forty years later when they were resurrected in public in a situation of pervasive uncertainty and insecurity without any previous attempt to master the past discursively.

In any event, what ‘returns’ in the postcommunist present is not something from the precommunist past; it is something constituted in important ways by the communist past. In the Soviet case, many national identities were first invented, imagined, and institutionalised under communism. But even elsewhere in eastern Europe, where this was not true, the national phenomenon was constituted in part — if only negatively — by communism, by the suppression of civil society, by the suppression of a public sphere where past atrocities could have been, in part, discursively mastered.

 IV

‘The return of repressed’ view often sees what returns as somehow primordial, or at least deeply rooted in the pre-communist history of the region. Hence the frequent reference to ‘ancient hatreds’. Those who focus on unscrupulous and manipulative elites take the opposite view. Far from seeing nationalism as deeply rooted in primordial identities or ancient conflicts, they see it as stirred up in opportunistic and cynical fashion by unprincipled political elites. There is obviously much truth in this view. It is scarcely controversial to point out the opportunism and cynicism of political elites, or to underscore the crucial role of elites, whether cynical or sincere, in articulating national grievances and mobilising people for nationalist conflict. And there are certain textbook-clear examples of cynically manipulative elites stirring up nationalist tensions and passions: perhaps Slobodan Milosevic is the paradigmatic case — a pure example of a nationalist of convenience, rather than conviction. The elitist, instrumentalist focus of this view is also correct in its rejection of the view that contemporary nationalist politics is driven by deeply rooted national identities and ancient conflicts.

As a general account of the sources and dynamics of nationalism in the region, however, the elite manipulation view has at least three problematic implications. The first is that nationalism pays off as a political strategy; that it is therefore a rational strategy for opportunistic elites to adopt; and that it is relatively easy for manipulative elites to stir up nationalist passions in a politically profitable manner. The second is that if elite-instigated ethnonational mobilisation could engender ethnonational war and mass violence in Yugoslavia, the same thing could happen elsewhere (in the strong version: anywhere). The third is that this elite-driven nationalism is essentially a politics of interest, and that it therefore must be explained in instrumental terms.

I think all three implications — or clusters of implications — are mistaken. To begin with, nationalism is not always a subjectively rational or objectively ‘successful’ political strategy. It is not always possible, let alone easy, to ‘stir up nationalist passions’. [540] It is not always possible, let alone easy, to evoke the anxieties, the fears, the resentments, the perceptions and misperceptions, the self- and other-identifications, in short, the dispositions, the cast of mind against the background of which conspicuous and calculated nationalist stance-taking by elites can ‘pay off’ politically. Nor is it always possible, or easy, to sustain such a nationally ‘primed’ frame of mind, such propitiously ‘nationalised’ dispositions, once they have been successfully evoked.

The loosely related political stances or strategies we call ‘nationalist’ afford no generalised guarantee of political success, no generalised advantage over other political stances or strategies.[541] Investing in nationalism, in general, is no wiser than investing in any other political idiom or stance. At certain moments, to be sure, nationalist stances may yield higher returns. But it is hard to identify the boundaries of such moments ex ante. And once it is clear that such a moment has arrived, both politicians and analysts are likely to err by conceiving it in overgeneralized terms. The collapse of communist regimes — a fortiori those that ruled multi- or binational states — was such a moment. But how do we define this moment and its boundaries? I would argue that political entrepreneurs, closely monitoring other political entrepreneurs within bounded fields of comparison, and seeking a share of the windfall profits won by early investors in late-communist (or early postcommunist) nationalism, have tended to overinvest in this (momentarily) successful strategy, just as analysts, monitoring other analysts (as well as politicians), and seeking a share of the windfall profits won by early analysts of late-communist (or early postcommunist) nationalism, have similarly tended to overinvest in the study of nationalism in general, and in the study of elite manipulation in particular. [542]

The history of postcommunism is short; but it is long enough to make it clear that nationalism is not always a winning strategy, even in the specifically postcommunist setting. The record of electoral failure by nationalists — beginning with Lithuania in 1992 and including Hungary (1994), Ukraine (1994), Belarus (1994), Romania (1996) and others — is by now quite substantial. [543] The failure of one particular kind of nationalist appeal — the appeal to the need to protect transborder coethnics who are citizens and residents of other states — has been particularly striking. It is a source of chronic frustration to the Hungarian political elite, for example, how little the average Hungarian knows, or cares, about transborder Hungarians (in Romania, Slovakia, rump Yugoslavia and Ukraine). What the average Hungarian ‘knows’ about them, he or she doesn’t like: the ‘fact’ that the Hungarian government should be spending ‘our’ money on ‘them’, and the ‘fact’ that ‘they’ come to Hungary to take ‘our’ jobs. ‘They’ are certainly not recognised as ‘us’; the most eloquent testimony to this is that Hungarians from Transylvania who come to work in Hungary are routinely called ‘Romanians’. [544] Similarly, Russian politicians’ attempts to mobilise on the issue of Russians stranded in the ‘near abroad’ have been conspicuously unsuccessful. The one organisation specifically devoted to this theme — the Congress of Russian Communities (KOR) — failed even to clear the 5 per cent threshold in the December 1995 parliamentary elections. [545]

The second problematic implication is that if elite manipulation drove the former Yugoslavia into ethnonational barbarism, the same could happen elsewhere. I have already criticised the conclusion to this syllogism, arguing that large-scale violence between Hungarians and Romanians in Transylvania is unlikely despite intractable national tensions. Here I would like to challenge the premise.

Elite manipulation was of course an important element in the unfolding Yugoslav catastrophe. But the elite manipulation thesis fails to specify the particular conditions that made key segments of the Yugoslav population especially responsive to elite manipulation as the state began to disintegrate; more generally, failing to account for the differential success of the mobilising efforts and activities of elites, it overpredicts the severity and violence of ethnic conflict. In the Yugoslav case, a whole series of distinctive factors — the massive intercommunal violence during World War 11; the narratives of that violence that, deprived of a public hearing, circulated in familial settings, especially in certain key regions such as the Serb-inhabited areas of Croatian Krajina; the fear of the recurrence of that violence under conditions of rapid change in control over the means of state violence, especially when control over the means of state violence in Croatia was passing into the hands of a regime that incautiously (at best) employed certain symbols associated in the minds of Serbs with the murderous wartime Ustasha regime — help explain why people were responsive to the cynical manipulations originating in Belgrade.[546] Of course politicians distorted the past. But these distortions could be perceived as resonant and relevant in certain regions of Yugoslavia in a way that has no close parallel elsewhere, except perhaps in the Armenian-Azerbaijani conflict. Such variation in conditions of responsiveness to inflammatory elite appeals remains untheorised by the elite manipulation approach.

The third problematic implication of the elite manipulation thesis is that nationalism is essentially a politics of interest, not a politics of identity, and that it therefore must be explained in instrumental terms, by focusing on the calculations of cynical, self-interested elites, not in primordial identitarian terms. We should not in fact have to choose between an instrumentalist and an identitarian approach to the study of nationalism. That this is a false opposition becomes clear when we think about the cognitive dimension of nationalism. Considered from a cognitive point of view, nationalism is a way of seeing the world, a way of identifying interests, or more precisely, a way of specifying interestbearing units, of identifying the relevant units in terms of which interests are conceived. It furnishes a mode of vision and division of the world, to use Pierre Bourdieu’s phrase, a mode of social counting and accounting.

Thus it inherently links identity and interest — by identifying how we are to calculate our interests.

Of course ‘interests’ are central to nationalist politics, as to all politics, indeed to social life generally. The elite manipulation view errs not in focusing on interests, but in doing so too narrowly, focusing on the calculating pursuit of interests taken as unproblematically ‘given’ (above all politicians’ interest in attaining or maintaining power), and ignoring broader questions about the constitution of interests, questions concerning the manner in which interests — and, more fundamentally, units construed as capable of having interests, such as ‘nations’, ‘ethnic groups’ and ‘classes’ — are identified and thereby constituted. Elite discourse often plays an important role in the constitution of interests, but again this is not something political or cultural elites can do at will by deploying a few manipulative tricks. The identification and constitution of interests — in national or other terms — is a complex process that cannot be reduced to elite manipulation.

 V

The fifth idea I want to address is the ‘groupism’ that still prevails in the study of ethnicity and nationalism. By groupism — or what I will also call the ‘realism of the group’ — I mean the social ontology that leads us to talk and write about ethnic groups and nations as real entities, as communities, as substantial, enduring, internally homogeneous and externally bounded collectivities.

A similar realism of the group long prevailed in many areas of sociology and kindred disciplines.[547] Yet in the last decade or so, at least four developments in social theory have combined to undermine the treatment of groups as real, substantial entities. The first is the growing interest in network forms, the flourishing of network theory, and the increasing use of network as an overall orienting image or metaphor in social theory. Secondly, there is the challenge posed by theories of rational action, with their relentless methodological individualism, to realist understandings of groupness. The third development is a shift from broadly structuralist to a variety of more ‘constructivist’ theoretical stances; while the former envisioned groups as enduring components of social structure, the latter see groupness as constructed, contingent and fluctuating. Finally, an emergent postmodernist theoretical sensibility emphasises the fragmentary, the ephemeral and the erosion of fixed forms and clear boundaries. These developments are disparate, even contradictory. But they have converged in problematising groupness, and in undermining axioms of stable group being.

Yet this movement away from the realism of the group in the social sciences has been uneven. It has been striking — to take just one example — in the study of class, especially in the study of the working class — a term that is hard to use today without quotation marks or some other distancing device. Indeed the working class — understood as a real entity or substantial community — has largely dissolved as an object of analysis. It has been challenged both by theoretical statements and by detailed empirical research in social history, labour history and the history of popular discourse and mobilisation. The study of class as a cultural and political idiom, as a mode of conflict, and as an underlying abstract dimension of economic structure remains vital; but it is no longer encumbered by an understanding of classes as real, enduring entities.

At the same time, an understanding of ethnic groups and nations as real entities continues to inform the study of ethnicity, nationhood and nationalism. In our everyday talk and writing, we casually reify ethnic and national groups, speaking of ‘the Serbs’, ‘the Croats’, ‘the Estonians’, ‘the Russians’, ‘the Hungarians’, ‘the Romanians’ as if they were internally homogeneous, externally bounded groups, even unitary collective actors with common purposes. We represent the social and cultural world in terms reminiscent of a Modigliani painting as a multichrome mosaic of monochrome ethnic or cultural blocs.

I want to say a bit more about this Modiglianesque image of the social world. The metaphor I borrow from Gellner. Towards the end of Nations and Nationalism, Gellner invoked the contrasting painterly styles of Kokoschka and Modigliani — shreds and patches of colour and light in the former case, solid, sharply outlined blocs of colour in the latter — to characterise the passage from the cultural landscape of prenational agrarian society to that of nationally and culturally homogenised industrial society. [548]

This is a striking image, but I think it is misleading. There are in fact two versions of the Modiglianisation argument. The first — and this is Gellner's own argument — is the 'classical', nation-statist version. This is the argument that culture and polity gradually converge. Gellner was a master of compressed characterisations of vast, world-historical social transformations; and no doubt in very broad historical perspective one can speak of a substantial cultural homogenisation of polities, and of a consequent convergence of cultural and political boundaries. There are, however, two problems with Gellner's account.

First, Gellner's stress on the homogenisation functionally required by industrial society seems to me to be trebly misplaced: in overemphasising the degree of cultural homogeneity 'required' by industrial society; in sidestepping the problem, endemic in functionalist accounts, of explanation (to note that something may be 'required' or 'useful' for something else is not to explain its occurrence; no mechanism guarantees that what is 'required' will in fact be produced); and in neglecting the homogenising pressures arising from interstate competition, mass military conscription and mass nationalist public education in the classical age of the mass citizen army — pressures more powerful, in my view, than those arising from industrialism as such. [549]

Secondly, Gellner did not specify whether the homogenising forces of industrial society are still at work, or whether late industrial society is no longer culturally homogenising. A differentiated answer is required to this question. In certain respects — for example in the global diffusion of what is in many respects a single global material culture and dispositions associated with it — powerfully homogenising forces are still at work. In other respects, however, this is not the case. Thus, for example, the very logic of advanced capitalist/late industrialist/postindustrial society generates pressures for massive imports of immigrant labour, which tends to recreate a more Kokoschka-like cultural pattern.

It seems indisputable, however, that the homogenising forces arising from militarised interstate competition in the classical age of the mass citizen army — at least in the advanced industrial world — peaked in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. This was the maximally ‘Modiglianesque’ moment, I would argue: it was the ‘high noon’ of the citizen army, of the ‘nation in arms’, of the highly assimilationist, homogenising school systems that were linked in style and ideology to citizen armies, and of nation-states’ claims to absolute internal sovereignty, claims that legitimated their attempts to ‘nationalise’ their own territories at will, even ruthlessly. With the passing of this maximally ‘Modiglianesque’ moment, there has been a certain relaxation in the homogenising claims, aspirations and practices of the state, at least in regions of the world (most strikingly in western Europe) where states are no longer locked in fierce geopolitical and potentially military competition with one another.

But the classical, nation-statist version of the Modigliani-map argument is not the most current one. It is universally acknowledged today that culture and polity do not converge, that nearly all existing polities are in some sense ‘multicultural’. Yet the multicultural landscapes of late modernity are themselves usually represented in Modiglianesque terms, in terms, that is, of juxtaposed, well-defined, monochrome blocs. I want to argue that this newer, ‘postnational’ (or, more precisely, postnation-state) version of the Modigliani map is as problematic as the older, classically ‘nation-statist’ version.

One might have thought that the mixed settlement patterns characteristic of most contemporary ‘multicultural’ polities would resist Modiglianesque representation. On this way of thinking, immigration-engendered ethnic heterogeneity, such as that of the United States, would be particularly refractory to representation in such terms; but so too would the intricately intermixed ethnodemographic landscape of Eastern Europe, and of East Central Europe in particular — a locus classicus of ethnically and nationally mixed settlement.

But this mistakes the nature — and the rhetorical power — of the Modigliani map. The spatial aspect of the representation — the image of continuous and homogeneous blocs situated next to, rather than interspersed with, one another — should not be interpreted too literally; it does not necessarily imply corresponding spatial characteristics of what is represented. The Modiglianesque representation of heterogeneity as the juxtaposition of homogeneous blocs does not presuppose that the blocs be territorially concentrated. The constituent blocs may be intermixed in space, for their 'blocness' — their boundedness and internal homogeneity — is conceptually located not in physical but in social and cultural space. [550] But the conceptual map is still groupist; it still sees the population as composed of definable, bounded, internally homogeneous blocs (for example, African Americans, Native Americans, Latinos, Asian-Americans, and Euro-Americans, in the 'pentagonal' multiculturalist account of America). [551] The implicit if not explicit imagery is that of internally homogeneous, externally sharply bounded, though not necessary territorially concentrated, ethnocultural blocs.

The fact of pervasive territorial intermixing, then, is not itself incompatible with the Modiglianesque representation of ethnocultural heterogeneity. To challenge the Modigliani map, one must directly challenge the underlying groupist social ontology that informs most discussions of multiculturalism in North America (and indeed most discussions of ethnicity and nationalism throughout the world). There is by now an ample and sophisticated literature supporting such a challenge. As I noted above, moreover, a series of fundamental developments in social theory in recent decades have converged in problematising assumptions of stable and bounded 'groupness'. Yet these considerable theoretical and empirical resources have scarcely made a dent in the groupism that continues to prevail — that has indeed recently been strengthened — in theoretical and practical discussions of ethnicity and nationalism, sustained by the combined force of casually groupist ordinary language, parochial scholarly tradition (especially in ethnic and racial studies and area studies, but now also in the rapidly expanding sphere of nationalism studies), the institutionalisation and codification of groups and group 'identities' in public policy, and the group-making, group-strengthening endeavours of ethnopolitical entrepreneurs.

The forces supporting — and strengthening — groupist social ontology and groupist social analysis are even stronger in Eastern Europe than in North America. The institutionalisation and codification of ethnic and national groups, as noted above, went much further in multinational communist states than in North America. In Eastern Europe, moreover, the scholarly traditions associated with challenges to groupness — rational choice theory, network analysis, constructivism generally, and postmodernist emphases on the transient and fragmentary — have been much weaker than in North America. More fundamentally, Eastern Europe lacks the individualist traditions ofNorth America, above all the fundamentally voluntarist conception of groupness originating in sectarian Protestantism but ramifying throughout social and political life, especially in the United States.

One might argue, moreover, that the prevailingly strongly groupist language of social analysis in Eastern Europe describes the ethnonational landscape of the region rather well. After all, this region has seen an enduring and conspicuous discrepancy between national boundaries — strongly maintained within and against states — and state boundaries. It has been the locus classicus of deeply sedimented, resilient and relatively stable ethnonational boundaries following, in much of the region, linguistic rather than political frontiers. The very forces that conspicuously hindered the Gellnerian convergence of culture and polity in the region, enabling ethnonational ‘groups’ to sustain boundaries that cut across political divisions, would seem to warrant a Modiglianesque representation.

There have indeed been impressive instances of sustained ‘groupness’ in the region — in particular, of the maintenance of group boundaries and strengthening of group identities against the homogenising, assimilationist pressures and practices of nationalising states. One notable instance is that of Poles in Eastern Prussia in the late nineteenth and early twentieth century. One cannot generalise, however, from this case to the region as a whole — or even to other settings involving Poles and Germans. In other nearby settings, the boundaries between Poles and Germans proved quite weak and unstable, and a great deal of assimilation occurred in both directions. The maintenance and strengthening of national boundaries in this instance must be seen as reflecting particular circumstantial forces and factors, not as somehow emanating from some properties putatively intrinsic to ‘Poles’ as such. Groupness was strengthened in dynamic, interactive, organised response (involving a highly developed agricultural cooperative movement, credit associations, land purchase organisations, school strikes and strong support from the Catholic church) to the harshly assimilative practices of the Prussian/German state. It was sustained by a strong basis in the Catholic church (and by religiously as well as ethnolinguistically sustained endogamy) in a region where linguistic and religious cleavages coincided (in regions where Catholic Germans encountered Poles, national boundaries were much weaker). Groupness in this case was thus a product of politics and collective action, not a stable underlying basis for these.[552]

In other cases boundaries are much weaker. Consider for example late- and post-Soviet Ukraine. As we have noted above, the Soviet regime pervasively institutionalised nationhood and nationality as fundamental social categories. A key expression (and instrument) of that institutionalised scheme was the census, which recorded the self-identified ethnocultural nationality (natsional'nost} of every person. At the time of the 1989 census, some 11.4 million residents of Ukraine identified their nationality as Russian. But the precision suggested by this census data, even when rounded to the nearest 100,000, is entirely spurious. The very categories 'Russian' and 'Ukrainian', as designators of putatively distinct ethnocultural nationalities, are deeply problematic in the Ukrainian context, where rates of intermarriage have been extremely high, and where nearly 2 million of those designating their ethnic nationality as Ukrainian in the 1989 census admitted to not speaking Ukrainian as their native language or as a second language they could 'freely command' — a figure many consider to be greatly underestimated. One should therefore be skeptical of the illusion of bounded groupness created by the census, with its exhaustive and mutually exclusive categories. One can imagine circumstances in which a selfconscious ethnically Russian minority might emerge in Ukraine, but such a 'group' cannot be taken as given or deduced from the census.[553]

The boundary between Hungarians and Romanians in Transylvania is certainly sharper than that between Russians and Ukrainians in Ukraine. Even in Transylvania, however, group boundaries are considerably more porous and ambiguous than is widely assumed. The language of everyday life, to be sure, is rigorously categorical, dividing the population into mutually exclusive ethnonational categories, and making no allowance for mixed or ambiguous forms. But this categorical code, important though it is as a constituent element of social relations, should not be taken for a faithful description of them. Reinforced by ethnopolitical entrepreneurs on both sides, the categorical code obscures as much as it reveals about ethnonational identifications, masking the fluidity and ambiguity that arise from mixed marriages, from bilingualism, from migration, from Hungarian children attending Romanian-language schools, from intergenerational assimilation (in both directions) and from sheer indifference to the claims of ethnocultural nationality.

‘Groupness’ and ‘boundedness’ must thus be taken as variable, as emergent properties of particular structural or conjunctural settings; they cannot properly be taken as given or axiomatic. Comparative studies of ethnicity and nationalism provide abundant support for this point, but it remains inadequately appreciated outside this specialised research tradition. The point needs to be emphasised today more than ever, for the unreflectively groupist language that prevails in everyday life, journalism, politics, and much social research as well — the habit of speaking without qualification of ‘Hungarians’ and ‘Romanians’, for example, as if they were sharply bounded, internally homogeneous ‘groups’ — not only weakens social analysis but undermines the possibilities for liberal politics in the region.

 VI

The final idea I want to discuss is the Manichean view that there are two kinds of nationalism, a good, civic kind and a bad, ethnic kind; and two corresponding understandings of nationhood, the good, civic conception, in which nationhood is seen as based on common citizenship, and the bad, ethnic conception, in which nationhood is seen as based on common ethnicity. This is often connected to an Orientalist conception of east European nationalism, for in general civic nationalism is seen as characteristic of western Europe, ethnic nationalism as characteristic of eastern Europe. But the civic-ethnic distinction is also used within regions, sometimes in an ideological mode, to distinguish one’s own good, legitimate civic nationalism from the illegitimate ethnic nationalism of one’s neighbours, and sometimes in a scholarly or quasi-scholarly mode, to characterise and classify different forms of nationalism and modes of national self-understanding. Today the distinction is often used to frame discussions of the new states of eastern Europe and the former Soviet Union, and to ‘keep score’ on contemporary processes of nation- and state-building in the region; it provides a handy — all-too-handy, in my view — tool for classifying incipient processes of state- and nation-building as civic or ethnic.

By labelling this a Manichean view, I caricature it, of course, but not too violently. In its more nuanced forms, the distinction certainly has some analytical and normative merit. I myself have used a related (though not identical) distinction between state-centred and ethnocultural understandings of nationhood in my own previous work. [554] Still, I think the distinction between civic and ethnic nationalism, especially in the rather simplistic form in which it is usually applied, is both analytically and normatively problematic. [555]

One way of highlighting the analytical weakness of the Manichean view is by noting its uncertainty over how to conceptualise the cultural dimension of nationhood and nationalism. Roughly speaking, there are two very different ways of mapping culture onto the civic-ethnic distinction.

(i) On the one hand, ethnic nationalism may be interpreted narrowly, as involving an emphasis on descent, and, ultimately, on race, on biology. In this case, there is very little ethnic nationalism around, for on this view an emphasis on common culture, without any marked emphasis on common descent, has to be coded as a species of civic nationalism. But the category of civic nationalism then becomes too heterogeneous to be useful, while that of ethnic nationalism is underpopulated.

(ii) On the other hand, ethnic nationalism may be interpreted broadly, as ethnocultural, while civic nationalism may be interpreted narrowly, as involving an acultural conception of citizenship, a sharp separation of citizenship from cultural as well as ethnic nationality. But in this case, the problem is just the opposite: civic nationalism gets defined out of existence, and virtually all nationalisms would be coded as ethnic or cultural. Even the paradigmatic cases of civic nationalism — France and America — cease to count as civic nationalism, since they have a crucial cultural component. (Interestingly, two recent books argue for the existence of an American cultural nationality: American nationhood, they argue, is not purely political, founded on an idea; it is cultural; America is a nationstate founded on a common, and distinctive, American culture).[556]

The normative weakness of the distinction similarly pivots on the ambiguous place of culture:

(a) If ethnic is interpreted broadly as ethnocultural, then the blanket normative condemnation of ethnic nationalism is problematic, for in certain circumstances it is easy to have normative sympathy for the defensive power of ethnocultural nationalism (e.g. for that of Poland during the time of partition, for that of the Baltic nations under Soviet rule, indeed for minority cultures everywhere, whose nationalism cannot assume a civic form, though it need not, of course, be ‘ethnic’ in the narrow, biologically based sense).

(b) If culture, however, is classified with civic nationhood and nationalism, then many nationalising ‘civic’ nationalisms, more or less suffused with cultural chauvinism, and seeking to reduce or (at the limit) eradicate cultural heterogeneity within a state, although indifferent to ethnicity in the sense of descent as such, are normatively ambiguous at best.

From a normative point of view, the joining of state power to nationalist or nationalising practices should always be cause for concern. A skeptical stance towards statist nationalising nationalisms (not to be equated with a blanket condemnation of them) is more adequate, and more supple, than the conceptually muddled blanket embrace of civic (and condemnation of ethnic) nationalism. The policies and practices of nationalising states may be assimilationist, in a variety of modalities ranging from benign — or not so benign — neglect of ethnic or cultural differences to harsh or even coercive attempts to eradicate such differences. On the other hand, nationalising policies and practices may be dissimilationist — premised on, even constitutive of, fundamental differences between groups. The assimilationist stances are not necessarily ‘civic’ in any normatively robust sense, while the dissimilationist stances are not necessarily ‘ethnic’ in the narrow sense (not necessarily premised on descent-based group difference). Both assimilationist and dissimilationist nationalising nationalisms warrant normative skepticism, though our normative evaluation of them will depend heavily on rich contextual knowledge — knowledge that cannot adequately be captured, even in simplified form, by an impoverished and ambiguous coding of them as ‘civic’ or ‘ethnic’.

From an analytical point of view, a more useful (though of course closely related) distinction can be drawn between state-framed and counter-state understandings of nationhood and forms of nationalism. In the former, ‘nation’ is conceived as congruent with the state, as institutionally and territorially ‘framed’ by the state; in the latter, it is conceived in opposition to the territorial and institutional frame of some existing state or states. This distinction can do the analytical work that is expected of the civic-ethnic distinction without the attendant confusions.

Clearly, there is not necessarily anything ‘civic’ — in the normatively robust sense of that term — about state-framed nationhood or nationalism. It is the state — not citizenship — that is the cardinal point of reference; and the state that frames the nation need not be democratic, let alone robustly so. Moreover, the notion of state-framed nationhood or nationalism can accommodate linguistic, cultural and even ethnic aspects of nationhood and nationalism in so far as these are (as they often are in fact) framed, mediated and shaped by the state.[557] Escaping the constricting definitional antithesis between civic and ethnic or ethnocultural nationalism, we can see that state-framed nationalisms are often imbued with a strong cultural content and may be (though need not be) ethnicised is well.[558]

Counter-state nationalisms, on the other hand, need not be specifically ethnic; nationhood conceived in opposition to an existing state need not be conceived in ethnic terms, or even, more loosely, in ethnocultural terms. Quite apart from the difference, mentioned above, between narrowly ethnic and broadly ethnocultural understandings of nationhood, counter-state definitions of nation may be based on territory, on historic provincial privileges, on distinct political histories prior to incorporation into a larger state and so on. These are all cases of counter-state but non-ethnic definitions of nationhood — of nation defined in opposition to the institutional and territorial framework of an existing state or states but without reference to a distinct ethnic or ethnocultural collectivity. Moreover, whether the counter-state nation in question is defined in ethnic or ethnocultural terms or in some other fashion, counter-state nationalisms may partake of ‘civic’ qualities; indeed demandingly participatory counter-state nationalist movements may provide a particularly rich setting for the cultivation, display and exercise of participatory and thereby in some sense ‘civic’ virtue — which the conventional civic-ethnic antithesis definitionally, but misleadingly, associates with ‘civic’ and denies to ‘ethnic’ nations and nationalisms.

 Conclusion

The ‘pernicious postulates’ I have discussed — some directly opposed to others — do not add up to a single theory of nationalism. Nor have I sought to construct such a theory in my critique of these postulates. The search for ‘a’ or ‘the’ theory of nationalism — like the search for ‘a’ or ‘the’ solution to nationalist conflicts — is in my view misguided: for the theoretical problems associated with nationhood and nationalism, like the practical political problems, are multiform and varied, and not susceptible of resolution through a single theoretical (or practical) approach. What I have sought to provide, then, is not a comprehensive theory of nationalism, but a series of pointers away from a set of analytical cliches, theoretical dead ends and misguided practical stances towards more promising ways of thinking about, writing about and coping practically with nationalism and national conflicts.

 Notes

For comments and suggestions on earlier versions of this chapter I thank Zsuzsa Berend, Margit Feischmidt, Jon Fox, Mark Granovetter, John A. Hall, Victoria Koroteyeva, Peter Loewenberg, John Meyer, Llszl6 Nemenyi, Margaret Somers, Peter Stamatov, David Stark and Ronald Suny.

[512] A partial listing of these would include international relations and security studies (as the end of the Cold War has fostered new understandings of ‘security’ and ‘insecurity’); political science (as the study of nationalism has spread from its traditional home in comparative politics into more theretically ambitious, self-consciously ‘scientific’ areas of political science); rational choice theory (in sociology as well as in political science); anthropology (as it has increasing taken complex, ‘modern’ societies as its object); sociology (especially with the ‘cultural turn’ in comparative, historical and political sociology); ethnic studies (with a partial convergence between the literatures on ethnicity and on nationalism); cultural studies; comparative literature; art history; women’s studies; musicology; and a variety of areastudies fields including, in a spectacular instance of scholarly perestroika, post-Soviet and east European studies.

[513] In the post-Soviet field, this has happened as academic entrepreneurs, in search of windfall profits, have entered the field, unburdened by any but the most minimal acquaintance with the comparative and theoretical literature of the field, to say nothing of the wider theoretical and empirical literature of the social sciences, and hastily converted their intellectual capital from forms suddenly devalued by the end of the Cold War and the collapse of the Soviet regime into newly revalued forms, for example, in the sub-field of ‘security studies’, from a weapons-oriented understanding of security and insecurity to one centred on ethnic and national conflict. In other fields, far removed from the traditional disciplinary loci for the study of nationalism (cultural studies, musicology, comparative literature, etc.), the historical and social scientific literature on nationalism has been appropriated in a highly selective way.

[514] For a sampling of that literature, see B. Anderson, Imagined Communities, London, 1991; J. Armstrong, Nations before Nationalism, Chapel Hill, 1982; J. Breuilly, Nationalism and the State, Manchester, 1982; E. Gellner, Nations and Nationalism, Oxford, 1983; and A. D. Smith, The Ethnic Origins of Nations, Oxford, 1986.

[515] C. Tilly, Big Structures, Large Processes, Huge Comparisons, New York, 1984.

[516] Apart from the fact that my own recent work has concerned nationalism in this region, there are good analytical reasons for focusing on this region. Nowhere — for reasons suggested in note 2 — is the theoretical primitivism in the study of nationalism more striking than in the literature (and quasiliterature) on this region. Nowhere, moreover, do the myths and misconceptions I address have more superficial plausibility than in this region.

[517] It is an uncomfortable truth that, around the time of the 1938 Munich agreement, the dismemberment of Czechoslovakia through the separation of the Sudeten German lands from the rest of the country was presented and justified in Britain — and not only in Germany — in the name of national selfdetermination. See A. J. P. Taylor, The Origins of the Second World War, London, 1961 and M. Kofacs, ‘A nemzeti onredelkezes csapdaja’ [The trap of self-determination], Nepszabadsag, 12 August 1995.

[518] For a classic, albeit highly compressed, statement of the sequel, see the epilogue to A. J. P. Taylor, The Habsburg Monarchy, Chicago, 1976. For a more extended statement, though still splendidly concise, see J. Rothschild, East Central Europe between the Two World Wars, Seattle, 1974, especially ch. 1. It is problematic, to be sure, to assign responsibility for the disastrous developments in Central Europe in the two decades following World War I to the principle of self-determination, not least because the principle was applied so selectively in the postwar settlement. One could argue that it was the failure to apply the principle more consistently — for example, by allowing the peaceful accession of rump Austria to Germany — rather than the application of the principle, that proved disastrous.

[519] Kovacs, ‘A nemzeti onredelkezes csapdaja’.

[520] For sophisticated recent discussions from the perspective of normative political theory, see Y. Tamir, Liberal Nationalism, Princeton, 1993; W. Kymlicka, Multicultural Citizenship, Oxford, 1995; and D. Miller, On Nationality, Oxford, 1995.

[521] Gellner, Nations and Nationalism, p. 48.

[522] For an analysis of interwar Poland as a nationalising state, with some concluding reflections on nationalising states today, see R. Brubaker, Nationalism Refamed: Nationhood and the National Question in the New Europe, Cambridge, 1996, ch. 4.

[523] For a comparison ofWeimar Germany and contemporary Russian homeland nationalism, see Brubaker, Nationalism Reframed, ch. 5.

[524] See inter alia S. Woodward, Balkan Tragedy, Washington, 1995, pp. 209ff and Kovacs, ‘A nemzeti onredelkezes csapdaja’.

[525] As Robert Dahl puts it, We cannot solve the problem of the proper scope and domain of democratic units from within democratic theory. Like the majority principle, the democratic principle presupposes a proper unit. The criteria of the democratic process presuppose the rightfulness of the unit itself.’ See for a thorough exploration of this point Dahl’s Democracy and its Critics, New Haven, 1989, pp. 147–8, 193–209, with quotation coming from p. 209.

[526] For penetrating analysis ofinstitutional design, see D. Horowitz, Ethnic Groups in Conflict, Berkeley, 1985 and A Democratic South Africa?, Berkeley, 1991.

[527] For an eloquent contextualist plea for ‘the adjustment of claims to circumstances’, see M. Walzer, ‘The New Tribalism’, Dissent, Spring, 1992. To argue that good institutional design must be context-sensitive in a strong sense does not mean that generalising analysis of the workings of different types of institutions — say, for example, different types of electoral systems — is inappropriate. Horowitz undertakes such generalising analysis, but it is a generalising analysis of the very different effects that ‘the same’ electoral system can have in differing contexts. And Horowitz’s most sustained discussion of institutional design — in A Democratic South Africa? — is densely contextual in my sense, blending relatively ‘thick’ description of a particular context with generalising arguments about the effects of particular institutions in a variety of settings.

[528] Although I limit my remarks to eastern Europe here, the gloom-and-doom view of putatively explosive ethnic nationalism has considerably wider currency. It is even used in the United States, for example, to link multiculturalism to ‘Balkanisation’ and attendant bloodshed. Critical though I am of many multiculturalist pieties (see, for example, pp. 292–98), I find the argument of a ‘slippery slope’ leading from the follies of multiculturalism a l’americaine to ethnic warfare just plain silly.

[529] J. D. Fearon and D. D. Laitin, ‘Explaining Interethnic Cooperation’, American Political Science Review, vol. 90, 1996.

[530] Ibid.

[531] I should emphasise that this is a relative, not an absolute, absence of nationalist violence. There was one serious incident of violent clashes between Hungarians and Romanians in Tirgu Mires in the spring of 1990, but this did not trigger further violence. Other forms of violence — notably violent attacks on Gypsies in Romania and other east European countries — have been quite serious; my attention here is limited to relations between Hungary and the majority nationalities in states neighbouring Hungary.

[532] Fearon and Laitin, ‘Explaining Interethnic Cooperation’, correctly caution against explaining ethnic violence by appealing to narratives of ‘loss, blame, and threat’, arguing that such narratives characterise non-violent forms of ethnic conflict as well. But not all such narratives are equal, or equally likely to be connected to violence. There is an important difference, in particular, between memories and threats of death and physical violence on the one hand and narratives of loss, blame and threat in general on the other. Credible narratives of loss, blame and threat are ubiquitous; credible narratives linking memeories of past mass violence to threats of future mass violence are not. What was distinctive about the Yugoslav situation — and in my view centrally connected with the violence there — was the availability of plausible, and for some key actors, compelling narratives linking the occurrence of large-scale violence, in particular, mass killings, in the past to the threatened recurrence of such violence in the present.

[533] David Laitin, personal communication.

[534] In Estonia and Latvia, for example, the clash between the claims of the newly independent nationalising states and those of their Russian and Russophone minorities, strongly amplified from the outside by the homeland nationalist claims of Russia to ‘protect’ Baltic Russians, has remained intense and intractable at the level of high politics. But there has been little popular nationalist mobilisation in the last few years on the part of majority nationalities or on the part of the Russian and Russian-speaking minorities (on the relative political passivity of Russians, see N. Melvin, Russians beyond Russia, London, 1995).

[535] There is, of course, a parallel danger of under-historicisation. I address this below in my discussion of the failure of ‘elite manipulation’ accounts to explain or systematically address the historically conditioned differential resonance of appeals made by manipulative or opportunistic nationalist politicians. (To the extent that historically conditioned differences in responsiveness to inflammatory nationalist rhetoric are addressed at all in the ‘elitist’ literature, they are addressed in an ad hoc fashion, relegated to the category of ‘other factors’ or to an undertheorised residual ‘context’.)

[536] Both the Hungarian Duna-TV and the various western European channels have high prestige among Transylvanian Hungarians. Romanian state television, by contrast, has low prestige although a new private Romanian channel, self-consciously Western in style, is widely watched. Its effect is mainly in contributing to the alienation of Transylvanian Hungarians from the regime, and, perhaps, from the state itself.

[537] For a fuller version of this argument, see Brubaker, Nationalism Reframed, ch. 2.

[538] V. Vujacic and V. Zaslavsky, ‘The Causes ofDisintegration in the USSR and Yugoslavia’, Telos, vol. 88, 1991.

[539] In Bourdieuian terms, two sets of persons might share exactly the same habitus (or, more sociologically, the same distribution of habitus); they might look at the world in the same way, speak the same language, dress in the same manner, consume the same goods, etc.: yet they might still exist as two ‘groups’ because of public categorical recognition.

[540] The expression itself is problematic: presuming that nationalist passions are already there to be ‘stirred up’, it glosses over the difficulties involved in what might be called the ‘work of nationalisation’.

[541] For a sophisticated argument to the contrary, see J. Rothschild, Ethnopolitics, New York, 1981, pp. 41–66, especially pp. 64–5.

[542] In another sense, to be sure, analysts have underinvested in the study of nationalism; or, their investments have been short-term rather than longterm. In search of a quick pay-off, they have underinvested in the long-term study of nationalism, but over-invested in quick discussions and in ‘pidding up’ the significance of the phenomenon of nationalism.

[543] One should not replace a global overestimation of the power of nationalist political appeals with a global underestimation. The ‘return of the left’ does not mean that nationalism is no longer a viable political option in the region. The ‘return of the left’ — especially, of a ‘left’ whose economic policies have been (in some instances) far more monetarist, far more acceptable to the IMF, than anything the preceding ‘right’ government undertook — may well be followed by the ‘return of the return of the right’. Moreover, the ‘left’ — think of the communists in Russia — is quite as capable of nationalism as the ‘right’, if these labels mean anything at all, which is doubtful. Nationalism had no fixed location on the political spectrum back when it made sense to speak of a political ‘spectrum’; still less does it have any such fixed location today.

[544] This is not, of course, peculiar to Hungary: ‘Germans’ from Kazakhstan who resettle in Germany are called ‘Russians’, as are Jews from Russia (or elsewhere in the former Soviet Union) who resettle in Israel.

[545] The lack of electoral success of appeals to the protection of Russians outside Russia does not mean that this theme will disappear from Russian political discourse. Even if such appeals are unprofitable in the arena of domestic political competition, they may be useful in international contexts. This argument is developed in Brubaker, Nationalism Reframed, ch. 5.

[546] For a more detailed statement of this argument, see Brubaker, Nationalism Reframed, pp. 72ff.

[547] The argument of this and the next paragraph is drawn from, and developed more fully in, Brubaker, Nationalism Reframed, ch 1, especially pp. 13ff.

[548] Gellner, Nations and Nationalism, pp. 139–40.

[549] Gellner of course did devote considerable attention to education, notably in Nations and Nationalism, ch. 3. But he saw mass ‘exo-education’ as arising from the logic of industrial society, not from the logic of interstate competition in the age of mass warfare.

[550] Even mixed settlement patterns, though, are often imagined in mosaic-like terms as composites of bounded and homogenous units. ‘Heterogeneity’, in this mode of imagining it, is a distribution of homogenous units. Heterogeneity is still conceptualised in groupist terms. Sometimes this finds literal representation in maps — as, for example, when maps of ethnic ‘diversity’ or ‘mixing’ are represented as juxtaposed solid colour patches. How to represent ethnic heterogeneity on a two-dimensional map is a difficult — and philosophically interesting — question. Certainly, though, the simple juxtaposition of solid colour fields is quite often misleading, suggesting a much greater degree of local homogeneity than in fact exists, and relegating heterogeneity to a higher-level unit. That is, such maps imply that provinces (for example) are heterogeneous, but smaller regions and villages are not; and this implication is often mistaken.

[551] For critical discussions of conceptions of this multicultural pentagon, see D. Hollinger, Post-Ethnic America, New York, 1995 and M. Lind, The Next American Nation, New York, 1995.

[552] For a general statement of this point, see C. Calhoun, ‘The Problem of Identity in Collective Action’, in J. Huber, ed., Macro-Micro Linkages in Sociology, Newbury Park, 1991, p. 59.

[553] The data on nationality and language are taken from Gosudarstvennyi Komitetet po Statistike, Natsional’nyi Sostav Naseleniia SSSR, Moscow, 1991, pp. 78–9.

[554] R. Brubaker, Citizenship and Nationhood in France and Germany, Cambridge, MA, 1992.

[555] For a critique of the civic-ethnic dichotomy from the point of view of political theory, see B. Yack, ‘The Myth of the Civic Nation’, Critical Review, vol. 10, 1996.

[556] See Hollinger, Post-Ethnic America and Lind, The Next American Nation.

[557] France may again be cited as a paradigmatic instance of state-framed nationhood. Culture is indeed constitutive (not — as I argued in Citizenship and Nationhood in France and Germany — simply expressive) of French nationhood; but this is pervasively state-framed culture, not culture conceived as prior to and independent of the territorial and institutional frame of the state.

[558] Again, in this case, we would be talking about a statist ethnicisation of nationhood, not some kind of pre-state or extra-state ethnicity. ‘Ethnicity’ and ‘culture’ thus may be found in state-framed nationalism, but only in so far as they themselves are state-framed or state-‘caged’ (to use Michael Mann’s term, drawn from his The Sources of Social Power, 2 vols., Cambridge, 1986 and 1993). There is no opposition between the statist component — which refers to the framing — and ethnicity or culture.

* Bibliography of Ernest Gellner’s writings on nationalism

Comments about nationalism occur throughout Gellner’s writings, not least when discussing particular national identities, Islam, the options of modern European thought, and the sociology of development: this is scarcely surprising given that the interpretation of nationalism is part of a larger social philosophy. The following list concentrates on the theory of nationalism, and so omits most occasional references and much of the more general social philosophy. As the list that follows is extensive, key texts have been marked with asterisks. It follows Ian Jarvie’s ‘Bibliography of Ernest Gellner’ in J. A. Hall and I. C. Jarvie, eds., The Social Philosophy of Ernest Geitner, Amsterdam, 1996. Please note that the pieces collected in Encounters with Nationalism are not listed here by date of original publication; equally, translations and reprintings are not cited.

| 1963 | ‘Going into Europe’, Encounter, vol. 20, pp. 54–5. |

| ★1965 | Thought and Change, London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson; Chicago: University of Chicago Press (with the imprint 1964).
‘The Day the Pendulum Stood Still’ (review of Sylvia G. Haim, ed., Arab Nationalism), New Society, vol. 5, pp. 30–1. |

| 1967 ‘Democracy and Industrialisation’, European Journal of Sociology, vol. 8, pp. 47–70. |

| 1971 ‘Our Current Sense of History’, European Journal of Sociology, vol. 12, pp. 159–79.
‘Going into Europe — Again?’, Encounter, vol. 37, pp. 232–4. |

| 1972 Review ofElie Kedourie, Nationalism in Asia and Afica, British Journal of Sociology, vol. 23, pp. 120–3. |

| ★1973 ‘Scale and Nation’, Philosophy of the Social Sciences, vol. 3, pp. 1–17. |

| 1974 ‘The Unknown Apollo of Biskra’, Government and Opposition, vol. 9, pp. 277–310. |

| 1975 ‘Cohesion and Identity: The Maghreb from Ibn Khaldun to Emile Durkheim’, Government and Opposition, vol. 1 0, pp. 203–18. |

| 1977 Review ofEugene Kamenka, ed., Nationalism: The Future and Evolution of an Idea, and Anthony Smith, Nationalist Movements, British Journal of Sociology, vol. 28, pp. 413–14.
‘Ethnicity and Anthropology in the Soviet Union’, European Journal of Sociology, vol. 18, pp. 201 -20. |

| 1978 | ‘Nationalism, or the New Confessions of a Justified Edinburgh Sinner’ (review of Tom Nairn, The Break Up of Britain), The Political Quarterly, vol. 49, pp. 127–9. |

| 1979 | Review of Hugh Seton-Watson, Nations and States, Political Studies, vol. 27, pp. 312–13.

| 1980 | ‘As raizes sociais de nacionalismo e a diversidede de suas formas’, in Alternatives politicas, economicas, e sociais at of final do secuto, Brazilia: Editore Universidad do Brazilien. |

| 1981 | ‘Nationalism’, Theory and Society, vol. 10, pp. 753–76. |

| 1982 | ‘The Individual Division of Labour and National Cultures’, Government and Opposition, vol. 17, pp. 268–78. |

| ★1983 | ‘Nationalism and the Two Forms of Cohesion in Complex Societies’, Proceedings of the British Academy, vol. 58, pp. 165–87. |

| ★ | Nations and Nationalism, Oxford: Basil Blackwell. |

| ★ | Personal communication about nationalism, quoted and discussed in Anthony Smith, Theories of Nationalism, 2nd edn, London: Duckworth, Appendix C, pp. 265–7. |

| 1984 | Foreword to Said Amir Arjomand, ed., From Nationalism to Revolutionary Islam, London: Macmillan, pp. vii-xi. |

| 1985 | Introduction to E. Gellner, ed., Islamic Dilemmas: Reformers, Nationalists and Industrialisation, The Southern Shore of the Mediterranean, Berlin: Mouton, pp. 1–9. |

| 1986 | Preface to Richard Jenkins, Hastings Donovan and Graham McFarlane, The Sectarian Divide in Northern Ireland Today, RAI Occasional Paper, no. 41, pp. v-vii. |

| 1987 | ‘Nationalism’, in Vernon Bogdanor, ed., Encyclopaedia of Political Institutions, Oxford: Blackwell, pp. 382–3.
‘Il nazionalismo, la democrazia e la storia’, Quaderni Storici, new series, vol. 66, pp. 945–59.

| 1988 | Plough, SwordandBook, London: Collins Harvill. |

| ★ | ‘Zeno of Cracow’, in R. Ellen et al., eds., Malinowski Between Two Worlds: The Polish Roots of an Anthropological Tradition, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, pp. 164–94. |

| 1989 | Introduction to Oleg Glebov and John Crowfoot, eds., The Soviet Empire: Its Nations Speak Out, New York: Harwood, pp. xi-xxv.
‘Nationalism Today: its Origins and Nature’ (transcript of a discussion with Igor Kon), Social Sciences [USSR], vol. 20, pp. 183–95
‘Etnicita, sentimento nazionale e industrialismo’, Problemi di Socialismo, no. 3. |

| ★1990 | ‘Ethnicity and Faith in Eastern Europe’, Daedalus, vol. 119, pp. 279–94.
‘Ethnicity Unbound’ (review of Bohdan Nahaylo and Victor Swoboda, A History of the Nationalities Problem in the USSR), The New Republic, vol. 202, pp. 34–8.
‘O Prirode Natsionalisma’ (an interview with V. Borschev, Znanie Sita, vol. 7, pp. 1–5.
‘Nationen, Imperium und ubernationale Gemeinschaft’, Transit, Europiiische Revue, vol. 1, pp. 143–5. |

| 1991 | ‘Nationalisme et politique en Europe de l’Est’, Le Debat, no. 63, pp. 78–84. |

| ★ | ‘Two Escapes from History, or the Hapsburg Impact on British Thought’, in Alfred Bohnen and Alan Musgrave, eds., Wege der Vernunfi, Festschrift zum siebzigsten Geburtstag von Hans Albert, Tubingen: J. C. B. Mohr, pp. 227–44.
‘Explosiv etnisk kamp’ (an interview with Bente Egjar Englesland), in Aftenposten, 8 February.
‘Det delte Ost-Europa’ (an interview), Bergeors Tidende, 2 October. |

| ★ | ‘Nationalism in Eastern Europe’, New Left Review, no. 189, pp. 127–36.
‘Nationalism in the New Central Europe’ and ‘Prague in the New Central Europe’, in Working Papers of the Institute of Sociology of the Czechoslovak Academy of Sciences, transcript of an international conference, 2–4 June 1990.
‘L’identita culturale’, Volonta, nos. 2 and 3. |

| 1992 | ‘Alle Radici delle nazioni. Tra etnie e Fondamentalismi’ (an interview with Nicole Janigro), IIManifesto, 3 March.
‘Nationalismus und Rassenwahn’, Siiddeutsche Zeitung, no. 6, 7 February, pp. 26–7.
‘Nationalism in the Vacuum’, in Alexander J. Motyl, Thinking Theoretically About Soviet Nationalities, New York: Columbia University Press, pp. 243–54.
‘Jenseits der Nationalismus?’, !KUS Lectures, nos. 3 and 4, pp. 31–4.
‘Ce ii nazionalismo non le nazioni’ (an interview with Annamaria Guadefni), L’Unita, 20 September.
‘Rozhovor s prof. E. Gellnerem’ (an interview with L. Chorvathova), Slovensky Narodopis, no. 3, pp. 304–10.
‘Nation’ and ‘Nationalism’ in W. Outhwaite et al., eds., The Blackwell Dictionary of Twentieth Century Social Thought, Oxford: Blackwell, pp. 402–3, 409–11. |

| 1993 | New Preface to Czech translation of Nations and Nationalism, Narody a Nacionalismus, Prague: Hribal.
‘Nationalism in a Post-Marxist World: Contemporary Reflections’, in Mario Buttino, ed., In a Collapsing Empire, Milan: Feltrinelli, pp. 83–8. New Preface to Russian translation of Nations and Nationalism, Natsii i Natsionalism, Moscow: Progress.
‘Nationalisms and the New World Order’, in L. W. Reed and C. Keyser, eds., Emerging Norms of Justified Intervention, Cambridge, MA: Committee on International Security Studies, American Academy of Arts and Sciences, pp. 151–5.
‘Nationalism and Politics in Eastern Europe’, European Review, vol. 1, pp. 341–5.
‘Nationalism in Europe’, in A. Clesse and A. Kortunov, eds., The Political and Strategic Implications of the State Crises in Central and Eastern Europe, Luxembourg: Institute for European and International Studies, pp. 29–32, 299–335.

Review of Peter Buck, Folk Cultures and Little Peoples: Aspects of National Awakening in East Central Europe, Ethnos, vol. 58, nos. 3–4, p. 406. |

| 1994 | ‘Nationalisms and the New World Order’, Bulletin of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, vol. 47, pp. 29–36.
‘Natsii i Natsionalizm’ (an interview with L. Anninskii and I. Mamaladze), Obschaia Gazeta, March, pp. 11–17. |

| ★ | Conditions of Liberty, London: Hamish Hamilton.
‘Die Vielfalt der europaischen Nationalismen’, Ethnos, vol. 43. |

| ★ | Encounters with Nationalism, Oxford: Blackwell.
‘The Struggle to Catch Up’, The Times Literary Supplement, vol. 9, pp. 14–15.
New Preface to Hebrew translation of Nations and Nationalism, Leumin u Leumit, Tel Aviv: Open University Press. |

| 1995 | Contribution to ‘Conclusion’ (debate with Pierre Hassner, Alain Dieckhoff and Jacques Rupnik) in Jacques Rupnik, ed., Le dechirement des nations, Paris: Editions de Seuil, pp. 261 -83.
‘Razgorur’ (interview with Vinka Drezga), in Kulturni Obzor, Zagreb, 26 March.
‘S profesorem Gellnerem o Ruski, Cesku, Rakousku atd’ (an interview with Jitka Sestakova), Respekt, vol. 29.
‘Ruthless Liberalism’ (interview with Ian Kirk-Smith), Fortnight (Belfast), April, pp. 28–30.
‘Introduction’ to Bernd Baumgart! and Adrian Farell, eds., New Xenophobia in Europe, The Hague: Kluwer Law International, pp. 6–9. ‘Expiation through Subjectivism’, in The Limits of Pluralism, Amsterdam: Praemium Erasmianum Foundation, pp. 163–6.
‘To, co vitezt, nemusi byt vzdy pravda’ (an interview with Eva Halinova), Nedelm Lidove Noviry, 26 August, p. 11.
‘Sauce for the Liberal Goose’, review of John Gray, Isaiah Berlin, Prospect, November, pp. 56–61.
‘Introduction’ to Sukumar Periwal, ed., Notions of Nationalism, Budapest: CEU Press, pp. 1–7. |

| ★ | Anthropology and Politics, Oxford: Blackwell |

| 1996 | ‘Return of a Native’, The Political Quarterly. vol. 67, pp. 4–13. |

| ★ | ‘The Rest of History’, Prospect, May, pp. 34–8. |

| ★ | ‘Reply to Critics’, in John A. Hall and Ian C. Jarvie, eds., The Social Philosophy of Ernest Gellner, Amsterdam: Rodopi, pp. 625–87. |

| ★ | Debate with Anthony Smith, Nations and Nationalism, vol. 10. |

| ★ | ‘The Coming of Nationalism and its Interpretation: The Myth of Nation and Class’, in Gopal Balakrishnan, ed., Mapping the Nation, London: Verso, pp. 98–145. |

| 1997 | Nationalism, London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson. |

| 1998 | Language and Solitude: Wittgenstein, Malinowski and the Hapsburg Dilemma, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press. |

* Index

[Page numbers don’t correspond to this version]

<biblio>

‘Abd al-Hamid Kishk, Shaykh 265 access, direct 196–7, 199–200, 207 Afghanistan 75

Africa 160 agency 9, 161–2, 170, 173, 174, 186 agriculture 249

Alexander II 98

Algeria 192, 261–2

Anderson, B. 33, 92, 196, 199, 204, 212, 219, 267, 272

Anderson, P. 8, 10, 11, 51, 121–2 anti-Jewish activities 223, 247–8 anticipatory borrowings 27–8 arbitration 64 architectonic illusion 273, 274–80 Arendt, H. 36 Armenia 210

Armstrong, J. 5, 54, 55, 272

Aron, R. 120

Arya Samaj 211 assimilation 220 democratic cultural 224–5 elites’ refusal 205–9 matched-guise test 145–6, 150–2 pressure 203 reasons for 153 role of exit 12, 154–5 of Russians 146–8, 233–4 survey 144–5 versus nationalism 143 see also language

Austria 229, 244–6 authoritarianism 12

Balibar, E. 102

Basque country 57–8, 124, 232–3

Baudrillard, J. 129

Bauer, O. 102

Beirut 267

Beissinger, M. R. 169–90, 12, 16

Belarus 290

Belgium 44–5, 57, 58, 64

Bennis, M. 264

Bernstein, E. 34

bilingualism 45, 194–5

Bismarck, O. E. L. von 95

books 263–5

Bosnia 125, 191, 210, 214, 232

boundaries administrative 180

changes 220

ethnic 113

physical, human and cultural 174–9 political 224

Bourdieu, P. 287

bourgeoisie l 02

Brazil 229, 231

Brecht, B. 130

Breuilly, J. 171, 272

British empire 61

Brittany 57

Brown, P. 260

Brubaker, R. 3, 17, 226, 272–306 bureaucracy 11, 66, 136

Burke, E. 68

Calhoun, C. 198

call to difference 206, 211–12, 214

Cambodia 109–14, 115–18, 125–6

Canada 44–5, 57, 58, 170, 195–6, 229, 278

Cardoso, F. H. 231

caricature 138

Carpathian Euroregion 253–4, 255

Catalonia 57, 58, 124, 232–3, 235–6

causality 162, 163–4

Ceausescu, N. 284

change 24, 26–7, 32, 220

Chauvin, N. 119, 124

chauvinism 7, 119

China 53

choice model 149–50

Christianity 260

citizenship 70, 196–7

civil society 15–16, 250–4, 255, 258–9, 268

class

conflicts 100–1

identity 102

peasant 107–8, 114–17

working 102, 109, 293

Cobban, A. 74

communications 47, 100, 160, 181, 225,

263–7

communitarian values 70

Comte, A. 28

conflict

class 100–1

ethnic 247–8, 252–4, 255

ofinterests 100–1

irresolvable 279–80

persistent 179–80

resolution 183

within ethnic groups 35 see also violence

consociation 64

constructivist theory 292, 296 contingency versus necessity 169–90

control 64

Corsica 57

Croatia 210, 223

cultural equipment 176, 180–1

culture 27, 299–300

conquering 206

diverse 64, 245–6

high 7, 47, 59, 62, 137, 169–70, 192–4, homogeneous 176, 192–4, 220, 293–4

220–2

peasant 107–8

state influence 183–4

and structure 42–3

traditional 194, 205–6

Cyprus 57

Czech national philosophy 28

Czech nationalism 45, 91, 121

Czechoslovakia 35, 64, 223–4, 243, 278

Dahl, R. A. 222, 229

Dark Gods theory 41, 46

De Valera, E. 127

deliberation and decision 203–4 democracy 13

and homogeneity 222–4

improvement of 219

legitimate 203–4

multinational 225–7

and nationalism 219

representative 200–1

transitions 219

unequal 229–31

Deutsch, K. 186

devolution 57

dignity 206–9, 212, 214

Dreyfus Affair 120

Durkheim, E. 46, 11

economic functionalism 121 economic growth 47, 76, 245

economic returns 142, 150, 153

Edelman, M. 176 education and culture 27–8, 42–3, 47, 70

economies of scale 59

mass 160–1, 263–8

modernisation, need for 27–8, 192

national system 249

state 193

egalitarianism 66

Egypt 261, 262, 263, 264–6

Eickelman, D. F. 258–71, 17 electoral systems 227

Eliade, M. 198

elite manipulation 273–4, 289–92

elites 205–9, 212

see also intelligentsia

Elster, J. 162

Engels, F. 30

England 74, 128

English Peasant Revolt (1381) 115 entropy-resistant classifications 136 equality 197

individual 94, 249

labour market 254

of nations 71

Estonia 144–55, 184–5, 224, 283

Russians in 233–4, 236 ethnic boundaries 113

ethnic cleansing 248

ethnic conflict 35, 247–8, 252–4, 255 ethnic identity 94–6 ethnic nationalism 108, 117, 122–3, 286–7

ethnicity 250–4

ethnofederalism 182

European Union 64, 124

exit and voice 12, 154–5

Fanon, F. 208

Farouk, King 266

fascism 137

Fearon, J. 282

federalism 64, 227–32, 235–6 communist ruptures 227 democratic inequalities 229–31 ethno-federalism 182

Fichte, J. G. 68

filter explanation 52–3, 76, 162

Findlay, R. 35–6

Finer, H. 230

Finland 57

France 57, 60, 66, 74, 119–20, 123–4, 197, 202

Muslims 261, 263

Franz Josef (Francis Joseph) I 36, 246

free markets 70

Frieson, K. 117

functionalism 8, 192

and causality 163–4 criticised 51–3, 78, 160–2 defended 10, 137–9

economic 121

liberal 58

and teleology 9,76

Galicia, eastern 244–50, 254

Gandhi, M. 209, 210, 211

Gellner, E.

‘An Alternative Vision’ 32

Conditions ofLiberty 15, 16, 258, 220–2

Encounters with Nationalism 72, 151 life 1–3

Nationalism 6, 15, 71–6, 138

Nationalism Observed 41, 137

Nations and Nationalism 23, 128, 293, 219, 137, 138, 1–6, 16, 41, 46–51, 51–76

Plough, Sword and Book 23, 35

‘Reply toMy Critics’ 9–10, 11–12, 41, 72, 76–7, 158, 161

Thought and Change 4–5, 23–4, 26, 29, 32, 40, 41–5, 50, 51–76, 128, 135, 170, 186

geographical dispersion 180

Georgia 124–5, 173, 184, 210

Germany 61, 62, 74, 122, 170, 221, 229–30, 277

Giddens, A. 158

global economy 176, 181

Gorbachev, M. 182–3, 287

Gramsci, A. 33, 34

Great Chain of Being 198

Greece 73, 76,98, 223

Greek Catholic Church 247–8, 251

Greenfeld, L. 54, 55, 128, 212

Hall, J. A. 1–18, 41

Hann, C. 16,243–57,4

Hapsburgempire 61, 74, 98, 244–6, 247

Hegel, G. W. F. 205

Heidegger, M. 123

Herder, J. G. von 68, 71

hierarchy 196, 198, 207

Himmler, H. 122

Hindus 211

Hirschman, A. O. 12

historical materialism 65

Hitler, A. 36, 114, 122

Hobsbawm, E. 77

homogeneity 8–9, 193, 201, 293–4

culture 220

and democracy 222–4

and nationalism 63–4, 202

Hong Kong 53

honour 207

Hope, A. 246

Hroch, M. 6, 91–106, 137, 138 human action 9, 161–2, 170, 174, 186 human rights see rights

Hungary 61, 103, 282–3, 290

Huntington, S. 259

ideal type 163, 164

identity

categorical 198, 199, 207, 214

class 102

ethnic 94–6

from relationship with others 208

modern citizen 201

multiple 13, 228, 232–4

national 6, 34, 96, 284

political 232

regional 96

threatened 211

ideology 9, 34, 67–8

Ieng Sary 126

imagined communities 196

incentives 139, 144

India 202, 207, 211, 224, 267

individualism 197–8

Indonesia 75

industrialisation 6, 72–3, 188

and change 24, 26

diffusion 135–6

and modernisation 94, 121

and nationalism 8,26, 36, 47, 135–6, 158–60, 163

and philosophy 24

uneven 245

inequality 245–6

innovation or invention 78

institutionalisation

degree of 287–8

of groups 296

institutions 13, 280

intelligentsia 43, 59, 172, 179

see also elites interests, politics of 291–2

international context 181, 185–6 international relations 35, 118

Ireland 57–8, 60, 107–8, 126–7

Islam 211–13

‘brick’ 258–61, 268

fundamentalism 214, 262

and nationalisation 16–17, 53, 74–5

see also Muslim society

Israel 57

Italy 57, 62, 74, 221

Jackson, K. D. 114

Jaffe, R. 115

Japan 52, 223

Jarvie, I. C. 41

Jinnah 212

job mobility 150–1

see also social mobility

Jordan 261, 263

Kant, I. 42, 207

Kaszinski, T. 123

Kazakhstan 144–55

Kedourie, E. 40, 42, 46, 67–8, 137, 175, 186, 193,202

Kepel, G. 261

Khieu Ponnary 110

Khieu Samphan 112

Khomeini, Ayatollah 213

Kiernan, B. 109–13, 115–18, 122, 125, 126

Killing Fields 115–16

Klaus, V. 2

Kohn, H. 74, 94, 123, 126, 128

Kokoschka, O. 293–4

Kostava, M. 173

Kurds 75

Kuwait 262

Kymlicka, W. 235, 14

labour, division of 161, 169

Laitin, D. D. 8–10, 124, 125, 135–57, 234, 282

Lambert, W. 145

language 15, 100, 222

as culture 28

economic returns 142, 150, 153

multilingualism 45, 194–5 official 193, 194

shift 140–3

standardised 171, 192, 267

total number of 50, 59

utility function 141–3

see also assimilation

Laski, H. 31

Latvia 144–55, 178, 224

leadership 96–7, 209

see also elites; intelligentsia

Lenin, V. I. 29, 35

Lerner, D. 259

Lester, J. 33

liberalism 4, 13, 14, 41, 45, 58, 61–3, 66

Lieven, A. 184

Lijphart, A. 227, 235

Linz, J. 13, 220, 232

List, F. 30–1, 32, 4, 35, 68 literacy 42, 47, 160–1, 192, 225

Lithuania 185, 290

loyalty 69–70

Lustick, I. 175

Luther, M. 115

Luxemburg, R. 34

Mabruk, L. 265

McGarry, J. 64

McLuhan, M. 129

Malaysia 75

Malinowski, B. 3, 36

Manichian view 274, 298–301

Mann, M. 8, 10, 158, 159, 164

Mao Tse Dong 112

market economies 197

Martov 35

Marx, K. 30–1, 32, 35, 46, 67, 129

Marxism 4, 41, 58

and nationalism 24, 29–30

philosophy 25–7

political status of 26

Masaryk, T. G. 1, 28

Mayer, A. J. 129

Mellars, P. 243

Merton, R. K. 161

methodology

comparative 91

macro/micro level consistency 139

Michnik, A. 253

migrants 108, 136

military 10, 53, 65–6, 159

Mill, J. S. 68, 69, 222, 129

Miller, D. 222–3, 226

Milosevic, S. 125, 289

Minogue, K. 73, 164

minorities 204, 227, 277

modern economy 192

modern state 170, 175

need for homogeneity 193 requirements 196–204

modernisation

and industrialisation 27, 94, 121

interrupted 7

and nationalisation 46, 53

nature ofprocess 120, 129 uneven development 135–6

modernist theory 54–5

modernity 40, 77 wave-like 205–6

Modigliani, A. 293–5 monopolymediators 141 Montesquieu, C. de S. 207

Moore, B. 164

Morocco 259, 261, 262, 263–4

Mouzelis, N. 6, 9, 158–65, 8, 10

Muhammad, Prophet 268 multicultural politics 294–5 multilingualism 45, 194–5

Muslim politics 261–3

Muslim society

diversity 260

secular 260–1 see also Islam

Nairn, T. 7, 107–34

Namierism 91

Nasser, President 264, 266 national consciousness 55, 91 national identity 6,34, 96, 284 national revival 91–2 nationalisation

and modernism 46, 53

and peasant rurality 122–3 nationalism after industrialisation 56–7 behavioural spread l 72

benefits of 45

and change 27 civic-ethnic division 298–301 classical liberal 49

as contentious politics 174–9 cycles of 178

defensive 210, 277–8

defined 4–5, 6, 46–7

and democracy 78, 219

diaspora 49, 61

diffusion 43, 53,76

divisive 43

early andlate 56

east/west contrasts 281

erroneous theories 17–18, 46, 273, 281–5

ethnic 49, 61, 62, 108, 117, 122–3, 286–7

and everyday life 284

external national homelands 277 failed 180

goals and aspirations 138

history of 32–3

and homogeneity 202

and industrialisation 8, 26, 36, 47, 135–6, 158–60, 163

liberal 214–15 a losing strategy 289–90 and Marxism 24, 29–30 mature homogenous 61 meanings of 93–4 modern phenomenon 204 nation-based 276 nationalising 277 patriotism 201–2 pre-industrial 54–6, 194 satisfied 49 scientific 30–1 sources of 53, 204–5, 285–92 stages (time zones) 73–4, 170, 221, 223, 244, 245

state focus 195, 300–1

typology 61–3

Utopian 30

weak and strong 11, 50–1 western liberal 61, 62, 63 nationalist movements 91–2, 136, 184, 283 contest of current concepts 177–8 demands of97 leadership 96–7 mass support for 95, 98, 159, 209–12 and the modern state 170 successful 99–101 violence in 124–6 nationality principle 274–80 nations categories of 173

as claim and condition 1 71 claims disputed 278–9 created or evolved 72 definitions 91, 99, 215–16 as extended family 113–14 form of 101–2 homogenisation 63–4 as innovation or invention 55 size 11, 59, 91–2, 94, 180 stages of development 94 substantiation of 171–4 typology 48–50, 74, 78

naturality theory 41–2

Nazis 223, 247 need 137, 161–2 Nehru, J. 52, 202, 211 Netherlands 64 network theory 292, 296 Nietszche, F. W. 123 Niven, D. 114

North Korea 53

O’Brien, C. C. 71

O’Donnell, G. 219

O’Leary, B. 5,6, 8,9, 11, 17, 23, 40–88, 162

Ottoman empire 61, 74, 98

Pakistan 75

Palestine 57, 278

path dependency l 72, l 74

patriotism 201–2

Pearse, P. 52

peasant culture 107–8

peasant uprisings 114–15, 116–17

Petain, H. P. O. 120, 124

Petersen, R. 143

philosophy 33

ofhistory 53–4

and industrialization 24

Marxism 25–7

Piedmont 74

Piscatori, J. 260

Pius X, Pope 260

Plamenatz, J. 7, 62

Plekhanov, G. V. 35

Pokrovsky, M. N. 29

Pol Pot (Saloth Sar) 109–12, 114–18, 126

Poland 35–6, 60, 61, 223, 245, 254

agriculture 249

partitioned 247

Przemysl 247–8, 250–4, 255 transition 249–50

Polanyi, K. 245

Poles 296–7

political legitimacy 40, 42, 55 political myth 33

political oppression 11–12 political programme 102–3 political systems 227 political theory 13–14 politics 3, l 0, 171

contentious l 74–9

and everyday life 284

interest 291–2

multicultural 294–5

Muslim 261–3

nature of 262

ofthe possible 180, 184, 186–7

ofrecognition 13, 225

and substantiation of nations l 72–4

Ponchaud, Father F. 118

Popper, K. 123

Portugal 74, 223

postmodern theory 292, 296

pre-modern units 42–4

primordialism 5–6

Protestantism 163, 213, 296

Prussia 74

Puymege, G. de 119

Qaboos, Sultan 263

racism 71, 118

Ramet, S. 125

Rammohan Roy 211

rational action theory 292, 296 rational choice theory 8

realism of the group 17–18, 274, 292–8

reductionism

cultural and material 65

theory 72, 76

reification 137–9

religions 40, 47, 60, 211

chauvinism 71

fundamentalism 214, 262–3

see also Christianity; Islam; Protestantism

Renan, J. E. 173

return of the repressed 17–18, 273, 285–8 reunification 57

rights 181

individual and group 14, 234–6 minority 227

Riker, W. 231

Riley, C. 114

Roman Catholic Church 251

Romania 61, 282, 290

Hungarians in 284–5

Romanov empire 74

Rousseau, J. J. 52, 68

rurality, curse of 107–30

Ruritania 244, 246

Rushdie, S. 263

Russia 192, 289

tsarist 98, 221, 245

Russian diaspora 140–55

Rustow, D. 222

Rwanda 126

Sadat, A. el-, President ofEgypt 261, 262

Sadik al-Azm 261

Saint-Somon, Henri de 35, 28

Saudi Arabia 263

Sayyid Qutb 266

Schanberg, S. 115

Schelling, T. 140

Schmitter, P. C. 219

science 25

Scotland 127

secession 13, 58, 63–4 seething cauldron 17–18, 273, 281–5 selection mechanisms 60–1

self-determination 66, 199

antimonies of279

doctrine of69, 75, 79

international norms 181

local 102–3

principle of 5–6, 27 4–80

Selim III 98

Senghaas, D. 32

Serbs 98, 125

Seton-Watson, H. 55, 171

Shahrur, M. 262–3

Shakespeare, W. 6

Sha’rawi, Shaykh 265

Siberia 182

Sihanouk, Prince 117

simultaneity 199

Smith, Adam 31

Smith, Anthony 54, 55, 59, 72, 92, 272 social conflict theory 50 social contract theory 198 social current 33

social entropy 50, 136

social mobility 47, 100, 245, 248–9, 254–5 see also job mobility socialism 102, 248–9

South Africa 64

South Korea 223

South Tyrol 61

sovereignty 200

Soviet Union 53, 61, 74

diaspora 140–55

glasnost 182–3

Marxist success 34

nationhood encouraged 286–7

post communist 58, 185, 221, 275, 283

Spain 57, 58, 232–3, 235–6 see also Basque country; Catalonia

Spanish empire 61

stability 76

Stalin, J. 53, 114

state

challenged 175–6

cultural equipment 176, 180–1

democratic division 224

development of 158–9

domination of public discourse 1 77 influence on cultural norms 183–4 mistrust of 182–3, 186

modern 170, 175, 193, 196–204

permanent breakdown 181

power 12

quiescent phases 179–86

wealth creation role 176

state-nation 94

status

in-group 143, 151–2

out-group 143, 152–3

Stepan, A. 9, 13–14, 219–39

Stewart, M. 243

Sudetenland 61

Swaan, A.de 141

Switzerland 44–5, 65

Szporluk, R. 4–5, 7, 23–39

tabuisation 288

Taylor, C. 8, 13, 14, 16, 191–218, 225 theory, predictive power 44, 50, 59–61, 78

Thompson, E. P. 109

Tilly, C. 187, 272

time zones 73–4, 170, 221, 223, 244, 245 tipping games model 140–3, 149–50,

154–5, 184

Tocqueville, A. de 12, 95, 196

T6ibin, C. 107

Transylvania 291, 297–8

Troeltsch, E. 260

Trotsky, L. 26

Trudeau, P. 195

Tunisia 261

Tuol Sleng 114

Turkey 75

Ukraine 124–5, 144–55, 224, 245, 247–8, 252, 290, 297

uncertainty 182

United States 66, 182, 202, 296

American Revolution 198

federal system 229–30

universalist theories 68

urbanisation 108, 136

Uzbekistan 172

Vickery, M. 116, 118

Vico, G. B. 28

Viemamese War 115–16

violence 124–6, 183, 209–10 absence of282-3

Eastern Europe 281–2

vision and division principle 287

Wales 57, 58, 127

wealth creation 176

Weber, E. 224–5

Weber, M. 287, 33, 121, 163

Whitehead, L. 219

Wittgenstein, L. 245, 3

Wolf, E. 114–15

Woodburn, J. 243

Woolard, K. 145 working-class movement 102

origin of 109

studies 293

Wrong Address theory 46

Yugoslavia 58, 61, 74, 125, 275, 278–9, 287–8, 291

Zhirinovsky 192

</biblio>

#title Identity Conflicts

#subtitle Can Violence be Regulated?

#author J. Craig Jenkins & Esther Gottlieb

#authors Antoinette Errante, Aseel Sawalha, Dale F. Eickelman, Armando Salvatore, Diane M. Nelson, Donna Lee Van Cott, Dru C. Gladney, Esther E. Gottlieb, J. Craig Jenkins, Georgi M. Derluguian, Kidane Mengisteab, Leo T.S. Ching, Michael M. Gunter, Muhammad Sani Umar, Neil J. Smelser, Norma Kriger, Pori Park, Robert Hislope,

#date 2007

#source <[[https://www.routledge.com/Identity-Conflicts-Can-Violence-be-Regulated/Gottlieb/p/book/9780203789285][routledge.com/Identity-Conflicts-Can-Violence-be-Regulated/Gottlieb/p/book/9780203789285]]>

#publisher Routledge

#lang en

#pubdate 2024-08-02T02:41:14

#topics

#cover e-g-esther-gottlieb-identity-conflicts-1.jpg

#DELETED temporarily

 [Front Matter]

 [Title Page]

IDENTITY CONFLICTS

Can Violence be Regulated

J. Craig Jenkins Esther E. Gottlieb editors

 [Copyright]

First published 2007 by Transaction Publishers

Published 2017 by Routledge 2 Park Square, Milton Park, Abingdon, Oxon OX14 4RN 711 Third Avenue, New York, NY 10017, USA

Routledge is an imprint of the Taylor & Francis Group, an informa business Copyright © 2007 by Taylor & Francis.

All rights reserved. No part of this book may be reprinted or reproduced or utilised in any form or by any electronic, mechanical, or other means, now known or hereafter invented, including photocopying and recording, or in any information storage or retrieval system, without permission in writing from the publishers.

Notice: Product or corporate names may be trademarks or registered trademarks, and are used only for identification and explanation without intent to infringe.

Library of Congress Catalog Number: 2007024453

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data Identity conflicts: can violence be regulated? / J. Craig Jenkins and Esther E. Gottlieb [editors]. p. cm. Includes bibliographical references and index. ISBN 978-1-4128-0659-6 (alk. paper) 1. Ethnic conflict-Case studies. 2. Social conflict-Case studies. 3. Political violence-Case studies. I. Jenkins, J. Craig, 1948- II. Gottlieb, Esther E. HM1121.I337 2007 305.8--dc22 2007024453

ISBN 13: 978-1-4128-0659-6 (hbk)

 [Dedication]

To the Memory of Ruth C. Jenkins 8/31/1917-10/15/2006 and Bluma (Fuhrer) Gottlieb 11/2/1917-12/4/2006

 Acknowledgements

This volume was imagined and shaped following a 2003 conference at Ohio State University, Columbus, Ohio. The conference was made possible by a grant from the Mershon Center for International Security awarded to the Office of International Affairs, headed at the time by Jerry Ladman and Frank Spaulding. Organizers were the Area Studies programs at Ohio State: African Studies Center, East Asian Studies Center, Center for Latin American Studies, Middle East Studies Center, Center for Slavic and East European Studies, and the Clusters of Interdisciplinary Research on International Themes (CIRIT) program. This conference was planned by a committee that consisted of Joanna Kukielka-Blaser, Ahmad Sikainga, Frank Spaulding, Halina Stephan, and the editors. Thanks are due to the Area Studies directors and assistant directors, and to OSU faculty who served as discussants and contributed valuable insights to the authors of this volume. They are: Nina Berman (Germanic Languages and Literatures), Philip Brown (History), Kevin R. Cox (Geography), Richard K. Herrmann (Political Science), John Mueller (Political Science), Ivy Pike (Anthropology), Christopher Reed (History), Daniel Reff (Comparative Studies), Ileana Rodriguez (Spanish and Portuguese), Halina Stephan (Slavic and East European Languages and Literatures), Kazimierz Slomczynski (Sociology), Abril Trigo (Spanish and Portuguese), Fernando Unzueta (Spanish and Portuguese), Sabra Webber (Near Eastern Languages and Cultures), and Alexander Pantsov (History, Capital University).

“Deprivation, Violence, and Identities” was a truly international interdisciplinary effort, embracing not only many world areas and academic disciplines, as reflected in the authors’ and discussants’ research, but also in the staging of an original play, Photographs from S-21, by Catherine Filloux (published by Playscripts, 2003). A finalist for the 1999 Heideman Award at the Actors Theatre of Louisville, Filloux’s play is based on documentary evidence of the detainment, torture, and execution of Cambodians in a secret prison called S-21 under the Khmer Rouge regime. The production of the play at OSU Theater Department, directed by Professor Lesley Ferris, was followed by a panel discussion with John B. Quigley, Presidents’ Club Professor of Law, Moritz College of Law, author of The Genocide Convention: An International Law Analysis, Ara Wilson, author of The Intimate Economies of Bangkok, and Alan Woods, director of the Jerome Lawrence and Robert E. Lee Theatre Research Institute.

The final work on this volume was made possible by additional funds and in-kind support from the Office of International Affairs and the Mershon Center for Security Studies. For insight, encouragement and assistance of more various kinds than we can easily enumerate, we wish to thank Richard K. Herrmann, director of the Mershon Center for International Security, Bill Form, Lauren Pincus, Brian McHale, and, last but not least, we thank Lindsey Peterson and Caroline Smith, without whose help we are not sure we could have pulled this off.

We are grateful to all who contributed essays to the volume, and for the commitment of Transaction Publishers' chairman and editorial director, Irving Louis Horowitz. Many thanks also to Laurence Mintz, editor, for generous help in the late stages of completion.

J. Craig Jenkins and Esther E. Gottlieb

Columbus, Ohio,

December 2006

 Preface

This volume examines the origins and regulation of violent conflicts. Our focus is on the regulation of conflict, by which we mean the constraining, directing, and repression of violence through institutional rules and understandings. We use "regulation" as the organizing theme of this volume because it captures the idea that conflict is ubiquitous but can be managed by rules, symbols and common understandings. Others have used terms such as "resolving," "modulating," "moderating," "containing," "de-fusing," and "mediating," but they are less satisfying. We assume that social conflicts are ubiquitous and inherent in organized social life. Conflict, therefore, cannot be eliminated and simply replaced by strictly cooperative behavior. A more realistic perspective is that though conflicts are rarely and perhaps never "resolved," they can be regulated. The root of the word "regulation" is the application of rules, which is narrower than the way we are going to use this term here and certainly narrower than the repertoire of strategies used to deal with or mediate identity conflicts. By regulation, we include common understandings, symbols and shared meanings that, in conjunction with rules, serve to reduce the intensity and violence of conflict. This may also include force or the potential for force, such as positioning peacekeepers and the like. Regulation does not necessarily mean the end of violence but, for durable violence reduction, violence regulation does have to occur. The core question of this volume is how violence is regulated and the social and political consequences of such regulation.

The chapters collected in this volume provide a multidisciplinary multiregional analysis of identity conflicts and their regulation. Our chapters draw on two general approaches for analyzing identity conflicts. Some follow a political-economy approach that places primary emphasis on resources, organization, and interests. In this view, violent conflict is seen as a product of underlying antagonisms combined with the availability of resources, organization, and political opportunities. Violence occurs because subordinated groups develop new resources, organization, and experience new opportunities and threats, or, alternatively, dominant groups see the need to enforce their claims through violence, using repression that may meet resistance. The limitation of the political-economy approach is that it neglects the understandings, sentiments, identities and values of the actors. It also treats institutional rules as the result of underlying power processes. For this reason, other chapters in this volume develop a cultural approach that focuses on the meanings of actors, tracing how identities are socially constructed, grievances defined, blame attributed, and programs for the redress of grievances articulated. This includes discussions of “unthinkable” conflict, multiple or “two-faced” identities, and the use of cultural symbols to signal opposition as well as reconciliation and conflict transformation. This captures the intentions and meanings of actors, which are stripped away by a political-economy treatment.

These are complementary approaches. Understanding identity conflicts and their regulation requires capturing both the resources and the interests of contending parties as well as their codes of honor, symbolism, and collective identities. Our volume is multidisciplinary in bringing together these different approaches in a sustained dialogue. Moreover, its perspective is global, drawing on the experiences of all the major world regions.

Chapter 1 of our volume provides a framework for examining the connections between identity, conflict, and violence. We begin our introductory chapter on the regulation of conflict, asking what processes contribute to the regulation of violence. In chapter 2, Neil Smelser examines the debates surrounding the idea that globalization is behind contemporary identity conflicts. Advancing a qualified and balanced assessment of the concept, he argues that contemporary ethnic conflicts are due only in part to globalization. The chief factors are the ethnic suppression that followed post-colonial independence and the new ethnic competition set off by the collapse of the Soviet Union. Globalization did, however, create limits on repressive closed states, encouraging ethnic minority movements and putting pressure on states to recognize human rights. Smelser points out a useful distinction between the economic, cultural, and political aspects of globalization. Transnational human rights advocacy, cooperative security arrangements that require protection for minority rights, and international norms that encourage human rights have created new opportunities for ethnic mobilization. Where states have had the capacity to implement conflict settlements and engage in effective reconstruction, globalization has discouraged violence and promoted positive conflict transformation. Globalization has both contributed to conflict and, at the same time, contributed to its regulation.

The remainder of the volume is divided into six parts, which address strategies or processes that contribute to the regulation of identity conflicts. Part I involves the forging of new identities, especially the processes that provide alternating support for conflicting identities. The chapters in this section highlight diverse responses to identity crisis. In some colonial settings, the oppressed respond with “false consciousness” by enthusiastically adopting the colonized identity offered them. Leo Ching shows that discrepant views were “unthinkable” or at least not openly expressed in a way that got into historical records. Similarly to the cases of recruitment of Gurkhas from Nepal to serve in the British imperial army or the Navaho “code talker” American Indians during World War II, the indigenous Taiwanese in Ching’s case study identified totally with their colonizers. Others challenged the colonizer identity but, due to lack of resources, leadership, and opportunities, failed to articulate an alternative identity. In chapter 4, Diane Nelson shows how many Mayans in post-conflict Guatemala have forged new ethnic identities which incorporate a more fluid “two-faced” element that depends on the audience and the immediate setting. This reflects the complexity of human identities in fluid changing societies, where identities are multiple and unfixed. It also reflects the reality of post-conflict societies in which conflicting social expectations are common. Chapter 5 focuses on the development of public discourse in Muslim-majority countries. Some contend that there is an unbridgeable cultural gulf between Islam and Western culture and that the norms of public discourse and political tolerance that prevail in Western democracies do not exist in non-democratic Muslim societies. Dale Eickelman and Armando Salvatore argue, contrary to these positions, that semiformal and informal articulations of Muslim identities in Muslim majority countries are currently creating such a public discourse and therefore publicly accountable forms of Islam. If we think of what they call “public Islam” as a new identity shaped by new practices, new forms of publication and communication, and new ways of thinking about religious and political authority, we must remember that there is no singular public Islam. Rather there are a multiplicity of overlapping forms of practice and discourse that represent the varied historical and political trajectories of Muslim communities and their links and influences with societies elsewhere.

Part II details the suppression of identities and thereby conflicts. In chapter 6, Dru Gladney examines Muslim identity in China, showing that some Muslims have become fully assimilated while others maintain a distinctive identity and way of life. Aside from a few protests, there has been little independent expression of ethnic identity. The Chinese government has used public works and state-controlled minority bodies to regulate and suppress conflict. However, exiled Muslims abroad have used the Internet and political opportunities in their diaspora communities to organize and promote a new “cyber-separatism.” While this campaign has gained little visible support inside China, it illustrates the possibilities for transnational organizing and has spurred the Chinese government to redouble its efforts to regulate expressions of Muslim identity. Chapter 7 turns to the world’s largest stateless nationality—the Kurds—whose identity has been suppressed until recently. Michael Gunter traces this suppression from the post-colonial solution imposed by the British in the 1920s to the present. While contemporary U.S. military protection for Kurdish autonomy in northern Iraq and civil relaxations in Turkey have created new opportunities for an autonomous identity, Kurdish nationalism remains largely suppressed in Iran and Syria. Recent developments in Iraq suggest one possibility, regional autonomy inside a federal state. However, should Iraq fail as a coherent state, it would seem likely that a new autonomous Kurdish state will emerge, posing new challenges for regional stability in the Middle East. In chapter 8, Pori Park examines the conflict over married vs. celibate Buddhist monks in post-colonial South Korea. Identified with the Japanese colonial regime, the celibate monks were able to purge the married monks, consolidating their control over Buddhist institutions. This shows how seemingly innocuous distinctions can be made into symbols of identity. Ironically, the celibate monks became closely identified with the repressive military governments, which eventually undermined their legitimacy and public support.

Part III focuses on problematic identities in which identity conflict is only partially regulated and could explode. In his analysis of ethnic hatred in Macedonia in chapter 9, Robert Hislope shows that rural ethnic Albanians are attitudinally capable of considerable ethnic violence but, at least to date, have not acted on their hatreds. He provides a comprehensive overview of theories of ethnic mobilization and violence, highlighting how these inform the Macedonian case. What translates ethnic hatred into action? This points to the importance of political entrepreneurs and opportunities created by outside powerbrokers. Comparing Hislope's evidence to Georgi Derluguian's analysis of ethnic politics in Abkhazia, in chapter 10, underscores the importance of regional powerbrokers. In the case of Abkhazia, a strong cultural identity was maintained within Georgia throughout the Soviet period. In part, this was because the region served as a vacation spot for Soviet officials as well as because it served Russian interests. In the post-Soviet era, regional rivalries between Russia and Georgia have created alternating rounds of ethnic purges and violence. The Russians have supported an autonomous Abkhazia as part of their grand strategy to weaken Georgia. So long as this balance of regional power between Russia and Georgia persists, Abkhazia will retain an odd type of de facto sovereignty.

Chapter II by Aseel Sawalha addresses the problem of urban reconstruction given the large displaced population uprooted by Lebanon's civil war. In view of the recent 2006 war in Lebanon, there are thousands of newly displaced southern Lebanese, who will now again lack permanent housing, a "problem" that is related to the debates about heritage and the identity of the city of Beirut. The newly uprooted from their homes, now as in 1991, have to adapt themselves to other spaces in the city, homes abandoned by the more affluent Lebanese who were able to flee to safer regions. Sawalha shows that the displaced are viewed as lacking urban culture and, worse, of disturbing the social order of the urban by making it grubby, dirty, and backward. The goal of finally placing the displaced has implications related to the city's aesthetics and the goal of modernizing, both of which are inevitably bound up with the theme of social and economic power. Responses to the large-scale social problem involve issues of geographic region as well as time: All the proposed solutions for solving the problem of displacement imply the return of the rural population to their prewar villages. Even those who criticize how the government treats the displaced agree that they should be removed from the Beirut area. Defining Lebanon's popular heritage and preserving its traditions by the urban elite were part of the country's search for its postwar identity. On the surface, this process might be read to suggest that the actors involved are trying to depart from the Western modernities, but in fact their strategies are a way of creating an "alternative modernity" in an attempt to be part of the global world.

Part IV turns to processes of reconstructing identities through peace-building measures, such as military reintegration, the creation of new collective memories, and building new political institutions. After war settlements, a key problem is how to reintegrate former troops. Frequently middle-aged and lacking alternative job skills, many former soldiers turn to predatory behavior, becoming criminal enforcers, mercenaries or other violence specialists. In chapter 13, Antoinette Errante examines post-conflict educational policies in Mozambique, in the wake of a peace settlement often celebrated as one of the more successful. Mozambican authorities have suppressed any public discussion of the conflict, assuming that the best approach is acting as if the civil war never occurred. Errante argues, however, that this has prevented youth from coming to terms with the conflict and recognizing the guilt that many parties incurred for atrocities committed during the war. As with the case of the South African Truth Commissions (discussed in chapter 1), conflict transformation requires an open dialogue before atonement can occur. Errante's chapter documents how wartime cultures and identities affect post-conflict violence regulation. Political and economic decision making regarding the socialization of war-affected youth has been shown to compromise prospects for long-term peace and security. Post-conflict policies that require reconciling parties to acknowledge their part in wartime atrocities against women and children trouble both the triumphalist wartime histories that reconciling parties-cum-policymakers are reluctant to surrender and any new identity narratives of political legitimacy that might help them do so. Similar to Sawalha's claim about reconstructing Beirut, Errante also argues that it is not enough for post-civil war political recontruction programs to wish to return societies to prewar conditions because for most countries this means a state dominated by high levels of structural inequality that will ultimately breed violence and rage all over again.

In Chapter 13, Norma Kriger also discusses the war-affected generation and the attempts to reintegrate Zimbawbwean guerrillas into postwar civil society building. Kriger shows how guerrillas were redefined as legitimate soldiers, giving them pension rights and privileged access to bureaucratic posts. This did not, however, eliminate violence, for many of these former guerillas later became the “enforcers” who carried out political purges, land seizures, and massacres on behalf of the Mugabe government and themselves. Redeploying the guerrillas as the regime’s “brown shirts” undermined state-building and any chance of positive conflict transformation. Kriger demonstrates that all the laws affecting guerrillas shared an understanding of justice that entailed material recognition for their war sacrifices. The laws also shared common characteristics: they created retroactive rights, were political (in the sense of arbitrarily including some and excluding others), and depended on the invention of legal fictions. Studies of transitional justice consider only justice for the victims and perpetrators of human rights atrocities. Laws that seek to provide justice for guerrillas by recognizing their heroic war sacrifices and forging new identities for the ex-fighters are outside the purview of transitional justice studies. The laws dealing with guerrillas carry the hallmarks of transitional justice measures insofar as they are retroactive, political, selective, and create legal fictions.

Part V of the book focuses on political democracy and problems of state-building. As the United States is painfully learning in Iraq, political reconstruction requires creating coherent and effective police, courts, a legal profession, educational institutions, and urban services, such as water and electricity, that are reliably and impartially delivered. This is not simply a question of dollars but one of organization, professional training, impartiality, and effectiveness. In the absence of a coherent state, the new benefits promised by political settlements cannot be delivered. Encouraged by perceived slights, ethnic polarization and retributive violence will likely persist. Put another way, a coherent institutionalized state has to be constructed before democratization and other conflict regulation devices can be effectively put into place. In his discussion of ethnic and religious conflict in Nigeria in chapter 15, M. Sani Umar shows that the key political problem in Nigeria is not lack of democracy (which is still a significant problem) but the lack of a coherent state. Corruption, nepotism, ethnic favoritism and the like undermine coherent rule. In this context, attempts to resolve ethnic conflict through elections are counterproductive, inflaming ethnic passions and frustrating those who seek a more effective state. Similarly, Kidane Mengisteab, in chapter 14, shows that state-building is the key crisis confronting sub-Saharan Africa, a region ripe with ethnic conflict as well as weak and repressive governments. Mengisteab argues that it is timely that African countries set political conditionalities for membership in regional integration schemes as well as in the African Union. African countries should also encourage bottom-up integration by allowing freer across border trade. The global factors are more difficult to address since they are not within the control of African countries. However, reconstitution of the African state, developing regional integration, and strengthening the African Union would go a long way in regulating violence and reducing conflicts as well as raising Africa's bargaining power within the global arena.

A more optimistic picture comes from Donna Lee Van Cott in chapter 16 as she analyzes the intercultural communication in the Andean region of Latin America. The Amerindian movements have pressed for controversial gains in terms of local courts and other separate institutions and forced the removal of elected governments, but have also responded to elections by forging cross-ethnic alliances focused on broader issues, such as corruption and urban services. Despite large-scale demonstrations and governmental instability in Bolivia, the overall process has been relatively peaceful, creating a deepening of democracy based on an intercultural dialogue that incorporates previously excluded groups and their shared interests with the broader population.

This volume offers new ideas about the regulation of identity conflicts. Identity conflicts stem from processes that operate on multiple social scales. At the global level, modernization has created new ethnic competition but also encourages conflict regulation processes that promote conflict transformation. Intercultural dialogue, democratization, and legal protections for human rights are actively promoted by international norms, agreements, and international organizations. At the same time, identity conflicts are also local. Political entrepreneurs and violence specialists are critical to mobilizing ethnic violence. They construct ethnic images and stereotypes as tools to legitimize their rule. Identity conflicts can also be regulated, suppressed by coercion or through identification with the oppressor, as well as channeled into more positive outcomes. Reconstructing collective memories, building coherent state institutions, and political democratization can work as strategies to positively transform conflict. The choices are there for the taking.

 1. Identity Conflicts and Their Regulation: An Introduction

J. Craig Jenkins and Esther E. Gottlieb

<quote>

<right>

…every decrease in power is an open invitation to violence--if only because those who hold power and feel it slipping from their hands, be they the government or be they the governed, have always found it difficult to resist the temptation to substitute violence for it.—Hannah Arendt

</right>

<right>

(1969: 87)

</right>

</quote>

Every day the news is filled with reports of suicide bombings, ethnic cleansing, collective rapes, calls for ethnic reconciliation and atonement, and violent power struggles. The location changes but the basic story does not. Ethnic and religious groups use violence to intimidate and destroy other groups, seeking control over resources, a sense of security, and to restore lost honor. What drives these conflicts and can they be regulated? Most identity conflicts occur within a single state, but reflecting the globalization of the economy and increasing international migration and interdependence these conflicts increasingly operate across international borders. Is globalization contributing to this growing pandemonium?

This volume focuses on two questions. First, what are the sources of identity conflicts? By identity conflict, we mean any rivalry between two or more groups that define themselves in mutually exclusive terms that use a collective “we/they” definition. This leads us to address theories of ethnic identity and mobilization asking when and why these groups resort to violence. Are these conflicts due to ancient hatreds, the opportunistic actions of political entrepreneurs, ideologies that justify dehumanization of the other, or situations that facilitate ethnic mobilization? Below, we will argue for a synthesis of the last three explanations along with the idea that identity conflicts tend to be zero-sum, creating greater intensity and likelihood of violence, and the idea of violence cycles, that is, that violence creates strong identities that lead to retributive violence.

Second, we address the regulation of identity conflicts. By regulation, we mean the constraining, directing, and channeling of conflict through institutional rules, cultural understandings and collective definitions. Regulation is often treated as simply a question of rules, such as new constitutions or rule-enforcing institutions, such as courts and police. While rules and enforcement institutions are critical, it is also important to include the ideational side of conflict regulation. Collective symbols, integrative humanizing ideologies, and diffuse social networks may also regulate conflict by creating alternative sources of integration and overarching common belief. In the following chapters, we show that post-conflict reconstruction and peace-building require new collective symbols as well as new constitutions and governance institutions.

At the outset, we should state our argument that identity conflict is not inevitably negative. Identity conflict can be a source of positive social and political innovation. Promoting a broader inclusive definition of citizenship, minority rights advocates and democracy reformers can create pressures for social reform to create a more just and equitable society. Resulting conflicts can pave the way for a more open, inclusive society. But identity conflicts can also be destructive, destroying the bases of social trust that help promote markets and economic transactions and provide a sense of security. A striking example comes from the research on civil wars, which have been found to reduce economic wealth in countries by a quarter or more of the prewar standard, undermine social trust, and impose major social costs on the population in terms of higher mortality, widespread psychological trauma, and greater exposure to disease (Collier et al. 2003: 11–32). None of the groups, victors or losers, is exempted from war loss. More limited identity violence, such as suicide bombings and assassinations, likewise stoke ethnic hatreds, provoke retaliatory attacks, and create security fears that undermine the normal working of society.

The chapters in this book illustrate many such situations in which two or more groups perceive themselves as having incompatible objectives that involve questions of honor, cultural integrity, territorial control and/or core values. Sometimes called “cultural clashes” or “identity wars,” these conflicts typically center on the recognition and cultural integrity of ethnic groups. In this introduction, we provide a framework for understanding the origins of identity conflicts and their possible regulation. In addressing the first, we argue that a theory of identity conflict needs to integrate insights from multiple academic disciplines, work at different levels of analysis, and address the complex processes that contribute to identity conflict. With regard to conflict regulation, we draw heavily on discussions of post-conflict reconstruction and conflict transformation, especially the literature on political reconstruction and peace-building (Barton 1990; Galtung, Jacobsen and Brand-Jacobson 2002; Galtung 2004). We underscore the social and cultural side of these processes, arguing that, in addition to institution-building and the creation of rules to adjudicate between conflicting identities, such peace-building efforts need to create a sustained social dialogue that creates new collective symbols, ideologies, and interpersonal social networks. Democratization, targeted nationality policies, and self-governance schemes that protect ethnic minorities also need to be complemented by new collective symbols, inclusive humanizing ideologies, and inter-group trust. Durable political reconstruction and peace-building require social and cultural reconstruction. We begin first with the nature of identity conflict and its origins.

 Identity Conflict and Polarization

Social conflict can be both socially beneficial and harmful. Lewis Coser (1956) argued that conflict can be a source of social and political innovation, giving individuals and groups an opportunity to articulate new ideas, experiment with new practices, and challenge prevailing social myths and institutions. This is most evident in social movements that attempt to open up opportunities for disadvantaged groups by overturning discriminatory laws and practices and, in the process, make society more flexible and adaptive. Drawing on Georg Simmel's (1955) ideas about conflict, Coser (1956) had in mind moderate reform movements in modern diversified societies in which contests over identity could be channeled into "realistic conflicts" over divisible material benefits, such as better streets and minority access to jobs. Such "realistic conflicts" mean that contenders are more likely to find compromises and positive-sum or "win-win" solutions. Coser (1956) contrasted these to "non-realistic conflicts" in which the key contention was over indivisible symbolic goods, such as social honor, territorial control, and sacred values. Such zero-sum identity conflicts are more intense and likely to create violence. Only one country can claim territorial control over Jerusalem's Temple Mount. Coser traced such identity conflicts to traditional societies with a more simple division of labor, reliance on retributive justice, and fewer cross-group social ties.

This structural explanation of identity conflict needs to be supplemented by a discussion of conflict process. Identity conflict is not simply a product of social structure but also of conflict dynamics. A fundamental rule of social interaction is reciprocity, that is, that one should respond with similar or like action. Peaceful and positive actions should be reciprocated with similar actions. Likewise, threats and violence should receive a similar negative response. Violence also creates in-group solidarity as people come to see group identity as more central and group survival at risk. This is especially the case where claims to legitimize violence rely on dehumanizing definitions. Victims are defined a subhuman, as animals or vermin that deserve their fate. Such violence deserves retaliation, which of course sets off further retaliation, creating a cycle of violence that is broken only when one party is no longer capable of resistance. Conflict leads to identity polarization, that is, the reduction of social interactions and group identities so that eventually there are only two groups both of which are characterized by strong positive in-group interaction but negative between-group interaction. Violence means that everyone has to pick sides, supporting one or the other party. So the question becomes: What can be done to prevent or regulate violence cycles and identity polarization?

One answer is provided by the conflict resolution movement (Kriesberg 1997, 1998; Galtung, Jacobsen and Brand-Jacobsen 2002; Galtung 2004; Rothman 1997; Ross and Rothman 2000). The basic “conflict resolution” idea is that broad participatory negotiations and third-party mediation can mutually educate contenders, make them aware of the interests and identity claims of opponents, create a better understanding of the benefits of future positive interactions with opponents, and generate a greater willingness to redefine identities so that the situation becomes a positive sum or “win-win” one. According to this approach, the basic tactics of mediation and negotiation are applicable to individual, group, societal and international conflicts and, with skillful third-party mediation and the creation of a sustained dialogue, identity conflicts, can be transformed, that is, redefined in positive “win-win” terms. Conflict transformation means that all parties come to recognize the limits of their claims and the benefits they receive from maintaining positive relations with other contenders, and to realize the merits of new social practices that protect the basic needs of all parties (Barton 1990; Kriesberg, Northrup and Thorson 1989; Rupesinghe 1995; Lederach 1995). To use Coser’s (1956) language, a conflict can be transformed from a “non-realistic” into a positive-sum “realistic” conflict. A core feature of such conflict transformation is redefining social identities so that identities are no longer seen in mutually exclusive terms but as inclusionary. “They” in effect become part and parcel of the “we.” This, of course, requires identity change and the creation or at least partially overlap with new integrative symbols and understandings that sustain these new identities.

This conflict transformation idea requires going beyond the standard rule-based formulas for conflict regulation. Over the past few decades, a standard package of post-conflict reconstruction or “conflict resolution” methods have been developed that focus on creating new rules for regulating inter-group relations (Gurr 1993, 2000; Lederach 1995; Collier et al. 2003). A key is democratization with new constitutions and law enforcement institutions that provide legal and institutional protections for minority and other group civil liberties and political rights. To accommodate ethnic diversity, peace-builders often recommend the creation of self-governance institutions, such as specialized regional or group-based courts to deal with family law and separate educational institutions to protect cultural heritages (Horowitz 1991; Van Cott, chap. 16 below). Compulsory multilingualism in the courts, legislatures, and schools also contributes to protecting diverse cultural heritages. If there are a small number of large ethnic groups, it may be preferable to use proportional representation to insure that all groups have access to centers of power. In contrast, where there are a large number of small groups, majoritarian “winner-take-all” elections may work better by forcing groups to band together to form broad coalitional majorities. Where there is a history of ethnic exclusion and persecution, peace-builders frequently recommend protective quotas to insure that disadvantaged groups are included. These need not protect numerical minorities. In Malaysia, for example, quotas are used to protect the majority Malay population, which historically was excluded from higher education and government positions. In India, quotas are used to protect minority listed castes, insuring them positions in higher education and government posts.

The idea of conflict transformation also highlights the importance of intergroup trust. Studies of civil war settlements show that the primary obstacle to peace is the lack of trust between contenders (Walter 1997, 2002). Unless there is a neutral third party or other enforcement mechanism that can insure that the terms of the peace settlement are honored, why should rebels or governments lay down their arms? Further, the greater the number of claimants and the closer the military balance of power between the major contenders, the less likely a peace settlement (Zartman 1995). The most favorable setting is a civil war in which territorial control is not at issue and either the government or the rebels has a clear military advantage. A third-party intermediary, such as the Catholic Church or a foreign government that is certain to remain engaged, can provide guarantees for a durable settlement.

Conflict transformation also entails creating new symbols so as to re-fashion self and social identities to bring contenders together (Gottlieb 2001). This can be seen from failures to transform conflict in Lebanon. Sawalha shows in her chapter below that a major barrier to a durable peace is the lack of new cultural models for national identity. Despite formal democratization and many of the above-mentioned peace procedures, the government planners who oversee the urban reconstruction of post-civil war Beirut define the urban slums inhabited by thousands of Shiite refugees as lacking in “civilized qualities.” Their solution was to remove the settlers, attempting to recreate a pre-war Beirut. Would the recent 2006 war with Israel be followed by a more inclusionary social/national Lebanese identity that includes all the major groups? Democratization and minority guarantees can help by facilitating sustained dialogue. But often there is no guarantee that this dialogue will go beyond elites, to fashion new self and social/national identities. In the Oslo accord negotiations between Israel and the PLO during the early 1990s, the dialogue remained limited to a small number of elites who did little to engage the broader population in an on-going discussion about what would be needed to create a lasting settlement and social/national embracement of peace. On both sides, unrealistic perceptions about exclusionary demands persisted. Hamas and other Palestinian factions continued to claim that their primary objective is to abolish Israel and recreate a unified Palestine. Israeli groups continued to talk about the need for more security settlements, creating a “greater” Israel. So long as such exclusionary identities persist, there is little likelihood of a durable solution. Had there been a broader participatory dialogue that engaged the majority of the population, the odds are greater that the major contenders would have redefined their identities in inclusionary terms (Galtung et al. 2002). Similarly, the Dayton accords over the breakup of Yugoslavia failed to include the broader population, leaving elites able to re-ignite the war when it became advantageous. So long as the dialogue remained limited to elites, elites could go back on their promises and restart the war, hoping to gain new territories and “cleanse” those from undesirable groups.

Various measures of reconciliation and atonement have been tried in post-conflict settings. Which is better, court-like legal proceedings that bring war criminals to justice or open-ended “truth forums” where victims can articulate their grievances and guilty parties acknowledge their guilt without threats of punishment? James Gibson’s (2004) work on the Truth Commission in South Africa suggests that open-ended forums are far more effective, promoting broader public education and identity exchange, breaking down stereotypes and making clear that all parties were victims. The problem with legal tribunals and similar justice efforts is that they are primarily concerned with retribution and hence tend to reinforce polarized identities. While the circumstances that surround the Truth Commission in South Africa are unique and highly unlikely to be replicated (all groups shared a strong commitment to the rule of law; all groups shared some guilt in terms of human right abuses; Bishop Tutu enjoyed considerable legitimacy as a neutral party), this experience suggests the merits of an open-ended “truth forum.”

In discussing conflict transformation, it is important to distinguish between positive and negative conflict regulation. The former entails positive changes in mutual awareness and identities such as those discussed above. Groups change their identities so that mutual sustained interaction is possible. Negative regulation, by contrast, means that interests are suppressed, typically by the stronger party using superior force and manipulating the situation to suppress, intimidate, and reeducate the opposition. Both methods may resolve conflict in the sense that violence declines. But negative conflict regulation suppresses conflict, which is likely to reemerge later in a more explosive form. This may not, then, prove to be a durable solution. Suppression may also mean that disadvantaged groups come to identify with their oppressors. In his discussion of “third dimensional” power, Steven Lukes (2005) argues that the most stable authority is legitimized power, that is, where subordinates cannot articulate their own distinctive interests and identity, coming to accept the commands of the powerful as legitimate even when they contradict their own interests. In these circumstances, subordinates may resort to passive resistance by footdragging and cultural displays like jokes and songs that invert the social hierarchy (Scott 1985). Some subordinates may also overconform, attempting to curry favor with superiors by internalizing the culture and claims of their superiors. An extreme example is Bruno Bettelheim’s (1992) analysis of how some victims of the Nazi Holocaust prison camps came to identify with their oppressors. In his discussion of Taiwanese colonial identity in this volume, Leo Ching argues that many of the indigenous Taiwanese overconformed with the colonial Japanese, adopting an “imperial identity” and making support for the Musha rebellion “unthinkable.” The durability of this solution to identity conflict depends on whether dominant groups are able to sustain the legitimacy of their control.

 The Origins of Identity Conflicts

What creates polarized identity conflict? A classic answer is Georg Simmel's (1955) modernization thesis. Analyzing the changes in social structure in nineteenth-century Western Europe, Simmel argued that the shift from a traditional to a modern division of labor creates a broad change from segmentary to highly differentiated social relations. In traditional societies, a simple division of labor means that groups are relatively autonomous (i.e., separate segments) and interact with only a limited set of other similar groups. This creates strong investments in particularistic identities and a strong likelihood that conflicts will be overlapping, concurrent, and persistent across time (also called "interlocked conflicts"). Such interlocked conflicts create identity polarization. Modern differentiated societies, in contrast, tend to have dispersed, non-concurrent, and fluid social relationships. Actors have multiple identities and are less vested in particular social relations. There are also cross-cutting cleavages, meaning that groups that are disadvantaged in one social domain are likely to find themselves advantaged in some other domain. Conflicts therefore tend to cross-cut one another or balance out with compensating gains and losses. Investment in particular identities is limited. This type of society encourages more moderate, "realistic," and nonviolent conflicts.

Does this mean that traditional segmentary societies are racked by violence? To the contrary, power in such societies is generally highly concentrated, meaning that subordinate groups have little opportunity to even think of opposing the existing order, much less the resources and collective identity needed to organize concerted opposition. So there is significant suppressed conflict in traditional societies. But when conflict does occur, the polarized identities at play often lead to violence. Violent conflict is more likely to emerge in social settings where social segmentation has begun to break down and elite controls are weakened, whether this is due to modernization, war, migration, economic crises or natural disasters. For Simmel, the most vulnerable societies are transitional societies that are moving from a traditional to a modern division of labor. Interlocked conflict and polarization still exists but, due to some modernization, subordinate groups have the opportunity and resources to act. In the long-run, socioeconomic and political modernization transform the nature of conflict, initially creating a greater likelihood of violence and polarization but then, at more advantaged stages, the likelihood of polarization and violence decline. This argument holds a net of other factors that contribute to identity polarization, such as the balance of power between rival ethnic groups, the degree of inequality among these groups, and a history of conquest and colonization.

This volume updates and significantly revises Simmel's classic argument. First we examine the impact of globalization. The globalization thesis argues that economic, political, technological and cultural exchange and interdependence are transforming the world, creating new identity conflicts and the likelihood of violence (Held 2005). Some advance a global domination thesis, arguing that economic hegemony by the "core" world powers reduces the economic and political security of the global "periphery" (Wallerstein 2000; Galtung 2004). Others extend Simmel, arguing that globalization is fueling transitional modernization and creating new cultural contacts, thereby stirring new discontents and violence. One variant is Huntington's (1996) "clash of civilizations" thesis that contends that, in the post-Cold War world, civilizational divisions between large religious blocs are supplanting the traditional capitalist-communist division. Identity conflicts are centered in countries along the buffer zone between these large religious blocs, such as Christianity and Islam. Another view is that economic globalization is creating new cultural contacts, information exchange, and cross-border social transactions that generate new conflicts and identities. International pressures on previously exclusionary states to recognize human rights and protect minorities create new opportunities for minority groups to mobilize (Held 2005).

In the following chapter, Neil Smelser critically assesses these arguments, arguing that, in addition to the transitional strains of modernization, political globalization is creating a world in which the norms of citizenship and human rights are becoming more widely accepted. With the growth of transnational advocacy organizations and international governmental organizations promoting these rights, exclusionary states are under pressure to recognize ethnic heterogeneity. Previously suppressed groups are able to mobilize and press their claims for recognition, autonomy and even independent statehood. At the same time, cross-border ties, such as financial linkages between diaspora communities, facilitate mobilization. While these movements might not resort initially to violence, authoritarian rulers typically resist demands for change, confronting reformers with "no way out" (Goodwin 2001) and the option of either a continued ineffectual voice, acceptance, flight abroad or violent rebellion. Some are almost certain to choose rebellion, which explains that strong association often noted between authoritarian regimes and violent rebellion (Timberlake and Williams 1984; Mueller 1985; Jenkins and Schock 1992; Rasler 1996; Hasef 2004).

Identity conflict may also stem from cultural globalization, which often boils down to “Americanization.” As U.S. and Western transnational corporations, media companies and communications anchored in the United States and Western Europe spread throughout the globe, previously isolated groups are exposed to Western (or “American”) standards of conduct and consumer standards, creating cultural clashes and a strong sense of relative deprivation. Combined with its status as the sole global superpower and the widespread perception abroad that the United States follows a “go-it-alone” diplomatic stance, anti-American attitudes have spread throughout the developing world (Kohut and Stokes 2006), making the United States a target for political attacks.

Yet the globalization explanation alone is too simple. In his discussion, Smelser points out that local oppression is also a key factor behind most identity conflicts. Post-colonial states in Africa, the Middle East, and Asia have attempted to impose a false national unity, ignoring internal cultural differences and repressing groups that refuse to assimilate. The Kurds in Iraq, Iran, Syria, and Turkey have in different degrees mounted political rebellion against states that refuse to accommodate their cultural difference. In other cases, this quest for imposed unity has led to a type of internal colonialism that has produced ethnic polarization and violent conflict (Gurr 1993; Gurr et al. 2001).

A second factor is the breakup of the Soviet Union, which created over a dozen new multi-ethnic states, several with a long history of ethnic exclusion and repression. Lacking an alternative political formula, Serbian leaders in former Yugoslavia turned to ethnic hate, using criminals, irregular troops and corrupt police to organize violence against Croats, Muslims, and other groups (Mueller 2004). In his chapter here, Georgi Derluguian traces the complex history of Abkhazia, showing how the breakup of the Soviet Union and the rivalries between the Russians and the Georgians led to rounds of ethnic plundering and the eventual emergence of Abkhazia as a de facto state. The breakup of the Soviet Union also meant that many former Soviet client states throughout the developing world (e.g., Zaire, Ethiopia) were militarily weakened and vulnerable to challenge. Some turned to ethnic hate, launching purges and repressing opponents to consolidate their rule. The end of the Cold War also meant that the major world powers had less of a direct stake in maintaining the existing order, which indirectly encouraged groups to mobilize resistance (Rasmussen 1997).

A third factor is international migration and the creation of global diasporas that are mobilized to fund insurgency. Migrants typically carry their identity and grievances with them to their new homeland. Often, they are the most ardent supporters of ethnic liberation and their new homeland (typically Western Europe, Canada, and the United States) provides greater opportunities and resources for organizing. Diasporas provide an ideal organizing ground for transnational ethnic liberation movements, allowing them to work from abroad outside the immediate conflict zone to stoke ethnic resentments and fund efforts to create a liberated homeland (Basch, Schiller, and Blanc 1994: 27). In the diaspora, extreme attitudes are untempered by realities in the homeland where interdependence and immediate needs create more moderate attitudes. Palestinian refugees who fled to Lebanon and Syria are typically more radical than Palestinians in Gaza or the West Bank, providing funds for suicide bombers and violent attacks on Israel and Palestinian moderates (Bloom 2005). In the 1990s, Tamils living in Western Europe, Canada, and the United States donated over $450,000 per year to buy arms and munitions that were used to equip the Tamil Tiger bombings and military attacks in Sri Lanka. During the same period, the Kurdish Worker Party managed to control wholesale trade among Kurdish retailers scattered throughout Western Europe, imposing a “tax” that was used to finance the Kurdish insurgency in Turkey (Collier et al. 2003: 146).

In his discussion of Islamic mobilization in China in this volume, Dru Gladney finds little evidence of support for Muslim ethnoseparatism among the 18 million plus Muslim minorities who reside within China. While there have been some civil rights protests, these have been moderate in their goals and methods. But Internet technology and the freedom and sources of émigrés who are operating from new temporary homelands abroad have created a new type of “cyber-separatism,” which is viewed as a serious threat by the Chinese government. He also points out that, while there is no evidence of affiliations between these groups and other Islamist radicals in Asia and the Middle East, the Chinese government has exploited the global “war on terror” as an opportunity to suppress politically active Muslims both inside China and abroad. While it seems highly unlikely that a separatist movement will develop inside China, an ethnic rights movement is developing in the regional diasporas to demand protection for Muslim minority rights.

Some idea of the global potential for ethnic conflict is given by the recognition that worldwide there are over 2,000 ethnicities with potential claims to sacred space and memories of sacred times housed within a little over 200 internationally recognized sovereign states, only twenty of which are genuine nation-states (i.e., states with only a single ethnicity). In the abstract, this suggests that there is a world potential for some 1,980 independence wars. Of course, few of these ethnicities will develop an organized claim for national identity, much less an organized claim for independent statehood, but the point is clear. There is considerable structural potential for ethnic conflict. Almost two-thirds of the internal armed conflicts between 1990 and 2003 centered on ethnic claims for territorial autonomy or independent statehood (Project Ploughshares 2003; Eck, Sollenberg and Wallensteen 2005; Gurr, Marshall and Khosla 2000). These ethnic wars tend to be protracted and highly lethal, reflecting the zero-sum nature of the issues under contention (Licklider 1993). While the number of such conflicts appears to have peaked in the mid-1990s and since declined (Eck, Sollenberg and Wallensteen 2005), the structural potential remains considerable.

Why do some ethnicities mobilize while others do not? Here discussions of globalization need to be supplemented by discussions of group and country-specific processes. Analysts of ethnic conflict have advanced four major explanations: primordialism, constructivism, ethnic competition, and social network ideas.

Primordialists point to the existence of strong identities in violent attacks, arguing that early childhood socialization creates strong loyalties and beliefs that later give rise to ethnocentric attitudes. The problem, however, is the translation of ethnocentric beliefs into violence. Ethnocentric beliefs are probably near universal and most bigots never engage in ethnic attacks, much less violence. Others engage in ethnic attacks for purely opportunistic reasons.

Constructivists provide a different focus, pointing to the interests of elites who gain by scapegoating minorities or “the other” as a device to legitimize their rule. By blaming others for problems, they divert attention from their own shortcomings and present themselves as loyal protectors of group heritage. By propagating ethnic ideologies that dehumanize or devalue other groups, these ethnic entrepreneurs incite hatred and mobilize attacks. The major limitation is that ethnic constructions require an available audience that can be readily persuaded to engage in ethnic violence. While ethnocentric attitudes and hatred are probably widespread, there are normally strong inhibitions on violence against anonymous others that have to be overcome. Nor do all situations favor the efforts of ethnic entrepreneurs.

Ethnic competition theory provides a third explanation. It argues that breakdowns in long-standing ethnic segmentation that bring previously separated groups into contact and social changes that increase the opportunities and resources of ethnic minorities are critical. Urbanization and immigration bring ethnic groups in contact, vying for the same jobs. A young generation of more educated minorities is able to compete for the same positions, threatening the dominant workers. Democratization creates new opportunities for suppressed minorities to organize and press their rights. Ethnic competition then spills over into ethnic violence (Blalock 1967; Olzak 1992). Competition is also a product of population ratios with the most volatile situation being a small number of large groups of roughly comparable size and resources that have a realistic claim to power (Jenkins and Kposowa 1990; Reynal-Querol 2002; Collier and Hoeffler 2004). The limitation of competition theory is that it does not capture the latent ethnocentrism built into socialization and fails to address the efforts of ethnic entrepreneurs.

Network theorists add the idea that cross-cutting social ties create social trust and reduce the likelihood of cross-group violence (Varshney 2002). Taking a page from Simmel’s classic cross-cutting cleavages idea, strong professional societies, unions, and other civic associations that span ethnic communities may serve to blunt ethnic hostilities. Varshney (2002) makes a plausible case that cross-ethnic ties between Hindus and Moslems in India traditionally regulated ethnic tensions but, with the decline of cross-group civic organizations, a new cauldron of polarization has developed.

None of these explanations is alone sufficient. Primordialism cannot account for the highly variable content of ethnic identity. There may be an innate human tendency towards ethnocentrism but this does not necessarily lead to ethnic hate. Bigots often fail to act on their hatred. Constructivism is relevant here by providing a situational account of the mobilization of ethnic hatred and action. The actual agents in ethnic violence are typically only a small portion of the population, either leaders with a stake in legitimizing their rule or social predators who can profit psychologically and materially from ethnic attacks. For entrepreneurial efforts to work, however, there must be a receptive context of widespread ethnic stereotypes and negative beliefs. Primordialism may help explain that. Competition and network theories both refine Simmel's ideas about identity conflict, arguing that transitional modernization creates greater likelihood of violence and that cross-cutting ties, which are likely anchored in modern social structures and associations, limit ethnic polarization. Competition and network theories typically take identities as given and focus on how initial contacts lead to competition or how the lack of cross-cutting group networks make for a polarized setting. Ultimately these theories need to be combined to provide a satisfactory explanation of ethnic conflict.

Robert Hislope's analysis of ethnic hatred and the lack of ethnic violence in Macedonia illustrates these points. Hislope documents a strong pattern of ethnic hatred and polarization between ethnic Macedonians and ethnic Albanians in Macedonia, especially among young rural Albanian men. However, this polarization has not led to violence. On primordial grounds, there is an ethnic "powder keg" that has yet to explode. The constructivists correctly point to ethnic entrepreneurs. Until a concerted "hate" campaign emerges along with dehumanizing ideologies that justify violence, this hatred is unlikely to lead to large-scale violence. At the same time, there are few cross-ethnic civic ties, which makes this a ripe context for ethnic strife. A key question is the level of ethnic competition. So long as these two groups remain largely segregated into different villages and regions, ethnic competition is limited. A critical “spark” will be increased competition between Macedonians and Albanians for the same jobs, territory, political power and social recognition. All four elements are needed to explain the lack of ethnic violence.

Social movement theory provides additional insights. Drawing on resource mobilization and political process ideas (Tilly 1978; Jenkins 1983; McCarthy and Zald 1987; Tarrow 1998), it argues that indigenous leadership, group cohesion, and opportunities for mobilization contribute to the likelihood of ethnic mobilization. For already mobilized groups, political threats create perceived security risks, thereby strengthening group loyalties and motivating collective action against antagonists. Ethnic entrepreneurs may forge an ideology of ethnic hatred by framing grievances in terms of the actions of ethnic rivals and constructing new symbols of collective identity (Snow and Benford 1992; Snow 2000; Melucci 1989, 1996; Taylor and Whittier 1992). Drawing on existing cultural commitments and identities, movement leaders define new justice norms, redefine stigmatized traits in positive terms, assert the justice of an alternative order, and redefine dominant groups as culpable and subject to change.

Research suggests that all of these factors are relevant to ethnic violence. In his comparative research, Gurr (1993) and collaborators (2001) found that ethnic discrimination combined with cultural cohesion and group organization are critical to the mobilization of minority groups. The form of that mobilization, however, depends on political opportunities and threats. Democratization encourages ethnic reform movements while repressive exclusionary policies typically provoke violent insurgencies that seek to overthrow or dismember the state. Ethnic violence is a product of minority group cohesion and grievances interacting with political opportunities and threats. At the group level, ethnic political entrepreneurs develop new collective identities and frame issues so that potential supporters mobilize behind the campaign.

In sum, globalization provides a useful complement to modernization, standard theories of ethnic conflict and social movement theory. Increased international trade, migration, communications and global support for human rights have increased ethnic competition and created new resources and opportunities for mobilization. At the same time, attention needs to be paid to local grievances, the efforts of ethnic entrepreneurs, and cross-ethnic social ties. A comprehensive explanation of identity conflict needs to integrate insights from a variety of different perspectives, work at multiple levels of analysis, and address the multiple processes that contribute to ethnic mobilization and conflict.

 Regulating Identity Conflict

What are the most effective measures for regulating identity conflict? Students of international conflict regulation make an important distinction between conflict management, i.e. the elimination of violence and the means of violence, and conflict transformation, that is, replacing polarization with positive relations. Constructing a durable peace means transforming conflict so that rival ideologies and beliefs are eliminated. Conflict management may be a useful measure in preparing the way for conflict transformation but needs to be kept distinct. Transformation does not necessarily mean that all conflict is eliminated but rather that identities and relations are changed so that they are surrounded by and embedded in a broader set of positive-sum social relations.

This discussion further distinguishes between peace-making, that is, diplomatic efforts to handle conflict (such as under the auspices of the UN Charter VI), and peace-keeping, i.e. the use of military force to monitor and maintain existing peace agreements. The favored conflict regulation measure is to forge peace agreements that bring previously warring sides together into some type of general peace agreement. Typically, this will not occur until all sides come to see perpetuating the conflict as more costly than accepting an agreement. As Zartman (1989) argues, conflicts have to become “mutually hurting” before contenders are likely to accept an agreement. Peace-keeping typically includes peace-enforcement, that is, the use of military force to bring conflicting parties under control, and peace-building, that is, the introduction of structural reforms and institutional changes to prevent a relapse into conflict. The key peace-building measure is the depolarization of identities and social relations by creating mutual understanding and positive social ties. Each of these international measures has a parallel in domestic conflict regulation where warring groups come to accept the existence and legitimacy of the police and institutional reforms that regulate relations between rival groups (Rothman 1997; Ross and Rothman 2000).

A major critique of standard conflict regulation is that it fails to address peace-building, leaving intact the “root cause” conditions that generated conflict in the first place as well as any deep-seated hostilities created by the violence. Moving beyond the traditional “top-down” approach of elite bargaining and traditional diplomacy, some argue for the use of social mediation processes that include grassroots peace and human rights movements, the use of reconciliation measures, and broader participation in peace-building (Kriesberg 1998; Galtung et al. 2002; Galtung 2004). Johan Galtung (2002) refers to these broader holistic peace-building processes as: Conscientization, Organization, Mobilization and Empowerment (COME). Rothman (1997) argues for the use of community boards, popular surveys, open hearings on grievances, and other devices to generate public participation and engagement in community dispute regulation. For durable peace-building to occur, broader participation in these conflict transformation processes is necessary.

What are the primary methods of post-conflict regulation? Laue (1991) argues that successful conflict settlements rest on five principles. First, a joint agreement must be worked out that addresses the basic needs and interests of all parties and that does not sacrifice the key values of any party. Second, the agreement must contain stipulations and measures that prevent any backsliding or repudiation of the agreement. This may entail agreed-upon sanctions, third-party guarantees or other measures to prevent backsliding. The certainty that such sanctions will be applied is important to the willingness to enter into the agreement much less its durability. Third, agreements work best that are self-implemented and self-monitored. While third parties may play a positive role in monitoring and implementing agreements, it is important that the major interested parties are directly involved in these processes. Peace-building, in this sense, often requires the empowerment of previously disorganized and stigmatized groups. Providing social recognition and a positive identity is a critical part of the peace-building process. Fourth, such agreements are more durable if they are based on universal norms of fairness and justice, not on simple compromises. Groups that suspend conflict due to compromise alone are often willing to regroup and refight the war again. Fifth, durable agreements must be advantageous to all parties, otherwise adherence will be problematic and groups will consider exiting the agreement or exploiting it to their advantage. “Advantage” here may mean simply exit from a “mutually hurting” conflict that has brought each side to the bargaining table or it may entail the creation of new advantages. Students of community dispute regulation often point to the need to maintain a “single text” process that brings together the various objectives, concerns, and restraints of all the parties into a single integrated process (Rothman 1997). This is obviously more complex the larger the number of actors, but by providing multiple public forums for dialogue and negotiation, peace-building processes can alter the broader context and create the conditions for a durable peace.

The question then is converting a settlement into a durable peace. A favored tactic in international peace-building is democratization, especially holding fair and free elections immediately following peace agreements. Since 1990, the UN and other international monitors have been involved in staging dozens of post-conflict elections throughout Asia, Africa, and Latin America, billing these as peace-building measures. Many of these have, however, reverted to violence. Merely holding elections guarantees little about whether the peace will hold, much less whether elected governments will rule democratically, reconcile diverse and often antagonistic claims, or transform conflicts.

One question involves the rules of political representation and how these relate to ethnic composition. If there is a small number of large groups, majoritarian or “winner-take-all” rule is likely to polarize conflict. Proportional representation guarantees all groups at least some representation and typically forces groups to forge coalitions after the election, which may foster extreme views. Majoritarian rules are probably the best method for regulating post-conflict settings with large numbers of small groups, forcing them to form coalitions prior to elections.

A second question is state-building. Stable democratization often requires building new legal and enforcement institutions, such as effective police and courts (Linz and Stepan 1996; Sorensen 1998). Another factor is the capacity to deliver social services, such as education and health care that counter a sense of isolation and reduce longstanding inequalities (Grindle 1996). Studies of post-conflict societies find that increased social spending fosters peace while military spending encourages a reversion to war (Collier and Hoffert 2002a). In their chapters, Kidane Mengisteab and Sani Umar argue that basic state-building must occur prior to elections if elections are to contribute to conflict transformation. In the absence of a coherent institutionalized state, governments lack the ability to implement effective policies. In the context of ineffective government, elections will only exacerbate ethnic rivalries and violence. New democracies are most vulnerable to renewed warfare during the first four or five years (Gates, Hegre, Jones and Strand 2003).

A third feature is an intercultural dialogue, which fosters mutual understandings and possible coalitions among former conflict groups. In her analysis of ethnic conflict and democratization in the Andean region of Latin America, Donna Lee Van Cott shows that decentralized government, the creation of special courts for particular regions, and strong protections for civil liberties, and political rights have fostered an intercultural dialogue in which Amerindians have come to recognize shared interests with lower class mestizos. Reflecting this dialogue, the Amerindians have turned to broader issues, like corruption and urban services, and forged electoral coalitions that cut across previous group boundaries. This has allowed broad political and social reforms with minimal violence. Strong regional norms against violence and international pressure from multilateral development agencies have also helped regulate these conflicts.

A fourth measure is the disarmament, demobilization, and reintegration (sometimes called “DDR”) of former soldiers, both those in the official military and in the guerrilla units. If there is to be a durable peace, soldiers need to be reintegrated by finding alternative employment or else they are likely to resort to crime or war-making. In her analysis of post-civil war Zimbawbwe, Norma Kriger shows that the absence of strong legal norms and impartial measures in allocating soldiers pensions and access to jobs undermined reintegration. Ad hoc norms, irregular procedures, and falsified service records were widely used to consolidate an alliance between the ZANLA guerrillas and Robert Mugabe’s ruling political party. Guerrillas claimed military service during the liberation struggle to legitimize war pensions and guaranteed access to positions in the army, police and civil bureaucracy. This corrupt partnership created a paramilitary force within the state that later turned to violent land invasions, political purges, and massive repression against the political opposition that eventually undermined the original settlement. This shows that effective reintegration depends on a coherent administratively rationalized state.

As pointed out earlier, discussions of conflict regulation typically focus on these rule-based measures, neglecting cultural and ideological regulation. Several of our chapters demonstrate the importance of cultural regulation, especially the development of new cultural symbols and unifying identities. One aim is the creation of new collective memories that redefine the past in ways that strengthen new identities. In her discussion of the flawed urban redevelopment of post-civil war Beirut, Lebanon, Aseel Sawalha shows how urban planners failed to take into account the new identities that would be needed to reconcile the rivalries and hatreds stemming from a twenty-year civil war. In place of traditional symbols, new integrative symbols need to be developed that provide a basis for new identities and unifying symbols. In her study of post-colonial South Korea, Pori Park shows that highly charged symbolic fights over the celibate vs. married status of Buddhist monks were critical to removing the vestiges of Japanese colonial rule. Although the celibate monks were later compromised by their association with military rule, initially their claims to purity and anti-Japanese sentiments helped construct a new national identity. In a post-conflict setting, new collective memories of the “imagined community” (Anderson 1990) need to be constructed along with institutional reconstruction.

Another setting for the construction of new identities is reconciliation efforts. Did the reconciliation efforts in post-conflict Rwanda, Cambodia, and South Africa create new identities and symbols? As discussed earlier, the evidence suggests that court-like justice forums designed to identify and punish guilty parties reinforce the conflict. Because their goal is retribution, these tribunals tend to reinforce existing hostilities. In contrast, Bishop Desmond Tutu’s Truth Commission in South Africa seems to have generated some reconciliation and encouraged new inclusive identities. Gibson (2004) finds that an open-ended “fact-finding” process with amnesty guarantees creates opportunities for parties to come forward and acknowledge guilt for atrocities. Those who refuse to participate can be tried in traditional courts. It also helps to have widespread support for rational-legal norms, a limited number of victims, and sufficient atrocities on all sides of the conflict. Effective reconciliation is unlikely where there is a large number of victims (e.g., Israel/Palestine, former Yugoslavia) or where the victims are largely on one side (e.g., Rwanda). International legal proceedings, such as those against Slobodan Milosevic in the Hague, or the genocide trial of Saddam Hussein in Iraq, or the trial in Cambodia against Pol Pot and his allies seem to have perpetuated the conflict.

The idea behind reconciliation is to transform conflict by reversing the dynamics that led to conflict escalation. In place of group polarization, groups are supposed to come to perceive mutual benefit from future interaction. In some measure, increased interaction in mutually complementary activities, such as market exchange and humanitarian assistance, can go a long way towards redefining the "Other." A second element is dealing with negative projections and attributions. Just as conflict escalates out of distorted perceptions and attributions (Jervis 1976; Janis 1982), so regulation requires building more realistic perceptions and attributions. For conflicts to be transformed, these processes need to work across multiple levels, affecting individuals, inter-group interaction, as well as the basic needs of entire populations.

Some argue that we are moving towards a "post-state world" in that traditional state sovereignty is increasingly constrained by transnational norms and institutions. Rosenau (1990) coined the term "sovereignty-free world" to capture the normative idea that state sovereignty is not an absolute but conditional on the recognition and practice of certain basic human rights. This means that states should share the international stage with other "sovereignty-free" actors, such as international nongovernmental organizations (INGOs) and intergovernmental organizations (IGOs). These "sovereignty-free" organizations have greater resources and legitimacy and are able to work at multiple levels to constrain and regulate various actors. Making use of "track two" diplomacy, such bodies attempt to create a forum for parties to explore and recognize the flaws and errors in their fears and the illegitimacy of their grievances and demands in a nonbinding environment. While guaranteeing little in terms of specific outcomes, such institutions have become fixtures in the international arena and capable of performing positive conflict regulation tasks.

The idea of a “post-state world” is, of course, central to the globalization thesis. It is important to keep in mind that globalization does not actually mean suspending state sovereignty but rather imposing a “tax” or a limitation on it. States are less and less able to control international events that directly affect their populations, and their borders are becoming increasingly permeable. Transnational organizations are increasingly important, not because they have direct coercive power (i.e., sovereignty), but because they influence state behavior through normative regulation and persuasion. These processes are working on both the regional and the global level. Further, the influence of global processes is highly variable and depends on the maturity and strength of the state itself. Many of the IGOs and INGOs are instruments of the major power states and have their greatest impact on the weaker states of the world which feel compelled to demonstrate their modernity by complying with international norms. This often creates a glaring gap between promise and performance but also has some benefits in terms of identifying new norms that regulate conflict.

 Conclusions

In line with these arguments, it appears that both institutional rules and shared understandings are important to regulating identity conflict. The transformation of conflict requires both the creation of new institutions and rules to regulate relations, and new understandings and integrative symbols that regulate inter-group relations. Political reconstruction needs to be complemented by cultural reconstruction. There is no guarantee that such regulation will create a durable peace, or that the various parties will perceive that their interests are best advanced by nonviolence. Our basic assumption is that identity conflicts can be regulated only where all parties recognize long-term advantages in a new arrangement. Peace-making must focus on the real conflicts of interests that divide parties as well as the perceptions, including distorted perceptions and attributions, that sustain hostilities.

Ultimately, for a durable peace to hold, all parties must perceive greater gains from conflict regulation than violence. This may include changing the salience of various interests, altering identities, and reframing these identities in new terms. It may also entail mutual recognition of the interests and identities of others, including measures to symbolize that recognition in collective terms.

 References

<biblio>

Anderson, Benedict. 1990. Imagined Communities. London: Verso.

Arendt, Hannah. 1969. On Violence. New York: Harcourt.

Barton, John W. 1990. Conflict: Resolution and Prevention. New York: St. Martins.

Basch, Linda, Nina Glick Schiller, and Cristina Szanton Blanc. 1994. Nations Unbound: Transnational Projects, Postcolonial Predicaments and Deterritorialized Nation-States. Langhorne, PA: Gordon and Breach.

Bettelheim, Bruno. 1992. “Helpless Victims.” In The Holocaust, edited by Donald L. Niewyk, 58–62. Lexington, MA: Lexington Books.

Blalock, Hubert M. 1967. Toward a Theory of Minority Group Relations. New York: John Wiley.

Bloom, Mia. 2005. Dying to Kill: The Allure of Suicide Terror. New York: Columbia University Press.

Collier, Paul, and Anka Hoeffler. 2002. “Aid, Policy and Growth in Post-Conflict Societies.” Policy Research Working Paper #2902. Washington, DC: World Bank.

Collier, Paul and Anka Hoeffler. “Greed and Grievance in Civil War.” Oxford Economic Papers–New Series 56, 4 (2004): 563–595

Collier, Paul, V., L. Elliott, Havard Hegre, Anke Hoeffler, Marta Reynal-Querol, and Nicholas Sambinis. 2003. Breaking the Conflict Trap: Civil War and Development Policy. Washington, DC: World Bank and Oxford University Press.

Coser, Lewis. 1956. The Functions of Social Conflict. New York: Free Press.

Dahrendorf, Ralf. 1959. Class and Class Conflict in Industrial Society. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press.

Eck, Kristine, Margareta Sollenberg, and Peter Wallensteen. 2005. “Collective Violence 2002 and 2003.” In Human Security Report 2004, edited by Andrew Mack. Oxford: Oxford University Press.

Foucault, Michel. 1975. Discipline and Punish: The Birth of the Prison, translated by Alan Sheridan. New York: Random House.

Foucault, Michel. 1980. Power/Knowledge. New York: Harvester.

Galtung, Johann. 2004. Transcend and Transform. Boulder, CO: Paradigm Publishers.

Galtung, Johann, Carl G. Jacobsen, and Kai Frithjof Brand-Jacobsen. 2002. Searching for Peace: The Road to Transcend. London: Pluto Press.

Gates, Scott, Havard Hegre, M. P. Jones, and H. Strand. 2003. “Institutional Inconsistency and Political Instability.” Oslo, Norway: International Peace Research Institute (PRIO).

Gibson, James L. 2004. Overcoming Apartheid: Can Truth Reconcile A Divided Nation? New York: Russell Sage Foundation.

Goodwin, Jeff. 2000. No Other Way Out: States and Revolutionary Movements, 1945–1991. New York: Cambridge University Press.

Gottlieb, Esther E. “ Appalachian Self-Fashioning: Regional Identities and Cultural Models.” Discourse: Studies in the Cultural Politics of Education 22, 3 (2001): 341–360.

Grindle, Merilee S. 1996. Challenging the State: Crisis and Innovation in Latin America and Africa. New York: Cambridge University Press.

Gurr, Ted Robert. 1993. Minorities at Risk. Washington, DC: U.S. Institute for Peace.

Gurr, Ted Robert. 2001. Peoples vs. States: Minorities at Risk in the New Century. Washington, DC: U. S. Institute for Peace.

Gurr, Ted Robert, Monty G. Marshall, and Deepa Khosla. 2000. Peace and Conflict 2001. College Park, MD: Center for International Development and Conflict Management (CIDCM).

Hafez, Mohammed. 2004. Why Do Muslims Rebel? Boulder, CO: Lynne Rienner.

Held, David. 2005. Debating Globalization. Malden, MA: Polity Press.

Horowitz, Donald L. “Self-determination: Politics, Philosophy and Law.” NOMOS 30 (1991): 421–463.

Huntington, Samuel P. 1996. The Clash of Civilizations and the Remaking of World Order. New York: Simon & Schuster.

Janis, Irving. 1982. Groupthink. Boston: Houghton-Mifflin.

Jenkins, J. Craig. “Resource Mobilization Theory and the Study of Social Movements.” Annual Review of Sociology 9 (1983): 527–553.

Jenkins, J. Craig, and Augustine Kposowa. “Explaining Military Coups: Black Africa 1956–1984.” American Sociological Review 55 (1990): 861–875.

Jenkins, J. Craig, and Kurt Schock. “Global Structures and Political Processes in the Study of Domestic Political Conflict.” Annual Review of Sociology 18 (1992): 161–85.

Jenkins, J. Craig, Edward M. Crenshaw, and Kris Robison. 2006. “The Growing Lethality of Transnational Terrorism.” Dept. of Sociology, Ohio State University.

Jervis, Robert. 1976. Perception and Misperception in International Politics. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Juergensmeyer, Mark. 2000. Terror in the Mind of God: The Global Rise of Religious Violence. Berkeley: University of California Press.

Kohut, Andrew and Bruce Stokes. 2006. America Against the World. Washington, DC: Pew Research Center.

Kriesberg, Louis. 1997. “The Development of the Conflict Resolution Field.” In Peacemaking in International Conflict, edited by I. William Zartman and J. Lewis Rasmussen, 51–77. Washington, DC: U.S. Institute of Peace.

Kriesberg, Louis. 1998. Constructive Conflicts. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield.

Kriesberg, Louis, Terrell A. Northrup, and Stuart J. Thorson (eds.). 1989. Intractable Conflicts and Their Transformation. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press.

Laqueur, Walter. 2001. A History of Terrorism. New Brunswick, NJ: Transaction Publishers.

Laue, James H. 1991. “Contributions to the Emerging Field of Conflict Resolution.” In Approaches to Peace, edited by W. Scott Thompson and Kenneth M. Jensen. Washington, DC: U.S. Institute of Peace.

Lederach, John Paul. 1995. Building Peace: Sustainable Reconciliation in Divided Societies. Tokyo: United Nations University Press.

Licklider, Roy. 1993. Stopping the Killing. New York: New York University Press.

Linz, Juan, and Alexander Stepan. 1996. Problems of Democratic Transition and Consolidation. Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins University Press.

Lukes, Steven. 2005. Power: A Radical View (2nd ed.). New York: Palgrave.

McCarthy, John, and Mayer N. Zald. 1987. Social Movements in an Organizational Society. New Brunswick, NJ: Transaction Publishers.

Melucci, Alberto. 1989. Nomads of the Present. Philadelphia, PA: Temple University Press.

Melucci, Alberto. 1996. Challenging Codes. New York: Cambridge University Press.

Mueller, Edward N. “Income Inequality, Regime Repressiveness and Political Violence.” American Sociological Review 51 (1985): 47–61.

Mueller, John. 2004. Remnants of War. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press.

Olzak, Susan. 1992. The Dynamics of Ethnic Competition and Conflict. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press.

Project Ploughshares. 2003. Armed Conflict Report. Waterloo, Ontario: Project Ploughshares.

Rasler, Karen. “Concessions, Repression and Political Protest: A Model of Escalation in the Iranian Revolution.” American Sociological Review 61 (1996): 132–152.

Rasmussen, J. Lewis. 1997. “Peacemaking in the Twenty-First Century.” In Peacemaking in International Conflict, edited by I. William Zartman and J. Lewis Rasmussen, 23–50. Washington, DC: U.S. Institute of Peace.

Reynal-Querol, Marta. “Ethnicity, Political Systems, and Civil War.” Journal of Conflict Resolution 46 (2002): 29–54.

Rosenau, James N. 1990. Turbulence in World Politics: A Theory of Change and Continuity. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Ross, Marc Howard, and Jay Rothman. 2000. Theory and Practice in Ethnic Conflict Resolution: Conceptualizing Success and Failure. New York: St. Martins.

Rothman, Jay. 1997. Resolving Identity-Based Conflicts in Nations, Organizations and Communities. San Francisco, CA: Jossey-Bass.

Rude, George. 1980. Ideology and Popular Protest. London: Lawrence & Wishart.

Rupesinghe, Kumar (ed.). 1995. Conflict Transformation. New York: St. Martin’s.

Scott, James. 1982. Weapons of the Weak. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Simmel, Georg. 1955. Conflict and the Web of Group Affiliations, translated by Kurt Wolff. New York: Free Press.

Snow, David. 2000. “Framing Processes, Ideology and Discursive Fields.” In The Blackwell’s Companion to Social Movements, edited by David A. Snow, Sarah A. Soule, and Hanspeter Kriesi, 380–412. Malden, MA: Blackwell.

Snow, David, and Robert Benford. 1992. “Master Frames and Cycles of Protest.” In Frontiers of Social Movement Theory, edited by Carol Mueller and Aldon Morris, 133–153. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Sorensen, Georg. 1998. Democracy and Democratization. Boulder, CO: Westview.

Stern, Jessica. 2003. Terror in the Mind of God: Why Religious Militants Kill. New York: HarperCollins.

Tarrow, Sidney. 1998. Power in Movement (2nd ed.). New York: Cambridge University Press.

Taylor, Verta, and Nancy Whittier. 1992. “Collective Identity in Social Movement Communities.” In Frontiers in Social Movement Theory, edited by Aldon Morris and Carol McClurg Mueller, 104–32. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Tilly, Charles. 1978. From Mobilization to Revolution. Reading, PA: Addison-Wesley.

Timberlake, Michael, and Kirk Williams. “Dependence, Political Exclusion and Government Repression.” American Sociological Review 49 (1984): 141–46.

Varshney, Ashutosh. 2002. Ethnic Conflict and Civil Life: Hindus and Muslims in India. New York: Cambridge University Press.

Wallerstein, Immanuel. 2000. The Essential Wallerstein. New York: New Press.

Walter, B. F. “The Critical Barrier to Civil War Settlement.” International Organization 51 (1997): 335–365.

Walter, B. F. 2002. Committing to Peace. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Zartman, I. William. 1989. Ripe for Resolution: Conflict and Intervention in Africa. New York: Oxford University Press.

Zartman, I. William. 1995. “Putting Things Back Together.” In Collapsed States: The Disintegration and Restoration of Legitimate Authority. Boulder, CO: Lynne Rienner.

Zartman, I William, and J. Lewis Rasmussen (eds.) 1997. Peacemaking in International Conflict: Methods and Techniques. Washington, DC: U.S. Institute of Peace.

</biblio>

 2. Uncertain Connections: Globalization, Localization, Identities, and Violence

Neil J. Smelser

Given the conceptual and geographical breadth of the chapters in this volume, any attempt to provide an integrative statement to introduce this volume is a formidable challenge. In the end I chose a strategy that is congenial for me but runs the risk of self-embarrassment. My strategy is to struggle with the issue of breadth by taking an even broader view. That is to say, I believe I can serve best by taking a critical look at the main conceptual frameworks that organize the various chapters. Among the frameworks are identities of dispossession, the state, the growing porousness of international borders, transnationalism (including globalization), and the regulation of violence. Each of these frameworks is itself complex, and the relations among the phenomena identified are even more so. In my remarks I hope to contribute to the theoretical clarification of the frameworks, to raise some skeptical observations about some dominant presuppositions relating them to one another, and to point toward more adequate formulations and explanations. My mission is therefore both ambitious and modest—ambitious in that I intend to venture into very uncertain seas as though I have confidence that they may be made more certain, and modest in that I hope to provide a conceptual apparatus that will not challenge but will rather tease out some of the general implications of the many case studies that constitute the real content of this volume. For documentation I have relied on a general search of the literature on the relevant topics, but also I have exploited the recently accumulated treasure of synthesized knowledge available in the International Encyclopedia of the Social and Behavioral Sciences in which I had a major editorial role.

 A Loose Model Linking Globalization, Localization, Identity, and Violence

To facilitate my tasks, I begin by creating what some might regard as a straw person—a kind of explanatory model (perspective or sketch might be a better term) that ties together many of the ingredients listed above. This model is based on widely but not universally shared assumptions (that is why it is straw). Nevertheless, it represents a more or less coherent set of connections and serves as a foil for the more complex and contextualized discussion I wish to introduce.

The model begins with the world-phenomenon of globalization, which might be defined at the most general level as “the expanding scale, growing magnitude, speeding up and deepening impact of transcontinental flows and patterns of social interaction” (Held and McGrew 2002: 1). To some commentators the process has the form of an “irresistible lava flow” (Langhorne 2001: 1) that is transforming the world. There are disagreements about the essence of the process, but the following dimensions are the most commonly stressed:

- technological, which have “given human beings the ability to conduct their affairs across the world without reference to nationality, governmental authority, time of day or physical environment” (Langhorne 2001: 2). Among these the information and communication revolutions are paramount.

- economic, including the explosion in international trade, internationalization of production, and the galloping internationalization of capital and financial institutions.

- political, involving the rise of new but incomplete and inadequate forms of global governance—including international non governmental organizations—which is “an array of formal legal arrangements, informal codes of conduct, and habitual practices based on shared expectations about legitimate action” (Benedict 2001:6233).

- migration, the movement of increasing numbers of peoples across national lines.

- cultural, or the spread and homogenization of a global culture, dominated by American and/or Western content and accomplished through the mass media.

An evidently complex process, globalization nevertheless is an admittedly diffuse independent variable that produces two clear consequences. The first has to do with the declining sovereignty of the traditional nation-state occasioned by re-locating of decisive events and constellations of decision making beyond the realm of state control (Held 1996). Although this thesis is disputed by “antiglobalists” (Held and McGrew 2002), it has had a certain staying power. The forces undermining the nation-state include “multinational companies, common markets, satellite communications and global environmental concerns, none of which have much respect for traditional political boundaries and the integrity of the sovereign state” (Samarasinghe 1990:1).

The second consequence of globalization is thought to excite various local, often but not always sub-national tendencies, represented as antagonistic to global tendencies which intrude in various ways—economic, political, cultural—on the autonomy and integrity of the local. In fact “most of the debates about globalization, whether scholarly or popular, have centered around the relation and even polarity between the global and the local” (Beyer 2001: 6287). On the cultural side, the tension is between homogenization of an international culture on the one hand and the reassertion of social and cultural diversity on the other (Beyer 2001: 6287). These tendencies have been represented, albeit very simplistically, as opposites (Robertson 2001: 6255). The “local” is not only regional as the term literally implies, but it subsumes groups that are ethnic, racial, indigenous, ethnonationalistic, religious, linguistic, cultural or simply a style of life—and often some mix of these. These are the foci of resistance to globalizing tendencies and the reassertion of local autonomy. In the extreme, this takes the form of “globaphobia,” or resistance to globalizing economic trends such as free trade and competition as alien and “threatening the integrity of primordiality of a particular collectivity” (Robertson 2001: 6256; see also Burtless, Lawrence, Litan and Shapiro 1998).

This antagonism affects the traditional nation-state as well, as these local assertions come to constitute claims against sovereignty as well: “the nation-state is being challenged by a new wave of ethnic nationalism that has manifested itself across the globe” (Samarasinghe 1990:1). At an earlier time I myself voiced these relations as follows: “nationally based systems of political-legal and territorial integration are being increasingly besieged by economic and political developments mainly ‘from above’ and by cultural developments mainly ‘from below’ the nation-state level” (Smelser 1997: 70). As my subsequent remarks will demonstrate, I am now in a position of wishing to recant partially on that formulation, because of its unacceptable simplicity. In all events, the drift of the reasoning I have summarized is to posit a set of zero-sum relations between globalization, national sovereignty, and localist tendencies—that is, the more you have of the one, the more you are subtracting from the others. Below, I am going to recant on that assumption and offer a more complex alternative.

The next ingredient in the complex is group identity. The various “local” bases noted in fact constitute the major bases of identity and identity politics with which nation-states have to contend. As the local is made more salient by contemporary global developments, so are identities associated with localism. Those now writing on identity focus mainly on (and often quietly laud) the identities of ethnic minorities, which involve claims for political rights or redress of past and present wrongs (Hardin 2001:7169). Identity movements defend the interests and promote the rights of these groups. There is also frequently “the search for symbolic recognition by a significant other” (Langlois 2001: 7166), typically the state and the dominant ethnicities.

The final and least certain connection is between identity and violence. The working assumption is that groups based on the particularistic identities may be particularly prone to violence. The bases for this assumption are two. First, even though identity groups certainly often behave like interest groups, the ideological bases of their claims are typically primordial and absolute. The further assumption is that these characteristics provide a ready legitimization for violence, containing as they do such a powerful distinction of a righteous “we” versus an evil “they.” The second basis is more political in nature. Because of the ideological commitments of identity groups, they are—or at least present a posture that they are—unfriendly to compromise in a give-and take in democratic polities, which find their existence in fashioning compromises among competing conflict groups. Democratic regimes, in their turn, are taxed by identity groups for the very same reason, and are likely to give them short treatment because they insist on playing on the edges of the political rules of the game. The net result is to rule out many options for the accommodation of identity groups, and thereby to increase their alienation and their willingness to turn toward more desperate measures, especially violence.

The reader will have little trouble in discerning that I am dissatisfied with the oversimplified connections I have just described. However simplified, they do inform much of the existing literature. By and large, the rendition I have given takes whole complexes of variables and treats them as undifferentiated causes. As such, the connections come up short with respect to specific mechanisms involved and, consequently, explanatory power. My aim in the remainder of these remarks will be to visit each one of the supposed connections and specify the contingent variables that should be included to make our understanding of the connections more realistic and accurate.

 Transition #1: The Subglobal Effects of Globalization

Under this heading I will discuss, first, the issue of the impact of globalization on the system of nation-states—briefly, because this is somewhat peripheral to the discussion in the volume—and, second, the impact of globalization on what I referred to above as “locality.”

* The Nation-State

A certain case can be made for the argument that states are weakened by the global economic system. With respect to the familiar kinds of economic penetrations—arising from the economic impact of decisions made by powerful nations, world inflation, shocks such as the OPEC price crisis of 1973, and fluctuations in international currency rates—it is true that these are “external” to states and that state governments are often unable to prevent or control them. At the same time it must be remembered that the responsibility for dealing with these penetrations remains with nation-states. That is to say, national governments are the agencies that have to cope with the consequences (for their domestic populations) of the vicissitudes of the world economy. The correct diagnosis is that sovereignty of nation-states is increasingly taxed or limited in the context of globalization. However, states still retain their sovereign power. The change is that states are less and less able to control events affecting their populations. There has been, however, very little by way of a formal handing over or transfer of sovereignty to transnational or supranational groups and agencies.

Similarly, the decisions made by transnational or supranational agencies continue, by and large, to be filtered through the apparatus of the nation-state. The extent to which such international agencies have spread is remarkable. Working from figures presented in the 1998–99 Yearbook of International Organizations, Haas (2001) counted some 6,000 international organizations at the end of the twentieth century. Of these, some 264 (170 in 1962) were organizations whose members were states (international governmental organizations, or IGOs), such as the United Nations and the Caribbean Community, another 5,766 (1,542 in 1962) were private associations with international objectives (NGOs), such as Doctors without Borders and the European Confederation of Free Trade Unions. Some 72 percent of these organizations represented a regional rather than a universal constituency.

What are the normative relations of these organizations to the nation-state? As for the NGOs, they are by and large cooperative associations, many of which do not make collective decisions, and, when they do, these decisions are not even binding on their own members, much less anyone else. IGOs, however, vary along a dimension, which Haas describes as extending from “organizations” to “institutions.” Organizations are interest-based collectivities without power; institutions assume a certain level of autonomy and an ability to bind their members by majority vote. The most remarkable transition from organization to institution is the European Union, but that is almost the only example. A few others, such as the International Monetary Fund, rely on strictures, which, if not adhered to, result in very adverse economic and political consequences; for this reason, these can be regarded as semi-coercive in character. Most other international governmental organizations are voluntary and rely on their members’ willingness to conform. The UN agencies, for example, are completely dependent on the voluntary cooperation of member states to provide revenues for operations and military support for various peace-keeping activities. NATO has recently experimented with integrated command structures within its military operations in Afghanistan but here, too, traditional sovereignty remains intact. A true world government would clearly be a fully developed institution, with a capacity to exercise binding power over its member units, but the world, as yet, has produced nothing remotely close to that.

Even when cooperation at the national level is obtained, different states adapt the policies to their own economic circumstances, cultures, and political systems and evolve their own “policy styles”(see Jänick and Weidner 1997; Richardson 1982). In all cases, however, the state mediates in a de facto way—that is, as the effective agency of normative control —between the supranational agencies and the people and groups who are affected by the influence locally, even though the origin of the normative influence originates externally to the state.

In all events, the impact of economic and political trends and events is highly variable according to the maturity and strength of the nation-state itself. To remind ourselves of the obvious, strong and mature modernized states surely have more control over the effects of global phenomena—indeed, they are the more active agents in engineering these phenomena—than the large number of post-colonial, weak, partially developed states, mainly in Africa and Asia. In a word, the impact of globalization is selective, both according to type of international penetration involved and according to the capacity of the “receiving” state.

* “Local” Impacts

The last third of the twentieth century has witnessed a dramatic increase in the development of quasi-religious, sub-nationalist, local movements based on a mix of ethnic, religious, linguistic, and cultural identities (Gurr 2000). Examples are the “nationalistic” movements in Wales and Scotland, the Basque phenomenon, the resurfacing of fissiparous ethnic tendencies in the former Soviet Union and Eastern Europe, and similar phenomena in other areas of the world. We have also witnessed a growth of solidary groupings based on social movements pressing for recognition, status and rights, or advocating a cause such as women’s rights, peace, or antagonism to nuclear power. In exploring the determinants of these developments, I hope to throw light on the first orienting question for the volume—why are there so many identity conflicts in the world today?

This explosion in local political contentiousness is a remarkable turn of historical events, in part because it was unanticipated by (and an embarrassment for) most of the social-science paradigms that reigned at mid-century. Modernization theory (particularly of the “convergence” variety) anticipated a global trend towards social and cultural homogenization. Marxian theory had always downplayed particularistic loyalties in favor of the dynamics of class. Secularization theory in the sociology of religion posited a long-term decline in religious forces. Mainstream liberal political theory tended to treat particularistic ethnic loyalties as subject to processes of assimilation.

Since this explosion has coincided with the very rapid pace of world globalizing tendencies, it seems reasonable to regard the localist impulse as a counteractive response to them. What might be the mechanisms of such a response? Nearly a quarter of a century ago, Rokkan and Urwin suggested such a mechanism. Referring to Western Europe, they pointed first to “globalizing” tendencies associated with the common market and the corresponding “erosion of inter-state boundaries.” These in turn constituted demands on the resources and manpower and have increased the need to expand welfare and education services. This relative “weakening” of the state led to “the multiplication of efforts to mobilize peripheries, regions and even localities against the national centres, and an assertion (or reassertion) of minority claims for cultural autonomy and for separate decision-making” (1982: 3). To generalize this formulation, global tendencies and events subtract from the ability of states to meet demands from local and particularistic constituencies, and this neglect heightens the political activity of these constituencies.

To focus on the powers of the state in relation to sub-state particularistic groups seems like a good lead but the link to “globalization” seems problematic. It seems more profitable to look at the fate of the state as it has been conditioned by specific international processes, all of which can be subsumed under “globalization” only by a very unhelpful stretching of the connotations of that term. The “international processes” I have in mind are long-term historical trends that have heightened the disjunction between the nation-state (and nationalism) and ethnic particularism throughout the world. The following trends are the major ones:

- The colonial heritage, in which the world's major colonial powers divided up the colonized world into colonial territories that took little or no account of the tribal, religious, and other characteristics of those territories, except sometimes to exploit them for political purposes. As a result, they generated political units that were constituted by a multiplicity of particularistic groups, many of which have reemerged with full force in the post-colonial world.

- The post-colonial heritage, in which most of the colonies adopted the formal model of the nation-state—the mode of political organization represented by their former colonizers and the political mode preferred by the diplomatic communities and the United Nations for membership in the world system. In most cases this adaptation perpetuated the internal ethnic diversity and merely papered over it or perhaps exacerbated it by pretending that it did not exist (Gurr and Harff 1994).

- The formal adoption of the traditional characteristics of nation-states by the new states (claims to self-sufficiency, insistence on a monopoly of violence, the focus on a single national identity) but their actual ineffectiveness in developing the nation-state form, which had, in fact, been realized in the West only after a long and irregular historical process that required many centuries and was, in some respects, incomplete. In some cases the result was "failed states," and, in other cases, "the insistence on the right to conduct internal affairs without outside interference gave unscrupulous dictators like Macias and Amin freedom to commit atrocities against their subjects in the name of 'nation-building'" (Gurr and Harff 1994:12).

- The dramatic "third (and fourth) wave" of democratization (Huntington 1991), which beginning in 1974, affected dozens of states throughout the world. The general shift was toward the dismantling of authoritarian regimes and the development of democratic institutions, but the results of this movement have been mixed in terms of the actual institutionalization of stable democracies. There have been many instances of democratic breakdown. More important, the quality of democracy often remains sharply limited. Minorities often lack effective protections and voice and severe restrictions remain on freedom of speech and organization. The transition to democracy implies a formal commitment to deal with contending opposition voices (including ethnic groups), thus giving them, legitimately, more political salience, but many of the democratization did not guarantee effectiveness in dealing with conflicts among such groups or between them and the state.

- The even more dramatic dismantling of the communist and socialist countries in 1989–90, which not only permitted the emergence of multiple ethnic, religious, and local forces held under by repression for decades, but also resulted in the formation of a significant number of new states. Almost all these states, moreover, did not really solve underlying issues of internal diversity, because in almost all cases residual minorities remained (e.g., the Russians in Latvia).

- An accelerating process of international migration, which is the factor most closely associated with the concept of globalization. While international migrants make up only 2 percent of the world's population, their absolute numbers have accelerated from approximately 75 million in 1965 to perhaps 140 million at the end of the 1990s (Castles 2001: 9826). The occasions for migration have been both economic and political, and the process inevitably results in some kind of multiculturalism both for the receiving country and for the migrant populations who are caught in the struggle between inherited particularistic loyalties and the "pressures of the varied ideologies of cultural and legal inclusion which characterize their new homes" (Appadurai 2001: 6269). This creates diaspora communities which are often freer to act than minorities in their homelands and thus likely to create greater conflict.

- The final factor is a kind of internal political dynamic. Countries in North America and Western Europe have gradually evolved from political aspirations for the individual assimilation of minorities (an evolution dictated mainly because those aspirations were not realized), to policies of recognition of cultural difference through policies of pluralism and multiculturalism (Castles 2001: 9827). Once the political system has made a commitment to recognize and respond to the demands of particularistic groups, this creates a kind of informal “invitation” or “hope” that politics based on claims of particularistic groups have a degree of political legitimacy.

This extended catalogue of mainly political developments provides much of the answer to the question of why there are so many more identity conflicts in the world. The answer is that all the preconditions for generating them have been moving in the same direction. The world has seen the immense growth in numbers of nation-states (185 in the United Nations in 2000). Almost all are multi-ethnic (or multi-particularistic) and many are multi-homeland (Said and Simmons 1976; Connor 2002). The number of multiple-oriented “border” populations at nations’ edges has increased correspondingly (Donnan and Wilson 1999). Most of the nations have not been able to create political machinery for contending with identity conflict, and in those that have, the machinery is fragile.

While these general conditions together have produced the worldwide growth in identity conflicts, the combination of these conditions varies in specific cases. To explain multiculturalist politics in the United States, for example, one would look at the heritage of repressing indigenous peoples, slavery, and unprecedented waves of migration; the failure of class-based organizations (particularly labor unions) to subordinate ethnic to class loyalties; the recent weakening of the major political parties as conduits for channeling ethnic groups and the increased salience of the social movement as a mode of organizing political expression; and the legitimization of ethnic groups by the governmental response to racial disturbances of the 1960s in racial/political terms (including affirmative action), and the subsequent adoption of collectivist/solidarity rhetoric by other such groups. The multiculturalism of Western Europe is a combination of the incomplete absorption of new immigrant groups and the excitation of long-standing regional loyalties. In the new nations the glaring contradictions between the nation-state structure and sub-national groups and the relative weakness of the state would be the beginning point for analysis. In all these cases “globalization” may have something to do with the changing conditions, but in and of itself it cannot be profitably regarded as a generalized, undifferentiated explanation.

 Transition #2: From Localism to Identity

To speak of the relationship between any given racial, ethnic, religious, regional or other particularistic group and that group's identity as a "transition" in a causal sense is somewhat meaningless, because the one virtually implies the other. Such a group would not be a group if it were not, already by definition set off by boundaries that are imposed on it both by others and by members of the group itself (Scherrer 2002: 7). One inevitable ingredient of group identity is that it contains a usually dichotomous reference to "we" and "they," though the "theys" may be multiple according to how different they are from the "we," how friendly or how inimical they are, the degree to which they may be trusted, and so on.

One initial conceptual clarification: under the influence of scholars preoccupied with group oppression (including some postmodernist scholars), the contemporary literature tends to treat "identity" and "identity movements" in moralistic terms, that is, focusing on the dispossessed, downtrodden, third world populations, minorities and subaltern peoples of the world—in short, victimized groups. Their identities tend to be taken for granted, and are thought to be a positive asset for mobilizing such groups (Hardin 2001: 7168). As Hardin notes, "actual supporters of group identity in many contexts would blanch at the thought of support for, say, Caucasian-American, Anglo-Saxon, or German identity, although each of these historically has been asserted against immigrant groups and, in the U.S., former slaves" (Hardin 2001: 7168). My own view, consistent with Hardin's expression, is that the question of identity is not a property of any one class of groups, but is a generic category applicable to all. Ethnic identity plays a significant role in regimes that perpetrate ethnic cleansings and genocides as well as in the identities of their victims and potential victims. Hence discussions of identity conflict require an analysis of all types of identity, both dominant (or victimizing) and subordinant (or victimized) groups.

The key question about identity, then, is not whether it is a characteristic of groups, but how salient it is for different kinds of groups, how this salience is likely to change over time, and under what conditions it is activated as a basis for a group's behavior. Gurr has provided a helpful list of factors affecting the salience of identity, which I present in schematic and somewhat modified form:

- how much of people's lives are wrapped up in their "home" group

- whether invoking their identity is thought to contribute to its advantage or disadvantage

- open conflict with states or other ethnic groups, especially recent violent conflict

- "group capacity" including territorial concentration and coalitions among diverse segments and contending leaders

- "opportunity factors," such as the political instability associated with the breakup of old states and establishment of new ones, transitions from one type of regime to another

- international factors, especially transnational networks and foreign interventions (Gurr 2000: 67–70).

Gurr lists these as "objective" factors, but analysis of the activation of identity calls for reference to two more dynamic and interactive elements.

The first issue has to do with fact that group identity often involves some kind of ideology, the elements of which include references to the glory and dignity of the group itself, threats to it, including its past and present mistreatment or victimization, grievances, and a vision of a better world.

These ingredients provide the standards by which the group's sense of relative deprivation is represented. Inevitably there are differences between group members, who go about their day-by-day business, and leaders who designate themselves and are sometimes designated by others as spokespeople or prolocutors for the group in the political arena. Tilly (2002) argues that such differences are omnipresent. Furthermore, it is typical that leaders tend to "push" identity issues more than followers, both because their leadership depends on "representing" the group, and they are in competition with one another as expressers of the group's identity and interests. The salience of group identity, then, is a function of two sets of negotiations—those between leaders and group members on the one hand, and those between leaders and the outside publics to whom they represent their group interests.

To frame the issue in this way shows the intellectual fruitlessness of the polemic opposition among scholars who define ethnic and related groups in "primordial" terms versus those who define them in "instrumental" terms, that is, as groups seeking their own interest in the political and economic arenas (Gurr and Harff 1994: 78–79). As Robert Hislope's discussion in chapter 9 of ethnic identity in Macedonia shows, ethnic identity is neither primordial nor purely instrumental. It is influenced by both the real economic and political situation and by ideology and collective memory of recent and past events.

Second, in connection with "opportunity factors," I would extend the list of factors that augment group identity to the active intervention of authorities, especially the state. I give one example dealing with the indigenous population of the United States. The fact that the American government drew up treaties with this indigenous population encouraged a certain solidification of their identity as "tribes," and this went counter to other strong tendencies to erase these distinctive identities—tendencies to decimate the tribes themselves through violence, famine, and disease, and tendencies for the dominant population to homogenize them into a population of "Indians" or "Native Americans." More recently, the U.S. government has held out positive economic incentives to tribes in the form of extending rights to organize gambling enterprises and other businesses. This has proven to be an "invitation to identity," in effect, asking tribes—some of which have long been dispersed—to declare their identity in hopes of economic gain (Wilkins and Vine 1999; Wilkins 2002). Several of the chapters in this volume show that state action is critical to all of the factors that Gurr identifies as sources of ethnic identity.

 Transition #3: From Identity to Identity Movement and Identity Politics

Earlier I observed that the existence of any kind of particularistic group more or less entails some notion of boundaries between that group and others and at least a minimum level of identity, self-imposed or imposed from outside (typically both). No such entailment is involved in the relationship between particularistic group identity and mobilization into some kind of movement. In fact, it may be more realistic to assume the opposite: that the identities remain latent and mobilizable but are not often mobilized. Olzak speaks of "the seemingly natural resistance of individuals to sustain collective action" (2001: 4796). Moreover, there are good theoretical reasons for supposing that individuals will not be motivated to participate in social movements, including identity movements (Olson 1965; Oberschall 1973). Williams reminds us that the vast majority of ethnic groups in the world do not engage in collective violence or civil war. "Of some 1600 major cultural groupings, less than 300 have been recently mobilized in politicized protest or rebellion and only some 30–50 wars are ongoing in a particular year" (2001: 4809).

Despite this observation, collective mobilization remains a sufficiently frequent phenomenon that a serious attempt to specify the major factors that influence its appearance and vicissitudes is invaluable. As a general rule, an intensification of the conditions augmenting the identity of a group will also serve as conditions increasing the probability of mobilization into some kind of collective action. To make this observation more specific, I would mention three sets of variables that come to mind as especially salient in this transition:

1. The occurrence of a visible historical event that (a) augments the perceived adversity or threat under which the group sees itself as living, such as an intensification of discrimination or major victimization in terms of violence; (b) contrariwise, increases the hope of the group to improve its situation, such as major concessions by a ruling government, a law that remedies longstanding grievances, or a promise of help to a group from friendly outside forces. Such events raise the consciousness of identity groups and provide the occasion for them to reassess and perhaps act on their political situation. In an earlier characterization of these kinds of events I used the term “precipitating factor” (Smelser 1962).

1. The capacity of leaders to symbolically integrate such events into a call for collective mobilization and action. This involves their ability to interpret convincingly the event or situation at hand in terms as “evidence” that threatens and/or encourages the identity of the group, articulating this “evidence” with the existing worldview, and convincing the group that collective action rather than some other form of response is needed and the most effective response.

1. The behavior of authorities in relation to group demands, which may be considered as part of the opportunity structure for potentially mobilizing groups (Tarrow 1994). At the one extreme, violent repression of a group by an effective state diminishes its power to mobilize, and tends to force it into a latent state or drive it underground. At the other extreme, the collapse of a state authority—not infrequent in weak, new states, and strikingly evident in the communist and socialist world in 1989–90 frees up the political situation, permits long-passive groups to become activated, and excites competitive political striving among them, including escalating mobilization and the creation of self-reinforcing violence (Gurr 2000: 70). Between these two extremes, there is also a notable sequence of vacillating behavior on the part of regimes that appears to be strong invitation to political mobilization—a period of accommodation or reform (raising expectations of the group), followed by a reversal of these policies accompanied by a repressive posture (dashing those expectations), followed by evidence of weakness, ineffectiveness, or vacillation on the part of authorities (Smelser 1962). All three state responses may help trigger ethnic mobilization by driving identities underground, creating unregulated competition, and creating opportunities that are frustrated.

 Transition #4: From Identity Movement to Violence

As indicated, the perpetration of social violence by collective movements is not well understood, and, correspondingly, my reflections on this will have to be the most tentative of all. In their introduction and coda, Craig Jenkins and Esther Gottlieb provide a more comprehensive assessment than I can provide here. My aim here is simply to provide an assessment of the conditions under which already mobilized movements resort to violence.

In his review of social violence, Tilly identifies three main, competing views:

- “propensity-driven behavior [which locates] its causes within the actor, calling attention to genetic, motional, or cognitive peculiarities”

- “instrumental interaction [which] characterize [violence] as means to power, wealth, prestige, or other ends”

- “a cultural form—as in the claim that because of the frontier, slavery, or capitalist competition the USA has an exceptionally violent culture—argues that the ready availability of certain ideas, practices, models, and beliefs itself promotes violent action.” (Tilly 2001:16207)

All three views share a common frailty, namely that they are formulated as constants that predispose individuals and groups to violence, but they are not framed in a way that would account for systematic variation in its occurrence. As a rule, it is analytically unsatisfactory to try to explain variations by reference to constants. In my own estimation, it is more fruitful to turn research in the direction of seeking variables that combine to produce empirically identifiable episodes of violence. Since different types of violence (e.g., criminal, interstate) may have different causes, my effort here is limited to explaining ethnic violence. In particular I would suggest that research look for the confluence of the four following sets of variables to increase our precision in explaining the occurrence of violence:

1. A facilitating ideology, many instances of which are found in the worldview of identity groups. Ingredients of such an ideology are a profound sense on the part of a “we” group of a “they” that are responsible for the threat, accompanied by a righteous rage and perhaps a glorification of the we-group’s culture and history. The reason why such an ideology is facilitative of violence is that it legitimates extreme violence against a perceived evil in the name of high moral purpose, which serves to blunt what otherwise might be inhibitions to destructive behavior.

1. The actual or perceived (and usually some mix) unavailability of alternative political means to achieve one’s ends. The capacity to work through political parties or potentially effective social movements should tame groups and draw them into the political process, giving them a stake in the system. I would not push this insight so far as some, who suggest that “the more democratic the political environment, the more likely ethnopolitical groups will be to voice opposition nonviolently” (Gurr and Harff 1994: 85), because democratic political systems have historically experienced a great deal of political violence (Rapoport and Weinberg 2001), but, in specific historical situations, the availability of non-violent institutional options is an important consideration. Critical is a rationalized justice system in which all parties can see some likelihood of being treated fairly in the long-run. This is part of the point made below by M. Sani Umar that an effective state is often more important in regulating ethnic violence than the form of government.

1. Opportunities for the use of violence. Under effective totalitarian regimes, the state itself is able to repress not only violence but also political protest in general. Less repressive and regulatory regimes are relatively more open to group violence, but the operative presump-tion—just enunciated—is that they provide more alternatives to it. The collapse of political regimes also means a failure in their ability to stem violence and therefore a greater opportunity for groups to rely on it. Finally, one of the observations made is that some of the characteristics of globalization—open borders and points of entry, increased migration and geographical mobility—also constitute a greater opportunity for violence, in that the ease of movement also increases difficulty of detection and prevention.

1. Access to the means of violence. This might be regarded as a sub-type of “opportunity,” but it deserves special mention. One of the characteristics of the episodes of genocide and ethnic cleansing in the past century is a regime that trumpets an ideology that is both nationalistic and ethnically or religiously specific, identifies “others” as inferior or treacherous (Naimark 2001: 4801). As a state regime, the ruling group typically enjoys an effective monopoly on legitimate violence, as well as control of army and police forces. Minorities that are typically victims of genocide or “ethnic cleansing” are typically weaker in their capacity for violence, and, when they do possess access to the means of violence, the result is more likely to be a civil war than an “ethnic cleansing.”

As with other formulations contained in these remarks, I regard the several points made not so much as established social-science principles but rather as the most likely leads into systematic historical and comparative research.

 A Concluding Note

My strategy has been this. For all the complex packaging of our concerns—globalization, localization, dispossession, identities and identity politics, and violence—I have engaged in an unpacking operation. Many dozens of explanatory variables have been assembled in the literature in the effort to establish connections among these ingredients. I have taken a critical attitude toward the adequacy of many of these explanations—concentrating especially on their vagueness and diffuseness—but above all I have attempted to pinpoint the precise locations in these connections where these various explanations assume their greatest explanatory power. I have carried out this strategy in the context of an article of faith: that to disaggregate large classes of variables and to specify their respective roles is the most fruitful way in which to generate a better understanding of the major cultural and social forces that generate violence and allow it to be regulated. To obtain better purchase on the sources of violence and our ability to reduce its harmful effects by social and political regulation requires this type of disaggregation as a critical first step.

 References

<biblio>

Appadurai, A. 2001. “Globalization, Anthropology of.” In International Encyclopedia of the Social andBehavioral Sciences, edited by Neil J. Smelser and Paul B. Baltes, 9: 6266–71. Oxford, Elsevier.

Benedict, K. 2001. “Global Governance.” In International Encyclopedia of the Social and Behavioral Sciences, edited by Neil J. Smelser and Paul B. Baltes, 9: 3232–37. Oxford: Elsevier.

Beyer, P. 2001. “Globalization, Subsuming Pluralism, Transnational Organizations, Diaspora, and Postmodernity.” In International Encyclopedia of the Social and Behavioral Sciences, edited by Neil J. Smelser and Paul B. Baltes, 9:6287–92. Oxford: Elsevier.

Burtless, G., R. Lawrence, R. Litan, and R. Shapiro. 1998. Globaphobia: Confronting Fears about Open Trade. Washington, DC: Brookings Institution Press.

Castles, S. 2001. “Migration: Sociological Aspects.” In International Encyclopedia of the Social and Behavioral Sciences, edited by Neil J. Smelser and Paul B. Baltes, 114: 9824–28. Oxford: Elsevier.

Connor, Walker. 2002. “A Primer for Analyzing Ethnonational Conflict.” In Ethnic Conflict: Religion,Identity, and Politics, edited by S. A. Giannokos. Athens: Ohio University Press.

Donnan, Hastins, and Thomas M. Wilson. 1999. Borders: Frontiers of Identity, Nation and State. New York: Oxford University Press.

Gurr, Ted Robert. 2000. People Versus States: Minorities at Risk in the New Century. Washington, DC: United States Institute of Peace Press.

Gurr, Ted Robert, and Barbara Harff. 1994. Ethnic Conflict in World Politics. Boulder, CO: Westview Press.

Haas, Ernst. 2001. “International Organization.” In International Encyclopedia of the Social and Behavioral Sciences, edited by Neil J. Smelser and Paul B. Baltes, 11: 7819–24. Oxford: Elsevier.

Hardin, Russell. 2001. “Identity: Social.” In International Encyclopedia of the Social and Behavioral Sciences, edited by Neil J. Smelser and Paul B. Baltes, 11: 7166–70. Oxford: Elsevier.

Held, David. 1996. Democracy and the Global Order: From the Modern State to Cosmopolitan Governance. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press.

Held, David, and Anthony McGrew. 2002. Globalization and Anti-Globalization. Cambridge: Polity Press.

Huntington, Samuel P. 1991. The Third Wave: Democratization in the Late Twentieth Century. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press.

Jänick, M., and H. Weider (eds.). 1997. National Environmental Policies. Berlin: Springer.

Langhorne, Richard. 2001. The Coming of Globalization: Its Evolution and Contemporary Consequences. New York: Palgrave.

Langlois, S. 2001. “Identity Movements.” In International Encyclopedia of the Social and Behavioral Sciences, edited by Neil J. Smelser and Paul B. Baltes, 11: 7162–66. Oxford: Elsevier.

Naimark, N. M. 2001. “Ethnic Cleansing, History of.” In International Encyclopedia of the Social andBehavioral Sciences, edited by Neil J. Smelser and Paul B. Baltes, 7: 4799–4802. Oxford: Elsevier.

Oberschall, Anthony. 1973. Social Conflicts and Social Movements. Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice-Hall.

Olson, Mancur. 1965. The Logic of Collective Action: Public Goods and the Theory of Groups. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Olzak, S. 2001 “Ethnic and Racial Social Movements.” In International Encyclopedia of the Social and Behavioral Sciences, edited by Neil J. Smelser and Paul B. Baltes, 7: 4796–4799. Oxford: Elsevier.

Rapoport, David C., and Leonard Weinberg (eds.). 2001. The Democratic Experience and Political Violence. London and Portland, OR: Frank Cass.

Richardson, J. 1982. Policy Styles in Europe. New York: Allen and Unwin.

Robertson, R. 2001. “Globality.” In International Encyclopedia of the Social and Behavioral Sciences, edited by Neil J. Smelser and Paul B. Baltes, 9: 6354–58. Oxford: Elsevier.

Rokkan, Stein, and Derek W. Urwin. 1982. “Introduction: Centres and Peripheries in West Europe.” In The Politics of Territorial Identity: Studies in European Regionalism. London: Sage Publications.

Said, Abdul A., and Luiz R. Simmons. 1976. “Introduction.” In Ethnicity in an International Context, edited by Abdul A. Said and Luiz R. Simmons. New Brunswick, NJ: Transaction Publishers.

Samarasinghe, S. W. R. de A. 1990. “Introduction.” In Secessionist Movements in Comparative Perspective, edited by Ralph R. Premdas, S. W. R. de A. Samarasinghe, and Alan B. Anderson. New York: St. Martin’s Press.

Scherrer, Christian. 2002. Structural Prevention of Ethnic Violence. New York: Palgrave Macmillan.

Smelser, Neil J. 1962. Theory of Collective Behavior. New York: Free Press.

Smelser, Neil J. 1997. Problematics of Sociology: The Georg Simmel Lectures 1995. Berkeley: University of California Press.

Tarrow, Sidney G. 1994. Power in Movement: Social Movements, Collective Action, and Politics. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Tilly, Charles. 2001. “Violence, Public.” In International Encyclopedia of the Social and Behavioral Sciences, edited by Neil J. Smelser and Paul B. Baltes, 24: 16206–11. Oxford: Elsevier.

Tilly, Charles. 2002. Stories, Identities, and Political Change. Lanham, MD: Rowman and Littlefield.

Wilkins, David E. 2002. Indian Politics and the American Political System. Lanham, MD: Rowman and Littlefield.

Wilkins, David E., and Deloria Vine. 1999. Tribes, Treaties, and Constitutional Tribulations. Austin: University of Texas Press.

Williams, R. M. 2001. “Ethnic Conflict.” In International Encyclopedia of the Social and Behavioral Sciences, edited by Neil J. Smelser and Paul B. Baltes, 7: 4806–10. Oxford: Elsevier.

</biblio>

* Part I: Forging New Identities

 3. The Musha Rebellion as Unthinkable: Coloniality, Aboriginality, and the Epistemology of Colonial Difference

Leo T.S. Ching

<quote>

From all aspects, their brutality was truly detestable.... But I personally felt, somehow with virtuous persuasion and proper guidance, I would want to have them on the front line as part of the military under our command for future emergency. I remember this kind of idea came naturally to me.

<right>

---Hattori Heijirô, 1931 (Hayashi 2000:41)

</right>

</quote>

Hattori was the staff officer to the subjugation army convened by the colonial administration following the 1930 Musha Rebellion. Nearly half of the population of the six aboriginal groups (1,373 at the time) where three hundred or so men participated in the uprising were either killed by the punitive force or committed suicide themselves. The remaining population was further depleted when the colonial administration conspired and launched an assault on the defenseless internment camp with the pro-Japanese aboriginal groups the following April, widely known as the second Musha Incident. Overall, only 298 survived the attack with 153 men (few above the age of fifteen) and 145 women. The six groups were reduced to one with two-thirds of their population annihilated. Hattori's observation proved prophetic eleven years later when fifty young men from the Musha reservation "volunteered" for the Imperial army and were sent off to the Philippines along with five hundred other "volunteers." The "detestable brutality" of the aborigines, through "virtuous persuasion and proper guidance," was transformed into civilized bravery under the command and demand of late-colonial exigency.

In retrospect, Hattori's "natural" idea seems to have sutured two contradictory events, the Musha Rebellion and wartime "voluntarism," into a dominant colonial narrative of converting the brutal "savage" to brave "volunteer" through ideological colonial-state apparatus, that is, the policies of assimilation and imperialization. The "voluntarism" exhibited by the aborigines can be then understood in terms of either the affect of colonial psychology or the instrumentality of post-Musha colonial policy. On the one hand, it is to interpret the aborigine identification as the manifestation of the latent "inferiority complex" and "dependency complex" of the colonized propagated by thinkers such as Octave Mannoni (1990).[1] The aborigine's "desire" to become "Japanese," to fight for the emperor and the Japanese nation is described as the innate "dependency complex" of the natives and then ascribed to their alleged unconscious “desire” to be colonized. The remarkable identification with the colonizer could be attributed to the “simplistic” if not the “retarded” psychic make-up of the aborigines given their undermost positionality in the overall colonial hierarchy.[2] On the other hand, one can attribute the subjective constitution of aborigine colonial identity to the objective and generalized (mis)representation of Japanese colonial ideology and the policies of assimilation and imperialization. The dramatic transformation from a “rebellious savage” to a “Japanese soldier” is scripted and effected by the success of the colonial regime of power through the institutionalization of education, administration, and welfare programs. That is, the unruly savages have been successfully “modernized” through colonial tutelage.

Needless to say, this linear and evolutionary account of the aborigine’s coming-into-being is embedded in and generated by what Anibal Quijano (2000) calls the “coloniality of power.” One constitution of the coloniality of power is the classification and reclassification of the planet population wherein the concept of “culture” becomes crucial in delineating and discriminating peoples in their relative positionalities to the omnipresent and omnipotent “West” through the dichotomous schemata of underdevelopment/development, premodern/modern, incivility/civility, etc. Furthermore, what is crucial for the exercise of the coloniality of power is the institutional structure that functions to articulate and manage such classification and reclassification: the colonial administration and, in the case of aborigines, the anthropological apparatus that ensures knowledge production serves the colonial will to dominate, exploit, and in the worst scenario, annihilate. The coloniality of power thus embodies an epistemological perspective from which to articulate the meaning and profile of the matrix of power and from which the production of knowledge could be channeled. This epistemological perspective takes the form of a universalist and hegemonic imposition where the colonizer is always prescribed with the production of knowledge, of the “known,” and the colonized is relegated to the recipient of that knowledge, of the “unknown.” The linear and evolutionary narrative of the aborigine subject presupposes the monotopic hermeneutics of the all-knowing colonial apparatus that elides and conceals the irreducible contradiction of the colonial condition.

This chapter is an attempt to disrupt and displace the all-knowing coloniality of power regarding the Musha Rebellion and the subsequent voluntarism by introducing the notion of what Michel-Rolph Trouillot calls “unthinkability” regarding historical events (Trouillot 1995). I want to suggest that the 1930 Musha Rebellion constituted a similar unthinkability within Japanese colonial epistemology. The Rebellion was unthinkable in two temporalities: the event itself and the subsequent “volunteerism.” The event itself was beyond the comprehensibility of Japanese colonial knowledge because it was instigated by a relatively “enlightened” and “assimilated” aboriginal group. The event was unthinkable because it was incommensurable with the discourse of colonial benevolence. A decade later, despite the near elimination of its entire population, some descendants of the aborigines “volunteered” for the Japanese war effort. This volunteerism constituted a second unthinkability from the perspective of postcoloniality where postwar Japanese intellectuals could not fathom the motivation of the aborigines. Volunteerism was unthinkable because it was incomprehensible in light of colonial violence. The unthinkability of colonial benevolence and violence, despite their apparent difference in relation to Japanese colonial rule, converges in the epistemology of colonial difference. Colonial difference refers to the radical incommensurability between the colonizers and the colonized, not as essentialized categories, but as a structural cleavage and irreconcilable condition of being within the colonial system. The unthinkablility points to a Japan-centrism that is unable to think beyond the limit of its own colonial design, that its mode of knowing is always already delimited by colonial difference despite the desire for reconciliation and rehabilitation. Colonial difference embodies the general contradiction of Japanese colonial discourse as it vacillates between the politics of difference and the politics of identity. The unthinkability is therefore symptomatic of the failures of colonial and postcolonial attempts to regulate violence.

The 1930 Musha Rebellion, or what came to be known as the Musha Incident (musha jiken) in the official discourse, was an organized attack on the Japanese led by three hundred Taiyal aborigines that left one hundred and thirty four Japanese dead, including many women and children. It marked one of the largest and bloodiest uprisings against the Japanese in Taiwan’s colonial history. The rebellion was devastating not only to the colonial authority, but also to the Japanese colonial projects and their relationships to the aborigines in general. This “immense scandal” (daifushôji) and “surprise of all surprises” (igaichû no igaiji) shocked imperialist Japan for several reasons. First of all, the perpetrators were from what the colonial officials have praised as the most “enlightened and compliant” of all aboriginal territories with relatively higher living and education standards. Secondly, two of the distinguished aborigine police Dakkis-nobin and Dakkis-naui (Japanese names Hanaoka Ichirô, Hanaoka Jirô respectively) who were groomed and lauded as symbols of Japanese colonial benevolence and tutelage, committed suicide instead of forewarning the authority or persuading the rebels to surrender. Thirdly, the killing appears to have been premeditated and methodical from the strategized pre-attacks on the police stations peripheral to Musha and the indiscriminate slaying of Japanese regardless of age and gender. Finally, the rebellion occurred in the midst of a global economic crisis that further strained the viability of Japanese capitalism and its overseas colonial enterprise. Many metropolitan and colonial officials feared that the Musha Incident would spark nationalist movements and stimulate class antagonisms not only in colonial Taiwan but also colonial Korea, and perhaps, in Japan itself (Tai 1981). The incredulity and agitation caused by the insurgence consumed the colonial authority to the extent that the subsequent subjugation campaign mobilized approximately 3,000 military and police forces (against 300 rebels) and deployed internationally banned poisonous gas with the clear aim to decimate the rebelling population.[3]

The massive and relentless murders of not only the rebels but also their entire tribal population only serve to underscore the shock and “unthinkability” of the rebellion in the minds of the colonial administration. In his general argument that silences are constitutive to historical narrative, Michel-Rolph Trouillot points to the Haiti Revolution as unthinkable in Western colonial epistemology: “The events that shook up Saint-Dominguez from 1791 to 1804 constituted a sequence for which not even the extreme political left in France or in England had a conceptual frame of reference. They were ‘unthinkable’ facts in the framework of Western thought” (Trouillot 1995: 82). Trouillot’s argument is not that eighteenth-century men and women should have thought about the fundamental equality of humankind, thus the possibility of violent revolt against the colonial regime, but that they could not have done so in the very historical limit of their epistemology. This structure of limitation is grounded in the knowledge of the ontological nature of conquered people, which, in turn, constructs a certain ideal of “man.” In coloniality, non-European groups are forced to enter into various philosophical, ideological, and practical schemes that recognized degrees of humanity. Colonialism provided the most potent impetus for the transformation of European ethnocentrism into scientific racism. The practice of slavery in the Americas secured the blacks' position at the bottom of the human world. The ontological principles behind the colonialist enterprise, namely that the differences between forms of humanity were not only of degree but of kind, not historical but primordial. The silencing of the Haitian revolution is therefore a general silencing of slavery, colonialism, and violence in historiography (Trouillot 1995: 82).

The notion of unthinkability as a structure of limitation of thought is useful in drawing the compatibility between Western and Japanese colonial discourse. The Western conviction that slaves could not envision freedom, let alone formulate strategies for gaining and securing such freedom, was based not so much on empirical evidences as on ontology, an implicit organization and classification of the world and its inhabitants. The subhuman designation of the Taiwanese aborigines was clearly spoken by the fourth Governor General Kodama Gentarô in his policy of "savage management" after the military suppression of Han-Taiwanese guerrillas in the "plains." Kodama had initially envisioned a total "extinction" of the aborigines. For Kodama, the natives are "stubbornly stupid" and are equivalent to "wild beasts" therefore difficult to properly "rein in." Although they might "evolve" in time, it is best in the interest of the colonial administration to dispose of them entirely (Kondo 1992: 36). Given the impossibility of eliminating the entire aborigine population and the practical needs to exploit the rich resources of the aboriginal territories, subsequent colonial policies have followed a more moderate "intimidate first, cultivate later" dictum of gradual assimilation. The tropes that placed aborigines in various degrees and categories of savagery to civility, however, remained consistent in Japanese colonial discourse.

It is this contradiction between savagery and civility within colonial discourse that confers the paradoxical nature of its unthinkability. On the one hand, the aborigines are "stubbornly stupid" subhuman forms incapable of rational thoughts, not to mention formulating and organizing military operations. On the other hand, the policy of gradual assimilation has brought the brethren ever closer to civility where their transgression is also inconceivable. The Musha Rebellion was unthinkable because Musha had "progressed" to semi-civility through colonial development. In 1930, Musha was considered by the colonial administration as the symbol of colonial benevolence and as the model of “savage management.” The writer Sato Haruo succinctly captured the semi-civility of Musha and the improbability of savagery in his visit to the island colony in 1920. Upon hearing a minor aboriginal disturbance mistakenly attributed to the Musha aborigines, Sato writes:

<quote>

There is suspicion about this rumor [that all the Japanese in Musha were killed in an aborigine uprising]. Musha is probably the premier city in the savage territory. There are more than a hundred Japanese residing there. As a result, the aborigines there shouldn’t be that barbarous. It is unthinkable that over a hundred Japanese could have been murdered.

<right>

(Uno 1981: 84)

</right>

</quote>

The disturbance that Sato referred to did not occur at Musha, but at Saramao where seven Japanese were killed. It was Musha’s relative proximity to civility, its designation as the “premier city in the savage territory,” that a mass revolt against the Japanese was unthinkable. The unthinkable therefore operates as a phenomenological barrier that occludes the contradiction between “city” and “savage territory,” between “civility” and “savagery.” As we shall see in a moment, it is a return to the discourse of savagery and bestiality, of the incapability to civility that colonial discourse tried to cope with the unthinkable that ten years later became a reality.

The initial unthinkability of the aboriginal uprising demanded a secondary rationalization that formed a system of knowledge capable of making sense of the event’s cause and effect on the one hand, and the diffusion and repression of the event itself on the other. Put differently, the trauma of the unthinkable must be displaced through a rational regime of colonial administrative power: historiography, investigations, reports, and management recommendations. Japanese colonial authority conducted a number of investigations and commissioned a number of reports on the Musha rebellion and its aftermath.[4] Compared to earlier official accounts of the uprising, An Account of the Musha Incident is by far the most complete and meticulous, and which includes much new evidence not found in other such reports. From the beginning of Japanese colonial policy toward the aborigine to the Musha Incident, from the subsequent subjugation mission to the final internment of the surviving aborigines, the report charts in detail the development and demise of the rebellion. For the context of our discussion, I want to call attention to what the report claims as the underlying motives for the aboriginal revolt. I will summarize them as follows:

1. The inherent characteristics of the savages. Despite the tireless effort of the colonial authority to civilize the savages, their natural propensity for violence, especially the practice of headhunting and their lack of guilt-consciousness (zaiakukan wo yûsezu) toward such practice, cannot be eradicated in a short period of time. Their innate infantilism, stupidity and stubbornness (ganmei korô) have foolishly led to the belief that they can recuperate bygone glory by killing a few Japanese.

1. The rebellious spirit of Mona-rudao, the chief of the Maebo tribe. Mona-rudao, the likely leader of the revolt, has harbored subversive plans (fuon keikaku) against the colonial authority stemming from the failed marriage between his sister Tewas-rudao and the Japanese police officer, Kondo Gisaburô.

1. The discontent of Bassao-Mona with his family. Bassao-mona, the second son of Mona-rudao who led the massacre was known to be involved in a marital dispute and carried out this headhunting ritual to demonstrate his bravery to another woman.

1. The beating of police officer Yoshimura. Twenty days prior to the incident, on October 7 at approximately 10:15 a.m., officer Yoshimura was beaten by an intoxicated Dadao-mona, the eldest son of Mona-rudao, for refusing a drink to celebrate the wedding of an aborigine couple. Fear of reprisal could have precipitated his determination to rebel.

1. The laxness of police discipline. A certain number of police officers have abused their authority by taking advantage of aboriginal labor and women and this has brought discontent to the natives.

1. The problems of marriage between police officers and savage women. As a measure of aboriginal rule, colonial authority has instituted a practice of marrying Japanese police officers and daughters of influential aboriginal men. Many failed matrimonies have incurred antipathy towards the authority.

1. The great number of construction works prior to the incident. The tremendous amount of labor power required for the nine or so construction works has brought a number of complaints by the savages.

1. The construction at the Musha elementary school. The construction required the transporting of timber through perilous terrains and thick forests. And the savages were ordered to carry the timber on their shoulders instead of dragging it on the ground as they are accustomed to do. Compounded by low wages and delays in payments, many savages have secretly harbored hatred for Japanese officers.

1. The scheme of the delinquent savages. Piho-sappo of the Hôgô tribe and his cousin Piho-waris, both inherently violent and with loose morals incited fellow savages’ disapproval of the elementary school construction.

1. The plotting by the Taiwanese. Although this is uncertain, there is suspicion that some Taiwanese living in Musha were involved in plotting the killing.

1. Flaws in administrative personnel. A few overly repressive police officers, the scarcity of long-term personnel in suspicious tribes, and lack of communication between police officers and savages have contributed to the strained relationship. The dwindling number of police officers can be attributed to the general reduction in colonial expenditures.[5]

The report concludes this segment of its investigation by linking the aboriginal discontent directly to the construction problems with the Musha elementary school lodgings and the agitation of a few “rebellious savages.” Without qualified and understanding police officers, the report laments, “For those who do not know ways to redress through letters and petitions (tôsho tangan) as would civilized beings (bunmeijin), it was inevitable that they would resort to such measure” (Tai 1981: 369–382).Not surprisingly, the report incriminates the rebels for their “primitivity,” their propensity for violence and their “stupidity and stubbornness” that led to the inevitable bloodshed despite the efforts in colonial assimilation. I have listed the official report on the causes at great length not so much to reiterate the expected rhetoric of colonial authority, but to point to the tactic of diffusion that the report employs. An Account of the Musha Incident lists eleven items as the possible causes to emphasize the overdetermined nature of the incident. The varying and multiple considerations given to the incident reflect not so much the complexity inherent to the uprising as the lack of preparation of the colonial authority in the midst of the largest extermination in the supposedly most “developed” aboriginal settlement. The historical contradiction between primitive bestiality and colonial civility could only be temporarily contained through evoking and stressing the utterly contingent and personal motivations behind the uprising. The construction surrounding Musha elementary school and the required timber transport are thus held up as the pivotal source of aboriginal discontent; the individuated defiance of a few aboriginal men and the misconduct of some Japanese police officials are cast as the sole instigators to the incident. The tactic of diffusion displaces the trauma of the unthinkable into individuated contingencies and the rebellion is devoid of its political content. By diffusing the incident into a circumstantial and personal effort, the colonial officials aimed to deflect any interrogation and criticism of colonial authority itself.

From the perspective of the metropolitan left, the Musha uprising was equally unthinkable. It was not that they were not critical of Japanese colonialism, indeed they were. Rather, they were similarly incapable of transcending the epistemological limit to colonial difference. Kôno Mitsu and Kawakami Jôtarô, associates of the Japan People's Party (minshûtô), published two reports based on their brief January 1931 visit to Musha directly refuting the colonial government's findings.[6] In contrast to colonial administration's tendency to locate the cause of the incident in the particular customs and inherent psychology of the savages, Kôno and Kawakami (1931) argued that one must probe into the "economic meaning" and attend to the "suggestive meanings given by the ethnic background" in locating the truth surrounding the Musha incident. They write:

<quote>

In short, to explain "the Musha incident" from simply the perspective of the savages' disposition or particular psychology is completely off the mark. "The Musha incident" is definitely not a question of "anthropology." To regard this as a general maltreatment of the savages through "coerced labor and non-payment" is to know only one aspect but not the others. "The Musha incident" is definitely not a simple "question of humanism." Furthermore, it is insufficient to understand it as police oppression based on police autocracy and impropriety. "The Musha incident" is not a question of political responsibility solely in terms of a "disciplinary problem." Kôno and Kawakami

<right>

(1931: 124)

</right>

</quote>

For Kôno and Kawakami, the Musha incident was not an aberration but embodied "the question of people's liberation, labor, and problems relating to the entirety of colonial rule.” The Musha incident thus reflected the age of imperialism--the discontent and resistance to colonialism’s exploitation and racial discrimination. Only by considering these fundamental factors of colonial rule, they argue, can the “truth” regarding the uprising be known.

Contrary to the colonial authority’s emphasis on the transient and contingent nature of the incident, Kôno and Kawakami insist on the systemic and structural failure of colonial rule itself by pointing out two separate, but interrelated areas of concern: the so-called “savage problem” and the errors of Japanese colonial policy. First of all, they seek to expose the problems of aboriginal rule through the various “transformations” of aboriginal lives affected by colonial policy. The forced shift of the basic aboriginal lifestyle from hunting and gathering to farming and grazing, the change from a primitive economy to the regulations of a capitalist economy, and the conversion from “independently employed subject” to wage laborer, they argue, exasperated the livelihoods of the aborigines. As far as the Musha incident is concerned, the forced labor imposed for the purpose of timber transport and the delay in wage payments, they argue, must be considered as a threat to their lifestyle. Furthermore, the spread of education and knowledge, what the colonial government lauded as the “civilizing policy” (kyôka seisaku), inevitably instilled within the aborigine intellectuals their “ethnic self-awareness” (minzokuteki jikaku) and the consciousness of colonial inequality. Secondly, they point to the Musha incident as an exposure to the two basic flaws in Japanese imperialism: autocracy and the lack of accountability. Citing the various aboriginal upheavals prior to the Musha incident, Kôno and Kawakami conclude that rather than due to a few licentious police officers and a few scandalous Japanese-aboriginal relations, unlawfulness and misconduct were construed as the “overall tendency of the colonial government” (sôtôseiji no zenteki keikô).

Kôno and Kawakami’s intervention is both insightful and damaging to the official response to the Musha uprising considering the brevity of their stay and the intensity of colonial censorship. They saw the Musha incident as a manifestation of deep-rooted and extensive colonial mismanagement rather than an abrupt and contingent event. Nonetheless, their analysis is marred by the kind of totalizing generalization and patronizing attitude that are symptomatic of metropolitan leftist discourse. Although understandably sympathetic to the plight of the aborigines, they never confront or come to terms with, the wretched of the earth themselves. This is evident in the longer and more detailed report penned by Kôno (1931) alone in “Exposing the Truth of the Musha Incident.” Ironically, the report also exposes the inherent flaw of anti-colonial leftist discourse, that the objective political resistance is incompatible with the subjective “primitivity” of the aborigines themselves. The report appears to be operating on two different registers: one that of an “objective” investigator, and the other of a “subjective” voyeur. Much akin to that of travelers to an exotic locale, Kôno describes his state-of-mind upon entering Musha as filled with various emotions: “impatience,” “anxiety,” “restlessness,” “anticipation” and “apprehension.” Protected by the colonial police, his party traced the sites and remains of the uprising, witnessing the markings of a beheaded aboriginal woman, the blood stain on the sword that decapitated the provincial governor, the cave that was a hideout for the rebel leader Mona-rudao. While wondering whether these vestiges of violence could serve as the “key to the truth,” they toured a settlement of a pro-Japanese aborigine camp, facing the natives for the first time. Amidst the hustle and bustle of aborigines conducting daily activities and chores relating to the subjugation effort, Kôno wonders:

<quote>

Raising the flags with a blue cross (the blue cross flag indicates pro-Japanese savages), the savages are running about in large numbers. We were told they are ordered to collect weapons. There is an inexplicable appeal to those who strut by carrying the aboriginal swords. The pitifulness of those who greet us with “konnichiwa, konnichiwa” as they come and go. After all, we only saw them as lovable and couldn’t find them detestable at all. Where is the brutality supposedly concealed in them? Who is responsible for the incident?

<right>

(Kôno 1931:345, italics mine)

</right>

</quote>

Confronted by the unexpected docility and gentility of the natives, Kôno is left to ponder how the same domesticated aborigines are capable of instigating one of the bloodiest attacks on the Japanese. After spending an entire day at Musha, Kôno laments that they still couldn't come close to the "truth" of the incident. The rest of "Exposing" echoes "Speaking" in establishing the "labor problem" and the "ethnic problem" inherent in Japanese colonialism overall as the cause of the aboriginal revolt.

What is important here is the paradoxical disjuncture between "seeing" and "believing," between "appearance" and "truth" that undergirds metropolitan leftist discourse. Kôno and Kawakami's interrogation of the Musha incident is premised on their "total disbelief" of what the colonial authority has offered as the true causes of the rebellion. Their sense of mission is motivated by the uncovering and solving of this "mystery" behind official rhetoric and explanations. What this radical political gesture conceals, however, is that its operative strategy is incumbent upon their "believing" in what they "see" in the "appearance" of the natives who are "pitiful," "lovable," and "alluring." Put differently, whereas the colonial problematic is understood in its full complexity that requires multiple efforts of analysis and scrutiny, the "savages" simply exist in their simplicity and depthlessness, rendering themselves clearly to the perusing eyes of the metropolitan radicals. To this extent, Kôno and Kawakami reproduce the other side of the same coin of colonial denigration of which they accused the colonial authority: the romanticization of the natives. My intention here, pace Trioullot, is not to suggest that Kôno and Kawakami should have been mindful of their idealization of the natives, but rather that they couldn't have. Once the aboriginal resistance is characterized and categorized into the familiar metropolitan radical discourse of "labor problem" and "national liberation problem," it was not difficult for Kôno and colleagues to conclude that the Musha incident was a direct result of "autocracy," of "corrupted politics," of "bourgeois politics," and to hope that the investigation would become a "large bomb" to be used against imperialism, militarism, and autocracy. Between colonial denigration and leftist appropriation, between colonial oppression and leftist emancipation, are there any alternatives for the aborigines?

The official report on the Musha incident and Kôno and Kawakami's anti-official discourse, despite their opposing political persuasions, are equally motivated by their dualistic differentiation between "self" and "other, " "colonizer" and "colonized," "Japanese" and "savages." Whereas the ontological status of the first term is taken for granted, the second term of the binary can only exist either in its primitive bestiality or primeval beauty, as heinous perpetrators or helpless victims. We should of course not be surprised by the complicity between the official and oppositional discourses on the Musha incident given the political context in which these reports were circulated.[7] As long as the Musha incident is interpreted and debated within the arena of colonial administration and policymaking, any attempt at interrogating the fundamental contradiction between the colonizer and the colonized, the Japanese and the aborigines, is necessarily disavowed and foreclosed.

The postwar reconsideration of the Musha incident, with a handful of exceptions, did not resume until the late 1960s.[8] The belatedness in which a colonial event reappears in academic and public discourse could be attributed to the general process of Japan's decolonization on the one hand, and the specific marginalization of "Taiwan" in the consciousness of Japanese intellectuals on the other. Reflecting on the status of Taiwan studies in Japan, the Japan resident historian Tai Kuo-hui writes:

<quote>

At the time, it was in a rather strange atmosphere that China Studies in Japan made "One China" their keynote. And most of the people who sang the tune only paid lip service to it. Let us disregard the conservatives who maintained from the outset [the position of] "One China, One Taiwan." The "One China" people presupposed that "Taiwan is part of China." They regarded Taiwan as both an object of study and a place to visit as taboo, and filled their "heads" with the most barren apolitical formula and theory disguised as politics. This ungainliness has gone beyond "weirdness," and is truly pitiful.

<right>

(Tai 1981: 2)

</right>

</quote>

Tai’s criticism against the indifference and hypocrisy of Taiwanese studies in Japan must be contextualized within the geopolitics of the Cold War era. What is important here, however, is that Tai and his colleagues have chosen the Musha uprising as the panacea for the marginalization of Taiwanese studies in Japan. Tai cites two reasons for selecting the Musha incident as the first theme for their collaborative work: the highly politicized atmosphere of the time (the Vietnam war, the Cultural Revolution, and worldwide student protests) and the necessity for a topic that required a multidisciplinary approach and a solid ground for research. Most crucially, Tai and his colleagues intended “to clarify the tragic event of those most oppressed and marginalized, and to present their actual conditions to the world” (Tai 1981: 3). It is perhaps too easy in today’s academic climate, despite Tai’s own qualifications, to criticize him for not only conflating “academic” politics (the marginalization of Taiwanese studies in Japan) with “real” politics (the rebellion of the most deprived) but also appropriating the latter as a means to remedy the former.[9] It seems to me that what is important here is that in a historical moment when “the subaltern cannot speak,” due to either the lack of access or total annihilation, intellectual work that situates itself as a “relay” for the vision of the future is perhaps the only possible means of political and ethical responsibility. Silence is another form of complicity. One of Tai’s insights on scholarship surrounding the Musha incident is that the Japanese anthropologists and folk studies, which were the pioneers and handmaidens of colonial rule, and compiling and composing compendium of writings on aboriginal customs, languages, and socioeconomic conditions, are completely mum on the Musha uprising. Tai’s intention was to provide some voice to the general silencing of the Musha uprising in postcolonial Japan.

It is rather ironic that it is the “informal” ethnography--that of travel writing and interview rather than institutional anthropology--that constitutes the most interesting and mediating writing on the Musha incident in the postwar era.[10] The literary critic Ozaki Hotsuki writes optimistically of this postcolonial generation: “The scar of colonialism can perhaps be overcome by the generation that can view the former colony objectively as a foreign country. However, in order to do so, the autonomous recognition of experience (and its theorization) is perhaps necessary" (Ozaki 1971: 237). It is not clear to me how an "objective" relationship to an ex-colony constitutes a better approach to the legacy of imperialism, or that it is even possible to posit such a relationship in the first place, and just how experience can be understood independently from the objective condition of its possibility. While it is difficult to imagine how the "scar of colonialism" can ever be healed by generational change, Ozaki does succinctly profile the outlook of postcolonial writings on the Musha incident: whereas earlier writings on the incident had been mostly by those who had directly or indirectly experienced colonialism, the postwar writings are by those who have no immediate colonial experience. Despite, or rather in spite of their colonial non-affiliation, most of these writers are sympathetic to the plights of the aborigines and as a whole see the Musha incident as resistance against Japanese colonial rule. However, rather than interpreting the postwar writings in terms of generational change, I would like to argue that the "desire" for writing on Musha be understood as enabled by the historical experience of the aborigines as "volunteers" to the Japanese military in the post-Musha era. It is indeed this contradiction between opposition and collaboration, between mutinous savages and Japanese soldiers that concerns the postwar literature on Musha. It is this seemingly inexplicable and unthinkable shift from the "savage" anti-colonial resistance and imperial "civil" servitude that has preoccupied most of the postcolonial writings on the Musha incident.

In a valiant effort to reveal the Japanese colonial hypocrisy of "universal brotherhood," Katô Kunihiko spends a chapter in his book on the plight of the aboriginal "volunteers" (Katô 1979). Katô's documentation of "the unexpected legacy of imperialism" invariably conjoins the "aboriginal volunteers" and the Musha rebels, pondering the tremendous historical irony. [11] Katô is especially intrigued by his encounter with Aui, who despite having lost his father at the hands of the Japanese police during the uprising, enlisted for the Sixth Takasago Volunteer Army. It is not only that Aui's father, who apparently did not participate in the uprising, was killed, but he was also tortured and put to death as the Japanese colonial force sought revenge in the wake of the Musha incident. Thirteen years later, Aui became a "volunteer" for the imperial military. The central question concerning Katô is obviously: "how can we account for the divergence in those ten or so years?" According to the interview, Aui began attending the four-year public school curriculum the year following the Musha uprising. And it is in the school, Aui says, where he was taught the “Japanese spirit” (nihon seishin):

<quote>

Japanese education is all about the “Yamato damashi.” How can I put it? A kind of spirit.... We all imbibed the Japanese spirit: for the final victory and for the last five minutes. We also memorized songs. A man is to crown his life for the nation. To crown one’s life is to drop bombs in the South, isn’t it? And then, one’s body is to be scattered like a flower.... It means to die for the country. It is to follow orders regardless of being beaten or killed. This is all Japanese spirit. We all took in the Japanese spirit. This is because Japan ruled us for fifty years.

<right>

(Katô 1979: 132–133)

</right>

</quote>

Somehow, Katô finds this rather straightforward and instrumental answer insufficient as an explanation for Aui’s volunteerism. Without mentioning the death of Aui’s father, Katô invites Aui to speak about his willingness to enlist:

<quote>

We went on our own because we all learned the Japanese spirit. We all applied at the police substation. However, as I recall, there was also an order (to enlist): an order from the prefectural governor to the police to enlist a number of men. The police officer would then seek out a number of qualified men from the tribe. “ Will you go?” “Oh sure.” Everyone responded the same way. As long as we’re ordered to go, we will. This is the Japanese spirit. Can’t say no. On the surface it is voluntary, but it is the same as an order.

<right>

(Katô 1979: 133–134)

</right>

</quote>

Despite Aui’s claim that in the colonial context, the distinction between “voluntarism” and “order” are often indistinguishable, Katô is nonetheless still troubled by the apparent contradiction. Unable to suppress his impatience, Katô queries Aui directly about his enlisting in relation to the death of his father: “Mr. Aui, but you did know that your father was killed by the Japanese during the Musha incident, and you still went to war for Japan?” Aui’s response is surprisingly brief and mundane: “it is because we were taught the Japanese spirit.” Aui repeats the phrase “Japanese spirit” several times and emphasizes the role education played in instilling such an ideology. As others begin to join in the conversation, Katô decides to ask the final question: “Well, it might be awkward for me as a Japanese to pose such a question, but please tell me what exactly is the Japanese spirit?” To Katô’s supposedly penetrating inquiry, the former aboriginal soldiers collectively respond matter-of-factly: “The Total Mobilization of National Spirit” (kokuminseishin sôdôin), “Dogged Perseverance” (kennin jikyû), “To Die for the Nation” (kuni no tameni inochi wo suterukoto), and “To Die for the Emperor” (tennoheika no tame ni shinukoto) (Katô 1979: 134–135). With a deep sense of resignation Katô writes:

<quote>

At this point, I could not but make this strange consent. That is the only thing the ruling Japanese has taught them: nothing more nothing less. To those who are positioned in the lowest level of the colonial hierarchy, it is enough to just teach those ideas, to inculcate in these innocent children violent values and to beat into them the values of the imperial nation. With excruciating thought, I brought the interview to an end.

<right>

(Katô 1979:135)

</right>

</quote>

Hayashi Eidai expresses similar incredulity at the contradictory positionality of the aborigines in an extremely valuable contemporary photo documentation of Japanese rule in Taiwan (Hayashi 2000). After a brief discussion of the Musha uprising and the cruel subjugation by the colonial government, Hayashi rightly points to “imperialization through education” (kôkoku shinminka kyôiku) as the primary assimilation policy that the colonizer attempted in “altering the aborigine’s traditional world view, eradicating their ethnic spirit and introducing new ideas based on the imperial family and the Japanese nation.” Despite foregrounding the total mobilization of the ideological state apparatus, Hayashi, like Katô, is much concerned with the “about face” of the volunteers from Musha:

They were elementary school children during the Musha Incident. Twelve years later, why did they compose letters in blood and volunteer for the Takasago Volunteer Army? With their fathers and brothers massacred, Japanese should certainly be their enemy. This cannot be explained as solely the outcome of imperial education by the police.

Despite his interviewees’ chorus of “to become a Japanese soldier is the highest honor and to die for the emperor and the nation is the ultimate Japanese spirit,” Hayashi still finds himself puzzled by their seeming ideological responses. These “conversations” between anti-colonialists from the former colonizing nation and the nationalist aborigines from the ex-colony seems less of a “dialogue” than an “inquisition,” not entirely different from the high times of colonialism. This is because, to put it crudely, despite decolonization, the fundamental power relationship between the aborigines and the Japanese has remained the same. For the postwar Japanese sympathetic to the plights of the aborigines, the unusually “common” responses—statements that have been utterly refuted, if not repressed, in Japan since 1945—emerge as an aporia, an incomprehensibility, an anachronicity that reproduce the ghostly images of the Japanese themselves: a mimetic other that is “not quite, yet alike.”

Katô and Hayashi’s incredulity and frustration can perhaps be interpreted as working within the “regime of nationality.” For them, the identity of the aborigines, hence its difference is incommensurable with loyalty to the emperor and the Japanese nation especially in the aftermath of the Musha uprising. On the one hand, there is a metropolitan desire to seek “resistance” within the oppressed in an ahistorical and essentialized manner. The oppressed, because of their ontological and existential relationality to the oppressor, is by definition recalcitrant and potentially subversive. On the other hand, loyalty and submission is perceived within a one-to-one relationship between the “nation” and its “people.” Whereas it is completely “natural” for the Japanese to fall prey to the nationalist and imperialist ideology—”to die for the emperor and the Japanese nation”—it is considered an aberration, if not an outright abomination for the colonized aborigines to do so. What is being played out here is none other than a politics of identity where the aborigines are consumed and presumed in their “difference,” and that difference alone, to the Japanese, despite the fact that they “were” Japanese and imperial subjects during the colonial period. I am not suggesting that we should take the aborigines’ responses “literally” for they are surely mediated by the politics of postcolonialism and a renewed internal colonization. It is noteworthy that in a number of postwar Japanese reports on the aborigines, as in Katô’s case, the Japanese interlocutors are initially mistaken for government officials whom the aborigines think to have come to the remote mountainous regions from Japan to hear their redress. Since the defeat of Japan and the subsequent decolonization meant that those aboriginal “volunteers” were no longer “Japanese,” but were now “Chinese/Taiwanese” under the new regime, they have not only lost their owed back wages but also any compensation from the Japanese government. As most of these aborigines today live in dire poverty, the claim of patriotism and loyalty to the Japanese nation is a present day strategy of protesting against the “betrayal” of the former colonizer and an effort to maintain an economic possibility of reparation.

Economic imperatives aside, should we be surprised at the devotion the aborigines have displayed toward the Japanese colonizers in the wake of colonial re-articulation and reinforcement after the Musha incident?

Positioned in the abyss of the colonial hierarchy and deprived of any political and economic possibilities, to become a “Japanese soldier” was perhaps the only avenue to a perceived equality and agency for most of these “volunteers.” This is a historical condition not particular to the Taiwanese aborigines, but a general category of colonized existence vividly depicted by Albert Memmi:

<quote>

The first attempt of the colonized is to change his condition by changing his skin. There is a tempting model very close at hand--the colonizer. The latter suffers from none of his deficiencies, has all rights, enjoys every possession and benefits from every prestige. He is, moreover, the other part of the comparison, the one that crushes the colonized and keeps him in servitude. The first ambition of the colonized is to become equal to that splendid model and to resemble him to the point of disappearing in him.

<right>

(Memmi 1965: 120, italics mine)

</right>

</quote>

The advocacy and insistence of “sameness” perhaps strikes a dissonant chord in today’s overemphasized call for “difference” of cultural politics. But for the dispossessed, the contradiction between “savagery” and “civility,” the “colonized” and the “colonizer,” “natives” and “Japanese” can only be overcome through a strategic construction of “sameness” and “equality.” Not as an end in itself, but a temporary transcendence from the alienated and battered existence inflicted by colonialism. This process of interpellation, or what has come to be known as “imperialization” (kôminka), obviously points to the tenacity of Japanese colonial rule as much as to the desire of the aborigines to insert themselves as active agents in the making of history. It is in this self-affirmation that we might view the desire of “becoming Japanese” not simply as the substantiation of “false consciousness” but rather as the coming to terms with the trauma and the tragedy of the Musha incident. As Waris-piho, one of the few surviving aborigine soldier with his given Japanese name “Yonekawa” tattooed onto his right wrist, defends his decision to volunteer for the war: “By becoming a Japanese soldier, I thought to remove the disgrace that has been attached to the Musha incident. By enlisting, I would achieve the same honor as the Japanese. I have never feared death” (Hayashi 1996).

The unthinkability of the Musha uprising and subsequent voluntarism points to the epistemological and historical limit of Japanese colonialism in the construction and articulation of colonial difference. This does not mean however, that the colonized occupies a privileged position capable of overcoming or transcending that limitation. It is not my intention to resuscitate a positivity that constructs a totalizing and monolithic colonial formation that leaves no room for negotiation or resistance. Nor do I want to overlook the hesitation and irresolution in the construction of a colonial subject and the possibilities of recalcitrance implicit within that construction. I do want however, to argue that the condition of coloniality is best construed and apprehended not as “ambivalence” or “hybridity” but as “contradiction.” And that colonial policies and texts are ideology and practices that deny, conceal, and otherwise distort that very contradiction.[12] It is important to underscore here that differences alone do not necessarily produce contradiction; only when apparently different elements are grasped in their constitutive relationship, can certain of their features be abstracted as contradiction. This “incompatible development” within a “dependent” relationship in the colonial system is well-recognized by Fanon:

<quote>

The settler and the native are old acquaintances. In fact, the settler is right when he speaks of knowing “them” well. For it is the settler who has brought the native into existence and who perpetuates his existence. The settler owes the fact of his very existence, that is to say, his property, to the colonial system.

<right>

(Fanon 1963: 36)

</right>

</quote>

The interrelationship between the colonizer and the colonized is neither mutual nor equal, but rather it represents a perpetuation as required by the workings and structuring of colonialism. Ironically, it is precisely from this internal dynamics of the colonial system that contradiction becomes visible and the condition for change becomes possible. Fanon continues:

<quote>

The settler-native relationship is a mass relationship. The settler pits brute force against the weight of numbers. He is an exhibitionist. His preoccupation with security makes him remind the native out loud that there he alone is master. The settler keeps alive in the native an anger which he deprives of outlet; the native is trapped in the tight links of the chains of colonialism.

<right>

(1963: 54, italics mine)

</right>

</quote>

In other words, the colonial world of prohibitions and barriers, of confinements and barbed-wire entanglements, also assists in strengthening the inhibited aggressiveness and instilling the suppressed anger within the colonized. As the immanent contradiction unfolds into a “decisive struggle between the two protagonists,” there arises a possibility where the “whole social structure [can be] changed from the bottom up” (Fanon 1963: 35).

There are several advantages, I believe, in grasping colonialism and its discourse in terms of contradiction rather than ambivalence. First of all, contradiction retains the inevitable internal conflict of colonialism and its discourse as suggested by ambivalence, yet by virtue of its insistence on analyzing colonial economy in terms of structure, system, and agency, it avoids seeing the colonizer and the colonized as simply shifting positions in an indeterminate process of circulation that eventually renders the relation of power equivocal. Secondly, whereas ambivalence suggests the inner dissension within a colonial discourse through the conflicting economy of the psyche, thus risking an unproblematic articulation of the transcendental categories of psychoanalysis, contradiction traces the necessary internal movements and developments of colonialism as a historically contingent process that constitutes a qualitative difference from an earlier period. In other words, contradiction enables us to grasp changes in colonial attitude not through some external causes (transcendental or metaphysical) but through the inner workings and dynamics of the colonial apparatus itself.

Lastly, the subject constructed within the complex articulation of colonial ambivalence, in its refusal to determinacy or fixity, in the final analysis, offers little or no threat at all to the strategic operation of colonial discourse. Put differently, what ambivalence suggests then, is that since the enunciation of colonial discourse is already inevitably split, and invariably in constant slippage, the “resistance” of the colonized, by virtue of its constituting relationship to the dominant, is always present and effected. What this theoretical argument ultimately refuses then, is to come to terms with the colonized, with his or her struggles, since the colonized has always spoken within the ambivalence of colonial discourse without either the intention or the desire of the colonial subject. The deconstruction of colonial discourse does not mean the destruction of colonial economy. Contradiction, on the other hand, as a continuous process of internal relations simultaneously supporting and undermining one another in an uneasy equilibrium, intensifies as colonialism exerts more pressure and furthers its exploitation. As the contradiction within the colonial system becomes bigger, sharper, and more explosive, both the supporting and undermining movements become more intense, though not necessarily to the same degree. And it is within this intensified unfolding of contradiction that the hitherto suppressed antagonism between the colonizer and the colonized becomes a reality where the colonized “becomes unhinged, reorganizes itself, and in blood and tears gives birth to very real and immediate action” (Fanon 1963: 56). This is, however, not to subscribe to a teleological movement within contradiction and to prescribe a final resolution to the colonial question--although that is the utopic strategy to which anti-colonialist struggles must envision--but as a possibility that requires constant revision in relation to the changing predicament of its subaltern positions, not a predetermined site waiting for the final unfolding of History. In this formulation, contradiction therefore, must ultimately be viewed as an analytical category of colonialism, not a guarantor for total emancipation. It is indispensable to the interpreting and mapping of the partial resolution and the constant negotiation of colonialism and its discourse. As preexisting equilibrium breaks down, new ones are being constructed--as witnessed by neocolonialism replacing colonialism after decolonization, and today in the guise of transnational capitalism. In other words, unlike the notion of ambivalence that risks the danger of ignoring the inner workings of colonial discourse that permits gaps and slippage to be occupied by anti-colonialist resistance in the interest of maintaining its own equilibrium, contradiction is able to trace the readjustments, the partial concessions of the continuing colonial practices.

Notes

[1] For a critique of Mannoni's work, see Fanon (1967), chapter 4, "The So-Called Dependency Complex of Colonized Peoples."

[2] What makes these otherwise tenuous propositions even partially conceivable is the generally positive assessment by the surviving aborigine "volunteers" regarding their own experiences under Japanese colonial rule. Many of them sang praise for the way the Japanese military treated them "fairly" despite the fact they were deployed not as soldiers but as war workers (gunzoku) doing menial and perilous chores. Many listed the partings with their Japanese "compatriots" after the war as the most emotional event in their war experience. Many more reminisced fondly about their interactions with the Japanese during the colonial period. For examples, see interviews recorded by Suzuki Akira in Suzuki (1976).

[3] The following account and discussion of the Musha Rebellion and postcolonial interpretation of voluntarism are based on chapter 4 ("From Mutineers to Volunteers: The Musha Uprising and Aboriginal Representations of Savagery and Civility") of Ching (2001).

[4] Some examples of the official documents are: Mushaban sôjô jiken chôsa fukumeisho (The Commissioned Investigating Report on the Musha Savage Riot) in November 1930 (Ikoma 1930), Musha jiken no tenmatsu (An Account of the Musha Incident) (Taiwan Sôtôfu 1931), Musha shûgeki jiken gaiyô (An Outline of the Musha Assault) (Taiwan Sôtôfu 1932) in the following year, and Musha jikenshi (An Account of the Musha Incident) (Taiwan Sôtôfu 1934). I have relied on the more comprehensive and detailed Musha jikenshi published by the Police Bureau of the Taiwan Colonial Government for my subsequent discussion of the official discourse.

[5] Musha jikenshi, appended in (Tai 1981: 369–382).

[6] “Mushajiken no shinsô wo kataru” (Speaking the Truth on the Musha Incident) was written by both Kawakami and Kôno (1931) in the March issue of Kaizô. “Musha jiken no shinsô wo abaku” (Exposing the Truth of the Musha Incident) was authored by Kôno (1931) in Chuô Kôron’s March issue. They are hereafter referred to as “Speaking” and “Exposing,” respectively. The two reports are very similar to “Exposing,” providing more detailed point-by-point refutation of the official investigation.

[7] The Musha incident was hotly debated in the fifty-ninth parliamentary meeting.

[8] Nishikawa Mitsuru’s “Banka” (The Aboriginal Songs) was published in 1951. Sakaguchi Reiko published a number of short stories on the aborigines: “Bikki no hanashi” (The Tales of Bikki) (1953); “Banchi” (The Aboriginal Territory) (1953); “Musha” (1954); “Banchi no onna” (The Aboriginal Women) (1956).

[9] “Regardless of nationalities, we take the position that the current members cannot, and should not, write the history of these Taiwanese minorities on their behalf. In the near future and from within the aboriginal society, there certainly will be movements of identity search relating to the establishment of historical subject and the restoration of minority rights. We are foreseeing this development and looking forward to its realization.... Our collaboration is intended as a “relay” until the aboriginal writers begin their work.” (Tai 1981:4).

[10] Both imaginative and historical texts are continuously being produced since the late 1960s. Some include recollections by those who were directly involved in the incident: Egawa Hirotôri’s Musha no chizakura (The Bloody Blossoms of Musha) (1970) and Morita Shûnsuke’s Taiwan no mushajiken: shinsô to haikei (The Musha Incident of Taiwan: Its Facts and Background) (1976). Egawa served as the section chief of the Nôkô County Police Department and Morita was the section chief of Aboriginal Rule. Another text that treads the official line on Musha is Miyamura Keny’a’s Maebo nisshi (The Maebo Diary) (1965). For accounts of other publications on the Musha Incident in the postwar era, see Nakagawa Koichi, Umezawa Fumiko, Wakamori Tamio, and Nakamura Reiko, Musha jiken--Taiwan takasagozoku no hôki (The Musha Incident: The Uprising of Taiwan’s Takasago Tribe) (Tokyo: Sanseidô, 1980: 263–271).

[11] Naoki Sakai defines “the unexpected legacy of imperialism” as follows: “what is pointed to by the mass of displaced or oppressed people, including those refugees in diaspora, whose existence one would not be able to comprehend but for the imperialist maneuvers that destroyed their previous habitats.” See Sakai 1997: 19.

[12] Contradiction here is to be understood in its Marxist formulation in material dialectics as “the incompatible development of different elements within the same relation...between elements that are also dependent on one another.” See Ollman 1993: 15.

 References

<biblio>

Ching, Leo T.S. 2001. Becoming “Japanese”: Colonial Taiwan and the Politics of Identity Formation. Berkeley: University of California Press.

Egawa, Hirotôri. 1970. Musha no chizakura (The Bloody Blossoms of Musha). No publisher given.

Fanon, Frantz. 1963. The Wretched of the Earth. New York: Grove Press.

Fanon, Frantz. 1967. Black Skin, White Masks. New York: Grove Press.

Hayashi, Eidai. 1996. Shashin kiroku: Taiwan shokuminchi tôjishi, sanchi genjûmin to musha jiken, takasago giyûtai (Photo record: The History of Colonial Rule in Taiwan, The Indigenous People and the Musha Incident, The Takasago Volunteer Army). Tokyo: Azusa shoin.

Hayashi, Eidai. 2000. Taiwan No Yamatodamashi (The Japanese Spirit in Taiwan). Tokyo: Tôhô shuppan.

Ikoma, Takatsune. 1930. Mushaban sôjô jiken chôsa fukumeisho (The Commissioned Investigating Report on the Musha Savage Riot). Taiwan: Taiwan Takumushô.

Katô, Kunihiko. 1979. Isshidôjin no hate (The Consequences of “Universal Brotherhood”). Tokyo: Keisô shobô.

Kawakami, Jôtarô, and Kôno, Mitsu. “Musha jiken no shinsô wo kataru” (Speaking the Truth on the Musha Incident). Kaizô 13, 3 (1931): 121–132.

Kondo, Masami. 1992. “Taiwan sôtôfu no ‘riban’ taisei to musha jiken” (Taiwan governor general’s ‘savage management’ and the musha incident). In Kindai nihon to shokuminchi (Modern Japan and colonies). Tokyo: Iwanami shoten.

Kôno, Mitsu. “Musha jiken no shinsô wo abaku” (Exposing the Truth of the Musha Incident). Chuô kôron 46, 3 (1931): 340–352.

Mannoni, Octave. 1990. Prospero and Caliban: The Psychology of Colonization. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press.

Memmi, Albert. 1965. The Colonizer and the Colonized. Boston: Beacon Press.

Miyamura, Keny’a. 1965. Maebo nisshi (The Maebo Diary). Tokyo: Yôyôsha.

Morita, Shunsuke. 1976. Taiwan no mushajiken: shinsô to haikei (The Musha Incident of Taiwan: Its Facts and Background). Tokyo: Shinkôsha.

Nakazawa, Koichi, Umezawa, Fumiko, Wakamori, Tomio, and Nakamura, Reiko. 1980. Musha jiken—Taiwan takasagozoku no hôki (The Musha Incident: The Uprising of Taiwan’s Takasago Tribe). Tokyo: Sanseidô.

Nishikawa, Mitsuru. 1951. Banka (The Aboriginal Songs). Tokyo: Ningen no hoshisha.

Ollman, Bertell. 1993. Dialectical Investigations. New York: Routledge.

Ozaki, Hotsuki. 1971. Kyûshokuminchi bungaku no kenkyû (The Study of Literatures from Former Colonies). Tokyo: Gunsô shobô.

Quijano, Anibal. “Coloniality of Power, Eurocentrism, and Latin America.” Nepantla 1, 3 (2000): 533–580.

Sakaguchi, Reiko. “Bikki no hanashi” (The Takes of Bikki). Bungakusha 37 (1953).

Sakaguchi, Reiko. “Banchi” (The Aboriginal Territory). Shinchô 50, 10 (1953).

Sakaguchi, Reiko. “Banchi no onna” (The Aboriginal Woman) Shôsetsushinchô 10, 10 (1956).

Sakai, Naoki. 1997. Translation and Subjectivity: On “Japan” and Cultural Nationalism. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press.

Suzuki, Akira. 1976. Takasagozoku ni sasageru (For the Takasagozoku). Tokyo: Chûo kôron sha.

Tai, Kuo-Hui (ed.). 1981. Taiwan musha hôkijiken: kenkyû to shiryô (Taiwan Musha Uprising: Research and Primary Material). Tokyo: Shakai shisôsha.

Taiwan Sôtôfu. “Musha jiken no tenmatsu” (An Account of the Musha Incident). Nanpôdozoku 1, 1 (1931): 98–115.

Taiwan Sôtôfu. 1932. Musha shûgeki jiken gaiyô (An Outline of the Musha Assault). Taipei: Taiwan Sôtôfu.

Taiwan Sôtôfu Keimukyoku. 1934. Musha Jikenshi (An Account of the Musha Incident). Taipei: Taiwan Sôtôfu.

Trouillot, Michel-Rolph. 1995. Silencing the Past: Power and the Production of History. Boston: Beacon Press.

Uno, Toshiharu. 1981. “Taiwan ni okeru ‘banjin’ kyôiku” (‘Savage’ Education in Taiwan). In Tai Kuo-Hui (ed.), Taiwan musha hôkijiken: kenkyû to shiryô (Taiwan Musha Uprising: Research and Primary Material). Tokyo: Shakai shisôsha.

</biblio>

 4. Dispossession and Possession: The Maya, Identi/ties, and “Post” War Guatemala

Diane M. Nelson1

A drum is playing and the thin reedy song of the oboe-like chirimia in the Guatemalan highland town of Joyabaj. Dancers dressed in heavy costumes and thick wooden masks trace the back and forth steps of the Baile de la Culebra (Dance of the Snake) in which the snakes are real and poisonous. Dancers repeat the yearly rituals of being contracted to work on the sugarcane plantations on the steamy Pacific coast by an indigenous man dressed as a Spaniard in blonde wooden curls. He bends one over to use his back as a table to mark down men’s names and how much they owe for the drink he just bought them—an act I’ve seen repeated out of costume, that is, in “real” life. Meanwhile the contratista’s (contractor) two companions, his “wife” ([cross]dressed in the huipil[13] of the department capital—not a local woman) and his “shaman” or Maxe, in the traditional dress of nearby Chichicastenango, seem to be dallying behind his back. In the slow rhythms of the dance the workers plan a revolt against the labor contractor. Plans are made and rituals performed, including handling the snakes, which are placed under the master’s clothes while he is sleeping. After much struggle he dies and the workers rejoice. But their joy is short-lived as the Maxe or shaman performs spells that bring him back to life. Things seem to go back to the way they were.

When I had seen it (August 2000 and 2002) the audience yelled out “Maxe necio!” (naughty Maxe, a nickname for people from Chichicastenango—where everyone is reputed to be a shaman, isomorphing geographical with supernatural identities. People in Joyabaj call themselves Xoye. Both speak the K’iche’ language.) Like the Dance of the Conquest, which recapitulates a Spanish dance commemorating the expulsion of the Moors in 1492, in the Baile de la Culebra the people united are defeated. They enact many of the tensions around remembering and amnesia addressed in this book. These are dances about dispossession.

In February 1999, three years after a peace treaty was signed in Guatemala’s thirty-six-year civil war, the United Nations Commission for Historical Clarification (CEH) declared that under international law the state’s counterinsurgency campaign of the early 1980s (comprising 93 percent of all violence they investigated) constituted genocide against the Mayan people (the majority in Guatemala). They based this claim on four case studies, including Joyabaj’s neighbor, Zacualpa. Much of the violence in Zacualpa was carried out by “civil patrollers” from Joyabaj. While those giving the orders were mostly non-indigenous (ladino), both victims and perpetrators many of whom in turn feel transformed into victims by this experience were indigenous. This chapter cannot fully account for their becoming collaborators in genocide or having to live without clear-cut divisions between victimizer and those who suffer (Nelson, in press). More humbly, I attempt to give the reader a sense of some complexities of identification in a place where the war, overwhelming and horrifying as it was, was also a continuation of everyday life, and the “post” war is less a clear-cut period than an unstable process.

Possession has been called “9/10s of the law” and has, since the 1600s in the global north, been the sign of full humanity, the seat of rights. In the postcolony, those who once were their own king, now dispossessed by the armies (of soldiers, merchants, priests, and other camp followers) mobilized under this banner, struggle to possess something:land, control of their own labor, community bonds. These struggles increasingly focus on possession of culture, or identity, authenticity, “Mayan-ness.”

Indigenous people (and the anthropologists who study them) are involved in complex articulations of what possessing identity means and what role it might play in struggles over re-possession: of land and labor, tradition and modernity, a sense of moral worth, and the complex emotions surrounding collaboration in violence. In Guatemala, these struggles are waged in the context of 500 years of colonization and thirty-five years of civil war, which brought geno-and ethnocide, syncretism, ladinization, exclusion, and a myriad of divide and conquer counterinsurgency strategies. While indigenous people are the majority in Guatemala they are divided among twenty-some ethno-linguistic groups with extremely strong community identifications (like Maxe and Xoye), further fractioning this non-homogeneous category. The civil war has been characterized as a racist war, pitting non-indigenous (ladino) elites vs. the Maya. While indigenous people suffered by far the largest casualties (on both sides), possession of such a clear-cut explanatory framework is far from secure.

This chapter explores these struggles, but also pivots through an other meaning of possession the kind in The Exorcist, the more magical sense that one has been taken over, acted on by an outside force, bent to act to another, alien will. In the masquerade dancers have two faces. The dancing, often for 15 + hours a day for days on end, is very taxing, but dancers report feeling the power of those they represent helping them bear the physical and psychic challenge. Power is represented in the form of the labor contractor. In the dance, he is played by an indigenous man wearing a white mask. In the “real world,” the role was formerly held exclusively by ladinos but has been monopolized by indigenous men for at least a generation. Power is revivified through the Maxe, indigenous magic practiced by an aj q’ij or sacerdote Maya (priest), clearly identified as indigenous, but not local, and NOT a “good person” or gente decente, an important category of belonging in Mayan communities (Gonzalez 2002; McAllister 2002).[14] A magical possession is enacted through a neighbor who is indigenous but also Other. Another ghostly possession is pointed to by the indigenous men who will go down to the Coast to cut cane and pick coffee, but will barely pay back their debts after months of hard labor. Who acts and who is acted on when a nation’s spectral ties to transnational finance capital are incarnated in the laboring (and dancing) bodies of indigenous men; when the mass murder of war is carried out by local people dragooned into “Civil” Patrols; when hated oppressors seem to come back from the dead; and “Mayan” identity, once feared lost, is “revitalized”? With identity so dynamic, with the difficulties in mapping the fine line between heinous perpetrator and hapless victim, how is one to live the “identities of dispossession”?

 Global Dispossession

Perhaps this chapter, as part of the book’s project to “map contemporary world conflicts,” should have started with my own attempts to be a good person in a context of collaboration and duplicity. Perhaps I should have started with a joke that is popular in Guatemala: “Why are there no coups d’etat in the U.S.? Because there is no U.S. Embassy there.” Jenkins and Gottlieb encourage us to address the end of the Cold War, but as a U.S. citizen I am constantly drawn back to its beginning for Latin America: Guatemala, 1954, with the overthrow of the elected Arbenz government. I am drawn back every time I go to Guatemala and am identified (by Guatemalans of every station) as a “gringa,” a two-faced entity, simultaneously concerned scholar and representative of a great, rich, ambivalent power. I am reminded over and over again by the Xoye in Joyabaj that I possess that great modern value of U.S. citizenship:an identity that means I won’t die trying to illegally cross the border into Guatemala in order to make my living.

David Harvey, pondering the “new imperialism” (2003), connects it to the dual character of capital accumulation. One aspect consists of the factory, the mine, the agricultural estate where an economic process is transacted between capitalist and laborer. The other aspect concerns relations between capitalist and non-capitalist modes of production mediated via colonial policy, the international loan system, and war (137). He disputes the term “primitive accumulation” because it suggests that rapaciousness and brutality are a stage, an earlier moment, that is overcome and morphs into “normal” accumulation. Instead he proffers “accumulation by dispossession” to name the continuous role of predation, force, and debt peonage in the contemporary world. Echoing Arrighi and Silver (1999) and Amin (1997), he characterizes the current moment as chaotic, in a serious crisis, and global structures as contingent, only partially effective at “protect[ing] the main centres of capital accumulation against devaluation...[via the] Wall Street-Treasury-IMF complex” (185).

Harvey (2003), the geographer, says that the post-1970 turn to neoliberal adjustments and privatization sought a “spatio-temporal fix” for surplus capital that included intensifying financialization. But this created deindustrialization, rapid inflation followed by credit crunches, and chronic structural unemployment in the United States as well as the global south. I am a gringa, thereby part of these transnational flows. In this chapter, I am working to map Joyabaj and Guatemala into global geographies of deprivation and violence. Following Leo Ching (chapter 3 in this volume), to do so entails paying attention to the un/thinkable and to epistemologies of “post-” colonial difference. I will try to think the possession of indigenous and Mayan identities, not only through war but also through these regimes of accumulation by dispossession. They inhabit contiguous terrains.

 Local Dispossession

* Land and Labor

Joyabaj has been a finca de mozos (worker farm) for close to 100 years (CEH 1999; Oglesby 2002; Remijnse 2003). Similar to how different areas were given over to export monocrop cultivation fincas de café,banano, azucar, algodón(coffee, bananas, sugar, cotton plantations), Joyabaj produced mozos: field hands for seasonal work on Guatemala’s South Coast plantations. The same non-indigenous (ladino) family, the Herreras, who acquired vast tracts of land in the hot coastal lowlands also acquired land around Joyabaj. As the land was communally held, that is, had no “owner” in the Liberal sense of the late nineteenth century “reform” movements, the Herreras didn’t buy it. They simply paid for a survey, some bribes, and took possession of the land and its people. In Joyabaj, in return for farming what had been their communally held land, individuals and families had to migrate to cut cane during the harvest season. The state regulated these transactions through landholding, labor, vagrancy, and other laws and their violent enforcement. In the twenty-first century, people are still tightly bound to the plantations but more through the sinuous ties of debt relations, while the fincas face increasing competition from immigration to the United States.

* Tradition and Modernity

The dance of the snakes is over-determined, with many possible interpretations, but I want to pull on the threads that help us think about identities of dispossession. Like any postcolonial project, the baile is deeply hybrid: it incorporates ancient fertility rites, honors the town's Catholic patron saint La Virgen de Transito (Virgin of the Assumption), and contains such "modern" actants as labor contractors. To outsiders—tourists, anthropologists, revitalized Catholics, Protestants, non-indigenous/ladinos, Mayan activists—the baile is an expression of authentic indigenous culture. For this, it is both celebrated and reviled.

"Authentic" culture is contested terrain—for example, not all "Indians" identify as Maya (people active in the cultural rights movement). In 1999, when I asked the indigenous mayor (Alcalde Indígena[15]) of Joyabaj if there were "Maya" in the area he looked puzzled, then asked if I were looking for a museum. In our discussion about identity he complained about ladinos in the area who called him an "indio" (a racist term). He said, "I am not one of those because they were people who lived here a long time ago...naked, without schooling. Now there are schools in all the hamlets. There are only naturales here." And Maya? "Like in a museum?" he asked. Then, "Here there aren't any of those, like from before. But there is an organization in Guatemala City. People who have their degrees.... But you know, there is a Grupo Maya here.... They talk about how we can all be united, how to come together.... When I leave here [retire from being mayor] I'm going to become a Maya."

Struggles to possess some means of subsistence, or perhaps a little more than that, are linked in contradictory ways with (self) possession and identity —they have several faces. For some indigenous people it means to look and sound less “indio” and more ladino—being educated, speaking Spanish, getting a white-collar job rather than the manual labor associated with indigeneity, or wearing “Western” clothing. Ladino is a term mainly used in Guatemala and southern Mexico to mean mestizo, non-indigenous, but also not white. It is only partially a “racial” term as it is marked by class, culture, clothes, and so forth. As a Guatemalan joke puts it: “What is a ladino? An Indian with money.”

Possessing education is somewhat ambivalent for the Alcalde Indígena (who by his very position seems to represent “authentic” Joyabaj). Schooling differentiates the hamlets from “primitive indios” but he also feels he still has much to learn.

Alfonso García is a local Mayan activist struggling to hold on to the language and “culture.” He says he is often asked by his more assimilated cousins, “Why would you want to talk that way? To be that way? It’s so backwards!’” Many of the organized Mayas point to the continuing tradition of the bailes/dances and cofradias/saint societies with pride. But they also criticize the more traditional people (costumbristas) for refusing to send their children to school, thus denying them any chance for economic advancement. The “real” indigenous are seen as consigning their kids to a life of non-subsistence farming and the horrible migration to the coast. Possessing culture is linked to dispossession of one’s labor and of the means to obtain a more comfortable, modern life.

This sort of possession—of material comforts, or “development”—was the goal of movements for radical political change. In Joyabaj, many of those who now identify publicly as Maya were involved in the mass movements of the l970s that culminated in the strong revolutionary challenge to the Guatemalan state. While at the national level many Mayan cultural rights activists disavow their relation to the guerrillas, in Joyabaj the most well-known Mayas are candidates on the URNG (former rebel) political ticket. While they maintain relations with the cofradias that organize the “traditional” dances, these Maya are not members nor are they invited to perform. Instead they sponsor the convite, a masked dance associated in other towns with ladinos.

One of the people in the Joyabaj Grupo Maya mentioned by the Alcalde Indígena is Natalia Godoy. Several people described her as the founder of the group and as a Mayan priestess. She became a Maya in Costa Rica where she had worked with a group of Guatemalans in the Maya League, studying esoteric literature, music, and social change, and had ties to the URNG. During that time she began to suffer several of the illnesses that presage a calling to become a diviner or curer (Tedlock 1992). Mejia says that an internationalist from a development agency paid for her to travel to Guatemala to apprentice herself to a daykeeper. She was initiated and in the late 1990s returned to Joyabaj. She and her young husband lived with her parents until they could get their feet on the ground.

She seems well respected and is involved in a number of projects to support Mayan cultural survival. However, she is chafing at the gender attitudes of indigenous leaders, including the Alcalde Indígena. She is also frustrated with her parents who want her to concentrate on having more children and who constantly rib her husband about who “wears the pants” in their relationship. She has worked with the Rigoberta Menchú Foundation and was involved with the formation of COPMAGUA in l996, the organization charged with implementing the indigenous rights accord of the peace treaty (although she complains about the way the men involved treated the women). Now she helps support her family with a shoe store and works on a variety of local issues. She said, “The Maya Committee, we are facing a lot of obstacles. In a lot of ways I think it’s because I’m a woman. I wonder why there are so many problems. They say I’m a bruja [a witch], that I’m not from here, that I’m a manipulador and just want to make money. I don’t want anything to do with that—how could they think that?”

Alfonso is also a Maya (meaning he is involved in the organization). Describing the teasing he takes from his cousins about repossessing his identity, he says, “Now I don’t like to be with them. I’m learning more about the conquest, what happened to us, how we are losing our values. It’s important to try to bring them back, to recuperate our morals. I am studying a lot, it’s good.” At other times, however, he says he doesn’t really believe in the Mayan stuff. “We have lost all that, what people are doing and saying, it’s lost, it’s not true, they don’t really feel those things in their hearts.” When we talk about identity issues, his pronouns float around—sometimes the indigenous are “us” and sometimes “them.” While he farms a little land, he has worked as a health promoter much of his life. He is a catechist in the Catholic Church, where he strongly resisted attempts to introduce hybrid Mayan practices into the mass. “They have their place,” he said, “but not in the church!” His children are mostly trained as elementary school teachers. One day we walked past a man and his young children hoeing their cornfield and Alfonso said, “They are traditionalists, and I really feel sorry for them, how hard they have to work. It hurts me to see it.”

Marcelo Guttiérez is Xoye and a labor contractor. He has done this work for many years and functions as an intermediary between the workers and the finca overseers on the South Coast. He insists that he is constantly agitating for better treatment, fairer wages, and an end to discrimination against indigenous workers. He is also the local representative of CONIC, the National Indigenous and Campesino Committee, with ties to earlier revolutionary peasant organizations. In the past ten years, CONIC has been on the front lines in organizing for land reform, collective bargaining, implementation of the peace treaty (all struggles for possession), and against capitalist globalization. A number of CONIC activists have received death threats and several have been killed.

In preparation for a large CONIC meeting in Joyabaj, Marcelo went to a diviner to choose the most auspicious day for the event and hired a local aj q’ij or Mayan priest to perform a ceremony to open it. It seems that working with the aj q’ij is somewhat new for him, as he, like many people in CONIC, increasingly identifies as Maya. The possession of cultural rights is taking a more central place in their struggles for equity. Thinking of the baile, I don’t know if the men he contracts want to kill him, with or without snake venom. It’s a blurry line here between victim and perpetrator.

* Moral Worth and Collaboration

In Joyabaj, those who perform the bailes and older rituals, or who have been initiated as aj q’ij or in other sacred roles, are known as traditionalists or costumbristas. The majority speak little Spanish and show no interest in being interviewed by an anthropologist. Many of them sided with the army against the popular movement, which in the highlands was strongly influenced by Catholic liberation theology. This means they are implicated in the murder and displacement of many of the indigenous people engaged in (or suspected of engagement with) the popular struggle for the possession of land and labor rights. In some cases, the very conservatism that retains “authentic” culture also supported their collaboration with genocide. Simone Remijnse, a Dutch anthropologist who spent several years in Joyabaj researching counterinsurgency, said, “The military did so well here! They knew so much about the local culture and the conflicts, because the local military commissioners were from here and told them all about people’s fears, their organization. They went around telling the costumbristas [traditionalists] that the Catholic Action people had first tried to take away their religion and then they were going to try to take away their land. And it worked. Some of the strongest Civil Patrols were in the towns where the costumbre was strongest.”

Initiated by anti-Communist priests brought in after the 1954 coup, Catholic Action was a church revitalization movement to purge “pagan” elements from the church (thus Alfonso’s discomfort with re/introducing “Mayan” elements). It became a powerful local tool to challenge the gerontocracya way to represent and live the huge changes in production, and the increasing power of (trans)national over local organization (Warren 1989; Brintnall 1979). By exorcising such powers from this important institution, Catholic Action seemed to offer the possession of more progressive possibilities and slowly became linked to Liberation Theology and the popular, then revolutionary movement. Service as a catechist was a frequent path to wider ranging power networks, and many prominent indigenous people, at the local, national, and international levels took it (including Nobel Laureate Rigoberta Menchú Tum). An activist now repents of his Catholic Action work. “I went with my father to help stamp out the other practices. I knew both sides the traditional and the Catholic, so I was very good at finding the traces of idolatry. Now that I see the importance of our culture I am so sorry for what I did. We were the worst destroyers of our own culture.” He is now dedicated to salvaging, repossessing, what he once worked so hard to root out.

In 1993, a woman whose family is very involved with Catholic Action introduced me to her two children, Maria, a toddler, and her infant daughter, Ixmucane (the name of a Mayan deity). She told me that her very Catholic mother is furious that she gave her newborn a pagan name. “This is my Quincentennial child,” she said. The hemisphere-wide organizing to repudiate the “official story” of the Columbus legacy was an extraordinary inspiration for the fledgling pan-Maya movement in Guatemala. The movement to revitalize and repossess Mayan identity grew out of the ashes of scorched earth counterinsurgency. It wove together those seeking ways to organize without being killed (for whom “cultural rights” agitation seemed safer than more revolutionary claims) and those angry at the racism and discrimination they felt in the popular and armed movements. It also articulates the claims of an emerging critical mass of young indigenous people with education and skills but not necessarily radical projects. The so-called Mayan movement is complex, encompassing city-based NGOs, government ministers, indigenous language radio stations, university student organizations, weaving cooperatives, the Grupo Maya in Joyabaj, and maybe the Alcalde Indígena, if he can find the time (Bastos and Camus 2003). Possessing this identity may be somewhat “interesting” in that it can also mean a job with an NGO, in a bilingual school, or even a government ministry. But I also see it as closely linked to the hopes and dreams of the costumbristas, the catechists, and the revolutionaries who are all struggling to be gente decente or good people in a world of dispossession.

 War and Dis/Re-Possession

A catechist in a hamlet of Joyabaj is in his second hour of speaking in Maya-K’iche’ about martyrs. He links the martyrdom of the biblical Israelis with Jesus Christ, then with the l980 assassination of the local priest, and finally with the recent state-sponsored genocide of the “Mayan people.” He is a corn farmer who also migrates to pick coffee and, unlike most men his age, wears traje (traditional clothing). This is the first day in a week of mission work connected to the Vatican’s Jubilee Year (July 2000). While the project seems connected to taking possession of history, genocide is not part of the standardized lesson-plan.

I am sitting on a dirt floor covered with pine needles in a schoolroom in this outlying hamlet and feeling a bit surprised when he uses the term Maya. It turns out the Guatemalan Mayan Language Academy (ALMG), an indigenous-run autonomous state agency, is providing the village with culturally sensitive curricular materials in both Spanish and Maya-K'iche'. All three of the official teachers in this public school are local K'iche' speakers, some have been involved in Mayan revitalization efforts for many years, and several are studying "intercultural education" through a National University extension program taught by Mayan activists from Guatemala City. The program is partly sponsored by USAID (United States Agency for International Development).

Domingo González, president of the hamlet's Improvement Committee, had just returned from a seminar on Mayan rights with the ALMG in Guatemala City, which was also partly funded by the Guatemalan government and USAID. The Mayan Language Academy (ALMG) was created by indigenous intellectuals in the early l980s who struggled for a decade to gain legal recognition. In 1990, it became an autonomous state agency. At the seminar on Mayan educational rights, Mr. González heard one of the founders of the ALMG speak, Dr. Demetrio Cojti Cuxil, who received a doctorate in Belgium in the late 1970s and is now vice minister of education. As Mr. González described it, "there were people from all over the country, the 23 languages all had representatives. Those Kaqchiqueles, from Chimaltenango, they are really adelantado (advanced), there was the Viceministro who gave a talk. His name is Cojtí. He's a doctor! We don't have any doctors, lawyers, engineers here. We need to work more on education so our children can learn and come back, like they do there. Cojtí started his speech speaking perfect Kaqchiquel; it was very smooth. Then he went right into Spanish he has accomplished so much, but he hasn't lost his language! You'd never know he's a doctor! He was very humble."

Mr. González tells me that the catechist who spoke of martyrdom was the driving force behind getting a road built to the hamlet, organizing state funding and community labor crews. The catechist also organized the community-controlled bilingual school and served several terms as a minor elected official in the town of Joyabaj. This hamlet is known throughout the municipality for its self-possession, its unity and progressive attitudes. Several days later I learn from the catechist that he was the civil patrol leader in the hamlet, the army-run militias responsible for atrocities during the war. “I have two faces,” he said. “One I show to the army, the other I show to my people.”

Survivors of the civil war frequently use this term of self-dispossession (Gonzalez 2002; Green 1999; McAllister 2002; Zur 1998). The state that carried out this genocide also has two faces, the paler, well-fed one that shows up in the newspaper accounts of government doings and the indigenous one that actually carried out the massacres, often through the “Civil” Patrol (PAC). Instituted in 1981, the PAC was quite diabolical, inducing community members to surveil, incriminate, and punish each other. This allowed the military state some distance from these crimes, which in turn warped and undermined community solidarity. Throughout much of the country, but especially in indigenous communities, every single man from age fourteen to sixty or even older was incorporated into the patrols. In some cases, leaders were former soldiers or military commissioners whose faces already pointed towards the state (although sometimes these same people used their military experiences to train local youth for the guerrilla). In many cases, however, the army laid this onerous task on respected local leaders, often catechists, cooperative members, or schoolteachers. Compared to other dirty wars in Latin America Guatemala was exceptional for its almost total incorporation of civilians into the counterinsurgency war.

For example, in 1982 the army called together all the men of Joyabaj and various outlying hamlets and made them walk through the night to the hamlet of Xeabaj. There they were forced to kill the residents with their machetes. “Awful things happened there,” said Alfonso, who thanked God he had been out of town that day. “My brother had to go. There were bodies, blood, the whole square was full. He couldn’t stand it. He went and hid in the woods for a long time.” Doña Miguela, an older K’iche’ woman from the town of Joyabaj said, “Ay dios! Ay dios! It was so horrible! So horrible! They killed babies (and she acted it out in her kitchen, as if she were lifting up an infant and smashing its head), children, women, old people. My husband had to go. Everyone had to go. We had to cook but when they came back they couldn’t eat. Their mouths were so bitter with all they had seen. All they had done. Terrible! Terrible! Ay dios!” Remijnse says there is still no accurate accounting: estimates of those murdered range from fifty to 200. “A river of blood ran down the mountain,” a witness told her (2001: 463).[16] The years 1981 and 1982 saw a wave of army-ordered patrol massacres in the Joyabaj/Zacualpa region, which then gave way to more “privatized” violence, “used more and more by individual patrol commanders for their own purposes—to improve their own economic position in the village by confiscating land and cattle from disappeared or fleeing neighbors. ‘That way lots of land changed owners. They saw that there was a good piece of land...and they took it,’” a Xoye told Remijnse (2001: 458).

The government’s counterinsurgency war was a horrific dispossession. The loss of life was massive. While clandestine cemeteries in the region are being exhumed and some people gave testimony to the truth commission, fear is still rampant. Rape was widespread. Tools, food stores, domestic animals, homes, clothing were all stolen or destroyed, access to land for farming and for ritual at sacred places was cut off, sometimes for years (González 2002; Wilson 1995). Many people fled to live in other towns, to disappear into the burgeoning shantytowns in Guatemala City, or to Costa Rica, Mexico, and the United States. The excess of violence, the genocidal killing “down to the last seed” (Falla 1984), the systematic murder of children and babies, as Doñ a Miguela so kinaesthetically recalls, is exceptional, to be sure. But it is also somehow the rule, a more recent and extreme expression of long histories of dispossession. These are old struggles over land and labor, tradition and modernity, moral worth and collaboration.

There is the moment in the Baile de la Culebra when the contratista bends over the indigenous worker to use his back as a table to note down debt, time owed, the muscle and creative powers to be extracted on the plantations possessed by the ladino Herrerra family. It is a masked simulation of the self-same movement that takes place daily around harvest season in the town square, and of other movements repeated time and again, of being bent down, acted on by a will coming from outside oneself.

What are the identities of such dispossession? “Indigenousness-ness,” much less Mayan-ness, has never been a unified category. Even the much-vaunted (in anthropology circles at least) indigenous community has always been riven by age and gender difference, possession of ties to outside power sources (like the army or church), or incipient class formation. The tense intra-indigenous relations in the Baile de la Culebra suggest some of the many complications of identification among Xoye (from Joyabaj the decent people), the naughty and duplicitous Maxe (Chichicastenango), and the Quiché (the department capital, represented by the contratista's wife). Then there are the divisions among Xoye, between the contratista, perpetrator of these violent everyday acts of dispossession and the victims, the resentful rebellious dispossessed. In turn, the ties to ladino Guatemalans and the supra-Guatemalan economic relations that undergird the dancing, the possession and the dispossession, remain spectral even as they weigh heavily.

For the Alcalde Indígena possessing education changes one from an indio to a natural and maybe to a Maya (if you can find the time), but for Alfonso's cousins it promises escape from indigeneity itself identified with backwardness and dispossession. This is a sense Alfonso himself sometimes shares. Domingo Gonzalez, on returning from the Mayan Language Academy conference, sees hope for being both a doctor and a Maya, for possessing education and a different lifeway, without being dispossessed of one's identity. Alfonso is sorry for traditionalists (who possess culture but are possessed by their old ways), but unsure about the Maya, who seem to have two faces their outward identity does not match their "hearts."

Anastasia also seems caught between two identities, a position that leads some to call her a manipuladora, duplicitous. One identity is her own true self as opposed to the gender stereotype those around her are trying to impose. Another is her role as a Mayan activist and her expression of that not through "traditional" dances, but through the convite (more a class performance than an "ethnic" one). Finally, there is her conviction that possessing government power through the URNG political party expresses her indigenous identity, while other Xoye saw and see the revolution as a threat to that very identity.

In the eyes of some traditionalists, during the guerrilla war their neighbors seemed possessed by Marxism, or by Liberation Theology and its purity movements. These seemed to threaten their traditions, the local organization and power hierarchies that in turn maintain the dances, understandings of time, illness, healing, and the vital connection to the past through which they possess themselves. Some reacted to this threat by siding wholeheartedly with the army. Others, like the two-faced patrol leader and Doña Miguela's husband, felt they had no choice but to obey, to be possessed by counterinsurgency, made to act against their will in murdering their neighbors.

The term identity comes from the Latin root of essence, akin to the Sanskrit for sameness. But five hundred years after the invasion, fifty years after the Cold War bombarded Guatemala with the Arbenz coup, and forty years after the start of civil war, the sense of self-possession we associate with the word identity seems contingent on the tenuous ties among shifting sites of power and struggle, identi/ties.

 Identit/ties

An identity of dispossession can mean the CONIC activist who deploys the aj q'ij as an instrument for alienating the labor of his neighbors, even as he struggles for their rights. It can also encompass the former patrol leader, the forcibly recruited soldier returning to his village, the Maya-K'iche' Catholic Action catechist and her "Quincentennial baby," and the increasing numbers of young men and now women going to the United States. I have tried to describe the double fascination and terror embedded in these narratives about dispossession and possession. They are articulations (both speaking of and tying together) of the struggle to control land, labor, culture and identity, and not be controlled, not be bent over to someone else's will. These are attempts to hold on to to possess values, morals, the past, in order to build a different kind of future. Conducting fieldwork after 1996, in postwar Guatemala, I keep encountering stories of two-faces, uncanny doubles, and duplicity. I think these are effects of the blurring of differences between victim and perpetrator, possessed and possessor in a moment when the "Post" War is surrounded by "scare quotes" and dispossession occurs at least as much through the invisible yet tightening "ties" of neoliberal globalization as through the visitations of military violence.

Indigenous people in Guatemala struggle to maintain two faces, to preserve some autonomy against the state even as they are the state's agent in their hamlets. They seek to hold on to the fruits of their labor even as they enact dispossession for the invisible hand of the global market. Perhaps this is why there are proliferating anxieties about possession in the magico-religious sense of being acted on. Diana Fuss suggests this “magic” may bathe every process of self-making. Identity is “profoundly unstable and perpetually open to radical change...[because] identification is, from the beginning, a question of relation, of self to other, subject to object, inside to outside” (1995: 2–3). People in Joyabaj talk about double identities, two faces, feeling things in their heads but not in their hearts perhaps as a symptom of identification as possession and dispossession, as a “detour through the other that defines the self” (Fuss 1995: 3).

The dispossession of the war took away life, family members, homes, and children. Already divided communities now harbor the blood memories of violent acts carried out against each other. Often both sides felt justified in their acts of violence, like “good people” because they understood they were struggling against dispossession. In trying to survive the postwar both sides struggle with the contradictions between their sense of moral worth and their collaboration in war. Perhaps this is why actors on both sides speak both about acting for something they believe in and acting against their own will, having two faces.

After 1984 the scorched earth counterinsurgency gave way to more selective violence and after 1996 the war gave way to less overtly violent forms of dispossession. The century-old migration to the coast has been revivified but it is now complemented by the more dangerous (but more lucrative if successful) migration to the United States. In return many families are losing their long-fought-for possession of land, used collateral for “coyote” fees for the trip North.

While possessing land, being fixed in a place is a central concern of the struggles I have been describing; mobility, rather than stasis or essence is central to the identities of dispossession that I am exploring here. I have told stories about indigenous people detouring through the education system, the Civil Patrol, and the state-supported ALMG; people also detour through NGOs supported by other states (a USAID-sponsored conference on Mayan identity). A woman becomes a Maya while detouring through Costa Rica; mozos become central to the state’s (and globe’s) political economy by detouring through the plantation system; and gringo anthropologists detour through Guatemala interviewing and writing about indigenous people to bring you, my detouring reader, this story. In all this traversing, where exactly is the identity of dispossession? How are we to “map” the contemporary world of deprivation and violence? Is identity actually this “two-faced Indian?” In turn, is one of those faces “real” and the other a sham? Or is the effect of self-possession precisely in the awful, struggling, continuing movement between them, in identi/ties?

Harvey argues that global capital has a dual character and that struggles over its effects are thereby two-faced. One he calls “expanded reproduction,” the emphasis of the “traditional left.” Then there is “accumulation by dispossession” that he sees as confronted by the social movements coalescing within the anti- and alternative globalization movements (2003: 176–177). While in Guatemala these struggles have often been expressed as either/or either Catholic Action or costumbre, either ladino (meaning educated, developed) or indigenous (meaning backward).Harvey argues for analyzing them dialectically. Perhaps this is what is emerging in postwar Guatemala, as the labor contractor and CONIC activist contracts an aj q’ij, as the Maya from Costa Rica sponsors traditional dances and throws herself behind the political party of the URNG.

Human identity may not be essential or inherent, but formed through movement, action. In this way it may be similar to the value of money, which is not internal to it but materialized in our effective social activity. “Cut off from all relation to circulation [money] would not be money, but merely a simple natural object” (Marx in Spivak 1988: 163). To understand the identi/ties of dispossession means acknowledging that their effectivity comes from their mobili/ties. They are materialized through ties or binding, when positions are momentarily clarified as in the moment of a coup, a massacre, the inscription of debt, the statement “I am a Maya. “ But they are simultaneously real-ized through the circulations of land, labor, bodies, ideas. This mobility is ambi (double)-valent (value or capacity). It is not just a one-way activity of the state on Joyabaj; of international debt relations incarnated through a man bending down to be used as a table; of education acting on traditionalists; of Catholic Action acting on benighted Indians; or the “modern” Maya acting on costumbristas. It is a complex interaction that dispossesses us of clear-cut stories of actor/acted on or victim/perpetrator.

How do we think the “unthinkable:” how people recover from genocide and how they endure ongoing dispossession? How do we “map contemporary world conflicts?” Like many of the authors gathered here I have described the tenuousness and context-specificity of apparently essential identifications. The modern history of Guatemala and dispossession is one of struggle. Masked dancers enact rituals of rebellion against labor contractors, a catechist struggles to remember martyrdom and to build a road to get agricultural surpluses to market, parents struggle for their children to possess an education so they can “get ahead,” men and women struggle to grasp hold of the fleeting sense of authentic Mayanness through study or through feeling it in their hearts. The struggle is to act, and not only be acted on, to possess and not only to be possessed by an Other. I am suggesting in this chapter that a map may be too static for thinking in regard to the dancing, mobile identi/ties that people detour through in postwar Guatemala. This does not mean there isn’t ground to stand on. But they and we need to be quick on our feet and able to “tie” strong knots.

[13] I have worked in Guatemala since 1985, with over six years total time there. Quotes are from interviews with Mayan organizers, Guatemalan state officials, development workers, and popular organization activists. All quotes are from author interviews and all translations are mine. I am indebted to everyone in Joyabaj who shared their time with me. It would not have been possible without Natalia Godoy, Liz Oglesby, and Simone Remijnse. Thanks also to AVANCSO, Maury Hutchinson and Lewis and Clark College, Duke University, and the Mellon Title VI grant. I am extremely grateful to J. Craig Jenkins and Esther Gottlieb for their work to bring this conference and volume together, and to all the participants.

[14] A traditional, usually handmade shirt that is distinctive for every highland town.

[15] Derluguian powerfully evoked a similar identification category for Abkhazia youth torn between the Q’uran and drug dealing.

[16] Joyabaj has a dual civil government system with a mayor elected through a nationally supervised process, and an Alcalde Indígena selected less formally, primarily by indigenous people.

[17] Remijnse says that some ladinos accepted the military, due to a sense that “only communists and naturals” were killed (as an older ladina told her), that their way of life was threatened, or “fear of an Indian majority literally pouring down from the mountains, demanding their rights and intent on killing every ladino in sight” (2002: 162). However, many ladinos who had resisted the army by refusing to patrol or in other ways, experienced the Xeabaj massacre as a turning point, “opening their eyes to what the military were capable of doing” (2002: 154).

 References

<biblio>

Amin, Samir. 1997. Capitalism in the Age of Globalization. London and New York: Zed Press.

Arrighi, Giovanni, and Beverly J. Silver (eds.). 1999. Chaos and Governance in the Modern World System. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press.

Bastos, Santiago, and Manuela Camus. 2003. Entre el mecapal y el cielo: Desarrollo del movimiento Maya en Guatemala. Guatemala City: FLACSO and Cholsamaj.

Brintnall, Douglas. 1979. Revolt Against the Dead: The Modernization of a Maya Community in the Highlands of Guatemala. New York: Gordon and Breach.

CEH Commission for Historical Clarification. l999. Guatemala: Memory of Silence. http://hrdata.aaas.org/ceh/report.

Falla, Ricardo. l984. "'We Charge Genocide.' Guatemala: Tyranny on Trial." In Testimony of the Permanent People's Tribunal, edited by Susanne Jonas, Ed McCaughan, and Elizabeth Sutherland Martínez. San Francisco: Synthesis Publications.

Fuss, Diana. 1995. Identification Papers. New York: Routledge

González, Matilde. 2002. Se Cambió el Tiempo: Conflicto y Poder en Territorio K'iche' 1880–1996. Guatemala City: AVANSCO.

Green, Linda. 1999. Fear as a Way of Life: Mayan Widows in Guatemala. New York: Colombia University Press.

Harvey, David. 2003. The New Imperialism. Oxford: Oxford University Press.

McAllister, Carlota. "Good People: Revolution, Community and conciencia in a Maya-K'iche' Village in Guatemala." Ph.D. Diss., Department of Anthropology, Johns Hopkins University, 2002.

Oglesby, Elizabeth. "Politics at Work: Elites, Labor and Agrarian Modernization in Guatemala, 1980–2000." Ph.D. Diss., Department of Geography, University of California-Berkeley, 2002.

Remijnse, Simone. 2003. Memories of Violence: Civil Patrols and the Legacy of Conflict in Joyabaj, Guatemala. Amsterdam, Netherlands: Rozenberg Publishers.

Spivak, Gayatari. 1988. In Other Worlds: Essays in Cultural Politics. New York: Routledge.

Tedlock, Barbara. l992. Time and the Highland Maya. Albuquerque: University of New Mexico Press.

Warren, Kay. l989 (l978). The Symbolism of Subordination: Indian Identity in a Guatemalan Town. Austin: University of Texas Press.

Wilson, Richard. l995. Maya Resurgence in Guatemala: Q’eqchi’ Experience. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press.

Zur, Judith. 1992. Violent Memories: Mayan War Widows in Guatemala. Boulder: Westview.

</biblio>

 5. Public Islam as an Antidote to Violence?{1}

Dale F. Eickelman and Armando Salvatore

 Terrorism and Public Debate

Now more than ever, secular and religious Muslims have to confront issues of identity and violence in open and public debate. Until the Iraqi death tolls began to rise after the 2003 preemptive war against Iraq, Colombia was still leading the world in the number of deaths directly attributable to terrorism, with Sri Lanka not far behind. Public perceptions, however, placed the Muslim-majority Middle East at the foreground of terrorism. The events of September 11, 2001, the October 2002 bombings in Bali, the May 2003 “kamikaze” attacks in Saudi Arabia and Morocco, the March 11, 2004 bombings in Madrid, the July 8, 2005 bombings in downtown London, the July 11, 2005, attacks in Bombay, and the staccato repetition of bombings and violence elsewhere, including Jerusalem, Baghdad, Gaza, and Ayodhya, test the limits of civility and trust and inscribed the possibility of “Islamic” terrorism on the global imagination. Ironically, “kamikaze” has become one of the first Japanese words to enter educated Arabic usage. It is the word of choice in Moroccan newspapers and transnational Arabic-language newspapers such as al-Sharq al-Awsat (London), offering an alternative to calling the perpetrators of such attacks either “martyrs” or “suicide bombers,” word choices with starkly different connotations in the political struggle over people’s imaginations (Pekonen 1989: 132).

The perpetrators of terrorist acts intend to block reasoned debate over appropriate responses, and often their small numbers succeed beyond all expectations. Yet it is necessary for scholars and observers to look beyond immediate—and often disturbing—events and to discern the long-term trends and developments likely to shape world politics for years to come. Only a tiny minority of Muslims use or condone terrorism in the name of religion, although many see it as a weapon of the weak. Apologists find a ready stock of counterpart examples among Hindus, Buddhists, Jews, Christians, and followers of other religions. The actions of these few, however, have captured the imagination of a global political community and altered the sense of political threat. In this context, it is unsurprising that political trends in the Muslim majority world are often violent and contradictory, but this is mainly due to the authoritarian regimes of many states. “Public Islam”—a concept intimately related to the new media and to contemporary senses of belonging—is not itself immune from such contradictions, but for the most part it works against violence.

 Contemporary Public Islam

Prevailing theories of modernity and modernization in the mid-twentieth century assumed that religious movements, identities, and practice had become increasingly marginal, and that only those religious intellectuals and leaders who attached themselves to the nation-state would continue to play a significant role in public life. These assertions concerning the eclipse of religion in the public life of North America and Europe have been exaggerated. José Casanova (1994) was one of the first to note that by the late 1970s this prevalent view was challenged by the impact of several parallel developments: the Iranian revolution, the rise of the Solidarity movement in Poland, the role of liberation theology in political movements throughout Latin America, and the return of Protestant fundamentalism as a force in American politics. In recent decades Muslims in Europe have increasingly asserted distinct identities. The rise of Islam in Europe over the past three decades is not just due to numbers but also to a consciousness of what it means to be Muslim in Europe. Gilles Kepel was one of the first to point this out in his carefully chosen subtitle to Les banlieues de l'Islam: Naissance d'un religion en France (The Suburbs of Islam: Birth of a religion in France) (1987). For some Europeans, who assumed that religion had receded as an element of their own public identity, this rise of Muslim consciousness was seen as a threat.

In the Muslim majority world, however, the role of religion in social and community life never receded. This does not mean that it did not change and develop in ways often underemphasized by Western observers and by Muslims themselves (Zaman 2002). Only in the last decade has the idea of an "Islamic public sphere"—Islamische Öffentlichkeit in German—come to the fore in contexts that Reinhard Schulze (2000 [1994]), responding to the work of Jürgen Habermas, discerned as forming the infrastructure of communication and discourse of a new intellectual class, from the classic era of Islamic reform in the late nineteenth century through the structural transformations of the 1960s and 1970s, and the present.

Advancing levels of education, greater ease of travel, and the rise of new communications media throughout the Muslim-majority world contribute to the emergence of a public sphere in which large numbers of people, and not only an educated, political, and economic elite, want a say in political and religious issues. The result has been challenges to authoritarianism, the fragmentation of religious and political authority, and increasingly open discussions of issues related to the "common good" (al-maslaha al-'amma or simply maslaha), a key concept within Islamic juridical traditions. At the same time, this trend has been uneven and often contradictory (see Masud 2005).

“Public Islam” refers to the highly diverse invocations of Islam as ideas and practices that religious scholars, self-ascribed religious authorities, secular intellectuals, Sufi orders, mothers, students, workers, engineers, and many others make to civic debate and public life. In this public capacity, Islam makes a difference in configuring the politics and social life of large parts of the globe, and not just for self-ascribed religious authorities. It makes this difference not only as a template for ideas and practices but also as a way of envisioning alternative political realities and, increasingly, in acting on both global and local stages, thus reconfiguring established boundaries of civil and social life.

Not all these trends are unique to the modern world. One can read Michael Cook’s (2000) captivating account of “commanding right and forbidding wrong” in Islamic thought, a study that flows from the early Islamic centuries to the present, as an account of an engagement including both Muslim jurists and a wider Muslim public with issues of community concern and conduct. Such concerns have been profoundly shaped by the course of history and the idea of the past in the Muslim majority world.

Many of the emerging new voices and the leaders of movements within the proliferating public space of the contemporary Muslim world—a space which is simultaneously physical and communicative—claim to interpret or be inspired by basic religious texts and ideas, and work in local or transnational contexts. These new interpreters of how religion shapes, or should shape, societies and politics, like their counterparts in Poland’s Solidarity movement and the liberation theology movements in Latin America in the 1980s, often lack the theological and philosophical sophistication of the religious scholars of earlier eras who led such discussions. Such new leaders and spokespersons have nonetheless succeeded in capturing the imagination of large numbers of people. These trends often intensify the ties that bind Muslim communities in the Muslim-majority world with Muslims in Europe, North America, and elsewhere.

 Public Islam in Practice

The issues and themes in Muslim politics increasingly transcend the specifics of region or place. Thus the contemporary “publicization” of Islam is often more commonly rooted in practice than in formal ideology (Adelkhah 2002). It has often created new social spaces, a trend significantly accelerated since the mid-twentieth century, and it has facilitated modern and distinctively open senses of political and religious identity.

Such practices and the resulting social spaces involve both emotional and intellectual engagement among participants in overlapping circles of communication, solidarity, and the building of bonds of identity and trust. Some of these practices are based on local communities. Others are geographically widespread and targeted to receptive audiences. One example is the use of e-mail among the Indonesian university students who coordinated the nationwide campus protests that contributed to the downfall of President Suharto as early as in 1998. These modern practices and new communication technologies create new, effective, and geographically more dispersed bases for effective mobilization—but they can also threaten tolerance and civil society by facilitating publicity and calls to action by extremist groups (Hefner 2003).

Social practices that are based on ideas of the common good and that contribute to shaping public Islam also embrace collective rituals including the pilgrimage to Mecca, popular festivals, and religious and secular commemorations. They also encompass disciplining and performative practices as diverse as Sufi rituals, regional pilgrimages, the informal economy, the routines of modern schooling, and the use of the press and modern communications technologies. The lively and quadrilingual website of Nadia Yassine (www.nadiayassine.net) and the mostly Arabic one of her father, Abdesslam Yassine (www.yassine.net), in Morocco dramatically illustrate how supposedly “traditional” religious orders can rapidly transform themselves into movements that foreground in the minds of a wide public the issue of the proper role for religion to play in society. The movement of Fethullah Gülen, based in Turkey but increasingly becoming transnational, is another indicator of this important trend. Gülen’s movement carefully steers clear of challenges to laicism, one of the founding principals of the Turkish state (Turam 2006).

Ideas of the common good are not an immutable heritage of religious or normative traditions, even if some Muslim spokespersons claim otherwise. They are defined by ethical notions and social values contested and redefined through interaction, practice, and transmission over generations. Sectarianism in Christian Europe provided the habitus and the congregational form for developing such ideas and practices, and it is possible to see in the Sufi tradition and other Muslim religious practices a similar contribution to a participative habitus, but also the authoritarian limits, inherent in the master-disciple relationship, of such participation and to the idea of the public sphere itself (Pinto 2004). Like the Christian sects, the more orthodox forms of Sufism and other styles of public piety have also contributed to shape reasoning selves and to reconfigure the relationship between legitimate authority and the independent pursuit of truth. Immanuel Kant was not born in Iraq; public reasoning has, however, a long tradition in Islamic jurisprudence, both Sunni and Shi’a, that flourished in Iraq and inspired modern Islamic reform.

Various sectarian movements in Europe played a major role in developing the idea of the modular self, a self empowered with a moral conscience that could confront the authority both of established religion and the state. In this European trajectory, only when the freedom of individual conscience is recognized and tolerated can a public sphere develop. It is, nonetheless, a more general argument that religious ideas and practice can foster the emergence of the public sphere, and this has taken place in the Muslim-majority world.

Ideas of the public are historically embedded and have strong links with culturally shared senses of self and community. They are situated at the strategic intersection between practice and discourse. Public Islam is a concept by which we encompass non-elite practices and interactions and their pre-modern antecedents. Its development includes challenging over the authority to interpret sacred texts and changing how issues are framed. The shared sense of public built into these social interactions varies considerably from place to place and time to time, as issues of individual responsibility, welfare, justice, and piety are contested and in flux.

 The Limits of Secular Spaces

How do these developments match views of the public sphere premised on the existence of a religiously neutral, indeed “secular” threshold of access to public debate? Some ideas of “secular” divest participants in public exchanges of their religious and cultural identities, or at least marginalize these identities. But the creation of a public culture promoting exchange and discussion can also involve deliberation over issues of common interest through the invocation of traditions of religious, moral, and legal discourses. It can also encourage the gradual emergence of ever more abstract patterns of membership and citizenship that rest on obligations and rights which increasingly fit a legal vocabulary and a contractual view of society.

In spite of the growing recognition that religion has an important role to play in public life and can contribute to the common good, it remains necessary to challenge the common assumption that secularism and secularly oriented practical rationality is the exclusive normative base for “modern” public life (Eickelman 2000; Salvatore 1997, 2001; Salvatore and LeVine 2005). Religious thought and practice in the Muslim world can be shown to inspire rational-practical orientations as much as do secular approaches to social action. Some practices, including Sufi (mystical) disciplines, interact and sometimes clash with different forms of secularism as incorporated in the ideologies and practices of most states within Muslim-majority societies or where Muslim minorities live.

For both the nineteenth century and the contemporary era, it is possible to identify the norms of exchange and discourse that are the product of these interactions and clashes, and also the creation of a variety of explicit and implicit Muslim forms of civility and publicness. This in turn requires an effort to discern the social history, or genealogy, of the emergence of a sense and structure of public communication and participation in societies shaped by Muslim cultural, religious, and political traditions.

The present period differs from earlier ones in the speed, intensity, and large numbers of people involved in pushing the contours of tradition, but the publics of an earlier era were equally engaged in doing so. The reshaping of religious identity and forms of communication and publicness in the nineteenth-century Ottoman Empire is especially important in this respect. Consider, for example, Istanbul, a city inhabited by a religiously, ethnically, and linguistically diverse population in which Muslims were outnumbered for a good part of the Ottoman era. The most commonly held assumption is that the confessional communities of the empire lived separately, with minimal reciprocal interaction, and developed social bonds and allegiances exclusively within their own communities. This assumption diverts an appreciation of the mobile and relational aspect of community relations in Ottoman Istanbul, and it says little about the people's sense of identity and of collective allegiance. Understanding the ongoing transformations of the Ottoman Empire from the nineteenth century to the present can facilitate a better grasp of the possibilities for change in the contemporary Muslim majority world (see, for example, Meeker 2002; Kirli 2004; Çinar 2005). Learning to think and act civilly in public is a prolonged, historically specific process, and Turkey offers a good example of the delicate combination of internal processes and opportunities combined with "external" ones. If formal negotiations and incentives for Turkey's entry into the European Union offer a high-level framework, the give-and-take of Turks in Europe who return frequently to their homeland and keep in touch through the new media (Yavuz 2003: 180–184) offers a ground-level impetus to blur supposed distinctions between "East" and "West."

The collective historical experience of coexistence among Muslims and non-Muslims in the Ottoman Empire can be analyzed on the basis of their common interests as members of a vibrant society. In India, the relation between Hindus and Muslims is crucial to the development of ideas of secularism and religiosity in relation to the public sphere. In such an historical and interreligious perspective, the forms of public Islam in the twentieth century appear as contingent crystallizations of much more complex historical processes. For example, imperial encounters have been of great importance to the historical development of public debate in the metropole as well as the colony—a circumstance that the U.S. occupation of Iraq in 2003 brought once again to light even though most policymakers concerned with Iraq acknowledge difficulty in understanding the distinction between Sunni and Shi’a (Stein 2006), let alone other historical background that most educated Middle Easterners take for granted.

Notwithstanding this diversity of experience, most Muslims share inherited conceptions of ideas of the common good. These shared ideas of the past shape contemporary understandings of publicness in Muslim societies (see Eickelman and Salvatore 2002). For example, although Islamic religious scholars, the ‘ulama, claim that God reveals the ideas of the common good to humankind, they also regard these ideas as discernable primarily by themselves—men with expertise in the science of scriptural hermeneutics. These religious scholars debate vigorously among themselves about what the common good entails. Yet they are never the only participants in this debate. Their authority remains strong in the modern world, but is increasingly challenged by alternative religious—and political—authorities that often lack formal training in the traditional religious sciences.

The increasing accessibility of the new media, including satellite television, the Internet, and new uses of older media such as video- and audio-cassettes and CDs and DVDs, contributes to fragmentation of the traditional structures of religious authority. It also facilitates innovative ideas of religious authority and of representing Islam in public in unexpected ways (Gonzalez-Quijano 2003; Hefner 2003). There are numerous combinations of fragmented and sustained old and new forms of religious authority and influence in the public sphere, making debates about what constitutes “good” or authentic Islam much more competitive than has been the case in the past.

One of the paradoxes of modern Muslim publics is that despite this discursive expansion in many Muslim-majority states and communities, the public good is increasingly defined within the parameters of Islam. Some states, such as republican Turkey, vigorously sought to domesticate and neutralize Islamic institutions and ideas, yet current Turkish politics are defined by a mutual accommodation and tacit bargaining, as the guardians of secularism and those who participate in Turkey’s public sphere and civic life learn to accommodate one another through public debate and practice (White 2002).

As Adelkhah (2004) suggests for Iran, the most powerful part of the women's movement is not formal and recognized organizations, all monitored and repressed by the state, but women's activities in the informal economy and in shaping religious practices. As in the French revolution, Adelkhah argues that such "informal" activities can be at least as powerful a vehicle for changing gender roles and ideas of Islam as explicit ideological statements and formal organizations. In all cases, Islamic ideas of the common good shift in content and elaboration over time and, despite explicit denials, may often converge with Western understandings of such major issues as democracy and tolerance for religious diversity (Hefner 2000). Sadek Sulaiman (1998), an activist in Arabian Peninsula Islamic circles and a former journalist, has gone so far as to say that democracy is an integral element of Islamic revelation and that the United States, who took over two centuries to grant the right to vote to all its citizens, is the best example of how the implementation of democracy requires time and shared historical experience. The role of Islam in shaping understandings of the common good is unlikely to recede in importance in the years to come, and Sulaiman's argument reminds us that Islamic thought is far from hermetically sealed from non-Islamic historical and political experience.

Muslims participate in crafting the idea of the common good in a variety of ways, and they also contribute to shaping the definitions of wider and more inclusive public goods in societies where Muslims are not a majority, as in Europe (Khosrokhavar 1997; Kepel 1997 [1994]); or, as in Syria and Turkey, they are confronted with a profoundly secular elite; or, as in Iran, with an increasingly unpopular, although powerful, clerical elite (Adelkhah 2004). In India, Muslims live in a secular state strongly buffeted by religious extremism (van der Veer 1994).

 The "West" Versus the "Rest" Laid to Rest

At the time of the collapse of the Soviet Union in 1991, various policy ideas gained currency posited on the notion that "Islam"—or what some people presume to be Islam—determines the identity and conduct of Muslims in a way that other world religions do not.

Paul Johnson (1991), for example, argued that “European civilization” was facing its “third major invasion” from the forces of Islam that he saw as concentrated in a 4,000-mile belt of tension running from North Africa to China. This invasion by demographic growth and labor migration is said to equal the threat posed by the expansion of Islam into Europe in the eighth century and the rise of the Ottoman Empire in the late sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Like Samuel Huntington (1993a: 34), who wrote of the “bloody borders” of the crescent-shaped Islamic bloc, which extends from the bulge of Africa to central Asia, Johnson inexplicably excluded Southeast Asia, where half the world’s Muslims live and where no such equivalent “threat” is apparent.

Johnson wrote that in this vast arc, “Western style concepts” such as “democracy, personal freedoms, and the rule of law... are denied”—his use of the passive voice disguises who does the denying. Amos Perlmutter (1992) argued that “Islam, fundamentalist or otherwise,” is incompatible with “liberal, human rights-oriented, Western-style, representative democracy,” so that Islamic religious movements “should be stifled at birth.” Those unsympathetic to Islam and Muslims are not the only ones to excoriate Islam. Muslim leaders and intellectuals, such as Tunisia’s exiled Rasheed Ghannouchi (1992), also did so. In an essay entitled “Islam and Freedom can be Friends,” he invoked such concepts as the role of “government in Islam,” as if “Islam” prescribed a clear and timeless point of view.

Samuel Huntington (1993b: 24–25), for his part argued that “non-Western civilizations” have increasingly become political actors. Updating Arnold Toynbee’s (1947) notion of civilizational traditions, Huntington saw “Islam” and “Confucianism” as antithetical to the West and suggested that the West develop strategies to pit one against the other. Toynbee, upon whom Huntington relied, identified twenty-one distinct civilizations, of which six supposedly survive today. A closer look at Toynbee might have cautioned Huntington against invoking the moralizing and stereotyped historicism of an earlier generation. Thus, Toynbee wrote that the Ottomans (Osmanlis) failed as a civilization because “they achieved their astonishing triumphs by… assuming an animal nature [and] limiting their minds to the ‘single-track’ action of instinct.” Consequently Toynbee relegated them to the category of “arrested” civilizations, which also included Polynesians, Eskimos, Nomads [sic], and Spartans (Toynbee 1947: 566–567).

The apparent simplicity of formulations such as Toynbee's and Huntington's encourages representations of "other" religions and civilizations as timeless essences, much like the Orientalism of an earlier generation. In this respect, Huntington's crisp "West versus rest" formula is as deceptive in its Manichean simplicity as Daniel Lerner's "Mecca or mechanization" (1964: 405), deflecting attention from the internal and historical variations between what are perceived as civilizations and from the vigorous internal debate "within" them.

Nonetheless, a positive consequence of Huntington's formulation was to reintroduce the concept of culture—albeit a dated and deeply flawed one—to the study of foreign policy and international relations and to underscore that nation-states are no longer the sole pole of identity in politics. Civilizations, however, do not act on the human stage. The actors are the carriers of civilizational traditions, and among them, even in societies labeled as "traditional"—or alternatively as populist—there is diversity, contest, and continuing internal debate over identifying key values, who is "authorized" to articulate them, and how they are implemented.

 The Contest for "True" Islam in the Public Sphere

Historically known and contemporary debates and practices among Muslims argue against efforts to find a single, overarching idea of the common good shared by all Muslim societies, even if some ideologues—both those claiming to represent Islam and those attacking it—make such essentializing claims (Eickelman and Piscatori 2004: 46–79). It is often the case that such debates or conflicts about what "good" or "true" Islam entails disrupt implicit or even camouflaged conceptions of the public sphere, as in many communities throughout the Muslim world. The analyses of these debates and the contexts in which they occur throw into relief competing claims to speak in public, revealing threads of consensus and points of divergence or rupture.

The participation of religious authorities in public religious debate cannot be understood without an analysis of the audiences to which their discourses are directed and the elements that connect the followers of religious leaders to their persona. The new media, including sermons on tape, popular journals, and local radio broadcasts, may combine with more conventional media (including gossip or published fatwas, or religious interpretations) to widen spheres of participation and make them more complex. The degree to which the participation or influence of these new audiences alters conceptions and implementation of the common good, however, is a question that must always be asked rather than assumed (Eickelman and Salvatore 2002:105–110). New authorities or speakers emerge in the space between the state and more traditional religious authorities, and thus come to represent alternative points of power.

Religious authority can be an essential part of the construction of public religious discourse in many different ways. For example, the participation of Sufis in public religious debate combines modern forms of conceptualizing and presenting religious arguments with membership in a hierarchical and intensely personalized religious framework.

The relationship between religious authority—whether claimed by traditional religious scholars or by “new” religious intellectuals (Roy 1994 [1992]) and their political counterparts—and the public sphere is therefore profoundly ambiguous and much more complex than conventional Habermasian theories, in spite of their theoretical sophistication, would make us believe. Even in places where there is a state-sponsored Islamic ideology, as in Pakistan and Iran, individuals, groups, and communities often appropriate this ideology to reinforce their position in public religious debate by claiming Islamic credentials for defining the common good, or furthering particular interests in the guise of shared ones—a device common to public spheres everywhere (Masud 2005).

Well before September 2001, the growing number of Muslims in Europe and North America began to address questions about national identity, citizenship and multiple loyalties, as in France and Germany. Events since then have further foregrounded the vulnerability of Muslims living in the diaspora. At times this has led to efforts to organize for more effective participation in the political life of the societies in question, and at times has created waves of self-estrangement, exposing the fragility of multicultural discourse. Even in such a predicament, however, a positive outcome of double estrangement with the home and the receiving societies is to encourage engagement with transnational Muslim causes, especially where Muslims are the victims of human rights abuses. Therefore, the fragilities of the diasporic predicament, exacerbated since the events of September 2001 might in the long run reinforce participation in transnational Muslim publics.

In short, there is no singular public Islam, but rather a multiplicity of overlapping forms of practice and discourse that represent the varied historical and political trajectories of Muslim communities and their links and influences with societies elsewhere. The debates in the public sphere about the common good encompass both words and actions. They are also profoundly shaped by new practices, new forms of publication and communication, and new ways of thinking about religious and political authority.

{1} This chapter is a revised and updated version of Dale F. Eickelman and Armando Salvatore, “Public Islam,” in Public Islam and the Common Good, edited by Armando Salvatore and Dale F. Eickelman (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2004), 3–27.

 References

<biblio>

Adelkhah, Fariba. 2002. Being Modern in Iran. New York: Columbia University Press.

Adelkhah, Fariba. 2003. “Framing the Public Sphere: Women in the Islamic Republic.” In Public Islam and the Common Good, edited by Armando Salvatore and Dale F. Eickelman, 227–241. Leiden: E. J. Brill.

Casanova, José. 1994. Public Religions in the Modern World. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Çinar, Alev. 2005. Modernity, Islam, and Secularism in Turkey: Bodies, Places, and Time. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press.

Cook, Michael. 2000. Commanding Right and Forbidding Wrong in Islamic Thought. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Eickelman, Dale F. “Islam and the Languages of Modernity.” Daedalus 129, 1 (Winter 2000): 119–133.

Eickelman, Dale F., and James Piscatori. 2004. Muslim Politics (2nd ed.). Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Eickelman, Dale F., and Armando Salvatore. “The Public Sphere and Muslim Identities.” European Journal of Sociology 43 (2002): 92–115.

Ghannouchi, Rasheed. “Islam and Freedom Can Be Friends.” The Observer (London) (January 19, 1992).

Gonzalez-Quijano, Yves. 2003. “The Birth of a Media Ecosystem: Lebanon in the Internet Age.” In New Media in the Islamic World: The Emerging Public Sphere (2nd ed.), edited by Dale F. Eickelman and Jon W. Anderson, 61–79. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.

Hefner, Robert W. 2000. Civil Islam: Muslims and Democratization in Indonesia. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Hefner, Robert W. 2003. “Civic Pluralism Denied? The New Media and Jihadi Violence in Indonesia.” In New Media in the Islamic World: The Emerging Public Sphere (2nd ed.), edited by Dale F. Eickelman and Jon W. Anderson, 158–179. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.

Huntington, Samuel P. “The Clash of Civilizations?” Foreign Affairs 72, 3 (Summer 1993a): 22–49.

Huntington, Samuel P. “The Coming Clash of Civilizations or, the West Against the Rest.” New York Times (June 6, 1993b), 19.

Johnson, Paul. “Another Moslem Invasion of Europe.” Los Angeles Times (December 20, 1991).

Kepel, Gilles. 1987. Les banlieues de l’Islam: Naissance d’un religion en France. Paris: Éditions du Seuil.

Kepel, Gilles. 1997 (1994). Allah in the West: Islamic Movements in America and Europe. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press.

Khosrokhavar, Farhad. 1997. L’Islam des jeunes. Paris: Flammarion.

Kırli, Cengiz. 2004. “Coffeehouses: Public Opinion in the Nineteenth-Century Ottoman Empire.” In Public Islam and the Common Good, edited by Armando Salvatore and Dale F. Eickelman, 75–97. Leiden and Boston: E. J. Brill.

Lerner, Daniel. 1964 (orig. 1958). The Passing of Traditional Society: Modernizing the Middle East. New York: The Free Press.

Masud, Khalid. 2005. “Communicative Action and the Social Construction of Shari’a in Pakistan.” In Religion, Social Practice, and Contested Hegemonies. Reconstructing the Public Sphere in Muslim Majority Societies, 155–179. New York: Palgrave Macmillan.

Meeker, Michael E. 2000. A Nation of Empire: The Ottoman Legacy of Turkish Modernity. Berkeley: University of California Press.

Pekonen, Kyösti. 1989. “Symbols and Politics as Culture in the Modern Situation: The Problem and Prospects of the ‘New.’” In Contemporary Political Culture: Politics in a Postmodern World, edited by John R. Gibbons, 127–143. London: Sage Publications.

Perlmutter, Amos. “Islam and Democracy Simply Aren’t Compatible.” International Herald Tribune (January 21, 1992), 6.

Pinto, Paulo G. 2004. “The Limits of the Public: Sufism and the Religious Debate in Syria.” In Public Islam and the Common Good, edited by Armando Salvatore and Dale Eickelman, 181–204. Leiden and Boston: E. J. Brill.

Roy, Olivier. 1994 (1992). The Failure of Political Islam. Cambridge: Harvard University Press.

Salvatore, Armando. 1997. Islam and the Political Discourse of Modernity. Reading: Ithaca.

Salvatore, Armando. 2000. “Introduction: The Problem of the Ingraining of Civilizing Traditions into Social Governance.” In Muslim Traditions and Modern Techniques of Power, Yearbook of the Sociology of Islam 3, edited by Armando Salvatore, 9–42. Hamburg: Lit Verlag; New Brunswick, NJ: Transaction Publishers.

Salvatore, Armando, and Dale F. Eickelman (eds.). 2004. Public Islam and the Common Good. Leiden and Boston: E. J. Brill.

Salvatore, Armando and Mark LeVine (eds.). 2005. Religion, Social Practice, and Contested Hegemonies. Reconstructing the Public Sphere in Muslim Majority Societies. New York: PalgraveMacmillan.

Schulze, Reinhard. 2000 (1994). A Modern History of the Islamic World. New York: New York University Press.

Stein, Jeff. “Can You Tell a Sunni from a Shiite?” New York Times (October 17, 2006).

Sulaiman, Sadek J. 1998. “Democracy and Shura.” In Liberal Islam: A Sourcebook, edited by Charles Kurzman, 96–98. New York: Oxford University Press.

Toynbee, Arnold J. 1947. A Study of History, abridgement of volumes I-VI by D. C. Somervell. New York and London: Oxford University Press.

Turam, Berna. 2006. Between Islam and the State: The Politics of Engagement. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press.

Van der Veer, Peter. 1994. Religious Nationalism. Berkeley: University of California Press.

White, Jenny B. 2002. Islamist Mobilization in Turkey: A Study in Vernacular Politics. Seattle: University of Washington Press.

Yavuz, Hakan. 2003. “Media Identities for Alevis and Kurds in Turkey.” In New Media in the Muslim World: The Emerging Public Sphere (2nd ed.), edited by Dale F. Eickelman and Jon W. Anderson, 180–199. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.

Zaman, Muhammad Qasim. 2002. The Ulama in Contemporary Islam: Custodians of Change. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

</biblio>

* Part II: Suppressed Identities/Conflicts

 6. Cyber-Separatism, Islam, and the State in China

Dru C. Gladney

China’s Muslims are now facing their second millennium under Chinese rule. Many of the challenges they confront remain the same as they have for the last 1400 years of interaction with Chinese society, but many others are new as a result of China’s transformed and increasingly globalized society, and especially the watershed events of the September 11 terrorist attacks with the subsequent “war on terrorism.” Muslims in China live as minority communities amid a sea of people who, in their view, are largely pork-eating, polytheist, secularist, and “heathen” (kafir). Nevertheless, many of their small and isolated communities have survived in rather inhospitable circumstances for over a millennium. In response to the theme of this book, this chapter explores the integration and non-integration of Muslim groups and their identity conflicts in China today, charting the background of recent expressions of violence among some Muslim groups.

Though small in population percentage (about 2 percent in China, 1 percent in Japan, and less than 1 percent in Korea), the Muslim populations of East Asia are nevertheless large in comparison with those of other Muslim states. In fact, there are more Muslims living in China today than there are in Malaysia, and more than in every Middle Eastern Muslim nation except Iran, Turkey, and Egypt. East Asia is also increasingly depending on immigrants from Muslim-majority nations for energy and cheap labor, thus raising the importance of its Muslim diasporic communities for international and domestic relations. Japan has a rather small resident Muslim community, estimated to be less than 10,000. However, recent waves of Middle Eastern and South Asian migrant laborers to Japan's large industrial cities suggest that the total Muslim population could be nearing the 1 million mark. Though these communities are temporary in terms of residency, they have as strong an impact on Japan's rather insular society as the Turkish and Kurdish populations in the Scandinavian heartlands (which now have surpassed 10 percent). As Lipman (1997:2) insightfully noted, these long-term Muslim communities have often been the "familiar strangers" found in small enclaves throughout Asia. And if Kosovo and Bosnia are to serve as lessons, failure to accommodate Muslim minorities can lead to national dismemberment and international intervention. Indeed, China's primary objection to NATO involvement in Kosovo centered on its fear that this might encourage the aiding and abetting of separatists, a potential problem in light of the fact that independence groups in Xinjiang, Tibet, and even Taiwan, remain a major Chinese concern.

This chapter examines Muslim minority identity in Asia with specific reference to Muslim, in China and how they manage to regulate violence. With the largest Muslim minority in East Asia, China's Muslims are clearly the most threatened in terms of self-preservation and Islamic identity. At the same time, some of the lessons from the Chinese case might be useful for other Muslim communities in East Asia, and perhaps elsewhere in the world. Most relevant is the thesis that successful Muslim accommodation to minority status in Asia can be seen to be a measure of the extent to which Muslim groups allow the dictates of Islam to adapt to the contexts of their host cultures, which in turn helps regulate violence. This goes against the opposite view that Islam is almost unavoidably rebellious and that Muslims as minorities are inherently problematic to a non-Muslim state (Israeli 1978; Dillon 1997).

 Islam in China

According to the reasonably accurate 2000 national census of China, the total Muslim population is 20.3 million, including: Hui (9,816,805); Uyghur (8,399,393); Kazakh (1,250,458); Dongxiang (513,805); Kyrgyz (160,823); Salar (104,503); Tajik (41,028); Uzbek (14,502); Bonan (16,505); Tatar (4,890).[17] The Hui speak mainly Sino-Tibetan languages; Turkic-language speakers include the Uyghur, Kazakh, Kyrgyz, Uzbek, Salar, and Tatar; combined Turkic-Mongolian speakers include the Dongxiang and Bonan, concentrated in Gansu's mountainous Hexi corridor; and the Tajik speak a variety of Indo-Persian dialects. It is important to note, however, that the Chinese census registered people by nationality, not religious affiliation, so the actual number of Muslims is still unknown, and all population figures are clearly influenced by politics in their use and interpretation. Nevertheless, there are few Han converts to Islam, and perhaps even fewer members of the ten nationalities listed above who would dare to say they are not Muslim, at least in front of their parents. As I have argued elsewhere (Gladney 1996: 112–114), Muslim identity in China can best be described as ethnoreligious in that history, ethnicity, and state nationality policy has left an indelible mark on contemporary Muslim identity and it is almost impossible to discuss Islam without reference to ethnic and national identity.

Archaeological discoveries of large collections of Islamic artifacts and epigraphy on the southeast coast suggest that the earliest Muslim communities in China were descended from Arab, Persian, Central Asian, and Mongolian Muslim merchants, militia, and officials who settled first along China's southeast coast from the seventh through the tenth centuries. Later, larger migrations to the North from Central Asia under the Mongol-Yuan dynasty in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries added to these Muslim populations by gradually intermarrying with the local Chinese populations, and raising their children as Muslims. Practicing Sunni, Hanafi Islam, and residing in independent small communities clustered around a central mosque, these communities were characterized by relatively isolated, independent Islamic villages and urban enclaves, who related with each other via trading networks. However these scattered Islamic settlements shared a recognition of belonging to the wider Islamic community (umma), that was connected by traveling Muslim teachers known locally as Ahung.

 Hui Muslims and Islamic Accommodation to Chinese Society

Islam in China has primarily been propagated over the last 1300 years among the people now known as Hui, but many of the issues confronting them are relevant to the Turkic and Indo-European Muslims on China’s Inner Asian frontier. Though Hui speak a number of non-Chinese languages, most Hui are closer to Han Chinese than other Muslim nationalities in terms of demographic proximity and cultural accommodation. The attempt to adapt many of their Muslim practices to the Han way of life has led to criticisms among some Muslim reformers. In the wake of modern Islamic reform movements that have swept across China, a wide spectrum of Islamic belief and practice can now be found among those Muslims in China referred to as the Hui.

The Hui have been labeled the “Chinese-speaking Muslims,” “Chinese Muslims,’ and most recently, as “Sino-Muslims.”[18] However this terminology is misleading since by law all Muslims living in China are “Chinese” by citizenship, and there are large Hui communities who speak primarily the non-Chinese languages dominant in the areas where they live. This is the case, for example, with the Tibetan, Mongolian, Thai, and Hainan Muslims of China, who are also classified by the state as Hui. These “Hui” Muslims speak Tibetan, Mongolian, and Thai as their first-languages, with Han Chinese the national language that they learn in school, along with the Arabic and Persian that some of them also learn at the mosque. Interestingly, since Tajik is not an official language in China, the Tajiks’ children of Xinjiangan go to school in either Turkic Uyghur or Han Chinese.

 Hui Islamic Orders and Chinese Culture

Sufism began to make a substantial impact in China proper in the late seventeenth century, arriving mainly along the Central Asian trade routes with saintly shaykhs, both Chinese and foreign, who brought new teachings from the pilgrimage cities. These charismatic teachers and tradesmen established widespread networks and brotherhood associations, including most prominently the Naqshbandiyya, Qadariyya, and Kubrawiyya. Unlike Middle Eastern or Central Asian Sufi orders, where one might belong to two or even three brotherhoods at once, the Hui belong to only one. Among the Hui, one is generally born into one’s Islamic order (menhuan), or converts dramatically to another. In fact, this is the only instance of conversion I encountered during my sojourn among the Hui. I never met a Han who had converted to Islam in China without having been married to a Hui or adopted into a Hui family, though I heard of a few isolated instances. Fletcher records the conversion to Islam of twenty-eight Tibetan tribes as well as their “Living Buddha” by Ma Laichi in Xunhua, Qinghai in the mid-eighteenth century (Trippner 1961: 154–155). After the 1784 Ma Mingxin uprising, the Qing government forbade non-Muslims from converting to Islam, which may have had some influence. This goes against the common assumption that Islam in China was spread through proselytization and conversion.

The tensions and conflicts that led to the rise and divisions between various Islamic orders menhuan in China, and subsequent non-Sufi reforms, are impossible to enumerate in their complexity. An overview of major developments can, however, give evidence of the ongoing struggles that continue to make Islam meaningful to Hui Muslims. These tensions between Islamic ideals and social realities are often left unresolved. Their very dynamism derives from the questions they raise and the doubts they engender among people struggling with traditional meanings in the midst of changing social contexts. Questions of purity and legitimacy become paramount when the Hui are faced with radical internal socioeconomic and political change, and exposed to different interpretations of Islam from the outside Muslim world. These conflicts and reforms reflect an ongoing debate in China over Islamic orthodoxy, revealing an important disjunction between “scripturalist” or “mystical” interpretations.

In a similar fashion, the study of Southeast Asian Islam has often centered on the contradiction and compromise between the native culture of the indigenous Muslims and the shari’a of orthodox Islam, the mystical and scriptural, the real and the ideal.[19] The supposed accommodation of orthodox Islamic tenets to local cultural practices has led scholars to dismiss or explain such compromise as syncretism, assimilation, and “sinification,” as has been described among the Hui. An alternative approach, and one perhaps more in tune with the interests of Hui themselves, sees this incongruence as the basis for ongoing dialectical tensions that have often led to reform movements and conflicts within Muslim communities (Eickelman 1976: 10–13).

In the competition for scarce resources, these conflicts are also prompted by and expressed in economic concerns. For example, Fletcher (1996) notes that one of the criticisms of the Khufiyya order in China was that their recitation of an Islamic religious text, entitled the Ming Sha Le, took less time than the normal Quranic suras as read by non-Sufi clergy, and therefore their Imams were cheaper to hire at ritual ceremonies. Fletcher (1996:,21) suggests that this assisted their rise in popularity and contributed to the criticism they received from traditional religious leaders.

 Tendencies toward Acculturation and Purification

The tensions arising from the conflict of Chinese cultural practices and Islamic ideals have led to the rise and powerful appeal of Islamic movements among Hui Muslims. At one extreme, there are those who reject any integration of Islam with Chinese culture, advocating instead a return to an Arabicized “pure” Islam. Conversely, at the other extreme, there are those traditionalist Chinese Muslim leaders who accepted greater degrees of integration with traditional Chinese society. Likewise, Ma Qixi’s Xi Dao Tang stressed the complete compatibility of Chinese and Islamic culture, the importance of Chinese Islamic Confucian texts, the harmony of the two systems, and the reading of the Quran in Chinese.

In between, one finds various attempts at changing Chinese society to “fit” a Muslim world, through transformationist or militant Islam, as illustrated by the largely Naqshbandiyya-led nineteenth-century Hui uprisings. The Jahriyya order sought to implement an alternative vision of the world in their society, and this posed a threat to the Qing as well as to other Hui Muslims, earning them the label of “heterodox” (xie jiao) and persecution by the Chinese state. By contrast, other Hui reformers have attempted to make Islam “fit” Chinese society, such as Liu Zhi’s monumental effort to demonstrate the Confucian morality of Islam. The alternative advocated by the Qadiriyya order in China represents resolution of this tension through ascetic withdrawal from the world.

The hierarchical organization of these Sufi networks helped in the mobilization of large numbers of Hui during economic and political crises of the seventeenth through the nineteenth centuries, assisting widespread Muslim-led rebellions and resistance movements against late Ming and Qing imperial rule in Yunnan, Shaanxi, Gansu, and Xinjiang. In the late nineteenth and early twentieth century, Wahhabi-inspired reform movements, known as the Yihewani, rose to popularity under Nationalist and warlord sponsorship, and were noted for their critical stance toward traditionalist Islam, which they viewed as being overly acculturated to non-Muslim Chinese practices, and to forms of popular Sufism such as saint and tomb veneration.

Beyond such internal Muslim critiques, the Chinese state has also launched its own criticisms of certain Islamic orders among the Hui. The stakes in such debates were often economic, as well as ideological. For example, during the Land Reform campaigns of the 1950s, the state appropriated mosque and waqf (Islamic endowment) holdings from traditional Muslim religious institutions. These met with great resistance from the Sufi menhuan that had accumulated a great deal due to their hierarchical centralized leadership.

 Islam and Chinese Nationalism

In the twentieth century, many Muslims supported the earliest communist call for economic equality, autonomy, freedom of religion, and recognized nationality status, and were active in the early establishment of the People’s Republic of China (PRC). However, many of them later became disenchanted by growing critiques of religious practice during several periods in the PRC beginning in 1957. During the Cultural Revolution (1966–1976), Muslims became the focus for both anti-religious and anti-ethnic nationalist critiques, leading to widespread persecutions, mosque closings, and at least one large massacre of 1,000 Hui following a 1975 uprising in Yunnan province. Since Deng Xiaoping’s post-1978 reforms, Muslims have sought to take advantage of liberalized economic and religious policies, while keeping a watchful eye on the ever-swinging pendulum of Chinese radical politics. There are now more mosques open in China than there were prior to 1949, and Muslims travel freely on the hajj to Mecca, as well as engaging in cross-border trade with co-religionists in Central Asia, the Middle East, and increasingly, Southeast Asia.

With the dramatic increase in the number of Muslims traveling back and forth to the Middle East came new waves of Islamic reformist thought, including criticism of local Muslim practices in China. Through similar channels, other Chinese Muslims have also been exposed to various types of new, often politically radical, Islamic ideologies. These developments have fueled Islamic factional struggles that have continued to further China's Muslims internal divisions. For example, in February 1994, four Naqshbandi Sufi leaders were sentenced to long-term imprisonment for their support of internal factional disputes in the southern Ningxia Region that had led to at least sixty deaths on both sides and People's Liberation Army intervention. Throughout the summer and fall of 1993 bombs exploded in several towns in Xinjiang, indicating the growing demands of organizations pressing for an "independent Turkestan." In February 1997, a major uprising in Ili led to the deaths of at least thirteen Uyghur Muslims and the arrests of hundreds. It is clear that Hui and Kazakh Muslims are critical of these separatist actions among the Uyghur, but it is not yet clear how much support even among the Uyghur there is for the violent acts, especially one recent attempt to assassinate a "collaborating" Imam in Kashghar. Beijing has responded with increased military presence in the region, particularly in Kashghar and Urumqi, as well as diplomatic efforts in the Central Asian states and Turkey to discourage foreign support for separatist movements.

Increasing Muslim political activism on a national scale and rapid state responses to such developments indicate the growing importance Beijing attaches to Muslim-related issues. Muslims throughout China protested the publication of a Chinese book Sexual Customs in May 1989, and a children's book in October 1993 that portrayed Muslims, particularly their restriction against pork, in a derogatory fashion. In each case, the government responded quickly, meeting most of the Muslims' demands, condemning the publications and arresting the authors, and closing down the printing houses.

These developments have influenced all Muslim nationalities in China today. However, they have found their most overtly political expressions among those Hui who are faced most directly with the task of accommodating new Islamic movements within Chinese culture. By comparison, among the Uyghur a more recent integration into Chinese society as a result of Mongolian and Manchu expansion into Central Asian has forced them to reach different degrees of social and political accommodations that have challenged their identity. In terms of integration, the Uyghur as a people are perhaps the least integrated into Chinese society, while the Hui are at the other end of the spectrum.

Increased Muslim activism in China might be thought of as “nationalistic,” but it is also a nationalism that may often transcend the boundaries of the contemporary nation-state, via mass communications, increased travel, and the internet. Encouraged by the Chinese state, relations between Muslims in China and their co-religionists in the Middle East are becoming stronger and more frequent. This appears to be motivated partly out of a desire to establish trading partners for arms, commodities, and currency exchanges, and partly by China’s traditional view of itself as a leader of the Third World. Delegations of foreign Muslims regularly travel to prominent Islamic sites in China, in a kind of state-sponsored religious tourism, and donations are encouraged. While the state hopes that private Islamic investment will assist economic development, the vast majority of grants by visiting foreign Muslims have been donated to the rebuilding of Islamic mosques, schools, and hospitals. As Hui in China are further exposed to Islamic internationalism, and they return from pilgrimages and periods of study abroad, traditional Hui identities are once again being reshaped and called into question, giving rise to new manifestations of Islam in China. Global Islam is thus localized into Hui Islam, finding its expression as a range of accommodations between Chinese-ness and Muslim-ness as defined in each local community.

 Uyghurs, Muslims, and Chinese

In 1997, bombs exploded in a city park in Beijing on May 13 (killing one) and on two buses on March 7 (killing two), as well as on February 25 in the northwestern border city of Urumqi, the capital of Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region (killing nine). In recent years there have been over thirty other bombings, six of them in Tibet alone. Most of these are thought to have been related to demands by Muslim and Tibetan separatists. Eight members of the Uyghur Muslim minority were executed on May 29, 1997 for alleged bombings in northwest China, with hundreds arrested on suspicion of taking part in ethnic riots and engaging in separatist activities. Though sporadically reported since the early 1980s, such incidents have been increasingly common since 1997 and are documented in a recent scathing report on Chinese government policy in the region by Amnesty International (1999). A report in the Wall Street Journal of August 11, 1999 (Johnson 1999) on the arrest of a well-known Uyghur business woman named Rebiya Kadir during a visit by the United States Congressional Research Service delegation to the region, indicates that China's random arrests have not diminished since the report, and that China remains relatively unconcerned with Western criticism of such measures. As a result of considerable international pressure, Ms. Kadir was released to the United States in May 2005 and is now the elected leader of the Uyghur American Association, based in Washington, DC.

As we consider the interaction of Uyghur Muslims with Chinese society, we must examine the interrelated aspects of regional history, economy, and politics. First, Chinese histories notwithstanding, most Uyghur firmly believe that their ancestors were the indigenous people of the Tarim basin, which did not become known in Chinese as Xinjiang (new dominion) until the eighteenth century. Nevertheless, the indigeneity of the present people classified as Uyghur by the Chinese state is a recent ethnogenesis created by Great Game rivalries, Sino-Soviet geopolitical maneuverings, and Chinese nation-building (Gladney 1990: 3).

The end of the Qing dynasty in 1912 and the rise of Great Game rivalries between China, Russia, and Britain saw the region torn by competing loyalties and marked by two short-lived and drastically different attempts at independence: the short-lived proclamations of an "East Turkestan Republic" in Kashgar in 1933, and another in Yining in 1944 (Benson 1990). These rebellions and attempts at self-rule did little to bridge competing political, religious, and regional differences among the Turkic people who became known as the Uyghur (Forbes 1986: 29). Furthermore Rudelson’s (1997) research suggests there remains persistent regional diversity along three, and perhaps four macro-regions of Uyghuristan: the northwestern Zungaria plateau, the southern Tarim basin, the southwest Pamir region, and the eastern Kumul-Turpan-Hami corridor.

 Uyghur Indigeneity and the Challenge to Chinese Sovereignty

The minzu policy under the Chinese Nationalists identified five peoples of China, with the Han in the majority. The recognition of the Uyghur as an official Chinese nationality (minzu) under a Soviet-influenced policy of nationality recognition contributed to a widespread acceptance today of the idea of a continuity with the ancient Uyghur kingdom and the eventual ethnogenesis of the Uyghur as a bona fide nationality. This policy was continued under the Communists, who eventually recognized fifty-six nationalities, with the Han occupying a 91 percent majority in 1990. The “peaceful liberation” of Xinjiang by the Chinese Communists in 1949, and the subsequent establishment of Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region on October 1, 1955, perpetuated the Nationalist policy of recognizing the Uyghur as a minority nationality under Chinese rule (Shahidi 1984). However, the designation of the Uyghur as a nationality masks tremendous regional and linguistic diversity. It also includes the Loplyk and Dolans, who have little in common with the oasis-based Uyghur. Contemporary Uyghur separatists look back to the brief periods of independent self-rule under Yakub Beg and the Eastern Turkestan Republics, in addition to the earlier Uyghur kingdoms as evidence of their rightful claims to the region.

Within the region, Uyghurs continue to be divided from within by religious conflicts between Sufi and non-Sufi factions, territorial loyalties, language, commoner-elite alienation, and competing political loyalties. These divided loyalties were behind the May 1996 attack on the Imam of the Idgah Mosque in Kashgar by other Uyghurs, as well as the assassination of at least six Uyghur officials in September 2001. It is also important to note that Islam is only one of several unifying markers for Uyghur identity, depending on those with whom they are cooperating at the time. To the Hui Muslim Chinese, the Uyghur distinguish themselves as the legitimate autochthonous minority, since both share a belief in Sunni Islam. In contrast to the nomadic Muslim peoples (Kazakh or Kyrgyz), Uyghur might stress their attachment to the land and oases of origin.

Alleged incursions of Taliban fighters through the Wakhan corridor into China where Xinjiang shares a narrow border with Afghanistan have led to the area being swamped with Chinese security forces and large military exercises, beginning at least one month prior to the 9/11 attacks. These military exercises suggested growing government concern about these border areas much earlier than 9/11/2001. Under U.S. and Chinese pressure, Pakistan returned one Uyghur activist to China out of hundreds of Taliban detainees, following a pattern of repatriating suspected Uyghur separatists in Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, and Uzbekistan. Amnesty International claims that Chinese government round-ups of “terrorists” and “separatists” has led to hurried public trials and immediate, summary executions of possibly thousands of locals. One Amnesty International estimate suggested that in a country known for its frequent executions, Xinjiang had the highest number, averaging 1.8 per week, most of them Uyghur (1999: 24). Troop movements to the area, related to the nationwide campaign against crime known as “Strike Hard” launched in 1998 have reportedly been the largest since the suppression of the large Akto insurrection in April 1990.[20]

 Ethnic Muslim Nationalism in an Age of Globalization

International campaigns for Uyghur rights and possible independence have become increasingly vocal and well organized, especially on the Internet. Repeated public appeals have been made to Abdulahat Abdurixit, the Uyghur People’s Government Chairman of Xinjiang in Urumqi. Notably, the elected chair of the Unrepresented Nations and People’s Organization (UNPO) based in the Hague is a Uyghur, Erkin Alptekin, son of the separatist leader, Isa Yusuf Alptekin, who is buried in Istanbul where there is a park dedicated to his memory. Supporting primarily an audience of approximately one million expatriate Uyghurs (yet few Uyghurs in Central Asia and China have access to these Internet sites), there are at least twenty-five international organizations and web sites working for the independence of “Eastern Turkestan.” Since 9/11, each of these organizations has disclaimed any support for violence or terrorism, pressing for a peaceful resolution of ongoing conflicts in the region. The growing influence of cyber-separatism and international popularization of the Uyghur cause concerns Chinese authorities, who hope to convince the world that the Uyghurs do pose a real domestic and international terrorist threat.

At the same time, the Chinese state has become more keenly aware of the importance that foreign Muslim governments place on China's treatment of its Muslim minorities as a factor in China's lucrative trade and military agreements. The establishment of full diplomatic ties with Saudi Arabia in 1991 and increasing military and technical trade with Middle Eastern Muslim states enhances the economic and political salience of China's treatment of its internal Muslim minority population. The official protocols signed with China's Central Asian border nations, beginning in 1996 with the group known as the "Shanghai 5" (China, Russia, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Tajikstan) and expanded in 2001 to include Uzbekistan, underlines China's growing role in the region and concerns over transnational trade and security. The increased transnationalism of China's Muslims will be an important factor in their ethnic expression as well as practiced accommodation to Chinese culture and state authority.

Beyond these political pressures, Uyghur relations with the Chinese state also involve significant economic issues. Since 1991, China has been a net oil importer; it also has twenty million Muslims. Mishandling of its Muslim populations runs the risk of alienating Middle Eastern trading partners, who are primarily Muslims. After an ethnic riot on February 5, 1997, in the northwestern Xinjiang city of Yining, that left at least nine Uyghur Muslims dead and several hundreds arrested, the Saudi Arabian official newspaper warned China about the "suffering of [its] Muslims whose human rights are violated." Turkey's Defense Minister officially condemned China's handling of the issue, and China responded by telling Turkey not to interfere in China's internal affairs. Muslim nations on China's borders, though officially unsupportive of Uyghur separatists, may be increasingly critical of harsh treatment extended to fellow Turkic and/or Muslim co-religionists in China.

Unrest in the Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region may thus lead to a decline in outside oil investment and revenues, which are already operating at a loss.

In 2003, Exxon reported that its two wells came up dry in China's supposedly oil-rich Tarim basin of southern Xinjiang, with the entire region yielding only 3.15 million metric tons of crude oil, much less than China's overall output of 156 million tons. The World Bank loans over $3 billion a year to China, investing over $780.5 million in fifteen projects in the Xinjiang Region alone, with some of that money allegedly going to the Xinjiang Production and Construction Corps (XPCC) that human rights activist Harry Wu has claimed employs prison labor. International companies and organizations may not wish to subject their employees and investors to social and political upheavals. As a result of these criticisms, many World Bank and Asian Development Bank projects have been curtailed in recent years. Yet China's trade with Central Asia is expanding rapidly with the opening of direct rail, air, and six overland links. Xinjiang's top trading partners are Kazakhstan and Hong Kong, with China-Kazakhstan trade alone totaling more than Turkey's trade with all of Central Asia (Dorian, Wigdortz, Gladney 1997).

Additionally, China is hoping to increase revenues from tourism to the region, marketing it as an important link on the ancient Silk Road. It has been a tremendous draw to foreign Muslim tourists, as well as Japanese, Taiwanese, Southeast Asian, and domestic tourists. This rise in tourism has led to five-star hotels throughout the region and dramatic changes, such as the building of eighty new skyscrapers in Urumqi over the last decade. Uyghur separatism and Muslim complaints regarding Chinese policy will have important consequences for China's economic development of the region.

China's handling of ethnic and integrationist issues in Xinjiang and Hong Kong will have a direct bearing on its possible reunification with Taiwan. Beyond the official minorities, China possesses tremendous ethnic, linguistic, and regional diversity. Intolerance toward difference in Xinjiang might be extended to limiting cultural pluralism in Guangdong, where at least fifteen dialects of Cantonese are spoken and folk religious practices remain strong. Memories of the Cultural Revolution (1966–76), when all forms of diversity, political or cultural, were severely curtailed, are still very much alive. If rising Chinese nationalism entails reducing ethnic and cultural difference, then anyone who is regarded as "other" in China will suffer, not only the Uyghurs.

 Cyber-Separatism: Virtual Voices in the Uyghur Opposition

Though silenced within China, Uyghur voices can still be heard virtually on the Internet. Perhaps due to Chinese restrictions on public protest and a state-controlled media or the deleterious effect of a war on domestic terrorism, very few Uyghur voices critical of the Chinese can be heard publicly today in the region. Supporting primarily an audience of over 500,000 expatriate Uyghurs, there are at least twenty-five international organizations and web sites working for the independence of “Eastern Turkestan,” and based in Amsterdam, Munich, Istanbul, Melbourne, Washington, DC, and New York. Estimates differ widely on the number of Uyghurs living in the diaspora. Uyghurs in Central Asia are not always well represented in the state censuses, particularly since 1991. Shichor (2002) estimates approximately 500,000 living abroad, about 5–6 percent of the total world Uyghur population. Uyghur web sites differ dramatically on the official Uyghur population, from up to 25 million Uyghur inside Xinjiang, to up to 10 million in the diaspora.[21]

Both the UN and the U.S. government have agreed with China that at least one international organization, ETIM (East Turkestan Islamic Movement), is a Uyghur-sponsored terrorist organization, while the vast majority of the Eastern Turkestan independence and information organizations disclaim violence. Supported largely by Uyghur émigrés who left China prior to the Communist takeover in 1949, these organizations maintain web sites and activities that take a primarily negative view of Chinese policies in the region. Although not all advocate independence, the vast majority press for radical change in the region, reporting human rights violations, environmental degradation, economic imbalances and alternative histories of the region. In general, these web sites can be divided into information and political advocacy sites, nearly all of which are critical of Chinese policies in Xinjiang.

There are also a growing number of Central Asia-based sites that contain information and discussion of events in Xinjiang. While most do not take positions on the Uyghur independence issues related to Xinjiang, most report more favorably on Uyghur claims against the Chinese State. GeoNative’s informational site maintained by the Basque activist Luistxo Fernandez claims to report objectively on minority peoples less represented in the world press. More advocacy-driven is the Uyghur service of Radio Free Asia, which as part of its regular broadcast to Xinjiang and surrounding regions, is reportedly beamed from transmitters in Tajikistan and Kyrgyzstan (www. rfa.org/service/index.html?service=uyg). According to their site, Radio Free Asia (RFA) broadcasts news and information to Asian listeners who lack regular access to “full and balanced reporting” in their domestic media. In its broadcasts and call-in programs, RFA aims to fill a “critical gap” in the news reporting for people in certain regions of Asia. Created by the U.S. Congress in 1994, RFA currently broadcasts in Burmese, Cantonese, Khmer, Korean, Lao, Mandarin, the Wu dialect, Vietnamese, Tibetan (Uke, Amdo, and Kham), and Uyghur. Although it claims to adhere to the highest standards of journalism, local governments have often complained of bias in favor of groups critical to the regimes in power. The Uyghur service has been regularly blocked and criticized by the Chinese government, and has been cited in the past for carrying stories supportive of “separatists.” Despite increased Sino-U.S. cooperation on terrorism and the labeling of ETIM as an international Uyghur terrorist group, there seem to have been no changes in funding levels or content. Frequent Uyghur listeners, however, have complained that the site no longer criticizes China as strongly or frequently for its treatment of Uyghurs in Xinjiang.

Funding for the informational sites are generally traceable to academic organizations, advertising, and subscription. It is much harder to establish funding sources for the advocacy sites. While most sites are supported by subscribers, advertising, and small donations from Uyghurs and other Muslims outside of China sympathetic to the Uyghur cause, there is no evidence that the organizations and the sites they sponsor have ever received official government sponsorship. Other than the Radio Free Asia Uyghur service, which is supported by the U.S. government, there is no other government that officially supports dissemination of information related to Uyghur human rights issues.

An interesting U.S.-based site includes the Citizens Against Communist Chinese Propaganda (with one page entitled “Free East Turkistan!”), which bills itself as a counter-propaganda site based in Florida and led by Jack Churchward who started the organization, Free Eastern Turkestan, that originally made a name for itself through a series of protests against a Chinese-owned and operated theme park, “Splendid China," located in Kissimmee, Florida that they found denigrating to Uyghurs and Tibetans. The Uyghur Human Rights Coalition is a web site reporting human rights abuses of Uyghurs in China and contains links to articles and other sites (www.uyghurs.org/). KIVILCIM is an East Turkistan Information Website advocating independence, in Uyghur language (www.doguturkistan.net/). Other advocacy groups include the East Turkestan Information Center www.uygur.org/ and the Eastern Turkestan National Freedom Center (www.uygur.org). The Uyghur Human Rights Coalition publishes personal testimonies of human rights abuses. As most sites are cross-linked, they repeat and pass along information contained on other sites.

There were over twenty Uyghur advocacy organizations in the late 1990s but these seem to have declined in membership and activities since 9/11. The most strident advocacy site in 2003 was the "Islamic Party of Turkistan," which was entirely in Uyghur (in the Arabicized script used in China, not the Cyrillic that is still used in the Central Asian Republics). The site advocated overthrow of the Chinese government by any means, including the use of violence, and chronicles atrocities committed against the Uyghur in Xinjiang and Central Asia with detailed reports on incidents in the region often drawn from BBC and Al-Jazeerah.

It is difficult to assess who the audience is for these web sites and organizations, as they are all blocked in China, and mostly inaccessible in Central Asia due to either inadequate Internet access or high costs. Many Uyghurs in China and Central Asia have never heard of these sites and government officials in Xinjiang also claim they do not have access. I was quite surprised, therefore, when on March 26, 2003, while in Kashgar, I went to the "Fatima Wangba" Internet café, across the street from the Seman Hotel, and was able to access the discussion list, Uighur-L, run by the site www.taklamakan.org/uighur-l. At that URL, I was able to read a history of the Uyghur in Xinjiang that was quite contrary to the officially approved Chinese government position. Nevertheless, this site is probably rarely accessed by local Uyghur and may no longer be available (Harwit 2003). During a September 2003 visit to Urumqi, it was no longer accessible, but I was able to connect to several pro-Tibetan sites. It is clear, however, that Uyghurs in the Western diaspora, particularly in Europe, Turkey, the United States, Canada, and Australia are frequent readers and contributors to these sites. In addition, events in the region since 9/11 have led an increasing number of journalists and observers to visit these sites more regularly. It is also interesting that little on these sites can be associated with militant or radical Islam, and there are almost no calls for an Islamic “Jihad” against the Chinese state. Most involve documenting the plight and history of the Uyghurs under Chinese rule in Xinjiang. Few Chinese inside or outside of China have visited these sites and are quite unaware of these alternative histories. Although there are several sites available in Turkish and Uyghur, there are none in Chinese. As such, it is a self-selected audience and rarely reaches beyond those who already support and are interested in the agenda supported by the site.

Financial support for these organizations and web sites come mostly from private individuals, foundations, and rare subscriptions. In an interview, Anwar Yusuf, president of the Washington, DC-based Eastern Turkestan National Freedom Center, claimed that he had received substantial support from patrons in Saudi Arabia, but by the late 1990s funding had begun to dry up due to too many organizations and waning interest in the Uyghur cause (Yusuf 1999).

Although most of these websites have limited funding and circulation, they should not be dismissed as forming only a “virtual” community without any substantial impact on events within Xinjiang. They serve as an important source of information unavailable in the official Chinese media and there is evidence that Internet sites influence public opinion because of their widespread availability and alternative reporting (Baber 2002). While there is debate about how much effect, it is clear that the Internet has altered the way information is circulated and opinions are formed. More important, these “virtual communities” have led to interactions and coalitions that have influenced political and socioeconomic events. Social movements in East Timor, Aceh, Chechnya, and Bosnia have used Internet communities for mobilizing, influencing opinion as well as creating large financial transfers (Foster 1997; Jordan 1999; Rushkoff 1994; Smith and Kollock 1999). While cyber-separatism would never be able on its own to unseat a local government, it does link like-minded individuals and raise consciousness about issues that were often inaccessible to the general public. For an isolated region such as Xinjiang, and the widely dispersed Uyghur diaspora, the Internet has dramatically altered the way the world sees the region and the Chinese state must respond to issues within it.

There are more than just Internet organizations involved in separatist activities in and around Xinjiang. As noted above, the East Turkestan Islamic Movement (ETIM) was recognized by the UN in October 2002 as an international terrorist organization responsible for domestic and international terrorist acts, which China claimed included a bombing of the Chinese consulate in Istanbul, assassinations of Chinese officials in Bishkek, and Uighur officials in Kashgar thought to collaborate with Chinese officialdom (Hutzler 2001). This designation, however, created a controversy in that China and the United States presented little public evidence to positively link the ETIM organization with the specific incidents described.[22] In 2001, the U.S. State Department released a report that documented several separatist and terrorist groups operating inside the region and abroad promoting an independent Xinjiang (McNeal 2001).[23] This included “The United Revolutionary Front of Eastern Turkestan” whose leader Yusupbek Mukhlisi claims to have thirty armed units with “20 million” Uyghurs primed for an uprising; the “Home of East Turkestan Youth,” said to be linked to Hamas with a reported 2000 members; the “Free Turkestan Movement” whose leader Abdul Kasim is said to have led the 1990 Baren uprising; the “Organization for the Liberation of Uighuristan” whose leader Ashir Vakhidi is said to be committed to the fighting Chinese “occupation” of the “Uighur homeland;” and the so-called “Wolves of Lop Nor” who have claimed responsibility for various bombings and uprisings. The State Department claims that all have tenuous links with al Qaeda, Taliban, the Hizb-ut-Tahrir (“Islamic Revival”), and the Tableeghi Jamaat. It came as some surprise, then, when at the conclusion of his August 2001 visit to Beijing, Deputy Secretary of State Richard Armitage identified ETIM as the leading Uyghur group to be targeted as an international terrorist group. At the time, few, including activists working for an independent East Turkistan, had ever heard of the ETIM group. Even the U.S. military did not seem to be aware of the group, as the September 28, 2001 “Special Report: Uighur Muslim Separatists” issued by the Virtual Information Center in Honolulu, which is funded by USCINCPAC (the Pacific Asia Command), not only did not mention ETIM, but concluded regarding separatist violence in Xinjiang that there is “no single identifiable group but there is violent opposition coordinated and possibly conducted by exiled groups and organizations within Xinjiang” (Virtual Information Center 2001).

The main criticism raised by those critical of this designation is that, with so many identified groups, it has not been made clear why ETIM was singled out. Interestingly, Mukhlisi's United Revolutionary Front was not included with ETIM, despite its frequent claims of responsibility for violent acts in Xinjiang, such as the 1997 train derailment and police station bombings.[24]

When I met with Yusupbek Mukhlisi in Almaty on two occasions in August 2003, he continued to advocate violence in the overthrow of the Chinese state in East Turkistan. He stated: "The Chinese government will never peacefully withdraw from the occupied territory of East Turkistan. We have no choice but to use violence." At the same time, many Uyghur have complained to me that, although there have been many reported terrorist bombings in Tibet and frequent organized protests against Chinese rule that have led to violence outside of Tibet, given the sympathy shown to Tibetans in the West, they do not see the United States ever siding with China in condemning a Tibetan independence organization as terrorist.

Following Armitage's announcement and the State Department's report, the Chinese State Council issued its own report charging that from 1990 to 2001 various Uyghur separatist groups "were responsible for over 200 terrorist incidents in Xinjiang" that resulted in the deaths of 162 people and injuries to 440 others. The report, titled "East Turkestan Terrorist Forces Cannot Get Away with Impunity," also dismissed allegations that Beijing had used the U.S.-led war on terror as a pretext to crack down on Uyghurs. The report condemned numerous Uyghur groups including Hazret's ETLO (East Turkestan Liberation Organization); the ETIM; the Islamic Reformist Party "Shock Brigade"; the East Turkestan Islamic Party; the East Turkestan Opposition Party; the East Turkestan Islamic Party of Allah; the Uyghur Liberation Organization; the Islamic Holy Warriors; and the East Turkestan International Committee.

An Internet search of these organizations reveals little information if any. These organizations and the Internet news and information organizations discussed above have rarely if ever claimed responsibility for any specific action, though many are sympathetic to isolated incidents regarded as challenging Chinese rule in the region. Interestingly, there seems to be very little support for radical Islam and a search for the term “jihad” among the various web sites and news postings related to these groups turns up almost no use of the term or call for a religious war against the Chinese, except for the Islamic Party of Turkistan as noted above (see www.turkistan-islam.com). As Rudelson (1997) has noted, many of the Uyghur nationalists are quite secular in their orientation, and overthrow of Chinese rule is related to issues of sovereignty and human rights, rather than religion. By contrast, Uyghur expatriots in the United States, Canada, Turkey, and Europe tend to be quite religious, yet rarely call for a holy war against the Chinese. Their concerns are more related to historic claims upon ancestral lands, Chinese mistreatment, and a desire to return home to a “free East Turkestan.” A Uyghur family with whom I spent the Ramadan feast in Toronto in 2000 maintained a deeply religious life in Canada that they claimed was not possible in China. Although disavowing violence, their daily prayer was for a free “Uyghuristan” where their relatives could be free to practice religion. In Istanbul, the Uyghur community is quite active in the mosques in Zeytinburnu and Tuzla, and strongly advocates a “liberated East Turkestan,” but on several visits to these communities since 1993 I have never once heard them call for a jihad against the Chinese government.

Since 9/11, very few groups have publicly advocated terror against the Chinese state, and most have denied any involvement in terrorist activities, though they may express sympathy for such activities. A case in point is the East Turkestan Liberation Organization (ETLO), led by the secretive Mehmet Emin Hazret. In a January 24, 2003 telephone interview with the Uyghur service of Radio Free Asia, Hazret admitted that there may be a need to establish a military wing of his organization that would target Chinese interests but he denied any prior terrorist activity or association with the East Turkestan Islamic Movement (ETIM). “We have not been and will not be involved in any kind of terrorist action inside or outside China. We have been trying to solve the East Turkestan problem through peaceful means. But the Chinese government’s brutality in East Turkestan may have forced some individuals to resort to violence.”[25]

Hazret, a former screenwriter from Xinjiang, who migrated to Turkey in his forties, denied any connection between his organization and al-Qaeda or Osama bin Laden. Nevertheless, he did see the increasing need for a military action against Chinese rule in the region: “Our principal goal is to achieve independence for East Turkestan by peaceful means. But to show our enemies and friends our determination on the East Turkestan issue, we view a military wing as inevitable….The Chinese people are not our enemy. Our problem is with the Chinese government, which violates the human rights of the Uyghur people.” Once again, a common pattern to his response regarding Chinese rule in the region was not to stress Islamic jihad or religious nationalism, but to emphasize human rights violations and Uyghur claims on Eastern Turkestan.

China’s Uyghur separatists are small in number, poorly equipped, loosely linked, and vastly out-gunned by the People’s Liberation Army and People’s Police. Although sometimes disgruntled about other rights’ and mistreatment issues, China’s nine other official Muslim minorities do not in general support Uyghur separatism. There is continued enmity between Uyghur and Hui (Tungan) in the region. Few Hui support an independent Xinjiang, and one million Kazakh in Xinjiang would have very little say in an independent Uyghuristan. Local support for separatist activities, particularly in Xinjiang and other border regions, is ambivalent at best, given the economic disparity between these regions and their foreign neighbors, including Tadjikistan, Kygyzstan, Pakistan, and especially Afghanistan. Strong memories persist of mass starvation and widespread destruction during the Sino-Japanese and civil war in the first half of this century, including intra-Muslim and Muslim-Chinese bloody conflicts, as well as the chaotic horrors of the Cultural Revolution. Many local activists are raising specific issues, such as environmental degradation, anti-nuclear testing, religious freedom, over-taxation, and limits on childbearing. Many ethnic leaders are simply calling for “real” autonomy according to Chinese law for the five Autonomous Regions that are each led by First Party Secretaries who are all Han Chinese controlled by Beijing.

The history of Chinese-Muslim relations in Xinjiang has been one of relative peace and quiet, broken by enormous social and political disruptions, fostered by both internal and external crises. The problems of the region have not been resolved or opposition dissolved. The opposition is similar to the Basque separatists of the ETA (Euskadi Ta Askatasuna [Basquefor “Basque Homeland and Freedom”]) in Spain or former IRA (Irish Republican Army) in Ireland and England. It may erupt in limited, violent moments of terror and resistance. And just as these oppositional movements have not been resolved in Europe, the Uyghur problem in Xinjiang does not appear to be one that will readily go away. The admitted problem of Uyghur terrorism and dissent, even in the diaspora, is thus problematic for a government that wants to encourage integration and development in a region where the majority population is not only ethnically different, but also devoutly Muslim. How does a government integrate a strongly religious minority (be it Muslim, Tibetan, Christian, or Buddhist) into a Marxist-Capitalist system? China's policy of intolerance toward dissent and economic stimulus has not seemed to resolve this issue.

 Conclusion: Contesting Otherness

Hui, Uyghur, and other minority groups in China are fully aware of the use the Chinese state is making of their identities in both international relations and the construction of national identity, which allows for the justification of internal control over not only individual sexuality, but cultural and political difference as well. Through several protests—I witnessed a Uyghur march against a Han exhibition of "minority art" at the Overseas Hotel in Urumqi in fall 1987 that the Uyghur found to be denigrating and degrading—Uyghurs have often objected to their National Geographic-like portrayals as "happy, sensual natives." But in China there is more to it than the National Geographic romanticization of the primitive. I would argue that it is because the construction of Han identity is so tenuous, so questionable, and the position of Han superiority is so insecure, that the portrayal of the Other as sensual, immoral, and even barbarous becomes so important. This is also why the erotic portrayal of minorities is still permitted in a society that strictly controls any other even slightly pornographic material, not only that of the Han, but also including foreign publications and video media. While every society tends to allow the exoticization and eroticization of the other and the stranger, in China it is an active project of the state itself. It is the internal "Other" that is appropriated for nation-building and reinforcing the prurient moral code of the totalitarian state. By allowing the continued portrayal of the minorities in state-sponsored media, at the very same time that it restricts such portrayals of Han and foreigners, the state reinforces its hegemonic control over its peoples as well as promoting its notion of civilization and moral authority. For domestic consumption, minorities—Muslims included—are portrayed as exotic and erotic, but for international purposes, the nationalities—Muslims especially—are represented as traditional and content.

At the same time, Uyghur and other minorities are taking advantage of their official minority status and objectified identities, ill-fitting or not, to promote their own religious, political, and personal interests. Opportunities to study and travel abroad are hard to come by, even for Han, and the Uyghur are eager to take advantage of every little crack in the Chinese system. When the state allows those cracks to appear, albeit for very specific foreign policy and economic goals, they may not be able to anticipate the many unintended results—results, which might include a strengthened transnational Uyghur identity, both Turkish and Muslim.

China is not immune from the new tide of ethnic nationalism and “primordial politics” sweeping Europe, Africa, and Asia in the post-Cold War period. Much of it is clearly due to a response to globalization in terms of localization: increasing nationalism arising from the organization of the world into nation-states. No longer content to sit on the sidelines, the nations within these states are playing a greater role in the public sphere, which Jürgen Habermas (1989) suggests is the defining characteristic of civil society in the modern nation-state. In most of these nationalist movements, religion, culture, and racialization play a privileged role in defining the boundaries of the nation. In China, as elsewhere, Islam will continue to play an important role in defining the nation, especially in countries where nationality is defined by a mix of religion and ethnicity.

[18] For an analysis of the 2000 population statistics, see Yang and Hong (2002).

[19] For the debate over the definition of Hui and reference to them as “Sino-Muslims,” see Lipman (1997: xxiv).

[20] This distinction was most fully articulated by Roff (1985: 8–10).

[21] This was the first major uprising in Xinjiang that took place in the Southern Tarim region near Baren Township, which initiated a series of sporadic protests in the Southern Tarim region.

[22] See, for example, www.Uyghur.org, the site supported by Anwar Yusuf, president of the Eastern Turkestan National Freedom Center in Washington, DC, who has suggested there are up to 25 million Uyghurs worldwide. Shichor (2002) based on information from Enver Can in Munich, estimates there are about 500 Uyghurs in Germany (mostly in Munich), 500 in Belgium (mostly from Central Asia), 200 in Sweden (mostly from Kazakhstan), 40 in England, 35 in Switzerland, 30 in Holland, and 10 in Norway. In addition, there are an estimated 10,000 Uyghurs in Turkey, 1,000 in the United States, 500 in Canada, and 200 in Australia (mostly in Melbourne).

[23] “China also Harmed by Separatist-Minded Eastern Turkestan Terrorists,” People’s Daily, October 10, 2001; Erik Eckholm, “U.S. Labeling of Group in China as Terrorist is Criticized,” New York Times, September 13, 2002; Charles Hutzler, “U.S. Gesture to China Raises Crackdown Fears,” Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2002.

[24] See also Scott Fogden’s excellent thesis (Fogden 2002).

[25] “Exile Group Claims Bomb Blast in Xinjiang,” AFP (Hong Kong), March 1, 1997, FBIS, FTS19970513001183.

[26] Radio Free Asia, Uyghur service, “Separatist leader vows to target Chinese government (RFA),” January 24, 2003. http://www.rfa.org/service/index. html?service=uyg.

 References

<biblio>

Amnesty International. People’s Republic of China: Gross Violations of Human Rights in the Xinjiang Uighur Autonomous Region (London, April 21, 1999): 24.

Baber, Zaheer. “The Internet and Social Change in Asia and Beyond.” Asian Journal of Social Sciences 30 (2002): 2.

Benson, Linda. 1990. The Ili Rebellion. New York: M. E. Sharpe.

Dillon, Michael. 1997. Hui Muslims in China. London: Curzon Press.

Dorian, James P., B. H. Wigdortz, and Dru C. Gladney. “China and Central Asia’s Volatile Mix: Energy, Trade, and Ethnic Relations.” Asian Pacific Issues 31 (May 1997).

Eickelman, Dale F. 1976. Moroccan Islam. Austin: University of Texas Press.

Fletcher, Joseph. 1996. Studies on Chinese and Islamic Inner Asia, edited by Beatrice Manz. London: Variorum Press.

Fogden, Scott. “Writing Insecurity: The PRC’s Push to Modernize China and the Politics of Uighur Identity.” MscEcon Thesis, University of Wales, Aberystwyth, 2002.

Forbes, Andrew D. W. 1986. Warlords and Muslims in Chinese Central Asia. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Foster, Derek.1997. “Community and Identity in the Electronic Village.” In Internet Culture, edited by D. Porter. New York: Routledge.

Gladney, Dru C. “The Ethnogenesis of the Uighur.” Central Asian Survey 9, 1 (1990): 1–28.

Gladney, Dru C. 1996. Muslim Chinese: Ethnic Nationalism in the People’s Republic. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, Council on East Asian Studies.

Gladney, Dru C. 2003. Dislocating China: Muslims, Minorities, and Other Subaltern Subjects. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Habermas, Jürgen. 1989. The Structural Transformation of the Public Sphere. Cambridge: MIT Press.

Harwit, Eric. “The Digital Divide of China’s Internet Use.” Presented at Association for Asian Studies Annual Meeting, New York (March 28, 2003).

Hutzler, Charles. “China-Iraq Policy is Risky for U.S.” Asian Wall Street Journal (September 19, 2001).

Israeli, Raphael. 1978. Muslims in China. Atlantic Highlands, NJ: Humanities Press.

Johnson, Ian. “China Arrests Noted Businesswoman in Crackdown in Muslim Region.” Wall Street Journal (August 18, 1999).

Jones, Steven G. 1997. “The Internet and Its Social Landscape.” In Virtual Culture, edited by Steve G. Jones. London: Sage.

Jordan, Tim.1999. Cyberpower. London: Sage.

Lipman, Jonathan. 1997. Familiar Strangers. Seattle: University of Washington Press.

McNeal, Dewardic L. 2001. “China’s Relations with Central Asian States and Problems with Terrorism.” U.S. Department of State, Congressional Research Service Report.

Roff, William. “Islam Obscured? Some Reflections on Studies of Islam and Society in Asia.” L’Islam en Indonesie 1, 29 (1985): 8–10.

Rudelson, Justin Jon. 1997. Oasis Identities. New York: Columbia University Press.

Rushkoff, Douglas. 1994. Cyberia. New York: Harper Collins.

Shichor, Yitzhak. “Virtual Transnationalism: Uyghur Communities in Europe and the Quest for Eastern Turkestan Independence.” Unpublished paper, 2002.

Smith, Mark A., and Peter Kollock (eds.). 1999. Communities in Cyberspace. New York: Routledge.

Trippner, Joseph. “Islamische Gruppe und Graberkult in Nordwest China.” Die Welt des Islams 7 (1976): 142–171.

Virtual Information Center. 2001. “Special Report: Uighur Muslim Separatists.” Honolulu, Ha: Virtual Information Center (September 28).

Yang, Shengmin, and Ding Hong (eds). 2002. An Ethnography of China (Zhongguo Minzu zhi).Beijing: Central Nationalities Publishing House.

Yusuf, Anwar, president of the Eastern Turkestan National Freedom Center, Washington DC. Personal interview (April 14, 1999).

</biblio>

 7. Re-Evaluating the Kurdish Question{2}

Michael M. Gunter

 Introduction

Straddling the borders where Turkey, Iran, Iraq, and Syria converge in the Middle East, the Kurds constitute the largest nation in the world without its own independent state.[26] Long a suppressed minority, the wars against Saddam Hussein in 1991 and 2003 resulted in the creation of a virtually independent Kurdistan Regional Government (KRG) in a federal Iraq. This KRG has inspired the Kurds elsewhere to seek cultural, social, and even political autonomy, if not independence. Furthermore, Turkey’s application for admission into the European Union (EU) also has brought the Kurdish issue to the attention of Europe. On the other hand, the states in which the Kurds live greatly fear Kurdish autonomy as a threat to their territorial integrity. The purpose of this chapter is to re-evaluate the resulting Kurdish problem in light of these developments.

 Population

The Kurds are a largely Sunni Muslim, Indo-European people. Thus, they are quite distinct ethnically from the Turks and Arabs, but related to the Iranians with whom they share the Newroz (new year) holiday at the beginning of spring. No precise figures for the Kurdish population exist because most Kurds tend to exaggerate their numbers, while the states in which they live undercount them for political reasons.[27] In addition, a significant number of Kurds have partially or fully assimilated into the larger Arab, Turkish, or Iranian populations surrounding them. Furthermore, debate continues whether such groups as the Lurs, Bakhtiyaris, and others are Kurds or not. Thus, there is not even complete agreement on who is a Kurd.

Nevertheless, a reasonable estimate is that there may be as many as 12 to 15 million Kurds in Turkey (18 to 23 percent of the population), 6.5 million in Iran (11 percent), 4 to 4.5 million in Iraq (17 to 20 percent), and 1 million in Syria (9 percent). At least 200,000 Kurds also live in parts of the former Soviet Union (some claim as many as 1 million largely assimilated Kurds live there) and recently a Kurdish diaspora of more than 1 million has risen in western Europe. More than half of this diaspora is concentrated in Germany. Some 25,000 Kurds live in the United States. (Again, it must be noted, however, that these figures are simply estimates given the lack of accurate demographic statistics.) Finally, it should be noted that numerous minorities also live in Kurdistan. These minorities include Christian groups such as the Armenians and Assyrians, Turkomans and Turks, Arabs, and Iranians, among others.

The Kurds themselves are notoriously divided geographically, politically, linguistically, tribally, and ideologically. Their mountains and valleys divide the Kurds as much as they ethnically stamp them. Whatever their exact origin, it is clear that racially the Kurds today constitute a mixture of various groupings, the result of earlier invasions and migrations.

The Kurdish language, too (which is related to Iranian), has two main variants, Kurmanji (or Bahdinani) spoken mainly in the northwest of Kurdistan (Turkey and the Bahdinan or Barzani area of northwest Iraqi Kurdistan) and Sorani spoken mainly in the southeast of Kurdistan. In addition, Dimili (Zaza) is also spoken in parts of Turkish Kurdistan, while Gurani is spoken in sections of Iraqi and Iranian Kurdistan. Finally, there are numerous subdialects of each one of these four main dialects. These Kurdish language variants are limited as to their degree of mutual intelligibility, a situation that adds to the many divisions in Kurdish society.[28]

Tribalism, too, has prevented Kurdish unity. Indeed, until recently the tribe has received more loyalty than any sense of Kurdish nationalism. In all of the Kurdish revolts of the twentieth century, for example, significant numbers of Kurds have supported the government because of their tribal antipathies for those rebelling. In Iraq, these pro-government Kurds have been derisively referred to as josh (little donkeys), while in recent years the Turkish government created a pro-government militia of Kurds called village guards. Similarly, the aghas (feudal landlords or tribal chieftains) and sheikhs (religious leaders) continue to command allegiances inconsistent with the full development of a modern sense of nationalism.

 Historical Background

The origin of the Kurds is uncertain, although some scholars believe them to be the descendants of various Indo-European tribes, which settled in the area as many as 4,000 years ago. The Kurds themselves claim to be the descendants of the Medes who helped overthrow the Assyrian Empire in 612 BCE, and also recite interesting myths about their origins involving King Solomon, jinn, and other magical agents. Many believe that the Kardouchoi, mentioned in his Anabasis by Xenophon, who gave his 10,000 such a mauling as they retreated from Persia in 401 BCE, were the ancestors of the Kurds. In the seventh century CE, the conquering Arabs applied the name “Kurds” to the mountainous people they Islamicized in the region, and history also records that the famous Saladin (Salah al-Din), who fought so chivalrously and successfully against the Christian Crusaders and Richard the Lionheart, was a Kurd.

Early in the sixteenth century, most of the Kurds fell loosely under Ottoman Turkish rule, while the remainder was placed under the Persians. In 1597, Sharaf Khan Bitlisi completed the Sharafnama, a highly erudite history of the ruling families of the Kurdish emirates. During the following century, Ahmad-i Khani wrote Mem u Zin, the Kurdish national epic and was seen by some as an early advocate of Kurdish nationalism.

Badr Khan Beg, the ruler of the last semi-independent Kurdish emirate of Botan, surrendered to the Ottomans in 1847. Some scholars argue that Sheikh Ubeydullah’s unsuccessful revolt in 1880 represented the first indication of modern Kurdish nationalism, while others consider it little more than a tribal-religious disturbance.

 Turkey

* Background

In 1891, Ottoman sultan Abdul Hamid II created the Hamidiye, a modern pro-government Kurdish cavalry that proved to be an important stage in the emergence of modern Kurdish nationalism. Nevertheless, the Kurds supported the Ottomans in World War I and Mustafa Kemal (Ataturk) during the Turkish War of Independence following that conflict.

During World War I, one of U.S. President Woodrow Wilson’s Fourteen Points (Number 12) declared that the non-Turkish minorities of the Ottoman Empire should be granted the right of “autonomous development.” The stillborn Treaty of Sèvres signed in August 1920 provided for “local autonomy for the predominantly Kurdish area” (Article 62) and in Article 64 even looked forward to the possibility that “the Kurdish peoples” might be granted “independence from Turkey.” Turkey’s quick revival under Ataturk—ironically enough with considerable Kurdish help as the Turks played well on the theme of Islamic unity—altered the entire situation. The subsequent and definitive Treaty of Lausanne in July 1923 recognized the modern Republic of Turkey without any special provisions for the Turkish Kurds.

Ataturk’s creation of a secular and purely Turkish state led to the first of three great Kurdish revolts, the rising in 1925 of Sheikh Said, the hereditary chief of the powerful Naqshbandi sufi Islamic order. Sheikh Said’s rebellion was both nationalistic and religious as it also favored the reinstatement of the Caliphate. After some initial successes, Sheikh Said was crushed and hanged.[29] In 1927, Khoyboun (Independence), a transnational Kurdish party that had been founded that year in Lebanon, helped to launch another major uprising under General Ihsan Nuri Pasha in the Ararat area that also was completely crushed, this time with Iranian cooperation. Finally, the Dersim (now called Tunceli) rebellion from 1936 to the end of 1938, and led by Sheikh Sayyid Riza until his death in 1937, also ended in a total Kurdish defeat.

Although many Kurdish tribes either supported the Turkish government or were at least neutral in these rebellions, the Turkish authorities decided to eliminate anything that might suggest a separate Kurdish nation. A broad battery of social and constitutional devices was employed to achieve this goal. In some cases what can only be termed pseudo-theoretical justifications were offered to defend what was being done. Thus, the so-called Sun Theory taught that all languages derived from one original primeval Turkic language in central Asia. Isolated in the mountain fastnesses of eastern Anatolia, the Kurds had simply forgotten their mother tongue. The much-abused and criticized appellation “Mountain Turks” when referring to the Turkish Kurds served as a code term for these actions. Everything that recalled a separate Kurdish identity was to be abolished: language, clothing, names, and so forth.[30]

The present (1982) constitution contained a number of specific provisions that sought to limit even speaking or writing in Kurdish. Its preamble, for example, declared: “The determination that no protection shall be afforded to thoughts or opinions contrary to Turkish national interests, the principle of the existence of Turkey as an indivisible entity.” Two articles banned the spoken and written usage of the Kurdish language without specifically naming it.

Although restrictions on the usage of the Kurdish language were eased following the Gulf War in 1991, Article 8 of the Anti-Terrorism Law that entered into force in April 1991, made it possible to consider academics, intellectuals, and journalists speaking up peacefully for Kurdish rights to be engaging in terrorist acts. Similarly, under Article 312 of the Turkish Penal Code, mere verbal or written support for Kurdish rights could lead one to be charged with “provoking hatred or animosity between groups of different race, religion, region, or social class.” Yasar Kemal, one of Turkey’s most famous novelists and an ethnic Kurd, was indicted in 1995 for violating these provisions of what some have termed “thought crime.” These problems have continued into the twenty-first century.

* PKK

Beginning in the 1970s, an increasingly significant portion of Turkey’s population of ethnic Kurds has actively demanded cultural, linguistic, and political rights as Kurds. Until recently, however, the government ruthlessly suppressed these demands for fear they would lead to the breakup of the state itself. This official refusal to brook any moderate Kurdish opposition helped encourage extremism and the creation of the Partiya Karkaren Kurdistan (PKK) or Kurdistan Workers Party, headed by Abdullah (Apo) Ocalan on November 27, 1978. In August 1984, the PKK officially launched its insurgency that by the beginning of 2000 had resulted in more than 37,000 deaths, as many as 3,000 villages partially or completely destroyed, and some 3 million people internally displaced.

For a short period in the early 1990s, Ocalan actually seemed close to achieving a certain degree of military success. In the end, however, he overextended himself, while the Turkish military spared no excesses in containing him. Slowly but steadily, the Turks marginalized the PKK’s military threat. Ocalan’s ill-advised decision in August 1995 to also attack Massoud Barzani’s Kurdistan Democratic Party (KDP) in northern Iraq because of its support for Turkey further sapped his strength. The final blow came when Turkey threatened to go to war against Syria in October 1998 unless Damascus expelled Ocalan from his longtime sanctuary in that country.

Ocalan fled to Italy where U.S. pressure on behalf of its NATO ally Turkey pressured Italy and others to reject Ocalan as a terrorist undeserving of political asylum or negotiation. Indeed, for years the United States had given Turkey intelligence training and weapons to battle against what it saw as the “bad” Kurds of Turkey, while ironically supporting the “good” Kurds of Iraq against Saddam Hussein. With U.S. and possibly Israeli aid, Ocalan was finally captured in Kenya on February 16, 1999, flown back to Turkey for a sensational trial, and sentenced to death for treason.

* Recent Events

Instead of making a hard-line appeal for renewed struggle during his trial, however, Ocalan issued a remarkable statement that called for the implementation of true democracy to solve the Kurdish problem within the existing borders of a unitary Turkey. He also ordered his guerrillas to evacuate Turkey to demonstrate his sincerity. Thus, far from ending Turkey's Kurdish problem, Ocalan's capture began a process of implicit bargaining between the state and many of its citizens of Kurdish ethnic heritage as represented by the PKK and the Peoples Democracy Party (HADEP). HADEP had been founded in 1994 as a legal Kurdish party and had elected numerous mayors in the Kurdish areas during the local elections held shortly after Ocalan's capture.

At this point, Turkey's potential candidacy for membership in the European Union entered the picture. If implemented, EU membership would fulfill Ataturk's ultimate hope for a strong, united, and democratic Turkey joined to the West. Until Turkey successfully implemented the so-called Copenhagen Criteria of minority rights for its Kurdish ethnic population and suspended Ocalan's death sentence to conform with EU standards which banned capital punishment, however, it was clear that Turkey's long-treasured candidacy would be only a pipe dream. As some have noted, Turkey's road to the EU lies through Diyarbakir (the unofficial capital of Turkish Kurdistan).

There are unfortunately still powerful forces in Turkey that do not want further democratization because they fear it would threaten their privileged positions as well as Turkey's territorial integrity. The military's privileged position in Turkey has been a prime example of this continuing situation. Thus, Turkey's passage of reform legislation beginning in August 2002 to harmonize its laws with EU norms and allow significant Kurdish cultural rights in theory as well as the commutation of Ocalan's death sentence to life imprisonment in October 2002, did not solve the continuing Kurdish problem in practice. The tremendous electoral victory of the moderate Islamist AK Party (AKP) on November 3, 2002, however, brought an even stronger Turkish determination to implement the necessary reforms for the EU, resulting in Turkey finally being given October 3, 2005 as a specific date for its candidacy talks with the EU to begin.

Although HADEP was finally closed down in 2003, its place was taken first by the Democratic Peoples Party (DEHAP) and since November 2005, the Democratic Society Party (DTP). Leyla Zana—a Kurdish leader elected to the Turkish parliament in 1991 but imprisoned in 1994 for her nonviolent support of the Kurdish cause—was finally released in 2004 after her case had become a cause célèbre for Kurdish human rights. In August 2005, Prime Minster Re-cep Tayyip Erdogan became the first Turkish leader to admit that Turkey had a “Kurdish problem.” In a dramatic speech in Diyarbakir, he added that Turkey had made “grave mistakes” in the past and called for more democracy to solve the problem (“The Sun Also Rises in the Southeast” 2005: 1–2). Violent riots throughout many parts of Turkey in March 2006, however, have dampened further movement on the Kurdish issue as of this writing in August 2006. Much work still has to be done both on the part of Turkey and the EU if Turkey is ever going to enter the European Union and in so doing help solve the Kurdish problem in Turkey.[31]

Arguing that Turkey has not implemented the necessary reforms, for example, the PKK ended the cease-fire it implemented after Ocalan’s capture and renewed low-level fighting in June 2004. In addition, opposition to Turkish membership in the EU seems to be growing in such EU members as France, Germany, and Austria, among others. New EU members must be approved unanimously, so any one member of the EU could veto Turkey’s membership, which many now see as not possible until sometime in the distant future.

* U.S. Alliance

Turkey’s opposition to the Kurdish identity and Turkey’s strong strategic alliance with the United States since the days of the Truman Doctrine, first promulgated in 1947, have arguably been two of the main reasons for the inability of the Kurds to create any type of an independent state in the modern Middle East, which began to develop after World War I. Although the United States paid lip service to the idea of Kurdish rights, when the chips were down, again and again the United States backed its strategic NATO ally Turkey when it came to the Kurdish issue.

Only when the United States perceived the Iraqi Kurds to be a useful foil against Saddam Hussein did the United States begin to take a partially pro-Kurdish position, at least towards the Iraqi Kurds. Although this U.S. support for the Iraqi Kurds did not prohibit Turkey from unilaterally intervening into northern Iraq in pursuit of the PKK during the 1990s, U.S. support for the de facto state of Kurdistan in northern Iraq, and disagreements over sanctions against Saddam Hussein's Iraq and the future of Iraq itself began to fray the longstanding U.S.-Turkish alliance.

The U.S. war to remove Saddam Hussein from power in 2003 furthered this process and even partially reversed alliance partners. For the first time since the creation of Iraq, the Iraqi Kurds now—at least for the present—have a powerful ally in the United States. This ironic situation was brought about by Turkey refusing to allow the United States to use its territory as a base for a northern front to attack Saddam Hussein's Iraq in March 2003. Courtesy of Turkey, the Iraqi Kurds suddenly were thrust into the role of U.S. ally, a novel position they eagerly and successfully assumed. Quickly, the Iraqi Kurds occupied the oil-rich Kirkuk and Mosul areas which would have been unthinkable encroachments upon Turkish "red lines" had Turkey anchored the northern front. What is more, Turkey had no choice but to acquiesce in the Iraqi Kurdish moves.

The new situation was further illustrated in July 2003 when the United States apprehended eleven Turkish commandos in the Iraqi Kurdish city of Sulaymaniya who were apparently seeking to carry out acts intended to destabilize the Kurdish government and de facto state in northern Iraq. Previously, as the strategic ally of the United States, Turkey had carte blanche to do practically anything it wanted to in northern Iraq. No longer is this true. The "Sulaymaniya incident" caused what one high-ranking Turkish general called the "worst crisis of confidence" ("Ozkok: Biggest Crisis of Trust with U.S." 2003; Kralev 2003) in U.S.-Turkish relations since the creation of the NATO alliance. It also illustrated how the United States was willing to protect the Iraqi Kurds from unwanted Turkish interference. What is more, the same U.S. principle of non-interference now began to apply to Turkish proposals that either the United States eliminate the PKK guerrillas holed up in northern Iraq or permit the Turkish army to do so. Previously, the Turkish army had entered northern Iraq any time it desired in pursuit of the PKK.

 Iraq

* Background

The Kurds in Iraq have been in an almost constant state of revolt since Great Britain artificially created Ira—in accordance with the Sykes-Picot Agreement of World War I—out of the former Ottoman vilayets (provinces) of Mosul, Baghdad, and Basra. There are three major reasons for this rebellious situation.[32]

First, the Kurds in Iraq long constituted a greater proportion of the population than they did in any other state they inhabited. Consequently, despite their smaller absolute numbers, they represented a larger critical mass in Iraq than elsewhere, a situation that enabled them to play a more important role there than they did in Turkey and Iran. Second, as an artificial, new state, Iraq had less legitimacy as a political entity than Turkey and Iran, two states that had existed in one form or another for many centuries despite their large Kurdish minorities. Thus, discontent and rebellion came easier for the Iraqi Kurds. Third, Iraq was further divided by a Sunni-Shiite Muslim division not present in Turkey or Iran. This predicament further called into question Iraq’s future.

For its part, the Iraqi government has always feared the possibility of Kurdish separatism. Kurdish secession would not only deplete the Iraqi population; it would also set a precedent that the Shiites, some 60 percent of the population, might follow and thus threaten the very future of the Iraqi state. In addition, since for many years approximately two-thirds of the oil production and reserves as well as much of the fertile land were located in the Kurdish area, the government felt that Kurdish secession would strike at the economic heart of the state. Thus were sown the seeds of a seemingly irreconcilable struggle between Iraq and its Kurdish minority.

To further their goals, the British, who held Iraq as a mandate from the League of Nations, invited a local Kurdish leader, Sheikh Mahmud Barzinji of Sulaymaniya, to act as their governor in the Kurdish vilayet (province) of Mosul. Despite his inability to overcome the division among the Kurds, Sheikh Mahmud almost immediately proclaimed himself “King of Kurdistan,” revolted against British rule, and began secret dealings with the Turks. In a precursor to subsequent defeats at the hands of the Iraqi government in Baghdad, the British Royal Air Force (RAF) successfully bombed the sheikh’s forces, putting down several of his uprisings during the 1920s.

Although the Treaty of Sèvres (1920) held out the possibility of Kurdish independence, as mentioned above, the definitive Treaty of Lausanne (1923) made no mention of the Kurds. What is more, the British already had decided to attach the largely Kurdish vilayet of Mosul to Iraq because of its vast oil resources. The British felt that this was the only way Iraq could be made viable.

With the final defeat of Sheikh Mahmud in 1931, Mulla Mustafa Barzani began to emerge as the leader almost synonymous with the Kurdish movement in Iraq. Although the Barzanis’ power was originally founded on their religious authority as Naqshbandi sheikhs, they also became noted for their fighting abilities and still wear a distinctive turban with red stripes. For more than half a century, Barzani fought the Iraqi government in one way or another. Despite his inherent conservatism and tribal mentality, he was the guiding spirit of the Kurdistan Democratic Party (KDP) founded on 16 August 1946; spent a decade of exile in the Soviet Union (1947–58); and at the height of his power in the early 1970s negotiated the March Manifesto of 1970 which theoretically provided for Kurdish autonomy under his rule. Kurdish infighting against such other leaders as Ibrahim Ahmad and his son-in-law Jalal Talabany and continuing government opposition, however, finally helped lead to Barzani’s ultimate defeat in 1975. Barzani’s defeat also occurred because the United States and Iran withdrew their support in return for Iraqi concessions, an action U.S. National Security Advisor Henry

Kissinger cynically explained as necessary covert action not to be confused with missionary work.[33]

Following Barzani's collapse in March 1975, his son Massoud Barzani eventually emerged as the new leader of the KDP, while Talabany established his Patriotic Union of Kurdistan (PUK) on June 1, 1975. Divided by philosophy, geography, dialect, and ambition, Barzani's KDP and Talabany's PUK have alternated between cooperation and bloody conflict ever since. They also have suffered grievously from such horrific repression as Saddam Hussein's genocidal Anfal campaigns of 1987–88, and the chemical attack against the city of Halabja on March 16, 1988.

After the Gulf War and failure of the ensuing Kurdish uprising in March 1991, the mass flight of Kurdish refugees to the mountains reluctantly forced the United States to create a safe haven and no-fly zone in which a de facto Kurdish state began to develop in northern Iraq. In addition, the unprecedented United Nations Security Council Resolution 688 of April 5, 1991 condemned "the repression of the Iraqi civilian population…in Kurdish populated areas" and demanded "that Iraq…immediately end this repression." As symbolic as it may have been, never before had the Kurds received such official international mention and protection.

Despite the de facto Kurdish state that emerged in northern Iraq following Saddam Hussein's defeat in the Gulf War, the KDP and PUK actually fought a civil war against each other from 1994 to 1998. As a result of this internal Kurdish fighting, there were two separate rump governments in Iraqi Kurdistan after 1994: the KDP's in Irbil and the PUK's in Sulaymaniya. Inevitably, the resulting instability and power vacuum drew in neighboring Turkey and Iran, among others such as the United States, Syria, and, of course, Iraq, since for reasons of state none of the powers wanted to see a Kurdish state established in northern Iraq.

The United States finally brokered a cease-fire by bringing Barzani and Talabany together in Washington in September 1998. The Kurds also began to receive 13 percent of the receipts from the oil Iraq was allowed to sell after 1995. Peace, relative prosperity, and democracy began to grow in the de facto state of Kurdistan in northern Iraq. In October 2002, the reunified parliament of the de facto Kurdish state met for the first time since 1994 and declared that Iraqi Kurdistan would be a federal state in a post-Sad-dam-Hussein Iraq.

* The 2003 War

On March 19, 2003, the United States finally launched a war against Iraq that quickly overthrew Saddam Hussein's regime. Establishing a stable new government has proven much more difficult. As Peter W. Galbraith recently explained: "The fundamental problem of Iraq is an absence of Iraqis" (Galbraith 2005: 242).[34] The interim constitution—known as the Transitional Administrative Law (TAL)[35]—promulgated on 8 March 2004 for a democratic federal Iraq proved only a temporary compromise given the majority Shiites' insistence on what they saw as their right to unfettered majority rule. Thus, United Nations Security Council Resolution 1546 of 8 June 2004, which authorized Iraq's new interim government, failed even to mention the TAL and federalism as a solution for the Kurdish problem in Iraq. Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, the de facto Shiite leader and spokesman, in general felt that the TAL should not tie the hands of the Iraqi parliament elected on January 30, 2005 and specifically objected to Article 61(c) in the TAL which gave the Kurds an effective veto[36] over the final constitution which nevertheless provided for meaningful federalism and was adopted on October 15, 2005.

Many Arabs consider the Kurds traitors for having supported the United States in the 2003 War. On the other hand, many Kurds see the Arabs as chauvinistic nationalists who oppose Kurdish rights because they would end up detaching territory from the Arab world. The future of Iraq, of course, has become even more uncertain given the virulent insurgency against the interim Iraqi government and its U.S. ally.

Moreover, Turkey fears the demonstration effect on its own restless Kurds of any Kurdish entity on the Turkish border. Indeed, General Ilker Basbug, Turkey's deputy chief of staff, declared that "if there is a federal structure in Iraq on an ethnic basis, the future will be very difficult and bloody" (Williams 2004). Turkish prime minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan accused the Iraqi Kurds of “playing with fire” (“Turkey’s Growing Uneasiness over Kurds’ Federalist Asprirations” 2004) by trying to annex the oil-rich Kirkuk area to their prospective federal state. Turkish opposition to ethnic or multinational federalism in Iraq reflects its long-standing security fears that any decentralization there—especially in favor of the Kurds—will inevitably encourage the Kurds in Turkey to seek autonomy and eventually separation. Given the adoption of the Iraqi constitution in October 2005 and its institutionalization of federalism, however, Turkey has begrudgingly come to accept the existence of the Kurdistan Regional Government (KRG).

* Will Federalism Work?

Iraq lacks a democratic tradition. For one to develop requires the existence of an implicit consensus on the legitimacy of the underlying order and trust on the part of the minority that the majority will not abuse its power. These, however, are the very ingredients that have “mostly been in pitifully short supply” in modern Iraq (Anderson and Stansfield 2004: 10). Moreover, federalism is a sophisticated division and sharing of powers between a central government and its constituent parts that would probably demand, as a prerequisite for its successful implementation, a democratic ethos. Trying to establish federalism in Iraq before that state is able to imbue a democratic tradition may be placing the cart before the horse.

* Elections

A number of other problems face a prospective Kurdish federal state. Unofficial referenda held in February 2004 and again in January 2005 called almost unanimously for independence despite the opposition of the KDP and PUK leaders who argued that independence would not be practical.[37] In maintaining this position, Massoud Barzani and Jalal Talabany ran the risk of losing control of the Kurdish “street” and thus their long-term grip on power. For the present, however, the two leaders seem secure in their positions.

In the immediate aftermath of the national elections held on January 30, 2005 for an interim parliament that then chose a new interim government and began to write a new permanent constitution for Iraq, the Kurds held the balance of power. To form the necessary two-thirds majority coalition government, the majority Shiite coalition had to accept the Kurdish demands for strong Kurdish rights in a democratic federal Iraq. These demands included one of the two main Kurdish leaders, Jalal Talabany, as the interim president of Iraq, while the Shiites gained the leading office of prime minister. Other Kurdish demands included the so-called Kurdish veto over approving or amending any future Iraqi constitution, the limited role of Islam, the rights of women, no Arab troops in Kurdistan, and Kirkuk, among others. The Kurds also decided that the other Kurdish leader, Massoud Barzani, would become president of the unified Kurdistan Regional Government. If these demands would not be met, the Kurds could simply wait until they were while maintaining their de facto independence. On paper, it seemed a win/win situation.

After a great deal of debate and against strong Sunni Arab opposition, the permanent constitution finally was concluded at the end of August 2005 and then approved by nearly 79 percent of those who voted in a referendum held on October 15, 2005. Sunni Arab opposition almost derailed the document, however, as the Sunnis achieved a two-thirds negative vote against the constitution in two governorates and fell just short of doing so in a third (Boudreaux 2005). As noted above, a two-thirds negative vote in any three governorates would have scuttled the constitution.

On December 15, 2005, elections were held to choose the first permanent post-Saddam-Hussein parliament and government. After a great deal of haggling, a Shiite Arab, Nouri al-Malki, finally emerged in May 2006 as the new prime minister, while Jalal Talabany was chosen as the largely ceremonial permanent president. Several other prominent Kurds also joined the new Iraqi government. Among others, Barham Salih was tabbed as one of the two deputy prime ministers and Hoshyar Zebari remained the foreign minister. The Kurdish role in Baghdad was a hedge against renewed Arab chauvinism.

On May 7, 2006, a supposedly unified Kurdistan Regional Government (KRG) was chosen headed by Nechirvan Idris Barzani, the nephew of Massoud Barzani. It consisted of thirteen ministries headed by the KDP and fourteen by the PUK. Islamists held three ministries, while Turkmans and Assyrians were granted one each. The main problem with the new unified KRG was that four of its major ministries remained divided between the PUK and the KDP: Interior, Finance, Justice, and Peshmerga (Defense). Each portfolio had two ministers, one from the PUK and the other from the KDP. It remained to be seen how successful this mechanism would prove. Even more problematic would be the interrelationship between the KRG and the national government in Baghdad.

* Kirkuk

Kirkuk is on the cusp where most of Iraq's Arab, Kurdish, and Turkmans ethnic factions and Sunni, Shiite, and Christian sectarian divisions meet. It also possesses incredibly large oil reserves. Thus, the Iraqi government and the Kurds have never been able to agree on whether Kirkuk should be included in a Kurdish autonomous region. The uncompromising position Barzani and Talabany seem to be taking on Kirkuk being part of Kurdistan is probably, at least in part, a result of their fear of losing control of the Kurdish "street," which considers Kirkuk to be the Kurdish "Jerusalem."

Kirkuk voted against Faisal becoming king of Iraq during the referendum of 1921. Turkey also claimed it until the League of Nations finally handed it over to Iraq as part of the former Ottoman vilayet of Mosul in 1926. Indeed, the 1957 census indicated that Kirkuk city (as distinguished from Kirkuk province or governorate) had a slightly larger Turkmans (39.8 percent) than Kurdish (35.1 percent) population. The Arabs (23.8 percent) constituted only the third largest group. The 1957 census, however, also showed that Kirkuk province had a Kurdish majority of 55 percent, while the Arabs numbered only 30.8 percent and the Turkmans 14.2 percent (Directorate of Population 1957).

During the 1960s and 1970s, Kirkuk was perhaps the most important point of disagreement between Mulla Mustafa Barzani (Massoud Barzani's legendary father who died in 1979) and the Iraqi government. Illustrating how strongly he felt about the issue, the elder Barzani reputedly declared that even if a census showed that the Kurds were only a minority in Kirkuk, he would still claim it. Showing his ultimately poor judgment on the matter, Barzani also stated that he would allow the United States to exploit its rich oil fields if the United States would support him (Gunter 1992: 17, 28). Thus, the Iraqi government had reason to believe that—given the Kurdish links to the United States, Israel, and then pro-Western Iran—handing Kirkuk to the Kurds, in effect, would be giving it and its rich oil reserves back to the West.

Given its oil and geostrategic location, Kirkuk's Kurdish majority was diluted over the decades by Saddam Hussein's Arabization policies so that when Saddam Hussein fell from power in 2003, the city had roughly equal populations of Kurds, Arabs, and Turkmans, as well as a considerable number of Christians. Indeed, the census that had been taken in 1977 even showed that Kirkuk province had an Arab plurality of 44.41 percent, while the Kurds numbered 37.53 percent and the Turkmans 16.31 percent (Talabany 1999: 81). Saddam Hussein accomplished this demographic legerdemain by expelling and killing many Kurds, replacing them with Arab settlers, and gerrymandering the province's boundaries. The Iraqi government even officially renamed Kirkuk as Tamim (Nationalization), supposedly in honor of the nationalization of the oil fields in 1972.

In a theoretical victory for the Kurdish position, Article 58 of the TAL declared that "the Iraqi Transitional Government…shall act expeditiously to take measures to remedy the injustice caused by the previous regime's practices in altering the demographic character of certain regions, including Kirkuk, by deporting and expelling individuals from their places of residence, forcing migration in and out of the region, settling individuals alien to the region, depriving the inhabitants of work, and correcting nationality." Although tens of thousands of Kurds have returned to Kirkuk and filed claims for homes and property lost when they were expelled, as of August 2006, few claims have been settled. Indeed, in 2005, Jalal Talabany, then the interim president of Iraq, complained formally to Ibrahim Al-Jafari, the (Shiite) interim prime minister of Iraq, about the situation ("Talabany Accuses Al-Ja'fari of Assaulting the Kurds' Right" 2005). As for taking a census, the Kurds, of course, argued that one should only be taken after all the expelled Kurds have been allowed to return to Kirkuk and the Arab newcomers returned to their original homes. To summarily oust the new Arab population after it has lived in Kirkuk for some 30 years, however, would simply create new injustices. In addition, what would it say about the future of Iraqi unity if most Iraqi Arabs were not allowed even to live in Kirkuk? Furthermore, the Turkish military has suggested that it would take it only 18 hours to reach Kirkuk if the Kurds insisted on tampering with the city's population to their own benefit and to the detriment of the Turkmans ("Military Issues Dire Warning on Iraq" 2004: 11).

In a partial victory for the Kurds, the Independent Electoral Commission of Iraq authorized some 100,000 Kurds to return to Kirkuk and vote in the elections held on January 30, 2005. The result was a resounding Kurdish electoral victory in the Kirkuk municipal elections. Article 140 of the permanent constitution adopted on October 15, 2005 provided that a referendum to determine the final status of Kirkuk would be held by the end of 2007. Clearly, Kirkuk constitutes one of the main stumbling blocks in the effort to create a successful post-Saddam-Hussein Iraq, especially given the lack of any group manifesting a willingness to compromise on their maximal demands.

* Independence?

Based on the above analysis, it would be very difficult for the Kurds to obtain the type of ethnic federalism that would satisfy their demands. Moreover, Iraq's lack of a democratic culture would make actual federalism very difficult to implement.

Therefore, if a federal Iraq proves impossible to construct, why not an independent Iraqi Kurdish state? What would be so sacred about the territorial integrity of a failed state like Iraq that was becoming increasingly unstable?[38] Indeed, within the past fifteen years, both the Soviet Union and Yugoslavia broke up into numerous new states. Earlier, Singapore split off from Malaysia, Bangladesh from Pakistan, and, more recently, Eritrea broke away from Ethiopia and East Timor from Indonesia. The United Nations also has in the past officially approved self-determination for the Palestinians[39] and black South African majority.[40]

Why do the Arabs so rightfully demand a state for the Palestinians, but so hypocritically deny one for the Iraqi Kurds? Why do the Turks demand self-determination for the Turkish Cypriots, but deny the same for the Iraqi Kurds? For the Kurds and their supporters, the current situation is neither fair nor logical. Indeed, a strong case can be made that the injustice done to the Kurds contributes to the instability in the Middle East.

The Iraqi Kurds, however, would be well advised to proceed with the consent of the United States, Turkey, and the other involved regional neighbors because without their consent an independent Iraqi Kurdistan would prove impossible to sustain for obvious geopolitical reasons. The first step to achieve this seemingly impossible task is for the Iraqi Kurds to be seen giving their all in trying to make a democratic federal Iraq work. If such an Iraq proves impossible to achieve, the Iraqi Kurds then would be seen as having the right, in the name of stability that also would benefit the United States, Turkey, and other neighboring states, to move towards independence.

At that point, the Iraqi Kurds must convince these states that in return for their support for Iraqi Kurdish independence, an independent Iraqi Kurdistan would not foment rebellion among the Kurds in neighboring states either directly or indirectly. These states' guarantee of an independent Iraqi Kurdish state would be a powerful incentive for the Iraqi Kurds to satisfy them on this point. Furthermore, the Iraqi Kurds must proceed in a manner that their neighbors including the Iraqi Arabs would perceive to be fair to them. This will probably mean compromise on the Kurdish demands for complete control of oil-rich Kirkuk.

In addition, the Iraqi Kurds should encourage Turkey's begrudging democratic reforms that will help lead to eventual Turkish membership in the EU and thus help solve the Kurdish problem in Turkey without secession, as discussed above. If Turkey joins the EU, its fears about an independent Iraqi Kurdish state gradually would most likely abate since EU membership would guarantee Turkish territorial integrity. Furthermore, once Turkey joins the EU, the influence of the Turkish military on political decisions regarding such issues as the Iraqi Kurds would diminish, a work already in progress as Turkey’s candidacy proceeds. A more civilian-directed Turkish government within the EU would be less likely to fear an independent Iraqi Kurdish state. The late Turkish president Turgut Ozal’s imaginative initiatives towards the Kurds during the early 1990s illustrate that these arguments concerning Turkish-Kurdish cooperation are not divorced from reality.[41]

On the other hand, if Turkey were kept out of the EU, Turkey would be more likely to continue to view the Kurdish issue through traditional national security issues hostile to an independent Iraqi Kurdish state. Cast adrift from both the European Union and the United States, Turkey would be more likely to seek succor from Syria and Iran, both of which remain very hostile to any concept of an independent Iraqi Kurdish state. On July 19, 2005, for example, Turkish officials suggested at a meeting of the foreign ministers of Turkey, Iran, and Syria that the three states join forces to help eliminate the PKK forces sheltering on the Iraqi Kurdish-Iranian border given the U.S. and Iraqi Kurdish hesitancy to do so (Ridolfo 2005). The United States responded that such operations could have “unintended consequences” and denied that it had issued orders to capture PKK leaders sheltering in northern Iraq (Landler 2005).

 Conclusion

Despite the seemingly endless conflicts of the past century, most Kurds in Turkey would probably still be satisfied with meaningful cultural rights and real democracy. In Iran and Syria—which space did not permit covering in this chapte—the lesser-developed Kurdish movements would also be more than pleased with such a result. In Iraq, on the other hand—due to the incredible incompetence of Saddam Hussein in calling forth the Gulf Wars of 1991 and 2003 upon himself and thus the resulting institution of the Kurdistan Regional Government (KRG) in northern Ira—the Iraqi Kurds will probably be satisfied with nothing less than a federal solution in any post-Saddam-Hussein Iraq. If Iraq breaks up, Iraqi Kurdish independence may even result.

At the present time, however, Iraqi Kurdish independence and even more pan-Kurdish unity remain unlikely because all the neighboring states bitterly oppose it as a threat to their own territorial integrity. The United States, although protecting the KRG with a no-fly zone until Saddam Hussein's removal from power in 2003, opposed independence for the Iraqi Kurds because of Turkey's attitude and the U.S. fear that Kurdish independence would destabilize the geostrategically important Middle East. Officially, both the United States and the Iraqi Kurds have accepted that the Kurds will remain as part of a post-Saddam-Hussein, democratic, and federal Iraq which will allow the Kurds to exercise a great deal of self-government. Given the current uncertain situation regarding the future of a post-Saddam-Hussein Iraq, however, the Kurdish situation there remains uncertain. What is certain, however, is the increasing importance of the Kurds for the future of regional Middle East and international politics.

{2} Portions of this chapter originally appeared in other articles I have published including "The Kurdish Question in Perspective," World Affairs 166 (Spring 2004): 197–205; and (with M. Hakan Yavuz) "The Continuing Crisis in Iraqi Kurdistan," Middle East Policy 12 (Spring 2005): 22–33.

[27] Possibly the two best studies of the Kurds in English remain van Bruinessen (1992) and McDowall (1996). More recently, see Romano (2006) and Natali (2005).

[28] For further discussions of the size of the Kurdish population, see McDowall (1996: 3–5); van Bruinessen (1992: 14–15); Izady (1992: 111–120). For a detailed analysis that lists considerably smaller figures for Turkey, see Mutlu (1996).

[29] On the Kurdish language, see Hassanpour (1992); Kreyenbroek (1992: 68–83).

[30] For a solid study of the Sheikh Said revolt, see Olson (1989).

[31] For a recent detailed analysis of the Kurdish problem in Turkey, see Ozcan (2006).

[32] For a meticulous analysis of the many problems involved, see Yildiz (2005) as well as the chapter in this collection by Nathalie Tocci.

[33] For recent detailed analysis of the Kurdish problem in Iraq, see Stansfield (2003).

[34] For Henry Kissinger's exact words, see "The CIA Report the President Doesn't Want You to Read" (1976: 70–92). This article contains the U.S. Congress House of Representatives Pike Committee Report, which investigated the CIA in the mid-1970s. The part dealing with the Kurds is entitled "Case 2: Arms Support," and appears on pp. 85 and 87–88. Many years later, Kissinger explained his position more thoroughly in Kissinger (1999: 576–596).

[35] In other words, given that Iraq has proven to be a failed state, its inhabitants simply reject further identification with it, identifying instead with their ethnic and/or sectarian groups. In addition to the series of articles in the O'Leary collection cited here, see Ahmed and Gunter (2005) for background analysis of the results of the 2003 War in Kurdistan in Iraq.

[36] For a copy of the TAL, see http://www.cpa-iraq.org/government/TAL.html.

[37] Article 61 (c) of the TAL—the so-called "Kurdish veto"—declared that "the general referendum will be successful and the draft constitution ratified if a majority of the voters in Iraq approve and if two-thirds of the voters in three or more governorates do not reject it." Since Iraqi Kurdistan consists of three governorates, this provision gave the Kurds an effective veto over the final constitution. Iraq's Sunni Arabs also came close to using it successfully to block approval of the permanent constitution in the referendum held on October 15, 2005.

[38] What Barzani and Talabany probably really meant was that to declare independence now would be premature.

[39] See, for example, Galbraith (2006) and Cockburn (2006).

[40] See, for example, U.N. General Assembly Resolutions 2672 C (XXV), in UN Chronicle, 1971, no. 1, 46; 3236 (XXIX), in UN Chronicle, 1974, no. 11, 36–74; and 33/23, in UN Chronicle, 1978, no. 11, 80.

[41] See, for example, U.N. General Assembly Resolutions 2396 (XXIII), in UN Chronicle, 1969, no. 1, 94; and 31/61, in UN Chronicle, 1976, no. 1, 79.

[42] For an analysis of Ozal’s initiatives, see Gunter (1997: 61–79).

 References

<biblio>

Ahmed, Mohammed M. A., and Michael M. Gunter. 2005. The Kurdish Question and the 2003 Iraqi War. Costa Mesa, CA: Mazda.

Anderson, Liam, and Gareth Stansfield. 2004. The Future of Iraq: Dictatorship, Democracy or Division? New York: Palgrave Macmillan.

Boudreaux, Richard. “Iraq Charter Ratified by Big Margin in Final Tally.” Los Angeles Times (October 26, 2005).

Cockburn, Patrick. “Kurdistan: Birth of a Nation?” Independent (June 22, 2006).

Directorate of Population, Ministry of Interior, Iraq’s General Statistical Census for 1957.

Galbraith, Peter W. 2006. The End of Iraq: How American Incompetence Created a War without End. New York: Simon & Schuster.

Gunter, Michael M.1992. The Kurds of Iraq: Tragedy and Hope. New York: St. Martin’s.

Gunter, Michael M. 1997. The Kurds and the Future of Turkey. New York: St. Martin’s.

Hassanpour, Amir. 1992. Nationalism and Language in Kurdistan, 1918–1985. San Francisco: Mellen Research University Press.

Izady, Mehrdad R. 1992. The Kurds: A Concise Handbook. Washington, DC: Crane Russak.

Kissinger, Henry. 1999. Years of Renewal. New York: Simon & Schuster.

Kreyenbroek, Philip G. 1992. “On the Kurdish Language.” In The Kurds: A Contemporary Overview, edited by Philip G. Kreyenbroek and Stefan Sperl. London: Routledge.

Landler, Mark. “U.S. Orders Arrest of Kurdish Militants, Turkey Says.” New York Times (July 19, 2005).

McDowall, David. 1996. A Modern History of the Kurds. London: I.B. Tauris.

“Military Issues Dire Warning on Iraq.” Briefing (Ankara) (November 8, 2004).

Mutlu, Servet. “Ethnic Kurds in Turkey: A Demographic Study.” International Journal of Middle East Studies 28 (November 1996).

Natali, Denise. 2005. The Kurds and the State: Evolving National Identity in Iraq, Turkey, and Iran. Syracuse: Syracuse University Press.

Olson, Robert. 1989. The Emergence of Kurdish Nationalism and the Sheikh Said Rebellion 1880–1925. Austin: University of Texas.

Ozcan, Ali Kemal. 2006. Turkey’s Kurds: A Theoretical Analysis of the PKK and Abdullah Ocalan. London and New York: Routledge.

“Ozkok: Biggest Crisis of Trust with US.” Turkish Daily News (July 7, 2003).

Ridolfo, Kathleen. “Iraq: Turkey Proposes Cross-Border Action To Rein in Kurdish Fighters.” Radio Free Europe (July 20, 2005).

Romano, David. 2006. The Kurdish Nationalist Movement: Opportunity, Mobilization and Identity. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Stansfield, Gareth. 2003. Iraqi Kurdistan: Political Development and Emergent Democracy. London: RoutledgeCurzon.

Talabany, Nouri. 1999. Mantikat Kirkuk Wa Muhawalat Taghyeer Wakiiha Al-Kawmy (The Kirkuk District and Attempts at Changing Its National Reality). London.

“Talabany Accuses Al-Ja’fari of Assaulting the Kurds’ Rights.” Al-Hayat (July 11, 2005).

“The CIA Report the President Doesn’t Want You to Read.” The Village Voice (February 16, 1976).

“The Sun Also Rises in the South East.” Briefing (Ankara) (August 15, 2005).

“Turkey’s Growing Uneasiness over Iraqi Kurds’ Federalist Aspirations” Briefing (Ankara) (January 19, 2004).

U.N. General Assembly Resolutions 2672 C (XXV), in UN Chronicle, 1971, no. 1, 46; 3236 (XXIX), in UN Chronicle, 1974, no. 11, 36–74; and 33/23, in UN Chronicle, 1978, no. 11, 80.

U.N. General Assembly Resolutions 2396 (XXIII), in UN Chronicle, 1969, no. 1, 94; and 31/61, in UN Chronicle, 1976, no. 1, 79.

Van Bruinessen, Martin. 1992. Agha, Shaikh and State: The Social and Political Structures of Kurdistan. London: Zed.

Williams, Daniel. “Iraqi Kurdish Leader Demands Guarantees: Minority Seeks Autonomous Region, Expulsion of Arabs under New Government.” Washington Post (January 18, 2004).

Yildiz, Kerim. 2005. The Kurds in Turkey: EU Accession and Human Rights. London and Ann Arbor: Pluto Press.

</biblio>

 8. The Buddhist Purification Movement in Postcolonial South Korea: Restoring Clerical Celibacy and State Intervention

Pori Park

Korea was colonized by Japan from 1910 to 1945, during which Korean Buddhism was severely Japanized. As a result, Korean monasteries were reorganized according to the Japanese main monastery system, by which Buddhist clerics were bureaucratized and competed for the limited abbot positions. Most of them adopted the practices of Japanese Buddhism, wearing Western-style clothes, taking wives, eating meat, and drinking wine. Korean monks regarded cleric marriage, their having fewer regulations, and living in cities as a more convenient way for them to relate to and assist lay people, as compared to living in monasteries as celibate monks. Cleric marriages already had become prevalent when they were officially approved by the government in 1926.

However, after liberation, during the process of overcoming the long years of colonization, cleric marriage began to appear as an apparent product of Japanized Buddhism, and married clerics were thus deemed collaborators of the Japanese rule. The purging of married clerics from the Buddhist order instigated the most vicious and prolonged fights among South Korean Buddhists in their modern history. As a result of this conflict, present-day South Korean Buddhism is represented by the most influential and celibate Chogye (Jogye) order, the largest Buddhist denomination in numbers of clerics and the possession of traditional monasteries.

This targeting of married clerics, during the so-called “Purification Movement” (Ch nghwa undong), became the focal issue of de-colonization only after 1954, about ten years after liberation. Immediately following liberation, Korean Buddhists had to purge themselves of the remnants of colonialism, which included identifying and punishing the so-called traitors and eliminating the Japanese product of the “temple ordinance.” The ideological confrontation and political chaos immediately following liberation frustrated the initial effort of de-colonization of the Buddhist order. Korea was divided into two by the “liberating” forces of the Soviet Union and the United States, and the nation was soon engulfed in a civil war, lasting from 1950 to 1953.

The Purification Movement was thus the second attempt to purge the order. This time, however, the focus was confined to the issue of who was considered a cleric, and cleric marriage was regarded as a grave infringement of the irrevocable criteria for Buddhist clerics. Observing celibacy was thus regarded as the first and fundamental rule for being Buddhist clerics. Instigated by the first president, Yi Sŭngman (Syngman Rhee, president from 1948 to 1960), who abruptly ordered the married clerics’ resignation by labeling them “Japanized clerics,” the celibate clerics embarked on a campaign to get rid of married clerics. In declaring the holy “Dharma War,” they sought to restore the celibate tradition of the Sangha (monastic community), with the Vinaya rules re-instituted. In tandem, the celibate faction made wholesale accusations of married clerics being the very product of colonized Buddhism. I argue that this accusation skewed the entire issue of de-colonization and that the celibates used this rhetoric of de-colonization for their own cause, namely, the hegemonic assumption of the Sangha.

In the Purification Movement, one of a number of problems was the stark contrast in numbers between the celibate and the married monks. Married clerics were power holders of the Korean Sangha and numbered 7,000, while the celibate numbered only 600. This large difference in power and numbers had to be resolved by the celibates to attain the final victory. It would thus be easy to conjecture that the fight could not be imaginable without the external backup of the tate. Further, the forceful nature of the assault on the married faction, provoked by the state, may well have heralded a long road of violent confrontations.

The celibates resorted to the government, and the government, in turn, sided with them in eliminating the powerful and resourceful married faction. In this chapter, I examine the process of the Purification Movement, in which the minority faction claimed the final victory, and analyze the state intervention as a major contributing element to the victory. I then discuss the ramifications of this dependence on the state and on violence, namely the Sangha's falling victim to the vicissitudes of politics and the continuation of the internal strife of the Sangha even up to the present day.

 Initial Efforts toward De-Colonization

Soon after liberation, on August 19, 1945, the Korean Sangha began to cleanse the country of the effect of colonized practices. The Buddhist community voluntarily participated in the nationwide movement of de-colonization and rebuilding the nation through the rectifying of the colonial past. The central administration of the Sangha, headed by Yi Chong'uk, voluntarily resigned.[42] The interim administration, the Committee for the Preparation of Korean Buddhist Renovation (Chŏson Pulgyo hyŏksin chunbi wiwŏnhoe), was soon established by Kim Pŏmlin, Ch'oe Pŏmsul, and Hŏ Yŏp, who belonged to the right wing Youth Party for Korean Independence (Kŏnguk Ch'ŏngnyŏn-tang). This Committee held a nationwide conference of Buddhist clerics (Chŏn'guk sungryŏ taehoe) in September 1945. They decided to abolish the colonial products of the "temple ordinance" and its detailed regulations, as well as the main branch monastery system. Kim Pŏmlin was elected as the chair of the central office and Pak Hanyong, a renowned Dharma teacher, as Supreme Patriarch (Kyŏjŏng). The new administration passed the constitution of Korean Buddhism in March 1946 and changed the sectarian name to Chosŏn Pulgyo (Korean Buddhism) from Chogye-chong (Chogye Sect).

Despite these changes, however, the central administration was criticized for its lukewarm reform effort, particularly when dealing with the alleged pro-

Japanese traitors. The administration put deemed collaborators, such as Yi Chong’uk, on probation, yet most of the collaborators of the Japanese colonial government were covertly brought back into important positions of the order. Moreover, the abbots of the thirty main monasteries, who were active during the colonial rule, were not subject to investigation (Kang 2000: 85).

As a reaction to those actions, outside the administration, voluntary reform groups began to appear to address the situation differently. Buddhist clerics and lay people formed such organizations as the Korean Buddhist Youth League (Chosŏn Pulgyo Ch’ŏngnyŏn-tang), Alliance of Revolutionary Buddhists (Hyŏngmyŏng Pulgyodo Tongmaeng), Korean Buddhist Reform Association (Chosŏn Pulgyo Hyŏksinhoe), and Buddhist Women’s League (Pulgyo Yŏsŏng Tongmaeng). These groups insisted on a thorough purging of colonial Buddhism and, by extension, social reforms.

The tension between the administration and the reform groups grew into conflict. In December 1946, the reform organizations consolidated into the General League of Buddhist Reforms (Pulgyo hŏksin ch’ongyŏnmaeng). The League held a nationwide conference of Buddhists in May 1947 and established its own administration headquarters, Ch’ongbonwŏn, in repudiation of the central administration. This division of the Sangha lasted until early 1948.

The right-left polarization of the society, a consequence of the international Cold War ideology, also became a crucial element in the conflict of Korean Buddhists. The central administration accused the reform groups of being Socialist. The General League members supported land reforms, which would take land from the people without compensation and redistribute the land free of charge, as advocated by the left, while the central administration backed the notion of redistribution with compensation. Moreover, the League espoused the unification of the nation. When Kim Ku and Kim Kyusik, nationalist leaders of the South, went to P’yŏngyang in North Korea for the unification conference in April 1948, ten of the General League members accompanied them and remained in North Korea. A total of fifty-six of the Buddhist leaders went north, which shows the seriousness of the ideological division of the Sangha (Kang 2000: 96).

As the United States military government (which governed from 1945 to 1948) increasingly favored the right wing and oppressed the left, the General League became obsolete, as did de-colonization issues. The military government did not abolish the temple ordinance, despite the demands of Korean Buddhists. To control the Japanese temples left in Korea, the military made use of the “temple ordinance,” instead of revoking it (Taehan Pulgyo Chogyejong Kyoyukwŏn 2001: 171). As such, not much came of the cleansing of colonized Buddhism. Those who collaborated with the colonial government survived, and even the colonial temple ordinance remained intact, partly because of the ideological and political dissension of Korea.

The Korean peninsula was divided into North and South Koreas when the South Korean government was established in 1948 and the North Korean regime followed suit. While North Korea became a Communist nation, the issue of decolonization in South Korea had to wait until the second round of mobilization of Buddhists. This second time, however, was mobilized by a politician, not from within the Buddhist themselves, as had occurred before.

 The “Purification Movement” and Political Intervention

As discussed above, the initial efforts of redressing colonized Buddhism were frustrated by the internal conflict among the conservative and progressive parties and international politics. After the Korean War, Buddhists in South Korea staged the Purification Movement to redo the early attempts of the decolonization of Korean Buddhism; and the minor faction of celibate clerics declared war against the majority, married faction, encouraged by the issuance of the presidential order.

President Yi Sŭngman, who served from 1948 to 1960, issued the first order on May 20, 1954, commanding that married clerics leave the Buddhist order. This had a great impact on both the married and celibate clerics, given the almost absolute power of the president in the fledgling democracy of Korea.

Yi not only ignited the fight, but also became the main force, throughout his presidency, behind the prolonged battle between these factions by repeatedly emitting presidential orders. Yi wanted to use the rhetoric of de-colonization to boost his weak political foundation and regarded the purging of the married monks as a way of pursing the colonial past. He also diverted people's attention from the unlawful revision of the constitution of the nation, in November 1954, to this unusual battle among monks, by igniting and fostering the fight. At the same time, he got rid of his political opponents, among which were some leaders of married monks (Kang 2000: 104–105).

With the political maneuvers, the married clerics became the main target of de-colonization, and the internal conflict was narrowed down to fights between the two factions. President Yi stated that his nation, which was in the process of restoring the freedom and independence of Korean people at the price of life, would not tolerate those who were pro-Japanese (the married clerics) and who did not care about the crisis of national sovereignty. He further insisted that everyone should cherish patriotism by abandoning Japanese customs and habits. He stated that those who were Buddhist clerics in a Japanese fashion should gradually return to lay life and help restore the sacred celibate tradition.[43]

All the married clerics were thus regarded as Japanese collaborators. The celibates literally incorporated this severe reductionism into their war against the violators of Buddhist precepts. The celibate clerics, who were mostly Sŏn meditation monks as opposed to doctrinal clerics, emerged as the leading group in this "purification" march. Being alienated by the powerful householders (married clerics) and losing retreat places for Sŏn practices, they had accumulated grievances against the power holders.

Taking advantage of the favorable social and political currents, the celibate clerics focused on religious justification for the restoration of celibacy of the Sangha. They accused the married clerics of neglecting their public duties for the Sangha, such as educating disciples and protecting the Sangha properties, due to their family responsibilities. The celibates regarded themselves as the legitimate heirs of the Buddha and thus argued that the places of the hosts (celibate clerics) and those of the guests (married ones) were reversed. Yi Ch’ŏngdam (1902–1971), the de facto leader of the purification movement, saw the movement as a “dharma war”(pŏpchŏn) between right and evil. He saw the restoration of celibacy as equivalent to returning to the truth. He thus gave absolute value to this dharma war by saying that the truth was beyond the boundaries of time and space and not made by consensus among people (Pulgyo 1994). The observance of celibacy was thus a preparatory and mandatory step to being a Buddhist cleric.

In a defensive position, the married clerics argued that they practiced taejung Pulgyo (Buddhism for the general public) and modern Buddhism, while adapting to the conditions of the time. In fact, up until the eruption of the married/celibate conflict, the practice of taejung Pulgyo had topped the priority list of the Sangha. In other words, cleric marriage was a way to respond to the urgencies of the time, to facilitate interactions between the laity and the populace.

To comply with the imminent president’s order, the married faction convened a general meeting in June 1954, allotting fifty monasteries to the celibates and designating the Three Jewel Monasteries, the largest monasteries, for the celibates. The celibate leaders also convened in Seoul in August 1954 and held a conference of the celibates on September 27, 1954, during which they passed their version of the constitution of the Chogye Order. This constitution stated that married clerics should be removed from the cleric registry and instead be known as Dharma Protectors (hobŏpjung), who would only take care of the official duties of the order for the public. The celibates also decided that they would assume the power of the administration and that the married clerics would leave the monasteries within a span of ten years.[44] The married faction denounced those celibates’ decisions, stating that they could not be just Dharma Protectors and decided to establish a separate sect. Tension grew between the two and there were no compromises made by either side.

President Yi then issued a second order on November 4, 1954, and affirmed his position favoring the celibates. Encouraged by this second order, the celibates made a forceful entry into and occupied the headquarters temple T’aego-sa on November 5, 1954, and then hung out their own signboard of Chogye-sa. On November 11, a bloody confrontation erupted as the married faction tried to retake the temple. The married did not concede to this coercive action without putting up a fight.

While this violent conflict had become deadlocked, the president issued a third order on November 19, 1954, and made it firm that the Japanized married monks should yield and resign gradually and that the Buddhists had to end the fight among themselves. If Buddhists did not concede, he threatened that the government would intervene and punish them, according to law.

Being obliged to this third order, the married faction convened at T'aego-sa, November 20–23, 1954, and decided that they would resign from central administration positions and abbot posts. The married faction then appointed the celibate monks, who belonged to their own camp, to major positions. Filling such positions with their own celibate monks was the strategy of the married faction to maintain their power, while fulfilling the presidential order and the demands of the opposite camp. The married clerics elected Im Sŏkjin, Chŏng Pongmo, Pak Pon'gong, Kim Sangho, and Kuk Mukt'aek. These celibate clerics were scholar monks, as opposed to Sŏn meditation monks in the other faction. From here, we can see another set of conflicts—meditation clerics versus doctrinal clerics.

These emergency measures, however, did not satisfy the celibate leadership. When the married faction handed over the official duties to the elected members on November 3, 1954, the celibate faction intervened in the process and demanded that the transition procedure should be open to the public. Physical fights among those involved followed the confrontation. Facing the tenacious resistance of the married camp, the celibates actively solicited government support. They held a conference on December 11–13, 1954, marched to Kyŏngmudae, the presidential residence, and protested the government's active involvement. On January 16, 1955, they again occupied T'aego-sa and retreated from there on January 21 due to police intervention.

With this impasse, the government directly intervened by mediating between the two factions. On February 4, 1955, the Minister of Education arranged a meeting among the ten delegates from both camps. As a result of this meeting, they agreed on the eight conditions of Buddhist clerics, such as shaving one’s hair, wearing monk robes, maintaining a single life, abstaining from meat and liquor, living in the monastic community, and being older than twenty-five years of age.[45] On May 18, 1955, in the room of the Minster of Education, delegates from both camps formed the Special Committee for Purification of Buddhism and decided to hold a nationwide abbot election. They would then report the election results to the Ministers of Education and the Interior by the end of June 1955.

This agreement, however, never materialized because of the resistance of the married clerics, who thought that these measures threatened their survival in the order. No further discussion took place, and the married faction still dominated the order. To protest the administrative delay of the government, 200 celibate clerics, representing Sŏn Hagwŏn in Seoul, a center temple for celibates, fasted for seven days (June 9–15, 1955). During this event, about 360 married clerics attacked the fasting celibates and injured about thirty of them (Han’guk 2002: 81).

At the beginning of the conflict, the celibates earned not only the support of the government, but also that of the general public because of their seemingly moral cause of liquidating the product of the colonial past, the married clerics. As the chaotic confrontation persisted, however, the general public became increasingly upset by the violent exchanges between the two factions and rebuked this battle as a fight over Buddhist property, which included 800 jŏngbo (approximately 1,960 acres) of forest, 700 jŏngbo (approximately 1,715 acres) of land, 900 temples, nine colleges, fifteen middle and high schools, and small and medium enterprises. The total annual income of the enterprises of the Buddhist order reached several million hwan (Korea’s currency introduced in 1953 at 1/60 U.S. dollar).[46] Choson Ilbo (Choson Daily) ridiculed the celibates for their heavy dependence on presidential orders and criticized the bloody fighting.[47]

As the violence continued, the National Assemly took matters into its own hands and interrogated the Ministers of Education and the Interior for their handing of the conflict. The Assembly raised the issue of the intervention of the government in Buddhist affairs as an infringement of freedom of religion. It also criticized the biased and illegal handling of the government ministers for following the presidential order mechanically, without thinking about the consequences. The Assembly members also asked about the counter plans of the government after driving the married monks out into the street. Apparently, the Assembly was more sympathetic to the married monks, who produced their own members in the Assembly, including Ch'oe Kaphwan and Kim Pŏmlin. Kim Tuhwan, a member of the Assembly, complained that he seemed to be the only one who supported the celibates. The Assembly finally recommended that the government not intervene in religious affairs and that, from then on, the Assembly would no longer discuss the matter.[48]

The day after the Assembly decisions, June 16, 1955, President Yi again issued a fourth order, commanding the married monks to surrender. In this action, one can see the conflict of interest between the administration and the Assembly. On July 5, 1955, the married faction acceded to forming the Special Committee. This committee met four times and then the talks broke off.

On August 2–3, 1955, the celibates convened without government permission. They passed a revised constitution and elected the Supreme Patriarch (Chongjŏng) and central posts. The next day, August 4, President Yi held a news briefing with reporters and again made his points clear that those clerics who were collaborators of the Japanese government should leave the order. He added that the married clerics were the ones who had attempted to become good citizens of the Japanese regime. Yi regarded cleric marriage as a way to please the colonial rulers. On August 5, the day following the news conference, Yi summoned the ministers and told them to resign their positions if they could not promptly resolve the Buddhist conflict.[49]

Encouraged by Yi's support and, this time, with the approval of the government, the celibates gathered at Chogye-sa on August 12 and passed the constitution of the Sangha. They elected fifty-six Sangha assembly members and filled the administrative positions. The celibate faction filled all the ecclesiastical positions. Now, with the Conference of Buddhist Clerics and the passing of the constitution, the resignation of the married clerics could no longer be avoided. The celibates finally began to take over major monasteries. This process of seizing monasteries was difficult due to the resistance of those who operated them. With the help of police, the celibates forced the married clerics out. Those clerics and their families who were kicked out went to the street and became a social problem, not just a symbol of Buddhist strife.

By October 1955, the celibates had taken over from the married faction about 450 monasteries out of 1,000. For the remaining ones, they gave only the right of operation to those married clerics who agreed with the purification movement. In reality, however, these monasteries remained under the ownership of the married clerics, as the minority celibates simply did not have sufficient manpower to take over so many monasteries (Minjok Pulgyo Yŏon'guso 1986: 59). The celibates employed thugs and street boys for their fights and later transformed them into clerics, without much discretion or training. Despite all these inventions, they still could not operate many of these monasteries by themselves.

Under these circumstances, the married clerics resorted to the judicial system and began lawsuits. Additionally, they did not give up the operation of enterprises, schools, companies, or Buddhist foundations. The Sangha was engulfed in a succession of legal battles with the married faction. In June 1956, the married clerics won a victory in district court. The court announced that the constitution proclaimed by the celibates was not effective. In July 1956, the married also won their lawsuit against T'aego-sa. These judgments made the married clerics reassume the Sangha as well as the bloody battle. [50]

The celibate faction immediately appealed to a high court of justice and won their lawsuit on September 17, 1957. In addition, the district court had recalled its decision on the ownership of T'aego-sa in August 1956. Thus, the situation again was favorable for the celibates. The government's support of the celibates was the major force for this judicial victory. In the end, both the government and the judicial system protected the celibates.

With this litigation, both parties consumed the wealth and resources of the Sangha, but there were still more than seventy lawsuits in process over the ownership of temples. Many married clerics got divorced as a group in order to acquire single status and thus preserve their rights over their monasteries. [51] All in all, President Yi's repeated orders and determination for the causes of the celibates made possible the impossible battle against the powerful married faction. This reliance on the political power, in turn, led the Sangha to fall helplessly into the hands of politicians and the judicial systems.

 Political Turmoil and Monastic Strife

The Korean Sangha further stumbled into the vicissitudes of politics. Yi Sŭngman's dictatorship was overthrown by student and popular protest in April 1960. With this popular upsurge and the loss of their major supporter, Yi Sŭngman, the situation changed for the worse for the celibates, and the Buddhist order again went through great upheaval. Now their fate was at the mercy of politics.

The cornered married faction took full advantage of the situation and began to reoccupy monasteries, while accusing the celibates of being both adherents of bureaucratic Buddhism (kwanje Pulgyo) and parasites of the corrupt regime (Taehan Pulgyo Chogyejong Kyoyukwŏn 1996: 208). On April 27, 1960, married clerics attempted to retake Chogye-sa, and a bloody fight ensued. In May 1960, the married reassumed control of major monasteries, such as Haein-sa, Hwaŏm-sa, Sŏnam-sa, and T'ongdo-sa, as well as ten other monasteries (Minjok Pulgyo Yŏ'guso 1986: 60).

With the change in government, the judicial system also became unfavorable to the celibates. The Supreme Court sent the case back to the higher court, in which the married faction went against the efficacy of the decision of the Conference of Buddhist Clerics held in August 1955. This ruling frustrated the celibates, and seven celibate monks went to the Supreme Court and protested the decision by attempting to cut their abdomens with a knife.

Upon hearing about this incident, several hundred celibate clerics broke into the court, and 133 of them were arrested for illegal entry.

The case returned to the higher court and was still pending when the May 16, 1961 coup took place. Legal and physical fights over the ownership of temples erupted everywhere, and Buddhists were involved in seventy-five lawsuits during this period. Both factions further consumed temple property in litigation. Under these chaotic circumstances, some monks hid temple property for personal use and sold it before returning to lay life. Despite these events, the celibates were still in charge of the Sangha (Minjok Pulgyo Yŏn'guso 1986: 61).

The unstable second republic lasted only briefly, being toppled by a coup d'état staged by a faction of the military elite on May 16, 1961. After one year of tasting democracy, the Korean people again lost their political freedom, this time by military guns. The Buddhists' fate was again up in the air. A young general, Pak Chŏnghui (Park Chung Hee, who served as president from 1961 to 1979), rose in power and began to implement sweeping social reforms to make up for the lack of legitimacy of the coup. Under the exigent situation, not much freedom was left, even for the Buddhists, but it worked in favor of the celibates in the end. The Chogye order of the celibate faction decided to aid the military coup and end the purging of the Sangha. It handed a petition to the interim government, which asked for its assistance in completing the taking over of the order (Taehan Pulgyo Chogyejong Kyoyukwŏn 2001: 217).

General Pak issued an order twice, urging Buddhists to reach a prompt agreement to end the social disturbance. Following the request of the military government, the Supreme Court ordered all seventy-five Buddhist lawsuits pending in court to stop. This command turned out to be in favor of the celibates because the court appeal had been the major means of winning lawsuits for the married faction.[52]

With the suggestion of the Department of Education, both parties formed the Committee of Rebuilding Buddhism in January 1962 (Taehan Pulgyo Chogyejong Kyoyukwŏn 2001: 219–222). The Committee held four meetings and prepared the foundation for a unified Sangha. It elected members and developed operational rules of the Emergency Sangha Assembly of Rebuilding (Chaegŏn pisang chonghoe). The Assembly members consisted of fifteen clerics from each faction, for a total of thirty. They confronted each other, however, on the issue of qualifications of clerics. The celibates insisted that Buddhist clerics had to be single, and the married faction emphasized that the married clerics also needed to be recognized as legitimate members of the Sangha.

Pushed by the government's request to end the conflict, both members had to abandon their disagreement and agree to adopt the constitution, leaving revision of the phrases of the constitution and the cleric qualification issues to the government. In response, the Department of Education announced that the married clerics would keep their vested rights and be treated as clerics only when they acted as clerics, meaning maintaining a single life. The married faction protested this interpretation, but the constitution was passed without the presence of the married ones.

Upon this action, the married faction rejected the efficacy of the passed constitution. To mediate the situation, the government again intervened. The Department of Education disbanded the Emergency Assembly and started a new Assembly with fifteen people, drawing five clerics each from both factions and five social leaders from outside the Sangha. The latter five members were all hand picked by the government and were sympathetic to the celibates, as was the government (Han'guk Pukgyo Kunhyŏndaes Yŏn'guhoe 2001: 327).

In this setting, the constitution was revised such that those who stayed alone without family at a temple were regarded as clerics. The previous constitution defined clerics as single people who stay at a temple (Taehan Pulgyo Chogyejong Kyoyukwŏn 2001: 222–223). Due to government pressure, the married faction agreed to accept the revised constitution, although they still did not like it. On March 25, 1962, the Sangha finally passed the revised constitution. On April 11, 1962, the unified Sangha officially began. Both factions filled the administration. For example, the Supreme Patriarch was Hyobong sunim, ˇ from the celibate camp, and the chair of the administration was Im Sokjin, ˘ from the married faction.

Immediately after the formation of the unified administration, in May 1962, the government announced the Law for the Control of Buddhist Property (Pulgyo chaesan kwalli pŏb). This provided the government with a means to supervise the operation of the Sangha in the appointment of abbots and the management of Buddhist property. The law functioned exactly like the temple ordinance of the Japanese regime. The celibates actively sought the government's supervision to protect their property from being lost by individual clerics and to acquire the government's sanction for their order (Taehan Pulgyo Chogyejong Kyoyukwŏn 2001: 226).

The unified Sangha, however, soon faced another conflict regarding the ratio of the two factions among the numbers of the Assembly. The celibate faction outnumbered the married faction 32 to 18. The married faction wanted to be represented equally, yet its opinion was ignored. Further, the government backed the celibates in leading the Sangha (Taehan Pulgyo Chogyejong Kyoyukwŏn 2001: 225).

The dejected married faction declared its separation and established its own administrative headquarters. Within less than a year after the unified Sangha started, Korean Buddhism again experienced dissension. The government and the general public did not support the separation. The married faction thus again turned to the judicial system. The Seoul district court announced victory for the married faction on October 4, 1962. The celibate administration made an immediate appeal to the higher court, and so the court battle resumed. By this time, approximately 90 percent of the Korean monasteries belonged to the celibate Chogye order. The court battles spread to local monasteries, fighting over the abbotship. In September 1965, the celibate order won the case at the higher court and was legally legitimized. Nevertheless, the local legal battles continued long after this victory (Taehan Pulgyo Chogyejong Kyoyukwŏn 2001: 226).

Beginning in March 1965, the celibate order tried to win some married clerics over with such conditions as dropping the court appeals and following the Sangha’s constitution and rules. With this conciliatory attitude, the Chogye order took more monasteries, which belonged to the married clerics, and let those ones known as hwadongpa take charge of some main and branch monasteries. In October 1969, the Supreme Court dropped the appeal of the married faction regarding the legitimacy of the celibate order. This final court decision facilitated further submission of the married clerics to the Sangha.

Those married clerics who rejected the compromise with the celibate order criticized those hwadongp’a clerics and declared their official separation from the celibates. Yet, they could not secure legitimate status due to the Law for the Control of Buddhist Property. This law allowed only one Sangha, that is, the celibate order as registered by Chogye order. To protect the few monasteries that belonged to them, the married faction decided to create a new denomination and registered as T’aego order in May 1970. The two administrations thus went their separate ways, and the long fierce battle officially ended after more than two decades. Nevertheless, the disputes over local monasteries continued long after this separation.

 Conclusion

The celibates became the final victors in the battle over the hegemony of the Korean Sangha. From this strife, the Chogye order emerged as a celibate order. The determining force behind the triumph of the minor faction was the support of the government. The Purification Movement began with Yi Sŭngman’s issuance of an order against the married clerics. Throughout Yi’s rule, he showed consistent support to the celibates and offered legitimacy to them by identifying the married as “Japanized clerics.” His administration provided moral support and the police force in taking over the monasteries of the married.

Other major political aid came from Pak Chŏnghŭi, who rendered the final victory for the celibates, with the enactment of the Law for the Control of Buddhist Property. These two presidents, known as autocrats, favored the minor faction, possibly for political reasons. Yi ruled the nation for thirteen years and Pak for eighteen years. Yi provoked the fights against the married clerics for political reasons, rather than for innocent religious ones, namely to restore the “purity” of the Sangha. He himself was a devout Christian and might well have wanted to distract people from politics to ensure his longevity as president. Similarly, Pak needed the people’s support for his military takeover. He regarded the purging of Buddhism as means for the betterment of society. Additionally, as a result of his active intervention, he took firm control of the Sangha.

Being disadvantaged by political force, the married clerics, in contrast, resorted to court decisions. Neither faction could reach a middle ground that could satisfy all. Because of this failure to reach internal consensus to end the conflict, the factions invited further political intervention. The political dependence, in turn, made the Buddhist situation vulnerable to political power. When the regime changed, the Buddhist fate was totally dependent on the action of the new political power. The battle lasted for over two decades and small disputes continued even longer. The fate of both factions depended on court decisions, which were influenced by political power. During the short-lived second republic, the defeated married faction had a chance to reclaim its ownership of temples. The emergence of the military regime, however, aggravated the political situation, but worked in favor of the celibates.

The celibates took advantage of the government’s political support and actively sought the necessary backup of the government. They risked their lives by forming a “martyr band” for the ultimate “cleansing” of the evil married clerics. By making cleric marriage the focal issue of de-colonization, they managed efficiently to galvanize their members for the cause. With this concentration of the restoration of monastic rules, however, they overlooked investigating the broader issues of de-colonization, such as probing the religion’s independence from political intervention, reassessing Buddhists’ relationships with the colonial regime, and reinventing ways to restore the sense of community after enduring the common plights of colonialism. Instead, Buddhist clerics planted a seed of distrust and confusion by distorting the real issues of de-colonization and handed down the legacy of violence and unreasonableness. Further, under the name of restoration of the Sangha’s original purity, the celibates denied their own past, that is, all the accomplishments of the Sangha during the colonial era, including the human resource.

Moreover, the celibate faction only focused on the goal of re-instituting celibacy, neglecting the means for attaining it. After the Purification Movement, the Sangha was crowded with unqualified clerics, who were hastily made into clerics by the celibate faction, and divorced clerics, who still hid their wives and children outside temples. The forceful and arbitrary nature of overturning the membership led to the potential conflicts that had heretofore exploded. The Sangha came to consist of the original celibate leaders, conciliatory clerics from the married faction, divorced ones, and those who were added without adequate procedures. All of them were soon consolidated into their own dharma families. After the Purification Movement, the Sangha had been plagued with hegemonic strife among the different dharma families. They repeated the same strategies of their forefathers, who fought for the celibacy, namely, the use of violence through resorting to collective power and the dependence on the political and judicial system, rather than resolving the conflict among themselves.

Overall, the Purification Movement resulted in victory for the celibates. In the beginning, the battle was an impossible task for the minority celibates. Their commitment and dedication to the cause was admirable, and they were applauded for creating the space and environment that were conducive to the Buddhist disciplines for generations to come. They had to pay a price, however, for their close relationship with the government. The Chogye order was under heavy political control and was not able to independently operate the Sangha. In addition, the Sangha earned the name of Bureaucratic Buddhism (kwanje Pulgyo) and was scorned by the public. The government mobilized the Buddhists for the election of presidents and Assembly members. The order also was accused of providing political funds for the leading political party (Kang 2000: 107). All those political engagements have been recently criticized by younger generations of Korean Buddhists, who have earned the name of minjung Pulgyo (Buddhism for the masses). This is an area for future investigation.

[43] For Korean Buddhism from 1945 to 1950, see the following articles: Kang and Pak (2000: 82–99); Kim (2001: 76–83); and Taehan Pulgyo Chogyejong Kyoyukwŏn (ed.) (2001: 157–174).

[44] Choson Daily, November 6, 1954; cited in Han’guk Pukgyo Kunhyŏndaesa Yŏn’guhoe (ed.) (1995: 187).

[45] Choson Daily, November 28, 1954; cited in Han’guk Pukgyo Kunhyŏndaesa Yŏn’guhoe (ed.) (1995: 190).

[46] Tonga Daily, February 6, 1955; cited in Han’guk Pukgyo Kunhyŏndaesa Yŏn’guhoe (ed.) (1995: 204).

[47] Tonga Daily, January 18, 1955; cited in Han’guk Pukgyo Kunhyŏndaesa Yŏn’guhoe (ed.) (1995: 199).

[48] Choson Daily, November 22, 1954, November 28, 1954; cited in Han’guk Pukgyo Kunhyŏndaesa Yŏn’guhoe (ed.) (1995: 188, 190).

[49] Choson Daily, June 16, 1955; Han’guk Pukgyo Kunhyŏndaesa Yŏn’guhoe (ed.) (1995: 221).

[50] Tonga Daily, August 13, 1955; Han’guk Pukgyo Kunhyŏndaesa Yŏn’guhoe (ed.) (1995: 245).

[51] Tonga Daily, July 30, 1956; cited in Han’guk Pukgyo Kunhyŏndaesa Yŏn’guhoe (ed.) (1995: 257).

[52] Kyonghyang Daily, July 28, 1955; cited in Han’guk Pukgyo Kunhyŏndaesa Yŏn’guhoe (ed.) (1995: 236–237). ˘

[53] Tonga Daily, October 22, 1961, cited in Kim (2000: 409).

 References

<biblio>

Buswell, Robert, Jr. 1992. The Zen Monastic Experience. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Chimyŏng. 1994. “Haebanghu ŭls Pulgyogye wa cŏonghwaundong.” In Han’guk Pulgyo ŭi chaejomyŏng. Seoul: Pulgyo sidesa.

Chŏng, Kwangho (ed.). 1999. Han’guk Pulgyo ch’ŏegon paengnyŏnsa py’ŏnnyŏn. Inchon: Inha University Press.

Han’guk Pukgyo Kunhyoŏdaesa Yʁn’guhoe (ed.). 2002. 22in ŏi chŭng’ŏn ŭl t’onghae ponkunhyondae Pulgyosa. Seoul: Sonu toryang Press.

Han’guk Pukgyo Kunhyŏndaesa Yon’guhoe (ed.). 1995. Sinmun ŭro pon Han’guk Pulgyo kunhyondaesa. 2 vols. Seoul: Sonudoryang Press.

Han’guk Pukgyo Kunhyŏndaesa Yŏn’guhoe (ed.). 2001. Kyodan chŏnghwaundong kwa Chogyojong ui onul. Seoul: Sŏnudoryang Press.

Han’guk kŭnhyŏndae Pulgyo charyo chŏnjip. 1996. 69 vols. Seoul: Minjoksa.

Kang, Inchŏl. “Haebanghu Pulgyo wa kukka: 1945–1960: Bigu-Taech’ŏ kaldŭngŭl chungsim ŭro” (Buddhism and the State after Liberation: 1945–1960: Focusing on the Conflict between the Celibates and the Married Monks). Sahoe wa Yŏksa 57 (2000): 79–112.

Kang, Sŏkchu, and Kyŏnghun Pak. 2002 (1980 reprint). Pulgyo kŭnse paengnyŏn, Seoul: Minjoksa.

Kang, Sŏkchu, and Kyŏnghun Pak. 1998. Han’gŭk kundae Pulgyo ŭi hyŏnsil insik. Seoul: Minjoksa.

Kang, Sŏkchu, and KyŏnghunPak (ed.). 2000. Han’gŭk Pulgyo paengnyŏn: 1900–1999. Seoul: Minjoksa.

Kim Kwangsik. 2000. Kŭnhyŏndae Pulgyo ŭi chaechomyŏng. Seoul: Minjoksa.

Min, Togwang. 1996. Han’guk Pulgyo sŭngdan chŏnghwasa. Seoul: Han’guk Pulgyo Sŭngdanchŏnghwasa P’yŏnch’an Wiwŏnhoe.

Minjok Pulgyo Yŏn’guso (ed.). 1986. Han’guk Pulgyo chongdan chojik silt’ae chosa pogosŏ (Report on the Organization of the Korean Buddhist Sangha). Seoul: Han’guk Ch’ongnyon Sungga Hoe.

Pak, Hŭuisung. “Han’gukPulgyochonghwaundong yŏn’ gu.“Pulgyo p’yŏngnon 3 (2000): 273–293.

Pulgyo, Sinmunsa (ed.). 1994. Han’guk Pulgyosa ŭi chaejomyŏng. Seoul: Pulgyo sidaesa.

Sorensen, Henrik. 1999. “Buddhism and Secular Power in Twentieth-Century Korea.” In Buddhism and Politics in Twentieth-Century Asia, edited by Ian Harris, 127–152. London and New York: Pinter.

Taehan Pulgyo Chogyejong Kyoyukwŏn (ed.). 2001. Chogyojong sa. Seoul: Chogyejong Press.

Taehan Pulgyo Chogyejong Ch’ongmuwŏn (ed.). 1996. Pulgyo p’alryejip. Seoul: Chogyejong Press.

</biblio>

* Part III: Problematic-National Identities

 9. From Expressive to Actionable Hatred: Ethnic Divisions and Riots in Macedonia{3}

Robert Hislope

<quote>

In other places, there is no gap between real prejudice and the readiness to act on that prejudice. Here the gap is very big, and in this gap is where politics is found.

<right>

—Ljubomir Frckovski (2000)

</right>

</quote>

This chapter focuses on the role of ethnic animosities in generating conflict. I argue that interethnic antipathies are real, critical factors that often accurately characterize multi-ethnic societies. Thus, I take issue with the trendy “con-structivist” and “instrumentalist” positions adopted by many scholars today, which not only denies a causal role for emotional factors like hatred, but also brings a hermeneutics of suspicion to the concept of ethnicity itself. To many constructivists/instrumentalists, ethnicity is an epiphenomenon having no basis in reality. In the case under investigation in this study--the Republic of Macedonia--this position is without empirical support. The opposite error is advanced by the doctrine of primordialism, which frames ethnic animosities as ancient in origin and incapable of being extinguished once ignited. Constructivist and instrumentalist thinkers have offered sharp and convincing criticisms of the “ancient animosities thesis,” but this does not mean they have offered a compelling alternative.

In contrast to the extremes of primordialism and constructivism/instrumentalism, I offer an argument that contains two parts: (1) in some societies, ethnic hatreds are quite palpable and do shape the pattern of political dynamics; but (2) such hatreds are insufficient to spark violence. Ljubomir Frckovski, former Macedonian interior minister, foreign minister, and joint author of the 1991 Macedonian Constitution, notes that it is one thing to express hatred or resentment, and quite another to act on this disposition.[53] Therefore, a major component of this chapter is to specify exactly what types of factors bridge “the gap” between expressive hatred and actionable hatred, and what types of factors and conditions make that gap wider.

Macedonia is the test case for these propositions. After achieving independence in 1991, post-communist Macedonian and Albanian elites never had to convince their respective communities to dislike each other, because interethnic animosity is part of the social fabric. This point will be elaborated upon below. The intriguing story, however, behind the evidence of widespread interethnic antipathies, is the fact that Macedonia remained relatively peaceful for the first decade of its independence, which suggests that primordial-like societies (hard ethnic boundaries, interethnic animosities, ethnic distance) are not inherently prone to implosion.

War did eventually come to Macedonia in 2001 in the form of an external, spillover effect from the fighting in Kosovo and southern Serbia (Hislope 2003; Vankovska 2003; Liotta and Jebb 2004). But this was certainly a low-scale conflict with a small death toll (Balalovska, Silj, and Zucconi 2002; Rusi 2001)[54] and was successfully mitigated within six months by international diplomatic intervention. The interesting element about the conflict—for the purposes of this discussion—is that it spawned two episodes of ethnic rioting in the southern town of Bitola. In section three of this chapter, I analyze the riots in Bitola, and contrast them with the relatively peaceful conditions in the northern Macedonian town of Kumanovo. The major difference between the two cases is this: in Bitola, the anger and grievances of the Macedonian community spilled over into direct action as it was in a state of mourning over the death of several young, local soldiers who were killed by Albanian guerrillas on the war front. Interethnic animosities are a crucial element in the riots, for without the community-level anger and grief it is difficult to imagine how the riots could have been triggered. But by the same token, it took the encouragement of local elites and institutions to transpose expressive hatred into actionable hatred. In contrast, local Macedonian and Albanian elites in Kumanovo successfully worked over time to ensure that latent animosities would remain just that, latent.

Thus, the important findings of this study are: (1) contra the constructivists and instrumentalists, there indeed are ethnically divided societies that harbor ample reserves of hatred for the ethnic “other”; but (2) contra the primordialists, the translation of emotion into action requires facilitating factors. Hate alone—as well as the mere existence of ethnic differences—is not enough. Following Donald Horowitz’s work, The Deadly Ethnic Riot (2001), I argue that actionable hatred requires a precipitating event that represents a perceived injury and injustice to a community. Traumatizing events galvanize a community’s consciousness and serve to rationalize mob retaliation. In the wake of a precipitating event, preexisting animosities work to inform and inflame the moral outrage a community experiences, and they function to pre-select the target of violence. This is not to say that institutions (such as the media and the police) and nationalist elites have no role to play in the causal equation. On the contrary, they are often indispensable in the facilitation of riots. However, as Horowitz notes, “organization cannot lead where sentiment will not go” (Horowitz 2001: 230). In this way, interethnic hostilities are causally prior and empirically distinct from organizational vehicles and elite interests. The bulk of the chapter is dedicated to demonstrating these propositions.

 Theoretical Polemics and Propositions

Primordialism, instrumentalism, and constructivism offer distinct conceptualizations of politically organized ethnicity. Primordialists argue that ethnicity is a basic form of human identity that creates a natural fault line for politicization. Ethnicity is deeper and more totalizing than other types of identities, such as class, they argue. Whereas class barriers can be breached, ethnic identity is “inherited and inescapable.”[55] The intense emotional pull of ethnic attachments encourages in-group amity and out-group enmity. Instrumentalism and constructivism, in contrast, frame ethnic identities as fluid, contingent, and malleable. For instrumentalists, a rational actor assumption replaces the irrational affect of primordialism. From this vantage point, one pathway to conflict is an elite-centered model of calculating nationalists who convince their co-ethnics to engage in collective action (Snyder 2000; Oberschall 2000). Another is the micro-level rationality of individuals who find their self-interests served in nationalist causes (Hechter 1995; Bates 1974). Either way, instrumentalism treats ethnicity as simply one of many social vehicles by which self-interested humans pursue power, wealth, and prestige. Constructivists, for their part, place a special emphasis on the manufacturing of ethnicity. They are reluctant to assign an ontological status to ethnicity because they argue that ethnic identities are constructed rather than a natural feature of the human condition. In other words, the master key to unlock ethnicity is not found in group characteristics or culture or shared historical experiences, but rather in the deconstruction of an ethnic-engendering discourse (Brubaker and Laitin 1998; Fearon and Laitin 2000). In this way (and to paraphrase Simone De Beauvoir), ethnic groups are not born, but made.

The popularity of these theories changed over time. When the ethnic wars began to unfold in the early 1990s, many Western journalists and politicians spoke of the resurgence of “ancient animosities.” The removal of the communist apparatus of repression allowed the resurfacing of historically forged, irreconcilable antipathies, so it was reasoned. Many scholars complained that primordialism worked against third-party efforts to resolve ethnic problems (Gagnon 2004; Kumar 1997). Why spend resources to make peace when ethnic communities are implacably committed to war? In reaction, instrumentalist and constructivist explanations were articulated that centered on a variety of social forces, such as elite manipulation, economic hardship, state weakness, gangsterism, the rational opportunism of local actors, and the policy debacles of the international community (to name just a few) (Mueller 2000; Woodward 1995; Beissinger 1998). In the marketplace of ideas, primordialism was reduced to a reactionary, simplistic dogma of ancient hatreds and, thereby, “came upon bad times” (Motyl 1999: 83).

However, constructivists and instrumentalists often produce conclusions just as absurd as the straw man constructed from primordialism. In fact, I argue that the major error of the moment is found not in primordialism, but in the opposite direction, as too many scholars, in the attempt to avoid essentialist fallacies, downplay the role of history and culture in the post-communist ethnic wars.[56] For example, in a recent work on Serbia and Croatia, V. P. Gagnon argues that the Yugoslav wars of succession were misidentified as a case of “ethnic war”; hence, the title of his book, The Myth of Ethnic War (Gagnon 2004, my emphasis). In his preface, Gagnon states, “my work seeks to problematize not just the primordial or essentialist views of the Yugoslav conflict…[but to question] the essentialized understanding of ‘ethnic groups’ as political actors.” Apparently, the category of ethnic groups is so suspicious (and politically incorrect?)[57] that Gagnon is compelled to enclose the concept within quotation marks! This does a great disservice to the facts of the case.

For if we consider the politically significant[58] parties of Croatia, Serbia, and Bosnia in the 1990s, we will find not a single “civic” oriented party that won national elections and was able to form a government. Instead, each republic produced and voted for ethnic parties whose membership was overwhelmingly ethnically homogeneous and whose rhetoric extolled the interests of the ethnic group in question. Furthermore, each ethnic party staked out a policy platform that one would predict given the size of its community-as-constituency and political status. Hence, Milosevic’s Socialist Party of Serbia advocated a recentralization of Yugoslavia which, based on an ethnic calculus, makes perfect sense given the scattered nature of Serb communities throughout Yugoslavia. For similar reasons, Alija Izetbegovic of the Party of Democratic Action in Bosnia advocated a unitary-majoritarian approach,[59] which would directly benefit Muslims as the largest single group in Bosnia, while Radovan Karadzic of the Serbian Democratic Party of Bosnia and the various leaders of the Croatian Democratic Community in Bosnia argued for cantonization and later secession and incorporation into Serbia and Croatia, respectively. If there is no such thing as an ethnic group, and therefore no explanatory utility for the construct ethnic politics, as Gagnon and others suggest, then how come it is rare to find parties representing majority ethnic groups to demand consensus or consocia-tional-based institutions and rules, and equally rare to find parties representing minority ethnic groups to press for a centralized state and majoritarian rules of decision making?

The central mistake that constructivists and instrumentalists make when rejecting a sui generis role for ethnic politics is to treat any deviation from totalizing ethnic identities and loyalties as proof that ethnicity is an empty concept.[60] But this is demanding too much, as well as bearing a close resemblance to the fallacy of the false dilemma. If such all-or-nothing standards were imposed on other constructs in the social sciences, then it is questionable whether a single usable concept would be left. For example, should we enclose the construct of class conflict within quotation marks simply because it is rare to find historical cases of the proletarian class unanimously and uniformly mobilizing to fight capital? Similarly, should the concept of gender politics be jettisoned because many men are feminists, and many women are not?

Constructivists muddy the waters in another way, and that is by failing to make clear whether their deconstructions render ethnicity epistemologically problematic or ontologically false (Hacking 1999: 6, 24–31).[61] If the concept of ethnicity involves epistemological difficulties, then it is hardly different than any other concept (such as elite, power, class, or culture) in the social sciences. But if ethnicity is actually an ontological phantom, then constructivists find themselves making an implicit and inadvertent elitist claim that the ethnic identifiers they study have false consciousness.

The question now becomes relevant as to how one identifies a case that may be properly labeled as ethnically divided. In political terms, ethnic divisions are largely inconsequential if there are no political parties to organize and express ethnic interests. And one can distinguish an ethnic party, following Kanchan Chandra, as encapsulating the dimensions of ascription, exclusion, and centrality: “The categories that such a party mobilizes are defined according to ascriptive characteristics; the mobilization of the ‘insider’ ethnic categories is always accompanied by the exclusion of ethnic ‘outsiders’; and, while the party may also highlight other issues, the championing of the cause of an ethnic category or categories is central to its mobilizing efforts” (Chandra 2004: 3). In other words, we know an ethnic party when we see one if the party’s social base is overwhelmingly based on a single ethnic group and if its policy platform champions that ethnic group's interest. Ethnically divided societies, therefore, are determined by the fact that all (or most all) politically significant parties are ethnic based.

None of these characteristics of ethnic parties or ethnically divided societies precludes intra-ethnic party competition (Hislope 1996; Rabushka and Shepsle 1972), intra-ethnic violence, interethnic trade and commerce (whether legal or illegal) (Hislope 2002; Andreas 2004), oscillations of ethnic salience in a polity, or the commingling of non-ethnic causes and forces (like economics, elites, electoral rules, institutions, etc.) with ethnic factors in the production of social and political outcomes. When instrumentalist thinkers argue that ethnic conflict is a "myth" because in most cases ethnically organized actors pursue goods like land, resources, and power (as opposed to pure cultural goals) (Bowen 1996), one must ask what it is about land, resources, and power that negates the category of ethnicity. What better way is there for a politically organized ethnic group to gain both affective self-satisfaction and instrumental gain over its adversarial "other" than for it to accumulate land, resources, and power?

Fortunately, many scholars have moved beyond the theoretical straightjackets imposed by primordialism, instrumentalism, and constructivism. Donald Horowitz, for example, is often categorized as a primordialist, but his scholarship actually borrows and combines elements from several theoretical perspectives. In his classic work, Ethnic Groups in Conflict (1985), he argues that the motor forces of ethnopolitics in Asia, Africa, and the Caribbean are located in unranked political systems where ethnic status is insecure and groups compete for recognition. At the same time, a good deal of his study is focused on regional economic position, electoral and institutional incentives, and the "utility of ethnic affiliations" (Horowitz 1985: 74–83, 233–262). Eller and Coughlan correctly point out that "Horowitz comes down somewhere in between, suggesting that there is a continuum in the ways in which people organize and categorize themselves, such that the affective and the instrumental would be viewed as poles rather than opposites" (Eller and Coughlan 1993).

Horowitz's most recent work, The Deadly Ethnic Riot, is a comprehensive anatomy of the forms and patterns of ethnic riots in the developing world. He finds that extant hostilities are indispensable factors in the generation of the ethnic riot. To be sure, traditional antipathy is not a “guarantee” that two groups will fight each other (2001: 160), as other factors need to be present for the transposition from attitude to behavior. Those conditions include, among other things, widespread popular support for the violence, a sympathetic or passive police force, the role of rumor, and the causal power of a precipitating event. Precipitating events are comparable to what game theorists call the tipping point (Laitin 1995; Kuran 1991), as they bridge the gap between expressive and actionable hatred. Rumors of an ethnically motivated murder or rape are sufficient to spark a visceral reaction in a community, and serve to both indict the community to which the perpetrators belong and to validate traditional prejudices, fears, resentments, and antagonisms. In this way, knowledge of antipathies leads to knowledge of targets (Horowitz 2001:198).

Let us now consider the structure of ethnic cleavages and perceptions in Macedonia.

 Portrait of an Ethnically Divided Society

Macedonia is the very exemplar of an ethnically divided society. The two principal ethnic groups, ethnic Macedonians (64.18 percent, or 1,297,981) and ethnic Albanians (25.17 percent, or 509, 083) fracture on just about every key trait of group identity: culture, language, religion, and family structure. Apart from this central bipolar division, Macedonia contains a potpourri of ethnic groups from the region, including Turks (77,959; 3.85 percent), Roma (53,879; 2.66 percent) Serbs (35, 939; 1.78 percent), Vlachs (9,695; 0.48 percent), Bosniaks (17,108; 0.84 percent), and “others” (20, 993; 1.04 percent) (State Statistical Office 2003).

On top of Macedonia’s ethnic diversity and cultural distance is a whole layer of mutual frustrations and antipathies. Ten years of post-communist politics witnessed considerable tension over cultural issues like flags, language, and education. A casual racism permeates Macedonian society. On the Macedonian side, racism shows up in the endlessly cruel jokes about Shiptari (derogatory term for Albanians), in the traditional media associations of Albanians with criminals and terrorists, and in contempt for Albanian cultural traditions. Essentially, Macedonians express a cultural hierarchy in which they are portrayed as “advanced” and Albanians as “backwards” (Horowitz 1985: 166–171). Albanians who are more modernized and open to friendship with Macedonians are typically referred to as Albanci. In this case, the term Shiptari is reserved for imagined migrants from Kosovo, villagers, and criminals. Albanians draw similar distinctions. Macedonians who are accepted by Albanians are said to be “like an Albanian.” This delineates decent Macedonians from those who are nationalistic and chauvinistic (Naegele 2001a).

Polling data confirm Macedonia’s deep divisions.[62] One of the most graphic manifestations of this is what I term the “see-saw” character of public opinion. If Albanians see black, Macedonians surely see white. This can be seen across many different issue dimensions. Table 9.1 expresses this phenomenon well.

Table 9.1 Rights for Ethnic Albanians in Macedonia.

| “Recently, various politicians have suggested amending the constitution of Macedonia, mostly to make political structures more representative of Macedonia’s various ethnic groups. For each of these following amendments, please tell me whether you would support or oppose.” |

| | | Macedonians | Albanians |

| Creating a vice-presidency, which would be held by an ethnic Albanian | support | 5 | 93% |

| oppose | 93 | 3 |

| Legalizing universities which teach using minority languages | support | 2 | 82 |

| oppose | 96 | 14 |

| Giving the Albanian language legal status equal to that of the Macedonian language for official contracts and business, such as in courts and in the parliament | | | |

| support | — | 93 |

| oppose | 98 | 4 |

| | | | |

| Giving greater authority to municipal governments | support | 24 | 91 |

| oppose | 74 | 3 |

Macedonian and Albanian views on minority rights are diametrically opposed. The Macedonian community was overwhelmingly against granting the kinds of rights Albanians were nearly uniformly demanding. This same pattern of positions on ethnic rights was replicated in surveys conducted by the UNDP (United Nations Development Program) in June and October of 2000. When the focus shifts from internal Macedonian politics to security issues in the Balkan region, the ethnic divide is preserved. Thus, Macedonians cited Kosovo (81.6 percent) and Albania (45.4 percent) as the two most serious regional threats to the state of Macedonia. Albanians, in contrast, chose Serbia (75.5 percent) and Montenegro (33.6 percent) as the principal destabilizing forces in the region.

Both groups traditionally have a low opinion of the other. For example, in a 1998 U.S. State Department survey, 77 percent of the Macedonian respondents held an unfavorable view of Albanians. Among Albanians, 43 percent indicated an unfavorable view of Macedonians. Interestingly, negative views of the other do not preclude market transactions. Survey data as well as personal testimony suggest that private business contacts between the two communities are largely unhindered by ethnic prejudice. [63]

Making money is one thing, making love is quite another. Albanians and Macedonians are psychologically unprepared to accept intermarriage between their two communities. Seventy-six percent of those polled by the UNDP in 2001 agreed with the statement “most citizens of Macedonia are not ready to marry outside their ethnic group.” In sum, there is very little evidence of affective and dense social networks between Albanians and Macedonians. In fact, both before and after the 2001 conflict a trend towards the ethnicization of public space was evident in both Skopje and Tetovo (the center of Albanian political life) (Petruseva 2001a; Borden 2001; Pritchard 2001; Icevska 2001). As the journalist Kim Mehmeti bemoaned in 1992, “we have lived together for more than four decades, but only side by side, without feeling any need to know each other better and to become closer to each other.…It would have been sufficient if each Albanian in Macedonia had just two or three Macedonian friends, or if two or three Macedonians had one common Albanian friend. This might have maintained some degree of normal communication between those who happened to share the same place and the same fate” (Mehmeti 1992: 12).

In the next section, two ethnically divided cities in Macedonia are compared, one which experienced ethnic rioting during the course of the 2001 conflict, and one which did not. The objective of this section is to determine how expressive antipathies became actionable.

 A Tale of Two Cities: Kumanovo and Bitola

The region of Kumanovo, northeast of Skopje, was an important recruiting center for the Albanian insurrectionary group the National Liberation Army (NLA) in the 2001 conflict, and was the site of a second front that opened in early May of that year. Despite its proximity to the theater of war, the inhabitants of Kumanovo avoided a direct confrontation. On the opposite, southern, side of the country is the town of Bitola. Two episodes of ethnic rioting occurred there, one in late April/early May, and the other in early June. These two contrasting cases offer important insights into the nature of the relationship between ethnic animosities and violence.

* Kumanovo

Constituting the second largest urban enclave in Macedonia (behind Skopje), Kumanovo lies twenty miles northeast of the capital. Situated in Skopje’s Black Mountain (Skopska Crna Gora) range, Kumanovo sits on a traditional crossroad that links Skopje, Nis (Serbia), and Sofia. It is also the beginning of an arc of Albanian-populated areas that, moving westward and then southward, ring Macedonia’s borders with southern Serbia, Kosovo, and Albania. The city of Kumanovo is multi-ethnic, with sizable communities of Serbs (9,035; 8.75 percent) and Roma (4,256; 4.12 percent) adding to the Macedonian-Albanian mosaic. The town itself has over 100,000 inhabitants. Albanians comprise 26 percent of that number. However, if we consider the surrounding villages and countryside dwellings, of which many are nearly 100 percent Albanian, the Albanian population reaches 37 percent of the total (State Statistical Office 2003; UNDP, Territorial Division).

The Albanians of the Kumanovo district have several grievances, which made them a fertile recruitment base for the NLA. Most notably, inhabitants of the border villages with southern Serbia were never issued citizenship documents. During Yugoslavia's existence, the border zones between republics, particularly in these mountainous terrains, were never defined or carefully monitored. Albanians could thus reasonably wonder, that with the fracturing of Yugoslavia along republican lines, to which future state they belonged. The Macedonian state, permanently paranoid about the illegal (i.e., unwanted) influx of Albanians from Kosovo, demanded from these villagers documentation of their residence in Macedonia during the communist period, documents which the villagers, due to their remote location and the institutional ineffectiveness of the Macedonian bureaucracy, never received. In this way, ten years of "democracy" passed in Macedonia with scores and scores of border Albanians disenfranchised (Naegele 2001e; Balalovska 2002: 26).

It was among such disaffected people that the NLA found a ready-base for mobilization. The rural areas in the district, such as Lipkovo, were believed to be locations for NLA military training and exercises. NLA fighters even declared "liberated zones" in the Lipkovo area in May. Much of these rural areas lie adjacent to the Presevo Valley, where Albanian guerrillas of southern Serbia conducted an unsuccessful bid for secession from Serbia in 2000. Moreover, many Kumanovo Albanians eagerly joined the Kosovo Liberation Army in 1999 and gained valuable combat experience (Naegele 2001f; Ordanoski 2001; Latifi 2001a). This whole cross-border region, therefore, is a stronghold of pan-Albanian nationalism and paramilitary networks.

The town of Kumanovo, too, has long been a delicate interethnic mixture. The Second World War opened in Macedonia in Kumanovo, and relations among the various communities were stained by that experience. Ethnic rivalry has often spilled into nationalist quarrels and fights. According to the analyst Nexhat Aqifi, “inter-ethnic relations have long been Kumanovo’s biggest challenge. The town has always been tense, with Serbs and ethnic Macedonians often in conflict with Albanians” (Aqifi 2001). When fighting came to this area in early May, many feared the city would become a “second Vukovar.” Indeed, one could say that deteriorating conditions in the countryside made the outbreak of violence in the city a safe bet. The most intense fighting of the war occurred in the Kumanovo countryside. Many villages were heavily shelled, and there are widespread, credible reports of Albanian villagers being severely abused by the police (Steele 2001). Furthermore, the NLA cut off the water supply to the city between June 6 and June 14, and Albanian villagers flocked to Kumanovo in search of refuge once the shelling began (Petruseva 2001b). All of this caused obvious hardship and tensions.

Nonetheless, the city did not implode. Credit is due to the town’s mayor, Slobodan Kovacevski, and Albanian local leaders, all of whom worked tirelessly to ensure confidence and to maintain open, honest communication channels. Kovacevski regularly contacted all the local mayors in the district and urged them to calm the population and promote peaceful relations. He asked local party leaders to refrain from protest rallies, he convinced the police to stop wearing facial masks during patrols, and he ensured that NGO relief convoys could reach besieged villages. Feriz Dervishi, the Albanian chair of Kumanovo’s interethnic commission, sums up the contribution of the mayor in the following way: “Thanks to the actions since 15 March of Mayor Slobodan Kovacevski, we have succeeded in ensuring that interethnic relations in Kumanovo have not been damaged, even though the situation has escalated in the Lipkovo villages. Kumanovo has remained relatively calm and interethnic relations have not been violated” (Naegele 2001d; Latifi 2001; Ford 2001). In this respect, therefore, one can conclude that the concerted efforts of capable elites were sufficient to dampen otherwise high-conflict conditions for violence.

* Bitola

The city of Bitola, which lies in the southwestern part of the country, is about 105 miles from Skopje. Macedonian citizens perpetrated two rounds of anti-Albanian rioting in 2001. The first episode began the evening of April 30 and continued until the evening of May 1. The second riot occurred on June 6 and lasted for four hours. In the first event, a few hundred rioters burned and looted fifty-nine shops and businesses and ten kiosks. In the second, at least 1,000 Macedonians (some estimates reach 3,000) gathered to destroy fifty Albanian and Turkish (or, more generally, Muslim) shops, twenty homes, and one mosque. Some Muslims were beaten. Anti-Albanian graffiti was spray-painted on building after building, most of it calling for “Death to the Shiptars,” “Pure Bitola,” and “Get Out Albanians.”[64] Speaking in the aftermath of the May disturbance, the Albanian leader Arben Xhaferi decried it as the equivalent of “Kristallnacht” (Human Rights Watch 2001; Naegele 2001b, f).

There are five separate threads that weave together the rioting of May and June: (1) the source of Macedonian outrage, (2) the role played by relatives of the deceased, (3) the irresponsibility of the media and the use of rumor, (4) the passivity of the police, and (5) the encouragement of elites. The precipitating events for both riots occurred not in Bitola, but in the Sar mountain range above Tetovo, 170 kilometers from the city. Each time, angry Macedonians assembled because the NLA ambushed and killed soldiers who came from the Bitola area. In May, NLA forces gunned down four Bitola policemen on active duty in the army; in June, NLA units killed three Bitola natives.

When Macedonians reacted to these triggering events, they unleashed a furious revenge not only on local Albanians, but Turks as well. The transferal of retribution from Albanians to Turks may lead one to question the nexus between precipitants and targets, but there is a logic to this displacement. According to the 2002 census, Albanians in the district number only 2,522 (2.92 percent) of the population, which makes them the third largest ethnicity, behind Macedonians (77,470; 90 percent) and Roma (2,594; 3 percent). Turks are the fourth largest ethnic group in Bitola, numbering 1,580 (1.83 percent) (State Statistical Office). By selecting Turks as a substitute target for Albanians, Macedonians were acting out not only traditional antipathies that stretch back to Ottoman rule, but broadening the boundaries of the immediate adversary to the more encompassing category of “Muslim.” Consequently, there occurred what Horowitz labels a “cumulation” effect, or the “conjunction of direct and displaced aggression” (Horowitz 2001: 137–138).

A second common element of the riots is that they occurred in the aftermath of funeral ceremonies, when relatives of the deceased organized friends and neighbors to join in demonstrations. The siblings and friends of those murdered were at the forefront of the May rioting, according to local eyewitnesses. In the June rampage, a brother of one of the victims organized a protest among taxi drivers, which quickly snowballed into mob action (Naegele 2001b, c).

A third thread that facilitated the rioting was the activity of the media. When the Macedonian soldiers were killed on April 28, a privately owned local television station, Tera TV, reported that the Albanians of Bitola were celebrating their deaths by discharging guns in the air. When individual rioters were later questioned, they cited the television report as one of the reasons for their behavior. Also revealed on television was the state coroner’s report, which documented in detail how the soldiers’ bodies were disfigured. Reportedly, NLA guerrillas mutilated the fingers, eyes, and scalps of the victims (Naegele 2001c; Taylor 2001). The editor of Fakti (Albanian newspaper), Lirim Dulovi, holds such media reports directly responsible for the subsequent carnage. He described the media’s role as follows:

<quote>

The Macedonian language media were put in position to create hatred, I underline this-- hatred, and to urge violence against the non-Macedonian population.... I shall remind you that what happened in Bitola was inspired by the murder of eight soldiers near Vejce ..... After the funeral ceremony of the soldiers, the article developed by Mende Mladenovski and presented at Tera TV included details that could be qualified as urging racial hatred. In the article, [Tito] Petkovski [nationalist Macedonian politician] said that while the soldiers were buried, the Albanians from the city were celebrating their death. After this article, the city was set on fire and ethnic cleansing of the non-Macedonian population begun…. So, this was simply manipulating with the public. — Dulovi 2001)

</quote>

A fourth thread concerns the reluctance of the police to intervene. Human Rights Watch, which published a study on the riots, concluded that local policemen not only passively stood by, but also in some cases, actively participated in the mayhem. In June, the police did not even attempt to enforce their own declared curfew of 10:00 p.m., and instead waited until 1:00 a.m. to clamp down on the vandals. Albanian eyewitnesses, including those whose shops were destroyed, claim to have seen a few policemen either directly participating or preventing Albanians from attempting to put out fires. In May, the only significant action of the police over two nights was to protect the home of an Albanian deputy health minister, Muarem Nexhipi. In June, not even his home was spared. According to a local Albanian television reporter, the minister's home was burned "in the presence of Macedonian police who were just spectators" (Human Rights Watch 2001; Naegele 2001b, c).

The fifth thread centers on the role of elites. Vladimir Milchin, director of the Open Society Institute branch in Skopje, is a major proponent of this thesis. In an article published in Utrinski vesnik on May 3, Milcin raised the specter that dark forces were at work in Bitola: "There is something smelly in this dim story, something that stinks much more than the burnt shops in the bazaar in Bitola. Power and money are the agents of movement of this 'death game'. Someone is encouraging enmity to incite voluntary or violent ethnic cleansing" (Milchin 2001). Milchin observes that hardline interior minister, Ljube Boskovski, was in Bitola on the day of the funeral and stayed until the next day.[65] This rather suspicious appearance coincided too neatly with the subsequent passivity of the police, who even disobeyed the mayor's demand to impose order. The June event also involved a prominent personality who, by virtue of his position, provided holy cover for sinister deeds. At the funeral service, Orthodox Bishop Petar presented an incendiary speech, in which Albanian political party leaders were accused of being collaborators with those who murdered the young men (ICG 2001).

Police collusion, likely at Boskovski's request but impossible to confirm, undoubtedly made possible the extent of destruction. More questionable, however, are the various conspiracy theories that have swirled around the Bitola events. For example, some commentators have attempted to assign complete responsibility to hooligans bused in from Skopje (ICG 2001; Alusevski 2001). However, such reports contradict the claims of residents who insist that locals alone perpetrated the violence.[66] Much is also made about the fact that wealthy Albanian homes were targeted, which presumably indicates the planned nature of the riots. Perhaps a better explanation is that local Macedonians had no trouble identifying the property of prominent Albanians simply because in small, parochial settings, people grow up knowing "who's who." The looting of homes, therefore, represented a criminal opportunity as well as a way to punish Albanians for the misdeeds of the NLA.

 Conclusion

The events in Bitola confirm Horowitz's analysis of the anatomy of the ethnic riot. Traditional antipathies become salient when a community experiences a traumatic, precipitating event, and such antipathies predetermine the targets for retribution. Moreover, triggering events such as ethnically motivated crimes reciprocally confirm and validate long-standing prejudices and suspicions. But other factors need to be present to facilitate the transposition of hatred from attitude to behavior. The Bitola riots were sustained by the local power structure, but not jumpstarted by them. For that, we have to look to the close relatives and friends of the victims. Macedonian politicians could not have successfully mobilized riots in the absence of the macabre slayings of Macedonian soldiers. The killings were a triggering event that prompted a visceral reaction in the Macedonian community. As Vladimir Milchin acknowledges, conditions in Bitola make it "a town which is easily pushed into being involved in events like a pogrom" (Naegele 2001c).

Kumanovo is also a town widely recognized to contain fragile interethnic relations. I argued above that diligent elites in that town worked overtime to prevent any type of conflagration as the war commenced in the surrounding countryside. But this brief comparison demonstrates another crucial difference between Bitola and Kumanovo, namely, the presence of a precipitating event in the former and its absence in the latter. Traumatizing events, such as interethnic rapes, murders, and mutilations, trigger powerful emotions in a community, and represent a fundamental factor that tips the balance from expressive to actionable hatred.

Office of Research, Department of State (May 9, 2000), p. 4. Poll was conducted March 19–20, 2000.

{3} Research for this paper was made possible by grants from the National Research Council (2000), the Open Society Institute in Macedonia (2002), Union College (2003), and I received invaluable insights and support from Professor Gjorge Ivanov and my friends in Skopje at the Institute for Democracy, Solidarity, and Civil Society (Nenad Markovic, Ivan Damjanovski, Dane Taleski, Vladimir Bozinovski, Ivica Bocevski, and Zoran Ilievski). I also want to thank Vladimir Milchin of the Open Society Institute (Macedonia), Silva Kantareva, and Michele Angrist. A very special thanks to Ann-Marie Rajhmundhani.

[54] Personal interview with Ljubomir Frckovski (November 21, 2000), Skopje, Macedonia.

[55] The Macedonian government has yet to release an official figure of the casualties. Early estimates were 200+, but it is likely higher. Eighty thousand Albanian refugees sought temporary shelter in Kosovo.

[56] The phrase is from Ralf Dahrendorf, which Horowitz applies to ethnic affiliations (Horowitz 1985: 90). Connor (1984) and Huntington (1996) are representative of the primordialist tradition.

[57] For instance, Fearon and Laitin (2000: 850) remarkably assert that earlier Yugoslav struggles with national identity (the nineteenth century, the Titoist period) have no bearing on the Yugoslav wars in the 1990s! Mary Kaldor (2001), too, fails to see any connection between previous ethnic wars in the Balkans and what she calls the “new wars.” For a critique of Kaldor, see Hislope (2004).

[58] The philosopher Ian Hacking (1999) argues that behind social constructivism is a political agenda. By exposing the human hand behind the supposed naturalness of a social category or social relations, constructivists hope to pave the way for social change.

[59] I define “politically significant” as parties and actors who are capable of affecting national outcomes substantially and regularly. Croatia, Bosnia, and Serbia in the 1990s produced many civic parties, but none were politically significant. To be sure, Serbia produced several significant multi-party coalitions (e.g., DEPOS, Zajedno, etc.) against Milosevic, but these were combinations of many small civic and nationalist parties. The definition of politically significant comes from Burton, Gunther, and Higley, (1992: 8).

[60] While Izetbegovic’s party did officially call for a “civic republic” (civilna gradjanska drzava) to replace the communist constitution, the political implications of this model were not lost on Bosnian Serb leaders, who realized that civic republics based on majoritarian rules have a built-in bias against minorities (Hislope 1995).

[61] John Mueller in his study of criminal thugs in the Balkan wars makes the same mistake, according to Anna Simons. She writes: “It seems that for Mueller…so long as ‘the vast majority’ do not take up arms, the conflict cannot be considered ethnically motivated…” (Mueller 2000; Simons 2001).

[62] Gagnon (2004: 197), for example, takes other constructivists to task for, among other things, assuming “the existence of ethnic groups.”

[63] The surveys examined in this essay are all from U.S. State Department commissioned-studies from 1998 to January 2001, and United Nations Development Program “early warning reports” from October 2000 to March 2001. I thank Anna Sweeny, Janice Bell, and Dina Smeltz at the U.S. State Department, and Albana Gjuzi at UNDP, for providing copies of the surveys. Nationally representative samples of 1,000 plus adults aged 18 and over were drawn by both organizations.

[64] UNDP (2000: 15), Office of Research, Department of State (June 4, 2001), p.3; personal interview with former economics minister, Jane Miljovski (Skopje, November 21, 2000). This point was also made by several small-scale entrepreneurs who were ethnic Macedonians.

[65] I visited Bitola and Prilep (also the scene of a riot) in November 2002, and saw many burned out businesses, shops, and a demolished mosque (in Prilep). In Prilep, I interviewed a local Turk, whose shop was destroyed. At an adjacent building, the words “UCK” [NLA] were spray-painted on the window. The author thanks Zoran Ilievski and family for the tour of Bitola, and Dane Taleski for leading the investigation in Prilep.

[66] Personal interview with Vladmir Milchin (June 21, 2002), Skopje.

[67] Personal interview with Zoran Ilievski and Ljubcho Ilievski, Bitola residents (November 22, 2002).

 References

<biblio>

Alusevski, Sime. “Bitola Spirit Crushed.” Balkan Crisis Report 253 (June 6, 2001). www.iwpr.net.

Andreas, Peter. “The Clandestine Political Economy of War and Peace in Bosnia.” International Studies Quarterly 48 (March 2004): 29–51.

Aqifi, Nexhat. “Kumanovo Braced for War.” Balkan Crisis Report 244 (May 6, 2001).

Balalovska, Kristina, Alessandro Silj, and Mario Zucconi. 2002. Minority Politics in Southeast Europe: Crisis in Macedonia. Rome: Ethnobarometer.

Bates, Robert. “Ethnic Competition and Modernization in Contemporary Africa.” Comparative Political Studies 6 (1974): 457–483.

Beissinger, Mark R. “Nationalist Violence and the State: Political Authority and Contentious Repertoires in the Former USSR.” Comparative Politics 30 (July 1998): 401–422.

Borden, Anthony. “A Bridge Across the Vardar.” Balkan Crisis Report 282 (September 21, 2001).

Bowen, John R. “The Myth of Global Ethnic Conflict.” Journal of Democracy 7 (1996): 3–14.

Brubaker, Rogers, and David D. Laitin, “Ethnic and Nationalist Violence.” Annual Review of Sociology 24 (1998): 423–452.

Burton, Michael, Richard Gunther, and John Higley. 1992. “Introduction: Elite Transformations and Democratic Regimes.” In Elites and Democratic Consolidation in Latin America and Southern Europe, edited by John Higley and Richard Gunther. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Chandra, Kanchan. 2004. Why Ethnic Parties Succeed: Patronage and Ethnic Head Counts in India. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Connor, Walker. “Eco- or Ethno-Nationalism?” Ethnic and Racial Studies 7 (July 1984): 342–359.

Dulovi, Lirim. “The Media and the Conflict in Macedonia.” Lobi (December 4. 2001).

Eller, Jack David, and Reed M. Coughlan. “The Poverty of Primordialism: The Demystification of Ethnic Attachments.” Ethnic and Racial Studies 16 (April 1993): 183–201.

Fearon, James D., and David D. Laitin. “Violence and the Social Construction of Identity.” International Organization 54, 4 (Autumn 2000): 845–877.

Ford, Peter. “Part of the Balkans that Has Not Exploded.” Christian Science Monitor (July 11, 2001).

Gagnon, V. P. 2004. The Myth of Ethnic War: Serbia and Croatia in the 1990s. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press.

Hacking, Ian. 1999. The Social Construction of What? Cambridge: Harvard University Press.

Hechter, Michael. “Explaining Nationalist Violence.” Nations and Nationalism 1 (1995): 53–68.

Hislope, Robert. “Nationalism, Ethnic Politics, and Democratic Consolidation: A Comparative Study of Croatia, Serbia, and Bosnia-Herzegovina.” Ph.D. diss., The Ohio State University, 1995.

Hislope, Robert. “Intra-Ethnic Conflict in Croatia and Serbia: Flanking and the Consequences for Democracy.” East European Quarterly 30, 4 (Winter 1996): 471–494.

Hislope, Robert. “Organized Crime in a Disorganized State: How Corruption Contributed to Macedonia’s Mini-War.” Problems of Post-Communism 49, 3 (May/June 2002): 33–41.

Hislope, Robert. “Between a Bad Peace and a Good War.” Ethnic and Racial Studies 26, 1 (January 2003): 129–151.

Hislope, Robert. “Crime and Honor in a Weak State: Paramilitary Forces and Violence in Macedonia.” Problems of Post-Communism 51, 3 (May/June 2004): 18–26.

Horowitz, Donald L. 1985. Ethnic Groups in Conflict. Berkeley: University of California Press.

Horowitz, Donald L. 2001. The Deadly Ethnic Riot. Berkeley: University of California Press.

Human Rights Watch. “Rioters Burn Albanian Homes in Bitola.” (New York, June 8, 2001). www.hrw.org/press/2001/06/Bitola0608.htm.

Huntington, Samuel P. 1996. The Clash of Civilizations and the Remaking of World Order. New York: Simon & Schuster.

Icevska, Gordana Stojanovska. “Skopke ‘Spirit’ Threatened.” Balkan Crisis Report (April 5, 2001).

International Crisis Group (ICG). “Macedonia: The Last Chance for Peace.” 113 (Skopje/Brussels, June 20, 2001).

Kaldor, Mary. 2001. New and Old Wars: Organized Violence in a Global Era. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press.

Kumar, Radha. 1997. Divide and Fall? Bosnia in the Annals of Partition. London: Verso.

Kuran, Timur. “Now Out of Never: The Element of Surprise in the East European Revolution of 1989.” World Politics 44 (October 1991): 7–48.

Laitin, David D. “National Revivals and Violence.” Archives européennes de sociologie 36 (1995): 3–43.

Latifi, Veton. “Ghosts of Vukovar Haunt Kumanovo.” Balkan Crisis Report 231 (March 30, 2001).

Latifi, Veton. “Kumanovo Holds Together.” Balkan Crisis Report 268 (August 3, 2001).

Liotta, Peter H., and C. R. Jebb. 2004. Mapping Macedonia: Idea and Identity. Westport, CT: Praeger.

Mehmeti, Kim. “More Sinning than Sinned Against.” East European Reporter 5 (November-December 1992):12.

Milchin, Vladimir. “Here Comes the Plague.” Utrinski vesnik (May 3, 2001).

Motyl, Alexander J. 1999. Revolutions, Nations, Empires: Conceptual Limits and Theoretical Possibilities. New York: Columbia University Press.

Mueller, John. “The Banality of ‘Ethnic War’.” International Security 25 (Summer 2000): 42–70.

Naegele, Jolyon (a). “How the Nation’s Albanians and Slavs Perceive One Another (Part 2).” Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty (June 28, 2001). www.rferl.org.

Naegele, Jolyon (b). “Violence Returns to Bitola.” Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty (June 7, 2001).

Naegele, Jolyon (c). “Questions Linger, Rumors Abound in Torching of Bitola’s Albanian Businesses.” Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty (May 30, 2001).

Naegele, Jolyon (d). “Kumanovo, So Far, Avoiding Interethnic Conflict.” Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty (May 18, 2001).

Naegele, Jolyon (e). “War Comes to a Village.” Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty (May 16, 2001).

Naegele, Jolyon (f). “Anti-Albanian Riots Put Conflict On New Level.” Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty (May 2, 2001).

Oberschall, Anthony. “The Manipulation of Ethnicity: From Ethnic Cooperation to Violence and War in Yugoslavia.” Ethnic and Racial Studies 23 (November 2000): 982–1001.

Office of Research, Department of State (Washington, D.C.), Survey Data from 1998 to 2001.

Ordanoski, Saso. “NLA Violence Sabotages Talks.” Balkan Crisis Report 243 (May 2, 2001).

Petruseva, Ana. “Step-by-Step Towards Division.” Balkan Crisis Report 271 (August 14, 2001).

Petruseva, Ana. “Thirsting for a Return to Normality.” Balkan Crisis Report 256 (June 15, 2001).

Pritchard, Ellie. “Macedonia: Tetovo Riven by Ethnic Hatred.” Balkan Crisis Report 306 (December 21, 2001).

Rabushka, Alvin, and Kenneth A. Shepsle. 1972. Politics in Plural Societies: A Theory of Democratic Instability. Columbus, OH: Charles E. Merrill.

Rusi, Iso. “How Many Victims Did the War Have?” Lobi 44 (December 17, 2001).

Simons, Anna. “Correspondence: The Dynamics of Internal Conflict.” International Security 25, 4 (Spring 2001): 187–192.

Snyder, Jack. 2000. From Voting to Violence: Democratization and Nationalist Conflict. New York: W.W. Norton & Co.

State Statistical Office. Census of Population, Households, and Dwellings in the Republic of Macedonia, 2002. (Skopje, Republic of Macedonia, December 1, 2003).

Steele, Jonathan. “Macedonian Police Beat Fleeing Albanians.” The Guardian (London) (June 2, 2001): 17.

Taylor, Scott. “On the Edge of an Abyss.” The Ottawa Citizen (May 12, 2001), B1.

United Nations Development Program. Territorial Division of FRY Macedonia into 34 Municipalities. (Country Office FYR Macedonia: Skopje), accessed from the web on April 19, 2001; web link no longer available.

United Nations Development Program. 2000–2001. “Early Warning Report.” Report nos. 1 (October 2000), 2 (November 2000), 3 (December 2000/January 2001), 4 (February/March 2001). Skopje: UNDP.

U.S. State Department, Office of Research, survey data from 1998 to January 2001.

Vankovska, Biljana. 2003. Current Perspectives on Macedonia: The Struggle for Peace, Democracy and Security, four part series. The Heinrich Boll Foundation. www.boell. de/asp/frameset_en.html.

Woodward, Susan L. 1995. Balkan Tragedy: Chaos and Dissolution after the Cold War. Washington DC: The Brookings Institution.

</biblio>

 10. Abkhazia: A Summary of Ethnic Conflict

Georgi M. Derluguian

The conventional explanations of the Abkhazian independence war against the Republic of Georgia dwell on the combination of local ancient hatreds and Moscow’s secret meddling. This explanation is both incorrect and politically harmful. After all, what can be done if the hatreds are so ancient, and Russia, as any state faced with similar problems, might be surely predicted to stay “meddling” in its Caucasus underbelly? To reframe these inherently pessimistic assumptions, let us revisit the typical arguments or “facts” one hears from the participants in the Abkhazia conflict. It is by no means a pedantic exercise. Abkhazia’s troubles are structurally similar to other smoldering separatist conflicts all over the Caucasus and the Balkans. By getting the record straight with Abkhazia, we may gain an analytical summary of Karabagh, Chechnya, or Kosovo as well.

The social processes and historical structures commonly understood as background to conflict, as I shall seek to demonstrate, are not at all “background” factors. Rather they form the historically complex trajectory that at certain points could ignite—and also defuse—conflicts which then become expressed in ethnic terms, as presumably confrontations between the Georgian majority, Abkhaz minority, and the intervening Russia. The usual “ancient hatreds” or path-dependent explanation is about as correct as blaming the contemporary violence in Northern Ireland on the long-standing theological dispute between the two branches of Western Christianity.

Let me throw in some hard “facts”: the Georgians are Orthodox Christian and so are, of course, the Russians—at least, most of them believe so on the basis of their getting to the church for baptisms, weddings, funerals, and occasionally on Easter, which totals on average two and a half times a year (Furman 1999). The religious practices and beliefs of the Abkhazes should be described as agnostic-syncretist while (to put it more bluntly) basically pagan (Abdushelishvili et al. 1994). I shall soon explain how come. The politicized sector among the Chechens, that for a brief period in the early 1990s (though not earlier and no longer today), passionately considered themselves brethren to the Abkhaz people, by all accounts are more serious Sunni Muslims than the happily syncretist Abkhaz. This is mostly because the Chechens over the last two centuries have regularly engaged in confrontations with the Russian imperial machinery which has been brutally reminding them of a separate identity (Zelkina 2000). In the Caucasus wars of the nineteenth century the Georgians (or rather the Georgian elites) usually sided with Russia not simply because they were Christians but because their Orthodox Christian background had culturally facilitated their access to Russian imperial careers. Curiously, the three men that in 1944 ordered and oversaw the deportation of the entire Chechen nation were the ethnic Georgians highly positioned in Moscow: the NKVD Col. Gvishiani, the chief of Soviet secret police Lavrenti Beria, and Joseph Stalin (Lieven 1998).

In order to stay on track in this political maze, let us follow the wisdom of the great historian Fernand Braudel (1986) and begin with the fundamental structures, literally with the fabulous soil and climate of Abkhazia.

 Geography

Abkhazia consists of about 250 km of gorgeous winding beaches and densely green valleys climbing to the snowy peaks of the Caucasus that tower in the background. In the twentieth century, Abkhazia was transformed into one of best vacation spots on earth (Ascherson 1995). The relic pine forests and the lush sub-tropical vegetation of the coastal strip reminds one of northern California, only the beaches of Abkhazia are washed by the balmy, moderately salty, and tideless Black Sea. After Stalin and Khrushchev chose to have their summer dachas here, some of the highest status Soviet-era entities such as the Ministry of Defense, the Pravda newspaper, and the Union of Writers built imposing vacation retreats for their personnel on Abkhazia’s coast. Furthermore, Abkhazia’s sub-tropical climate endows it with outstanding condition for cash-crop plantations that can produce everything from tea and tangerines to walnuts and, most recently, kiwis. The seaside real estate and the agricultural hinterland of Abkhazia in relative value was even more precious than California--within the immense confines of the USSR, after all, there were very few moderately humid sub-tropical locales.

Just as in California or Florida, the prized landscape is actually man-made and very recent. Earlier in history Abkhazia, like much of the Caucasus, consisted of roadless mountain slopes covered with impenetrable thorny forests and unhealthy swamps in the lowlands (Khodarkovsky 2002; Kurtynova-Derluguian 1995). In the 1900s, Russian colonial botanists planted exotic palm trees and citrus orchards, and the coast was at last freed from endemic malaria only in the 1930s-1950s, thanks to extensive public works and the spread of eucalyptuses. The created real estate value of Abkhazia brought the blessing of exceptional wealth during the 1950s-1980s, in the times of late Soviet prosperity. But quarrels over the possession of this man-made paradise also caused the curse of seemingly perpetual devastation after the collapse of the Soviet order after 1989.

 Linguistics, Archaeology, Ethno-Genetics

Linguistically and anthropologically, the native Abkhazes belong to the North Caucasian group of peoples that also comprise the Adyghs (Adygeis, Circassians, Kabardins) and, more distantly, the Vainakhs (Chechens and Ingushes) and most Daghestanis (Abdushelishvili et al. 1994). To the considerable pride of its native speakers, the Abkhaz language is featured in the Guinness Book of World Records as the world’s hardest tongue. Indeed it boasts sixty or so consonants to just four vowels or even one (depending on the dialect). The verdict of patriotic Georgian scholars renders Abkhaz merely patois, a backward dialect of the Georgian language. Today, however, the comparative linguists consider it proven that the languages of the North Caucasian group are entirely unrelated to any other language family in this part of the world, be it Indo-European, Afrasian (Semitic), Turkic, or Kartvelian (a small endemic family that consist of Georgian proper and the Svan, Mingrelian, and Laz languages).

An extravagant but apparently solid recent hypothesis claims to have discovered the traces of very distant (meta-family level) linguistic relation between the North Caucasian, Sino-Tibetan (Chinese et al.) and the Na-Dene languages once spoken by California’s natives (Diakonoff 1999). But so far this newest scientific discovery has not been appropriated by the patriotic Abkhaz minds always looking out to claim additional allies in their struggles against Georgia. This could be just a matter of time considering that Abkhazia's founding president Dr. Vladislav Ardzinba is himself a professional historical linguist who had once authored a respectable exploration of Hittite mythology.

The distant ancestors of North Caucasian peoples have inhabited the valleys of North Caucasus apparently since the late Stone Age. The nationalists, of course, would take (or fiercely contest) this scholarly theory as political argument directly related to presumed historical rights (De Waal 2003). Yet all it really says is that the mountain environment was so inaccessible and resource-poor that historical migrations and conquests bypassed the Caucasus ridge. This nature-made sanctuary durably preserved different isolated languages and genetic pools.

Isolation apparently explains also the famous longevity of native Abkhazes, many of whom stay alive and healthy past the age of one hundred years. In the 1970s-1980s, the multidisciplinary inquiry of Soviet and Western scholars into the Abkhaz gerontological phenomenon pursued the factors as diverse as the yogurt-based diet, climate, the natural background radiation, or the special respect and social roles accorded by the Abkhaz culture to male and female elders (Hewitt 1979). The most robust hypothesis suggests simply an advantageous genetic mutation that became sustained in a relatively small and durably contained population. (By curious coincidence, the other similar pool of highlander longevity gene is found in Karabagh.)

 History

Another manifestation of durable isolation is the easy-going religious syncretism of Abkhazes. For centuries, first the Byzantine and then the Ottoman empires claimed to dominate the Caucasus Black Sea coast and thus to spread their respective religions. The imperial claims, however, were mostly nominal. The empires and the native Abkhaz princes possessed neither the coercive resources nor sufficient reasons to struggle for establishing credible authority over the self-governing highlander communities scattered over this poor and inaccessible periphery of the larger Mediterranean (Ascherson 1995; King 2004). In Abkhazia as elsewhere in the Caucasus, the traditional social organization rested on self-sufficient village communities interwoven in the extensive kinship networks. The convoluted feudal politics of princely families, that is, the very staple of historical monographs, for centuries remained quite superfluous to the autonomous village kind of social organization. By default, the majority of Abkhazes remained oblivious to their distant imperial rulers, and essentially were traditional pagan believers under a thin veneer of mixed up Christianity and Islam.

As recently as in 2004, I could observe that sacred groves are still frequented for the annual sacrificial feasts, and the dead are buried in the backyard after long periods of funerary rites rather than in the cemeteries (find a wonderfully literary description in Iskander 1983). On many occasions I heard the common Abkhazes ridiculing the Muslim zeal displayed by the volunteers from Chechnya and the Middle East, who, in 1992, rushed to defend Abkhazia's independence against the Christian Georgians. After the quiet departure of foreign volunteers, the mosques they had begun to build remain abandoned. Except for a few Russians priests and the Russian Orthodox churches, there is little Christian presence either.

According to textbooks, Abkhazia became part of the Russian empire in 1810 when a particular branch of Abkhaz princely lineage, called the Chachbas in the Abkhaz language or the Shervashidzes in Georgian, swore vassalage to the Tsar. Prince Sefer-bei Chachba/Shervashidze shed the Islam of previous pro-Ottoman orientation, his scions re-invented their Orthodox Christian identity and soon they adopted the culture of the much larger Georgian nobility at Russia's imperial service (Suny 1994). The upper-class shifts of vassal allegiance and corresponding cultural conversions had a long tradition in this corner of the world. Modern Georgian nationalists seeking to prove their claims to Abkhazia on medieval precedents, in reality generalize the eleventh-thirteenth-centuries experience when the feudal kingdom of Georgia was strong enough to pull the Abkhaz princes into its political and cultural orbit. We have no historical evidence to judge whether the medieval cultural bonds penetrated beyond the thin Abkhaz feudal elite. But the nineteenth-century situation is sufficiently documented to make it clear that the Russian and, by proxy, the Georgian presence in Abkhazia was a squarely diplomatic fiction until the final military defeat of independent highlander communities of the Caucasus in 1864.

 Demography and Empire

Until the last quarter of the nineteenth century the population of Abkhazia (probably around 100,000 people—the actual size is very hard to estimate due to complete lack of any state authority and thus censuses prior to the 1890s) consisted solely of ethnic native Abkhazes and a few other closely related peoples (such as the Ubykhs), who no longer exist. In 1864, the sweeping push of Russian armies towards the Black Sea provoked among the highlanders an apocalyptic panic that led to mass exodus across the sea into the Ottoman lands: present-day Turkey, Syria, Jordan, and even Kosovo (Ascherson 1995; Lieven 1998). The panic swept the entire expanse from Daghestan and Chechnya in the east Caucasus to the Circassian lands and Abkhazia in the western parts. Since Abkhazia was situated directly on the Black Sea coast, the emigration there was particularly massive. At least one half or perhaps as much as three-quarters of the Abkhazes abandoned their native land in successive waves following the series of crushed rebellions between 1864 and 1878. Their neighbors to the north, the Ubykhs and Abadzekhs, left entirely. Most of them would assimilate in the Middle East, remembering only that their ancestors came from the Caucasus. The majority of emigrés lost their languages given the natural assimilation and the activist nationalist policies of the Turkish Republic. The last speaker of the Ubykh language, a linguistic relative of the Abkhaz, died in Turkey in 1974. In a bittersweet accident, the famous folklorist Georges Dumezile himself had recorded the Ubykh language before it disappeared for good (King 2004).

The anguish of exile instilled among the North Caucasian muhajeers (Muslim refugees fleeing from the threatening infidels) a pro-Turkish, militantly Islamic identity directed against the Russian conquerors. The recent ethnic wars in Abkhazia, Chechnya, and in the former Yugoslavia forcefully revived these feelings. Today almost 3 million people in Turkey claim to be descendants of the Abkhazes, Circassians, and Chechens. In the meantime, the Abkhazes who remained in their homeland grew very pro-Russian, a fact that has more than bemused the diaspora volunteers as they rushed in 1992 to recover the land of their ancestors. Invariably, the diaspora nationalisms tend to presume their ethnic cradles to be a repository of untainted national culture. But in the last century Abkhazia underwent profound changes that made the Abkhazes an ethnic minority of 17 percent whose special status in the face of the Georgian majority of around 45 percent could be secured only by the counterbalancing factor of Russian state interests (Beissinger 2002).

The Abkhaz popular memory downplays the effects of Russian conquest and overlooks the relationship between the arrival of Georgian, Armenian, Greek, even the several hundred Estonian settlers and the policies of colonial development (Shnirelman 2001). Before 1917, the Russian administration had two objectives in Abkhazia—to create a revenue base by encouraging the introduction of cash-crop plantations (citrines, tobacco, tea) and, in a related effort, to placate the restless peasantry of western Georgia with land grants in depopulated Abkhazia.

The contemporary demographic explosion in the Georgian countryside was due to the spread of the substantially more productive American corn (which replaced the traditional millet) sometime in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, which was followed by the imposition of Russian rule in the early nineteenth century that curbed the depredations of feudal warfare and slave trade. But the Russian rule in Georgia critically depended on the loyalty of Georgian nobility (which at the time included the Abkhaz princes) whose numbers were multiplying even faster than the numbers of their serf peasants. At the abolition of Georgian serfdom in the late 1860s, the Russian administration yielded to the native noblemen and gave the freed peasants even punier land plots than in central Russia (Suny 1994). Despite the land reclamation and resettlement into the frontier territories such as Abkhazia, the rapid development of monetized economy, cash-crop plantations, and the accelerating population growth by the beginning of the twentieth century significantly worsened the plight of peasantry throughout the Caucasus.

When, in 1905 and again in 1917, the Russian state experienced revolutionary breakdowns, the social pressures erupted all over in the form of rural revolts, land seizures, and banditry (for a classic statement of causality flowing from demographic pressure to revolutions, see Goldstone 1991; specifically for the Russian Empire, see Suny 1994; Martin 2001). In a multi-ethnic environment the agrarian unrest evolved into numerous ethnic confrontations involving various sub-groups of Georgians, the Azeris, Armenians, Ossets, and Abkhazes.

The complexities of demography, land tenure, and revolutionary politics of the time became totally incomprehensible to the Caucasian men and women who grew up in the radically different atmosphere of Soviet times. The historical memory of Caucasian peoples, imperfectly preserved in family lore and eventually shaped by modern national intellectuals, could say about the dreadful events of 1905 and 1917–1921 only that “they were killing us,” but, of course, this crude simplification was repeated with enormously emotional belief. When the Soviet state began breaking down in the late 1980s, the traumatic memories became actualized and consciously reenacted in the new and quite different historical circumstances.

It is utterly wrong to follow the local nationalists and their followers, however numerous and vociferous they might be, in claiming that the recent conflicts were just the reemergence of age-old hatreds. (See the important document written in the early 1920s but first published only decades later, Lisitsian 1992; also De Waal 2003.) Interethnic relations are a gross generalization that in actuality consist of myriad daily-life interactions ranging from personal-level cooperation (friendships, intermarriages, corruption if one wishes) to occasional conflicts (careerist competition or drunken brawls) that nonetheless under normal circumstances find daily-life resolution even if, in particularly dire instances, they may involve the police (Mars and Altman 1983; Ledeneva 1998). The impression of history repeating itself is produced by two factors: the culturally driven rationalization of all kinds of conflict along the lines of traumatic historical memory and the path-dependent institutionalization of ethnicity by modern national states. The Soviet Union and socialist Yugoslavia offered poignant examples of originally quite successful institutionalization of troublesome ethnicities in the framework of federal republics that became unmanageable and destructive when the socialist states attempted limited liberalization and market reforms in response to their declining legitimation and the looming bankruptcy of previous industrialization efforts (Bunce 1998).

 Politics

In 1918, as Russia was descending into the hell of civil war, Georgia became an independent state and hurried to impose its own administration over the ethnically problematic outliers including Abkhazia (Suny 1994). The presumably irrational ethnic violence of those times is commonly blamed on the imperfections in character, class structures, and institutions of East Europeans. We overlook the centrality of the League of Nations with its perfectly liberal and legalistic discourse in sponsoring the nationalist warfare on the ruins of Hapsburg, Ottoman, and Russian empires. In 1919, the Great Powers gathered in Versailles and set the newly independent Armenia, Azerbaijan, and Georgia three standard conditions to be met within one year in preparation to receiving full recognition as nation-states. The three conditions were: (a) historical rights, (b) cultural belonging of the populations, if necessary, decided in plebiscites, and (c) effective occupation (Kazem-zadeh 1951). The first clause prompted the new regimes to create the committees of national historians and anthropologists whose patriotic findings to this day are supplying ammunition to the nationalist propaganda. The second and especially the third condition, the demand of effective occupation, which was directly adopted from the 1885 Berlin conference on the colonial partition of Africa, sent the aspiring national states scrambling to hoist their flags and install garrisons in as many contested areas as possible before the deadline and the looming plebiscites. To compensate for the severe shortage of regular troops, local militias and irregulars of all sorts were recruited and armed in the process. The results were predictably bloody (Mann 2005).

Everywhere, in Karabagh, Adjaria, Southern Ossetia, or in Abkhazia, the arrival of nationalist armed forces exacerbated the local ethnically colored agrarian conflicts and led to outright massacres. The Abkhaz village militias (called Kiaraz) sought an alternative source of weapons from the Russian Bolsheviks, who in their turn counted on transforming the disparate rural resistances into the communist organized rebellions against the nationalist regimes (Tsutsiev 1998). After finally taking Georgia in 1921, the Bolsheviks united it with Armenia, Azerbaijan, and Abkhazia into the short-lived Transcaucasian Federation (Suny 1994). This historical precedent, rooted in the constitutional experimentation of the early Soviet era, in the late 1980s would be stressed by Abkhaz leaders to claim that they were all along equal to Georgia in status, that is, a union republic enjoying the constitutional right to secession and international recognition no less than (admittedly as recently made) Moldova or Tadjikistan.

It is an understatement to say that the convoluted Soviet system of national federalism could function only due to the central institution of Communist party supported by secret police (Martin 2001). The Soviet federal system functioned largely on the common understandings and through the personal networks running through the party apparat. In 1921–1936, the special advantageous status of Abkhazia hinged on the personality of its hugely popular leader Nestor Lakoba, the semi-educated former honorable bandit of the 1905 generation, who, by 1917, had spent years in the underground or in tsarist prisons and became a Bolshevik convert with strong personal ties to Stalin (for a fictionalized account based on local folklore, see Iskander 1983). For this reason or more likely because Abkhazia was generally considered too backward and peripheral, Lakoba was able to postpone the collectivization of Abkhaz peasantry until his sudden death in 1936. (Lakoba died several days after he had feasted with Lavrenti Beria, then the communist boss of Georgia.)

With Lakoba eliminated and posthumously declared enemy of the people, Beria launched the Georgianization of Abkhazia with his trademark organizing vigor and ruthlessness. The 1936 Constitution made Abkhazia an autonomous republic of the Georgian SSR. Large numbers of Georgian collective farmers and specialists were transferred to Abkhazia as part of a campaign against backwardness (Viola 1996). Meanwhile, the Abkhaz language, that only a decade earlier acquired its own alphabet, was replaced with the Georgian language in official usage and the nascent Abkhaz intelligentsia was decimated in purges. The attempted forced Georgianization of Abkhazia (and the parallel campaign in Southern Ossetia) falls into the late 1930s Stalinist trend to reduce the roster of national autonomies to a more manageable number and eliminate along the way the virtual fiefdoms like the one carved up by Lakoba in Abkhazia. But the fact that both Stalin and Beria were ethnic Georgians was missed in neither Abkhazia nor in Georgia (Grant 1995).

After 1953, the surviving Abkhaz intelligentsia (a few writers, historians, and educators produced mostly in the earlier Soviet era) and the Abkhaz party cadres exploited the death of Stalin and the execution of Beria to reverse the tide. The ethnic demographic was changed irreversibly—without the Georgian and, to a lesser degree, the Armenian, and the Russian labor force the modern agriculture and the newly prominent resort sector of Abkhazia would have collapsed. But the Abkhaz leaders successfully urged Khrushchev to revert to the “truly Leninist nationality policies,” namely the state sponsorship of Abkhaz culture and the affirmative action in university admissions and administrative promotions favoring the titular nationality. Unsurprisingly enough, this provoked apprehension and resentment among the Georgians who occupied various positions in Abkhazia ranging from government minister down to university instructors, collective farm managers, and the police.

Normally, such tensions would be contained by the bureaucratic procedures and the constraints imposed by official Soviet discourse on nationalities (Martin 2001). In fact, after 1954, the bureaucratic containment of nationalist disruptions would become the norm for years to come, forcing the Georgian majority to adapt and learn how to live with it. But Georgia was one of the least compliant and quiescent Soviet republics in every respect (Beissinger 2002). Georgia’s history and agrarian social structures resembled Poland. Both countries boasted vibrant civil societies centered on highly regarded artistic and professorial intelligentsia whose lineages reached back to the inordinately large and ambitious petty nobility of pre-socialist times (Bunce 1998; King 2001).

During the 1956–1989 period, unruly Georgia was no less Moscow’s headache than Poland. The post-Stalinist regime felt perennially apprehensive in the face of periodical outbursts of intelligentsia-led protests. Moscow responded typically with a mixture of coopting and repressive measures against the nationalist intelligentsia, which, inadvertently, created an expanding opportunity structure for further protest mobilizations (Suny 1994). Moscow offered generous aid to the Georgian economy and cultural institutions (that never had it better than under Brezhnev) while keeping it the target of every blame. The Abkhaz population benefited even more given that in this period its numbers stabilized at under 100,000, which was around 17 percent of Abkhazia’s total population of under half-a-million. Ethnic Russians, Armenians, and Greeks each had a share comparable to Abkhaz (12–17 percent), while the ethnic Georgians (mostly speakers of the Mengrelian “dialect,” which differs from literary Georgian roughly as Spanish does from French) maintained a plurality of 40–46 percent (Suny 1994; Grant 1995). Each cycle of protest left in its wake newly actualized practices, ever-wider networks, and conciliatory political arrangements that ensured the recurrence of further protests. Both Georgian and Abkhaz protestors maneuvered to select the issues and rhetoric that would resonate with national feelings yet would avoid directly assaulting the core of Communist ideology and leave Moscow no alternative but to respond harshly (Nodia 2002).

As long as the Soviet state remained functioning in its post-1956 low-repression mode, the cycle of protest could offer a valuable bargaining opportunity for Georgian and Abkhaz officials. They were conniving almost openly with the dissidents and the crowds. The escalating cycles of protest regarding Abkhazia’s status took place every decade: in the late 1950s, the late 1960s, in 1978–79, in December 1988, spring and summer 1989. Each campaign served to embolden the protestors and wrangle substantial benefits intended to pacify the mass passions. Ironically, it was at the pinnacle of Gorbachev’s democratization that Moscow finally resolved to use coercion instead of the usual gratuitous pacification of Georgian-Abkhaz ritualized clashes. (For the general theory of democratization as cause of ethnic violence, see Mann 2005). In April 1989, Soviet paratroopers were sent to disperse the protesting crowds permanently occupying Tbilisi’s central square (Beissinger 2002). The paratroopers had to be armed with entrenching shovels for the shortage of batons and apparently received no instruction in combating angry civilians. Nineteen protestors died in the result, most of them women. Tbilisi’s “shovel massacre” initiated the first anti-communist revolution of 1989. Over a single tragic night, the legitimacy of Georgia’s Communist party was destroyed and the mercurial nationalist dissident Zviad Gamsakhurdia suddenly became the likeliest contender for state power.

 Revolution and War

Two typical stories from Abkhazia illustrate the turmoil unleashed by the events of 1989 (personal field notes, recorded in 2000). An Abkhaz farmer meets his old Georgian friend for a drink, but instead of the usual conversation about soccer and planning on selling profitably the tangerine crops, the Georgian begins passionately asserting that Georgia is the most civilized ancient nation in a Caucasus long suffering from the Russian domination. When the Abkhaz fails to match the emotions of his friend, the latter grimly proposes a toast to the death of all Abkhazes. In another instance, the graciously charismatic Djaba Ioseliani, whose picturesque life record included a long prison term for bank robberies, a subsequent doctorate in art history, and several well-crafted novels, comes to recruit Abkhazia's Georgians into his nationalist para-military organization, the National Rescue Squad (Mkhedrioni). Ioseliani had the biggest success in the cluster of ethnic Georgian villages near the prized resort town of Gagra. These villages emerged during Beria's resettlement campaign in the late 1930s, and this memory continued to cause uneasiness locally. Ioseliani forcefully insisted that Gagra was no less a Georgian land than any other, calling Abkhazes a backward subset of Georgians whose provincial ego was deliberately boosted by Moscow's attempt to dominate Georgia. He furthermore announced the pending privatization of land and the resorts of Abkhazia under the post-socialist reforms of the independent Georgian state and hinted that membership in his para-military movement would count a lot in the privatization of Soviet-era assets. The emboldened villagers joined en masse receiving the Mkhedrioni badges, pre-authorized titles to property, and a few guns. Two years later these villages would be burnt to the ground by the joint Abkhaz and Chechen forces led by then little-known Shamil Basayev (in 1995–2004, the mastermind of hostage takings in the town hospital of Budennovsk, a Moscow theater, and a school in Beslan).

The Abkhaz population of less than 100,000 felt beleaguered at the prospect of Georgian independence. Their experience of living in the state based on local patronage (which we usually call corruption) quite rightly suggested the conclusions that competitive elections would only serve the interests of the ethnic majority (Holmes 1993; Urban 1989; Vaksberg 1991; Volkov 2002). Furthermore, the senior Abkhaz Communist leaders became irrelevant when Gorbachev's acts removed from power in Moscow the top nomenklatura patrons of Abkhaz elite (Zaslavsky 1993). In the disarray, the organizing of Abkhaz countermobilization passed to the younger and less-inhibited generation of national nomenklatura. They pursued two goals: to preserve the Soviet-era ethnic quota system, which prevented the local Georgians from scoring automatic majority in the Abkhaz parliamentary elections, and to recruit external allies, Russian, Chechen, Armenian, or Middle Eastern, in order to counterbalance the overwhelming odds enjoyed by the Georgian majority.

The compactness of the Abkhaz population made its political mobilization relatively easy (see the impressive event-analysis database compiled by Beissinger 2002). By contrast, the emerging political scene of Georgia was plagued by an extreme fragmentation reminiscent of feudal patrimonial feuds (excellent analyses of familial politics include Humpherey 1991; Solnick 1998; Hislope 2002; Fisun 2002; Ganev 2006). During the Soviet times, when the Communist party offered the common unifying target, the inherited culture of Georgian petty nobility, embedded in the high status networks of intelligentsia and professionals, helped to maintain a colorful and vibrant civil society. But once the Soviet rule had collapsed, the “good families” of Georgia quarreled shamefully over status and the spoils of empire. Besides, their social skills and habits, cultivated in the intellectual salons and at the famous Georgian banquets, proved quite inadequate to the tasks of state-building and war-making. The first post-communist president, Zviad Gamsakhurdia, whose rise to power was largely due to the pedigree credential of being son of a famous national writer, within a year was overthrown by his erstwhile allies (Suny 1994). Eduard Shevardnadze, the senior Soviet-era statesman of legendary cunning, was then called to sort out the runaway mess. Shevardnadze eventually achieved a degree of pacification. But this could happen not before Djaba Ioseliani and Tengiz Kitovani, the two warlords who brought him to power, disgraced themselves through the military defeat in Abkhazia.

The origins and the course of the 1992–93 war are shrouded in dirty mysteries. The Abkhaz leadership in 1991 managed to make a power-sharing deal with Gamsakhurdia who probably sought to avoid wars on too many fronts. The Abkhaz ethnic minority managed to preserve its vastly disproportionate share in the provincial parliament and state administration. But after toppling the first Georgian president, Kitovani and Ioseliani apparently wanted to score another military success, or, perhaps, they needed to occupy and reward their troops by plundering the richest part of Georgian territory. Using the numerous and admittedly irresponsible proclamations of Abkhazia’s parliament as pretext, the Georgian warlords launched their blitzkrieg in August 1992. Their campaign almost immediately got bogged down either due to the threat of Russian troops still stationed in Abkhazia or, as many witnesses suggest, because the Georgian invaders began looting. Likely it was a combination of both constraints. The Abkhaz side acquired a breathing space to organize their defenses.

There can be no doubt that the Abkhazes were aided by the Russian military. Despite the romantic stories of Chechen and Kabardin volunteers valiantly crossing the mountains on foot to help their Abkhaz brethren, the majority of North Caucasus and Cossack volunteers were openly recruited on Russian territory, transported to the Abkhaz border by bus, trained and armed by Russian officers. The Chechen detachment of Shamil Basayev received its training on the former dacha of Khrushchev in Pitsunda, which still belongs to the Russian presidential administration. The motives and the institutional movers of Russian covert aid are less clear. Journalists suggested reasons ranging from sophisticated geostrategic calculations to the purported revenge against She-vardnadze, whom the Russian generals accused of selling East Germany to the NATO (De Waal 2003).

As with all conspiracy theories, the major point of doubt is the assumption of a unified agency capable of long-term calculations under the conditions of radical uncertainty and the seamless execution of plans (for an elaboration of this critique, see Derluguian 2001). The war in Abkhazia coincided with President Yeltsin's war on his parliament, where, incidentally, the Abkhaz leaders had many friends among the anti-Yeltsin nationalists. Furthermore, it is usually neglected that in the summer of 1992 Kabardino-Balkaria experienced a near successful nationalist revolution modeled on the earlier Chechen example, North Ossetia was on the brink of war with Ingushetia, the Adygeis on the Black Sea coast rallied for the restoration of their national enclave abolished in the mid-1950s, and the project of the pan-Caucasian Mountain Republic did not seem too hot-headed. Against this backdrop we must either presume that the acts of Moscow were guided by a secret genius enforcing a devilishly complicated plan, or a more parsimonious hypothesis would be that the events followed a chaotic trajectory consisting of myriad contradictory acts and motivations that in the end benefited Moscow as still the most powerful player on the field.

The Abkhaz independence war of 1992–93 consisted of sporadic inconclusive battles, protracted periods of stalemate, and peace agreements broken every time one or the other side (or even an individual commander) saw a chance to score victory. It was accompanied by looting and atrocities against civilians by all combatants. In the rear of both armies, Georgian or Abkhaz civilians committed the paranoid acts of house burning and executions by lynching mobs directed against suspected spies, traitors, or simply for the sake of symbolic revenge (Bourdieu 1973) every time a dead fighter was brought home for the funeral. It must be acknowledged that after several generations of living side by side the Abkhazes and the Georgians shared a common culture, common territory, common networks created through marriage and working together. It was normal to speak at least two, usually three languages (Abkhaz, Georgian, and Russian). Therefore the war-induced separation was atrociously traumatic and produced the socio-psychological effects familiar from the anthropological literature on ritual impurity and witch-hunts. From the political science perspective, Stathis Kalyvas (2006) compellingly argues that the apparent insanity in fact follows the logic of control in contested areas during civil wars.

The random atrocities became a central part of organized warfare towards the end of war, in September-October 1993, when the joint Abkhaz and external volunteer forces tricked the Georgian defenses and rapidly captured the capital of Suhum (pronounced Suhumi in Georgian) and the rest of Abkhazia. Before the war only 7 percent of Suhum's population was ethnic Abkhaz, while the richest agricultural district of Gali in southern Abkhazia was entirely Georgian (Nodia 2002). Evidently, the Abkhaz war leaders calculated that given their limited manpower it would be impossible to control the areas of predominantly Georgian population, hence there better be no population at all. Ethnic cleansing has its own perverse logic (Mann 2005; Kalyvas 2006). The atrocities must be despicable to produce the wave of panic driving large populations to flee before a small band of fighters who would not otherwise be able to prevent resistance in their rear. A simple maximization of return on effort, which results in another banality of evil (Arendt 1964).

 Future Possibilities

Stating his vision of what social science must achieve, Arthur Stinchcombe (1997) writes that the key lies in the ability to trace the social mechanisms and the resulting roads by which societies come from past into future. Where, given the preceding analysis, might we locate structural configurations that can embed the future of Abkhazia? My main contention is that the conflict in Abkhazia is akin to revolutions and civil wars. The conflict was “frozen” by the military ability of Abkhaz forces and their Russian backers to defeat the Georgian forces, and by the diplomatic ability of Georgia, an internationally recognized sovereign state with a secure seat in the United Nations, to brand the Abkhaz rebellion as separatist and illegitimate. The juxtaposition of military power and diplomatic norms produced one of the “frozen” conflicts that abounded in the former Soviet Caucasus. Since 1993, Abkhazia has existed as a de facto state (under Russian unacknowledged protectorate) while being subjected to the international economic and political blockade because of the Georgian adamant refusal to recognize the secession.

Elsewhere Stinchcombe (1999) suggested that revolutions come to an end when the degree of political uncertainty is reduced by building enough bargains into a structure of power that can sustain such bargains. It seems then that Abkhazia, like many similarly rebellious provinces in the former USSR (and in Yugoslavia), has not reached the end. In other words, frozen conflict is civil war without conclusion. Stinchcombe summarizes the structures ending revolutions and civil wars as analytical continuum from conservative authoritarianism (“Thermidor”), totalitarianism, caudillismo, occupation government, to democracy, and national independence. Let us consider the likelihood of these options in turn.

Totalitarianism is not an option for two major reasons. International norms, which today are strongly antithetical to totalitarian dictatorships, seem to be of secondary importance. After all, there still exists North Korea and there would have existed a coercively unified Iraq if international norms were not manipulated by the American government. The main reason why totalitarianism is not a realistic option is because it takes a functioning state to sustain such a regime. This is obviously not the case in Abkhazia or Georgia.

Ironically, democracy is not a realistic option for largely the same reason—this kind of regime also takes a good amount of state capacity to be sustained. In the absence of strong state structures (Fisun 2002; Ganev 2005), the prevalent if not the sole form of government in the region is what Stinchcombe called caudillismo: personalistic rule through the networks of loyalties glued by venality, mutual complicity, nepotism—and ethnicity in its most localized “tribal” and regionalist forms. But in the example of Abkhazia, caudillismo by itself would not solve the conflict.

We are left with national independence and its obverse, foreign occupation. In another typical irony, what one side of the conflict would consider national independence another would view as foreign occupation. Since the 2003 “Rose Revolution” in Georgia, the new energetic president Mikheil Saakashvili has been betting on American aid and political patronage. Indeed, today Georgian troops wear American uniforms, they serve alongside their American comrades in Iraq, and, in a display of humor, the Pentagon entrusted training Georgian military forces to the National Guard of the American State of Georgia. Expectedly, Abkhazia and Russia view this build up with suspicion that leads to another round of war preparations. The conflict was un-frozen and by the end of 2006 reached the point beyond which open warfare appeared very likely.

Besides the personal ambition of Georgia’s young new president who promised to his domestic constituency a speedy re-unification of Georgian territory, the looming recognition of Kosovo’s independence was the major factor in un-freezing the Abkhazia conflict. In this context, three outcomes can be envisioned. Abkhazia would be conquered by the newly rebuilt Georgian army and integrated into Georgia. But Georgian forces would have to confront the Abkhaz, perhaps this time overtly aided by the Russians. Moscow under President Putin has been increasingly nationalist and assertive internationally. The windfall of foreign earnings from Russian energy exports is not the cause; rather it has been a resource in the policies of Putin. The main reason is that Russian elites no longer buy into the vision of global integration. Instead, they feel cynical regarding international norms, which they now consider merely a front for American imperial ambitions. In the minds of the Russian political elite, the American-led “humanitarian interventions” in Kosovo and the invasion of Iraq proved that the world scene is shaped by the calculus of power and that Moscow cannot expect a kind invitation to join the club of America’s favored allies. All this makes more likely Russia’s annexation of Abkhazia (as well as Southern Ossetia) in one form or another. Between the prospect of Georgia’s re-conquest of Abkhazia and the Russian annexation of Abkhazia, the historical middle ground appears to be the same familiar situation of neither war, nor peace: a frozen ethnic conflict.

 References

<biblio>

Abdushelishvili, M. G., S. A. Arutyunov, B. A. Kaloyev. 1994. Narody Kavkaza: antropologia, lingvistika, hozyaistvo (The Peoples of the Caucasus: Anthropology, Linguistics, Traditional Economy). Moscow: Institut antropologii i etnologii RAN.

Arendt, Hannah. 1964. Eichmann in Jerusalem. A Report on the Banality of Evil. New York: Viking Press.

Ascherson, Neal. 1995. Black Sea. London: Jonathan Cape.

Beissinger, Mark. 2002. Nationalist Mobilization and the Collapse of the Soviet State. New York: Cambridge University Press.

Bourdieu, Pierre. 1973. “The Algerian Subproletariate.” In Man, State, and Society in the Contemporary Maghreb, edited by I. W. Zartman, 83–89. London: Pall Mall.

Braudel, Fernand. 1986. Afterthoughts on Material Civilization and Capitalism. Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins University Press.

Bunce, Valerie. 1998. Subversive Institutions: The Design and the Destruction of Socialism and the State. New York: Cambridge University Press.

Derluguian, Georgi. 2001. “Why Adjaria is Not Like Bosnia: Historical Determinants, Human Agency, and Contingency in the Chaotic Transition.” In After the Fall: 1989 and the Future of Freedom, edited by George Katsiaficas, 103–124. New York: Routledge.

De Waal, Thomas. 2003. Black Garden: Armenia and Azerbaijan through Peace and War. New York: New York University Press.

Diakonoff, Igor M. 1999. The Paths of History. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Fisun, Oleksandr. “Politiko-rezhimnaia transformatsia Ukrainy: dilemmy neopatrimonialnogo razvitia” (The Political-Regime Transformation in Ukraine: Dilemmas of Neo-patrimonial Development). Stylos (Kyïv) (2002): 4–14.

Furman, Dmitry E. (ed.). 1999. Chechnia i Rossiia: obschestva i gosudarstva. (Chechnya and Russia: Societies and States). Moscow: Polinform-Talburi.

Ganev, Venelin. “Ballots, Bribes, and State Building in Bulgaria.” Journal of Democracy 17, 1 (2006): 75–89.

Goldstone, Jack. 1991. Revolution and Rebellion in the Early Modern World. Berkeley: University of California Press.

Gould, Roger V. “Patron-Client Ties, State Centralization, and the Whiskey Rebellion.” American Journal of Sociology 102, 2 (1996): 400–429.

Grant, Bruce. 1995. In the Soviet House of Culture: A Century of Perestroikas. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Hewitt B. G., in collaboration with Z. K. Khiba. 1979. The Abkhaz. Amsterdam: North-Holland.

Hislope, Robert. “Organized Crime in a Disorganized State.” Problems of Post-Communism 49, 3 (May/June 2002).

Holmes, Leslie. 1993. The End of Communist Power: Anti-Corruption Campaigns and Legitimation Crisis. Oxford: Oxford University Press.

Humphrey, Caroline. ‘Icebergs,’ Barter, and the Mafia in Provincial Russia.” Anthropology Today 7, 2 (April 1991).

Iskander, Fazil. 1983. Sandro of Chegem: A Novel. Translated by Susan Brownsberger. New York: Vintage Books.

Kalyvas, Stathis. 2006. The Logic of Violence in Civil War. New York: Cambridge University Press.

Kazem-zadeh, Firuz. 1951. The Struggle for Transcaucasia, 1917–1921. New York: Philosophical Library.

Khodarkovsky, Michael. 2002. Russia’s Steppe Frontier: The Making of a Colonial Empire, 1500–1800. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.

King, Charles. 2004. The Black Sea: A History. New York: Oxford University Press, King, Lawrence P. “Making Markets: A Comparative Study of Postcommunist Managerial Strategies in Central Europe.” Theory and Society 30 (2001): 493–538.

Kurtynova-Derluguian, Liubov. “Tsar’s Abolitionists. The Russian Suppression of Slave Trade in the Caucasus, 1801–1864.” Ph.D. diss., Department of History, Binghamton University, 1995.

Ledeneva, Alena. 1998. Russia’s Economy of Favors: Blat, Networking, and Informal Exchange. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Lieven, Anatol. 1998. Chechnya, The Tombstone of Russian Power. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Lisitsian, Stepan. 1992. Armyane Nagornogo Karabaha (The Armenians of Mountainous Karabagh). Yerevan: Izdatelstvo erevanskogo universiteta.

Mann, Michael. 2005. The Dark Side of Democracy: Explaining Ethnic Cleansing. New York: Cambridge University Press.

Markoff, John. 1995. The Great Wave of Democracy in Historical Perspective. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press.

Mars, Gerald, and Yochanan Altman. “The Cultural Bases of Soviet Georgia’s Second Economy.” Soviet Studies XXXV, 4 (October 1983): 546–560.

Martin, Terry. 2001. The Affirmative Action Empire. Nations and Nationalism in the Soviet Union. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press.

Nodia, Ghia. “Conflict and Regional Security in the Caucasus.” Paper presented at the Yale Center for the Study of Globalization, September 22, 2002.

Reno, William. 1998. Warlord Politics and African States. Boulder, CO: Lynne Rienner.

Shnirelman, Victor A. 2001. The Value of the Past: Myths, Identity and Politics in Transcaucasia. Osaka, Japan: National Museum of Ethnology.

Solnick, Steven L. 1998. Stealing the State: Control and Collapse in Soviet Institutions. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Stinchcombe, Arthur. “Ending Revolutions and Building New Governments.” Annual Review of Political Science 2 (1999): 49–73.

Stinchcombe, Arthur.1997. “Tilly on the Past as a Sequence of Futures.” Review essay in Roads from Past to Future by Charles Tilly. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield.

Suny, Ronald Grigor. 1994. The Making of the Georgian Nation (2nd ed.). Bloomington: Indiana University Press

Szelényi, Iván, with Robert Manchin et al. 1988. Socialist Entrepreneurs: Embourgeoisement in Rural Hungary. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press.

Tilly, Charles. 1993. European Revolutions, 1492–1992. Oxford: Blackwell.

Tsutsiyev, Artur. 1998. Osetino-ingushskii konflikt (1992 — ….) ego predystoria i factory razvitiya (The Ossetino-Ingush Conflict [1992 - ….] Antecedents and Developmental Factors). Moscow: ROSSPEN.

Urban, Michael. 1989. An Algebra of Soviet Power: Elite Circulation in the Belorussian Republic, 1966–86. New York: Cambridge University Press.

Vaksberg, Arkady. 1991. The Soviet Mafia. New York: St. Martin’s Press.

Viola, Lynne. 1996. Peasant Rebels under Stalin: Collectivization and the Culture of Peasant Resistance. New York: Oxford University Press.

Volkov, Vadim. 2002. Violent Entrepreneurs: The Use of Force in the Making of Russian Capitalism. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press.

Woodruff, David. 1999. Money Unmade: Barter and the Fate of Russian Capitalism. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press.

Zaslavsky, Victor. 1993. “Success and Collapse: Traditional Soviet Nationality Policy.” In Nation and Politics in the Soviet Successor States, edited by Ian Bremmer and Ray Taras, 29–42. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Zelkina, Anna. 2000. In Quest for God and Freedom: The Sufi Response to the Russian Advance in the North Caucasus. London: Hurst & Co.

</biblio>

 11. Reconstructing Heritage and Tradition in Postwar Beirut

Aseel Sawalha

<quote>

Each people supposes their newly inflated heritage concerns to be unique, reflecting some trait of character circumstance, some spirit of veneration or revenge that is peculiarly their own. Some impute these concerns to patriotic ardor, some to nostalgic fantasy, others to specific needs for mourning or celebrating.—

<right>

(Lowenthal 1998: 4)

</right>

</quote>

 Historical Background

A devastating sixteen-year civil war (1975–1991) destroyed much of the physical landscape of Lebanon and shaped the identity and history of its people. The capital, Beirut, became the site for the fiercest battles, which resulted in the destruction of infrastructures, displacement of many people, and loss of lives. For example, in Beirut alone, one-quarter of all residential units were damaged or demolished; half of the population was temporarily or permanently displaced from their homes (Charif 1994; Faour 1991; Trendle 1991); and the lively downtown area was deserted, with most of its commercial buildings destroyed by bombing or fire.

At the end of the civil war in 1991, officials launched a major reconstruction project to rebuild the war-torn city. The project, which focused mainly on the rebuilding of the physical space in Beirut’s downtown central district, aimed at restoring the Beirut of its glorious past, while making it a center of contemporary modernity, that is, integrating Beirut into global capitalism and international tourism. The postwar reconstruction project was encharged to a private real estate company named Solidere, with other international and regional developers, the Lebanese elite, and urban planners and architects. The prime minister at the time, Rafiq Hariri,[67] was not only supportive of, but personally involved in the privatizing plan. The developers are not restoring the downtown district to its cherished old ways, however, but rather selecting details these authorities value and integrating them into their vision, which is shaped largely by the concerns of global capitalism. While replacing old cafés with Starbucks and Hard Rock Café, the project revived the flattering nicknames for Beirut that were common during that glorious period before the war, such as “Paris of the Middle East,” “Switzerland of the Arab world,” and the “East’s window onto the West,” as part of the promotion of its plans. This massive development scheme, deaf to local residents’ concerns, destroyed the buildings in the downtown area that had survived the war-–this time not by the war’s rockets and bombs, but by the authorized bulldozers.

In response to this top-down development, many individuals and groups were drawn into discussions, forming a diverse conversation from many levels of society: international to local, state, elite, intellectual, and ordinary residents. These debates revolved around a main tension: as the city preserves its past, whose past counts? Which group’s experiences comprise the city’s official heritage? These debates, in turn, raised debates over the definitions of core concepts, heritage, authenticity, which are closely linked to the city’s ambitions of modernity.[68] Beirutis found that these diverse groups do not agree on what the city’s past is. In reconstruction, they faced the continual question: whose past counts? This chapter examines the politics of heritage specifically as it was debated between two different groups: one, a local museum organized by one regular citizen; the second, a conference among Lebanese intellectuals to address the question of the country’s heritage. The conference leads to a seemingly separate, but closely related issue of what should be done about the large population of people displaced by the civil war, in effect Lebanon’s internal refugees or homeless, whose fates are entwined with the visions of the modern future of the nation and its capital city.

At the close of the war, groups that had been battling against one another suddenly found themselves searching for a shared heritage, a common ground that would facilitate the reconciliation process. This raised questions about what Lebanon’s past was, or whose stories qualified as its history.

Thus, collective memories became crucial weapons in the struggle over which elements of the past would become part of the official history, which would determine whether buildings or ports or cafés were preserved, or whose interests mattered more in a historic neighborhood. These struggles challenge the very definition of heritage, history, past, memory, and other charged terms. All the keywords debated in Beirut are complex, not only in the daily life of Beirutis, but for scholars researching the relationship of living people to their cultural histories.

As psychologists and social theorists argue, memory is selective, as people edit/sift their own experiences as well as other accounts to highlight specific details, exclude others, and reinterpret earlier narratives to fit into a particular agenda, which is related more to the present and future than to the real past. Often such reinterpretations pit specific groups against the official reconstruction project, as when developers saw the last surviving fishing port as an opportunity for luxury condominiums, but the fishermen stressed the role of their port as part of the city's history. Sometimes, though, collective narratives get shaped by tacit agreement in order to preserve peace among them. In establishing a collective memory and preserving harmony among rival communities, these groups (consciously and unconsciously) collectively silence particular episodes of the past in what can be named "collective amnesia."

Examining collective memory (or amnesia) involves the obvious question, which aspects of the past are remembered? The choice of parts of the past involves not only selecting certain places, but certain times: the Lebanese debate which moments are worth remembering, as well as which places should be preserved. Some Lebanese argued that the best route to reconciliation is to obliterate all reminders of the sixteen-year war era. For them, the prewar period was the part of the past worth selecting, and it was remembered with what we understand as nostalgia, a time of peace, prosperity, and harmony, nearly without flaw.

But this strategy of deliberately forgetting the war while recalling prewar times is not shared by all Lebanese. After the war, a large number of cultural productions (writing, films, visual art, and museums) addressed and even glorified the experiences of the civil war. According to the authors creating these kinds of works, the goal of healing the wounds of the recent war, and preventing future civil war, was to be accomplished only by confronting that past, especially the ugly brutality of the war. These Lebanese remembered and documented prewar and wartime periods through various media: making art, including theater plays, visual work, and film; publishing memoirs, historical accounts, and coffee-table books of photographs (there were several of buildings, doorways, and other prewar architecture);[69] founding museums, both on official and nonofficial levels; and launching Internet web sites where individuals posted their memories, old photos, or notices seeking lost friends and family members. An architect-critic wrote, “Hardly a month passes without seeing a book of beautiful photographs about ‘Beirut as it was,’ reading an article reviving the memories of the good old days (ayam zaman), or noticing an art exhibition showing the magic and beauty of old Lebanese buildings and traditional rural and urban homes” (Thabet 1999: 1).

In the postwar period, there were signs of an analogous concern to remember, and to promote a certain aspect of the city’s past, across other sections of society. One important strategy in relation to the past was smaller groups organizing for preservation according to their respective alliances, religion and ethnicity among them, but there were also trade and neighborhood interests that worked in similar ways. In the period between 1991 and 1997, more than 100 such groups were registered at the Ministry of Interior for licenses, stating missions that ranged from preserving architectural sites, collecting traditional songs and folktales, to building specialized museums (Misk 1997).[70] My first case below is one such humble organization. At the same time, ordinary people took an interest in archaeological artifacts, objects that were visible at professional archaeology digs around the city, or displayed in informal exhibits. Elites and intellectuals, meanwhile, participated in conferences and lectures focused on heritage or Beirut’s identity; one of these conferences forms the other focal point for this chapter.

In these discussions about Beirut’s future, its identity and its past, one heard frequent vocal and widespread criticism of the reconstruction company Solidere. These voices were also diverse, from a range including social scientists, dissenting architects (marginal to or excluded from the reconstruction process), heritage groups, and many intellectuals. In different ways, they accused the private international reconstruction company, Solidere, of designing a business-oriented city at the expense of both the city's heritage and its contemporary residential life.

Solidere responded to these criticisms by hiring a committee comprised of architects, archaeologists and urban planners (the majority of whom had criticized the first plans), whose task was to recommend a list of historically valuable buildings in the downtown area. The committee designated 265 buildings and monuments as "historically valuable" (Beirut in Motion 1996: 48). Solidere then modified its plans and treated these buildings as symbols of Beirut's architectural heritage in order, in the words of Lebanon's director general of antiquities, "to imbue the new city center with symbolic and aesthetic references to the past" (quoted in Percy 1995). Since the majority of these buildings are concentrated in only two main areas, Solidere decided to renovate these two respective neighborhoods—Al-Saifi, located east of the city center, and Wadi Abu Jmil to the west. These renovated sections were intended to serve as displays, almost like a living museum, of the old Beiruti neighborhoods. Other neighborhoods have been largely demolished and remodeled, with the exception of an old building left standing here or there.

These discourses about authenticity and reviving the "popular heritage" that influenced the preservation parts of the overall development design are fundamental to how the Lebanese construct the nation's postwar self-image. The revival and the preservation efforts have two dimensions, which it helps to distinguish: first, protecting what is regarded local and authentic; and second, rejecting the sweeping influences from the outside—in this case the outside means rapid Westernization and the influx of hybrid ideas, lifestyles, and architectural forms. Ironically, the body responsible for implementing this large-scale downtown preservation according to ideals of authenticity was the same company that installed Western multinational hotels and restaurants nearby.

The politics of rebuilding the war-torn country brought to the surface new conflicts over concepts of the modern, the heritage, and the authentic, which are entwined in this process. This can be seen in the ways individuals and groups define and narrate the country's pasts, histories, and identities. Beirutis, then, are working along different channels that sometimes intersect and merge (and sometimes collide) in response to these questions about the city’s disputed past and future. Each group or project defines heritage according to its own interest. For example, the fishermen stress the vital role of the port, while intellectual women voice nostalgia for their affordable, French-style cafés, where they could socialize with ease; though both have lost their havens to the same force, development, the Beirut they remember and advocate rebuilding is not the same.

The increasing interest in preserving the heritage among Beirut’s various groups and individuals did not create a unified heritage for the city and the country. On the contrary, it exacerbated divisions among the people, with each group struggling to broadcast its own story, to prove that its past should be valued and its own meaning of heritage was the right one. David Lowenthal, in The Heritage Crusade and the Spoils of History (1998) explains: “Each people supposes their newly inflated heritage concerns to be unique, reflecting some trait of character circumstance, some spirit of veneration or revenge that is peculiarly their own. Some impute these concerns to patriotic ardor, some to nostalgic fantasy, others to specific needs for mourning or celebrating” (Lowenthal 1998: 4).

Why did heritage and tradition become matters of concern at this historical juncture in the Lebanese situation? What characterizes this historical juncture, in the postwar era after a long civil war, is not so much that the crisis is over, but rather that there is a continuation of emergency; although the war has ended, peace is not yet fully restored. One cause of this instability was the fact that in the late 1990s, the state had still not resumed its full responsibilities, or separated clearly from the militia leadership of the war years, when the city was sliced into hostile turfs and virtually ruled by unofficial factions. After the war, policies were in flux, and rumors became the principle source of information about resources. The state and its institutions failed to provide many of the expected services: there was a very high percentage of unemployment, the war-displaced left homeless and still struggled and negotiated to secure reliable living space. As I explain in another section, people across the economic spectrum yearned for a place to drink coffee and socialize as they once did.

Ordinary people (not those in positions of power) therefore enjoyed no certainty about the condition of their lives six months or a year ahead, and this uncertain relationship to the future shaped their relationship to the past. They expressed the fear that they were excluded from participating in their own future, the rebuilding of the city. They questioned the promises of the political leaders and blamed them for granting the private sector the upper hand in determining the agenda of reconstruction. They complained that the old downtown market has been usurped by international investors, such as American fast-food chains, and aimed at tourists, not residents. Beirutis, who longed for the end of the emergencies associated with the war, continued to live in a state of emergency in the postwar era. Yet they had lost the social, economic, and political networks that helped them during the war, and were yet unable to establish alternative ones for the times of peace. I would argue that in response to the instabilities of the present, regular people idealized the past (both prewar and wartime) and used it as a figurative refuge from the unpleasant reality of the present.

 The Meaning of Heritage

Etymologically, in Arabic, the word turath (heritage) is derived from the verb waratha, which means the legal transfer of ownership of material and/or abstract objects from one's ancestors. Heritage, turath, means the collective ownership of traditions, beliefs, and ways of life, which were passed on from earlier generations. In Beirut, the word heritage is used in daily life to mean the local traditions that were practiced by previous generations, such as the traditional group dance dabka, or material objects, such as brass pots that were used by Lebanese people in the past. The word turath is often coupled with the word asala (authenticity), which also means the traditions of the past that are pure and original. In the postwar period, Lebanese intellectuals, elite as well as ordinary people, all agree that heritage is essential in the making of the Lebanese identity in the process of recovery from the war and its violence, but these same actors do not agree on which elements form the Lebanese heritage that should be conserved. On a scholarly level, Tahan (1993) defined Al-Turath (the heritage) as "what was produced in the past and some how continued to exist among us in the present. It is our cultural memory that we keep either consciously or mythically as Arabs, Muslims and human beings" (Tahan 1993: 129). Tahan then blurs the clarity of his definition by describing the unsettled state of these concepts: "It is important to admit that the Arab thought is going through a crisis in dealing with heritage.[71] [Because] heritage is not the problem of the past, but rather it is the problem of the present" (Tahan 1993: 129).

Underlying these divergent debates about the meaning of heritage, and the value of particular components of heritage, is a similar desire to preserve some elements of the past. The rest of this chapter examines two cases of preserving Lebanese heritage, each of which illustrates the effort to preserve particular kinds of heritage, though in different ways. The first case is one of the organizations formed in the postwar era, the Association for the Revival of the Heritage of Ayn al-Mreisi neighborhood, whose members gathered specific aspects of the neighborhood's past to be collected and preserved in a local museum. The second case, also a response to postwar reconstruction, is not a group, but a single conference, organized by and for the country's intellectuals in order to define heritage.

 The Association for the Revival of the Heritage of Ayn al-Mreisi

The Association for the Revival of the Heritage of Ayn al-Mreisi is an example of marginalized locals organizing themselves to preserve the heritage of their neighborhood and record their memories in a local museum. Members of this association come primarily from three ethno-religious groups, Druze, Sunni and Christian Lebanese, whose residence in the neighborhood of Ayn al-Mreisi can be traced to before the war. Ayn al-Mreisi abuts the downtown area on the waterfront, next to Wadi Abu-Jmil, one of the two neighborhoods selected for Solidere's living-museum style preservation project. The aim of this association is to protect the neighborhood's threatened heritage, as they see it, and to preserve the memories of its original residents.

The association's understanding of the concept of "heritage" is a flexible one Najem, a middle-aged man, is the self-appointed and community-recognized authority on the neighborhood's heritage. A retired fireman who also worked as a diver before he lost both his legs in an explosion, he has transformed the second floor of his own house into what he calls the "Museum of Ayn al-Mreisi." Residents of the neighborhood acknowledge the leadership of Najem, referring to him as "the one who can tell the history of the neighborhood," and they donate items they no longer use but judge as valuable to his collection. Najem describes the association's objective as "the preservation of anything old, authentic and used by the people of Ayn al-Mreisi." This flexible definition of heritage, and his neighbors' cooperation, is manifest in the jammed, three-room museum that holds, among other things, forty albums of old photographs; a collection of old radio sets, telephones, and phonographs; Beiruti clothes considered traditional; coins from different parts of the world; paintings and postcards of old Beirut; and hundreds of sea shells collected from shores surrounding Beirut.

Najem emphasizes the importance of his museum as a way to preserve Beirut's threatened heritage and guarantee the continued existence of the area. Najem is convinced that his museum is vital not only for protecting the past of Ayn al-Mreisi neighborhood, but also for the whole city. He fortifies this by stating, "Ayn al-Mreisi is what is left of old Beirut, which is also on its way to disappearing. If you come back to this area in 10 years, I am sure that you won't find any of us here, and you won't recognize the area. I am trying to protect the past of the area and the memory of its residents. I believe that our heritage is our history." Najem sees himself as a guardian of the neighborhood's threatened past and the memories of its residents. He finds himself where he has to interpret and negotiate with his neighbors and supporters the meaning of heritage.

Although Najem does not have a systematic method for organizing the museum material, he does have elaborate knowledge of his collection, such as the names of the items, the names of owners and donors, the approximate year they were purchased, the prices the original owners paid for selected items, and most interestingly, an anecdote about it. For example, Najem enthusiastically recounts the story of an old radio set: "This radio was the first radio set in Ayn al-Mreisi. The owner, who was a friend of my father, sold his carpentry equipment to pay for the radio in the 1930s. The neighbors [male] used to go to the carpenter's shop to listen to the radio." Najem tells similar stories about other items of his collection. Each of these items is connected to a story that embeds it in the neighborhood or the social network of its residents. This knowledge is not written anywhere, but reproduced orally; it is perpetuated in the collective memories and the shared knowledge of Najem and his friends, and mainly in the stories they tell about the museum's collection.

As the inventory of phonographs and telephones suggests, Najem's collection is not limited to items manufactured or made in the neighborhood. The museum includes anything adopted or owned by the residents of the neighborhood over time, regardless of the item's origin. In fact, many of the items in the collection like the telephones represented moments of modernity, and not authenticity, at the time when they were first used by the neighborhood's inhabitants. Najem's story of the carpenter's radio is an example of this irony. According to Najem, if an item was used by the inhabitants of Ayn al-Mreisi in the past it becomes part of the neighborhood's heritage and deserves preserving, whether it be an appliance, coins, clothing, or fishing equipment.

One of the complex examples of objects in Najem's museum coming from "outside" the neighborhood is the collection of photographs. The collection includes photographs of international celebrities, such as Hollywood actors and actresses, the Shah of Iran and late King Hussein of Jordan, the American boxer Mohammed Ali, and employees of different embassies whom Najem knew by name—portraits taken when the person was visiting the neighborhood as a tourist. For Najem and his constituency, these photos illustrate a crucial aspect of Ayn al-Mreisi's heritage—namely that the neighborhood beaches, nightclubs, and hotels attracted many foreign visitors, some of whom formed temporary friendships with local residents. Najem and his friends express pride in the neighborhood's past when it was a site of attraction for outsiders and tourists, but, at the same time, they complain about the current version of tourism, a commodification of features of the neighborhood's natural environment and what they describe as "the invasion of the neighborhood by strangers who do not belong to the area." Abu Adnan, a member of the Association for the Revival of the Heritage of Ayn al-Mreisi, indicts these strangers: "With their money, they buy apartments with beautiful views of the sea, but they do not know their actual meaning. They only watch the sea through the glass of their air-conditioned balconies." Other members of the association criticize the new residents for not appreciating the unique character of the neighborhood and its "authentic" past and for not interacting with the original residents. Through the museum's displays, Najem and members of his association hope to document and preserve certain moments of the past as a way of providing the area with roots in the present.

In addition to housing the items that are believed to represent Ayn al-Mreisi's past, the museum functions as a site of remembrance for the neighborhood's residents. Sitting in a big armchair under a vine tree on his old house's balcony, overlooking an alleyway and accompanied with other cofounders, his aging mother and two sisters, Najem narrates what could be called the "biographies" of his collection. During these narrations, his friends and family members complement his story by injecting more details, making comments or prompting Najem to show his guests an item he had just acquired. It is apparent that Najem's friends have heard the same stories before, but they continue to seem interested in hearing them repeated. The family and members of his association become active participants in telling the story of their neighborhood's past through talking about the museum's collection. They seem to perceive the biographies of the museum collection as an extension of their own lives.

The museum/home exudes the quality of a social center, where familiar friends banter, and strangers (like I was) are welcomed as audience to the organization's importance. One of Najem's colleagues is Abu Adnan, a cheerful, talkative 80-year-old Bieruti fisherman, who spends most of his time sitting with Najem on his balcony watching the passersby. Abu Adnan gave Najem an assortment of intimate and personal items that became part of the museum's collection: photographs, an old butcher scale and meat hooks that he used in his shop, his father's traditional Beiruti dress, and his traditional wooden sandals. He also contributed personal stories associated with each item. One afternoon, Abu Adnan asked Najem to show me his father's traditional Beiruti dress, and when Najem obliged, Abu Adnan recounted a story from his boyhood, about a day he followed his father in the old alleys of Beirut and got lost. A third member of the association teased Abu Adnan by saying that he had given the items to the museum because his wife wanted them out. Abu Adnan laughingly replied that he had given them to the museum so he can keep telling stories about his own life. While Abu Adnan was talking about his memories with his father, a younger regular at the museum and a neighborhood painter, Kareem, jumped into the conversation to tell us about his grandfather, who used to wear the traditional Beiruti dress as well. Three of Kareem's original paintings depicting twilight in the neighborhood's fishing port are hanging on a main wall in the museum.

Like Abu Adnan’s donations, the rest of the museum’s collection consists of familiar but no-longer-used items. The items became symbols in the interrelated processes of collective remembering and the preservation of the neighborhood’s past. Ayn al-Mreisi museum serves multiple purposes: it is a kind of archive, site of memory for the residents of the neighborhood who are keen on preserving their memories and storing them, with the possibility of teaching others (like me) about those memories; and it is a place for socializing, where members of the community discuss their concerns, their political positions on important issues related to their lives, dialogue that reinforces their affiliations.

In addition to operating the neighborhood’s museum, The Association for the Revival of the Heritage of Ayn al-Mreisi supported the fishermen of Ayn al-Mreisi in their struggle against investors and developers, who had managed to displace the fishermen and take over the neighborhood’s fishing port. The organization’s interest in reinforcing the fishermen’s cause was crystallized when members of the association, along with members of the Mosque’s Committee (another neighborhood group), collaborated to coordinate their votes in the parliament elections to support candidates who promised to defend the fishermen. As explained by members of the association, the support of the fishermen was seen as one way of protecting an important aspect of the neighborhood’s threatened heritage. Although the neighborhood museum is run by Najem, the efforts and the passion of his neighbors are what make the museum a site of collective memory. In discussing feminism and cultural memory, Hirsch and Smith defined cultural memory as the product of fragmentary personal and collective experiences that are transmitted through memory. The authors view acts of memory as forms of performance, representation, and interpretation (Hirsch and Smith 2002: 5). Similarly, Andreas Huyssen explains the political reasons that make communities preserve their collective memories creating public spheres of real memory that will counter the politics of forgetting imposed by ruling regimes either through reconciliation or through repressive silencing, “in sum, memory has become a cultural obsession on monumental proportions across the globe” (Huyssen 2000: 26).

 The First Convention of the Lebanese Popular Culture

Whatever its importance for local symbolism or anthropological research, though, the efforts of the heritage museum organization remained marginal to the efforts of defining and preserving the Lebanese heritage. What did those in power, meanwhile, think of the city's cherished past? As said above, one heard among the intellectuals in Lebanon an ongoing debate over the meanings of al-turath (heritage), al-asala (authenticity) and al-hadatha (modernity). At the level of policymaking, the debate involved several powerful parties: concerned intellectuals, state institutions, and non-governmental organizations. Unlike the local residents of Ayn al-Mrieisi, who collected material objects in the museum and recounted individual memories, the intellectuals and policymakers issued various calls for reviving the "heritage" and maintaining the "authentic" at a larger level, in order to unite a strong nation that would be capable of maintaining a peaceful existence internally among its different groups. Heritage, in this vision, will unite the divergent ethno-religious groups (who had fought each other for nearly two decades) within a collective national frame. Although there was a general consensus on the importance of preserving "The Heritage," there was no consensus on what the word means or on whose heritage should be collected and preserved. This lack of agreement sparked ongoing debate, which played out in live conversation, print, and formal gatherings such as conferences.

The "First Convention of the Lebanese Popular Culture" was held in Beirut in December 1993. On the agenda of its meetings, the terms heritage and authenticity were given a prominent place. As a sign of how urgent and critical this issue was, those invited were all figures of power: ministers from an assortment of departments—including media, internal affairs, tourism, culture and higher education; two Parliament members; the director of the Hariri Foundation; professors at local universities; and finally independent researchers and writers. At this gathering, the participants discussed in formal dialogue what constituted the nation's heritage. In the end, they failed to reach an agreement. Nonetheless, in his report of the convention, the Lebanese journalist and writer Joseph Basil (1994) wrote that underneath their variety, these intellectuals did share the definition of Lebanon's popular heritage as "the accumulation of the experiences of ordinary people, experiences that stretch over thousands of years through the many successive governments and armies." In order to include all strata of the Lebanese society within this vision, the participants in the convention agreed that the Lebanese heritage should be seen as having four characteristics: collective, unique, divergent, and multifold. Participants in the conference acknowledged that the Lebanese heritage is multilayered. They recommended that the state, with cultural and academic institutions, play a key role in collecting and preserving not only the country's heritage, but also its popular culture. In this move, heritage was conflated with yet another complex category: popular culture.

The conference reporter, Basil, acknowledged the variations in the components of heritage among distinct Lebanese groups. Moreover, he attributed these differences to geographic region, rather than to sectarian or religious affiliation, that is, to rural (agrarian and generally more poor) or urban (cosmopolitan, modern) differences. This is a notable assertion, given that it comes after a long civil war based, largely, on sectarian divisions—not on regional differences. According to this vision, heritage transcends sectarian affiliations but not social classes. By obscuring the still volatile tensions between different religious identities, the conference participants, analogous to the museum organizers and other Beirut residents, configured "heritage" in a way that would help the process of recovering from war.

Participants in the debate over defining the postwar Lebanese heritage selected specific aspects of the country's contested past, and presented them as "the" Lebanese Heritage. While in a positive light, such selecting of elements is an attempt to create a collective past that could unite the once fighting factions, on the negative side, highlighting the elements that ostensibly unite people induces a collective amnesia, in which the various sectarian "traditions" and "heritage" (which had been centrally important during the war) were now silenced.

Which practices were remembered, which (deliberately) forgotten? The components of heritage highlighted by more powerful voices were mostly rural practices. These parts of the culture were shared by all religious and sectarian groups living in the same geographical region, which included Christians, Druze, and Muslims. Basil went on to support his geographic, non-sectarian scheme by stating that the Christians share the same popular heritage as the Druze, because both groups live in the Shouf Mountains, while the “tribal mentality” of the Shiites in the Hermil region is shared by the Maronite Christians in the Bshiri area. Why at this specific moment did regional heritage become more important than the ethno-religious affiliation?

These official voices expressed a growing concern for promoting a national collective heritage that could be shared by the divergent eighteen ethno-religious groups that constitute Lebanese society. But how does their vision of the past incorporate these ethnic and religions differences? Examining the proceedings of the Convention of the Lebanese Popular Culture, it is evident that, despite what Basil reported, the participants in fact reached no consensus on the definitions of these central terms, not “culture” (thaqafa), “popular culture” (thaqafa shabeya), “tradition”(taqlaid), “heritage” (turath) or “elite culture” (thaqafat al-anukhba). At the conference, the phrase elite culture is used to refer to the urban elite, the opposite of the rural lower classes, a distinction that raises contradictions, as I will explain below. Ironically, while the convention’s participants couldn’t agree on what heritage is, they all agreed that, whatever it is, it must be preserved. More emphatically, collecting the heritage, traditions and memories of the Lebanese people should be a national priority.

In the presentations at the convention, speakers (who were mostly city dwellers) invoked a shared past, and that past belonged to rural traditions. The rural people who were believed to practice these traditions were themselves absent from the convention. Officials and intellectuals called for collecting, preserving, restoring, and replicating proverbs, songs, fables, marriage traditions, and, interestingly, religious rituals. Heritage remains the concern of the state and the elite of the country, who want to safeguard selective aspects of the lifestyles of the ordinary people, more specifically the rural population. To preserve these cultural forms, these elites frame them as the public property of the nation and as an essential part of its unified past.

The desire to preserve Lebanon’s past is not—at the levels of government or business sectors— longing to return to the past (as it may be for some residents). Rather the past and the rural are valued as ingredients with which to shape the future Lebanon, and that future must be modern—that is, integrated into global systems. In tune with the neoliberal economic policies of Western nations, the route to “modernity” is seen as granting more power to the private sector, as evidenced in the Hard Rock Café and the international investment that controls the reconstruction of Beirut, as mentioned previously. In this scheme, the route to modernity also requires cleaning dirt, organizing disordered spaces, and getting rid of urban illegalities.

The issue that looms over all these strategies is the problem of the displaced population—those who were dislocated during and because of the civil war, who still lack permanent housing—a “problem” that is related to the debates about heritage and the city’s identity. Uprooted from their homes, these people adapted themselves to other spaces in the city, often homes abandoned by the more affluent Lebanese who were able to flee to safer regions. Similar to the debates over heritage and authenticity, the discourse surrounding the evacuation of the displaced is also widespread and controversial. The displaced are viewed as lacking urban culture and, worse, of disturbing the social order of the urban by making it grubby, dirty, and backward. The goal of finally placing the displaced has implications related to the city’s aesthetics and the goal of modernizing, both of which are inevitably bound with the theme of social and economic power, as it is the elite who will largely determine the fate of the displaced. They also shape the discourses through which the displaced, who are mainly of rural origin, are framed, which positions the internal refugees as the wrong opposing term in a set of binary oppositions. The displaced represent dirt, illegality, and poverty—the stark opposite to the modernity the development project aims for.

The responses to the large-scale social problem involve issues of geographic region as well as time: All the proposed solutions for solving the problem of displacement imply the return of the rural population to their prewar villages. Even those who criticize how the government treats the displaced agree that they should be removed from the Beirut area. There are no calls, for example, to incorporate the displaced into the new plans of the downtown area and into the urban fabric of Beirut. The displaced are accused of endangering the city by ruralizing it, especially because they lack the “culture of the city.” For example, in The Suspended City, Wadah Shararah, a Lebanese sociologist, describes the displaced population in Beirut as the “temporary residents” of the city who impose their “authentic rural culture” on the urban environment without integrating into the city’s “rational and social life.” He continues to accuse the rural displaced of hindering Beirut’s urban heritage by “ruralizing” it, and even violating it through the use of violence (Shararah 1985: 13–15).

Others criticized the state’s policy of giving the displaced cash compensations in order for them to evacuate the urban spaces they illegally occupied during the war. While agreeing that the displaced should leave these spaces, these critics believe the displaced should not be awarded cash compensations because they were not using them to build new homes in their villages of origin, but instead spending the compensation money in the city. Others accused the displaced of not caring about the country or its national economy.

 Conclusions

The displaced, and the discourses they engender as a social problem, highlight the contradictions of the national project of recovery. On the one hand, this rural population (in this context the displaced), is seen as an obstacle in healing the nation’s wounds; their presence in Beirut hinders its future modernity. On the other hand, official discourse sees the rural heritage as rooted in the countryside, the very place these displaced come from; and in order to accomplish modernity the rural heritage should be preserved, studied, and collected. So while the people who originally came from the country are dirty and incongruent, the rural, as the source of tradition, is seen as the pure, original and authentic strain of national culture. While the displaced must be removed, or erased, the regional culture that produced them must be protected and replicated, in order for Lebanon to move toward its goal to be, in the words of the reconstruction project motto, “An Ancient City for the Future.”

Defining Lebanon’s popular heritage and preserving its traditions by the urban elite is part of the country’s search for its postwar identity. On the surface, this process might be read to suggest that the actors involved are trying to depart from Western modernities, but in fact their strategies are a way of creating “alternative modernity” in an attempt to be part of the global world. Defining heritage and rewriting the past is always politically charged. Of the possible places, things, and moments in national history, which pieces of the past get preserved and counted as part of the heritage, and which ones are marginalized or erased, depends on who has the power to define heritage, the authentic, and national ambitions, in this case, modernity as embodied in global capitalism.

[68] Lebanon’s Prime Minister Rafiq Hariri was assassinated on February 14, 2004. His death resulted in a UN resolution that forced Syria to withdraw its forces from Lebanon.

[69] Terms such as heritage, authenticity, and modernity bear layers of meanings. In this chapter I will use such terms as they are used in the literature cited both here and by my interviewees, without elaborating the different meanings of each term.

[70] The following are examples of nostalgic publications that include memoirs with titles such as: Beirut in the Heart (Jarkas 1996), Oh for those Old Days Beirut (Rubayz 1986), Beirut Fragments (Makdisi 1990), Memory for Forgetfulness (Darwish 1995), Nadia, Captive of Hope: Memoir of an Arab Woman (Kabafani 1998), Our Beirut (Mukhtar Itani 1996), Beirut the Heritage (Al-Khatib 1993), and Beirut: Morning Beauty (Machnouk 1994). All these writings record the authors’ experiences about the past and thoughts on the heritage of Beirut. Novels include: Beirut Blues (Shaykh 1995), Beirut Nightmares (Samman 1997) Leaving Beirut: Women and the Wars Within (Ghoussoub 1998), City Gates (Khuri 1990), and The Stone of Laughter (Barakat 1995), and films such as West Beirut: Coming of Age in a Time of War, Between Us Two Beirut and The Civilized. In these, the authors shed light on social and political aspects of the war, which many condemned, criticizing those involved in it.

[71] As some examples: The Association for Memory and Development-AMED, which aims at preserving the built and natural heritage; The Association for the Safeguard of the Sites and Old Residences (APSAD), which seeks to raise awareness about environmental problems and to encourage the safeguard of the cultural and natural heritage of the country. After the war, APSAD added a new dimension to its mission, which is to safeguard old constructions. It promoted the annual Daraj el Fann exhibition in Gemayze, and produced postcards depicting Beirut's old houses. The Audi Foundation aims at rediscovering the heritage of the city, revalorizing tourism, organizing artistic and cultural activities (exhibitions, conferences, seminars, concerts) and the revival of traditional professions. The Cultural Dialogue Circle, works for the promotion of heritage and popular education. There was also the National Foundation for Heritage and the Beirut Heritage Association.

[72] Issues of heritage and authenticity and modernity have been debated among Arab scholars. For further information, see George Trabishi and Aziz Al-Azmeh.

 References

<biblio>

Al-Khatib. Nasimah. 1993. Beirut the Heritage (Beirut al-Turath) (in Arabic). Beirut: Sharikat Al-Matbouat.

Barakat, Hoda. 1995. The Stone of Laughter. Translated by Sophie Bennet. New York: Interlink Publishing Group.

Basil, Joseph. "The First Conference on Popular Heritage in Lebanon." Al-Fikr Al-Arabi, 3, 77 (1994): 99–145 (in Arabic).

Charif, Hassan. 1994. "Regional Development and Integration." In Peace for Lebanon: From War to Reconstruction, 151–162. Boulder, CO: Lynn Reinner.

Darwish, Mahmud. 1995. Memory for Forgetfulness: August, Beirut, 1982. Translated by Ibrahim Muhawi. Berkeley: University of California Press.

Director General of Antiquities of Lebanon. 1995. Urban Archaeology 94: Excavations of the Souk Area Beirut. Beirut: Ministry of Culture and Higher Education, Directorate General of Antiquities, American University of Beirut and Solidere.

Faour, Ali. 1991. Beirut, 1975–1990: Demographic, Social and Economic Transformations (in Arabic). Beirut: Geographic Institute.

Faour, Ali. 1993. The Geography of Population Displacement (in Arabic). Beirut: Dar Al-Mussasah Al-Jughrafiya.

Ghoussoub, Mai. 1998. Leaving Beirut: Women and the Wars Within. Beirut: Saqi Books.

Hirsch, Marianne, and Valerie Smith. “Feminism and Cultural Memory.” Signs 28, 1 (Autumn 2002): 1–19

Huyssen, Andreas. “Present Pasts: Media, Politics, Amnesia.” Public Culture 12, 1 (2000): 21–38.

Itani, Mukhtar, and Abdl Latif Fakhouri. 1996. Our Beirut (Beirutna) (in Arabic). Beirut: Dar Al-Anis.

Jarkas, Riyad. 1996. Beirut in the Heart (Beirut Fi al-Bal) (in Arabic). London: Dar Al-Rayyis.

Kabafani, Afaf. 1998. Nadia, Captive of Hope: Memoir of an Arab Woman. New York: M. E. Sharpe.

Khuri, Ilyas. 1990. The City Gates. Beirut: Dar Ibn Rushd li as-Tibaa wa al-Nashr.

Lowenthal, David. 1998. The Heritage Crusade and the Spoils of History. Cambridge, UK and New York: Cambridge University Press.

Machnouk, Mohamad. 1994. Beirut: Morning Beauty. Beirut: Masters Publication Communication.

Makdisi, Jean Said. 1990. Beirut Fragments: A War Memoir. New York: Persea.

Misk, Zeina. “Heritage Associations in Beirut.” Unpublished paper. American University of Beirut, 1997.

Percy, Charles. “United State’s Participation in the Economic Recovery of Lebanon.” Mediterranean Quarterly 6, 2 (Spring 1995): 1–16.

Rubayz, Kamal Jurji. 1996. Oh for Those Old Days Beirut (Rizq Alla Hadik al-Ayyam Ya Ras Beirut) (in Arabic). Beirut: Al-Matbouaat al-Musawrrah.

Samman, Ghada. 1997. Beirut Nightmares. London: Quartet Books.

Sharrarah, Waddah. 1985. The Suspended City. Beirut: Dar al-Matbouat al-Sharqeyah (in Arabic).

Shaykh, Hanan. 1995. Beirut Blues. New York: Anchor Books.

Solutions Group. 1997. Beirut in Motion. Beirut: IDAL publication.

Tabet, Jad. “Arab Architectural Heritage between Mirrors and Idols: Looking Within and Beyond the Tradition-Modernity Debate.” Aljadid: A Review and Record of Arab Culture and Arts 4, 25 & 26 (Summer and Fall 1998): 1–10.

Tahan. “Reading the Heritage: The Open Text and the Closed Text.” Al-Mustaqbal Al-Arabi 1, 85 (1993): 34–51 (in Arabic).

Trendle, Giles. “A ‘Civil War’ Over Rebuilding Beirut.” Middle East Journal 22 (1991): 19–29.

</biblio>

* Part IV: Reconstructing Identities/Peace-Building

 12. Regulating Peace or Institutionalizing Rage? The Identity Conundrums of Postwar Educational Policymaking in Mozambique

Antoinette Errante

<quote>

All politics is identity politics. Political activity is... animated by efforts to define and defend who I am, or we are, or you are, or hope to be, or hope to be seen to be. By extension, it is motivated by our imagination of what is or ought to be mine or ours or yours. It is not only about self-government. What structures it, often beneath the surface, is the unfinished enterprise of self-construction and self-presentation.

<right>

—(Parker 2005: 53)

</right>

</quote>

It is why politicians like to be photographed kissing babies and reading books to schoolchildren: child protection and formal schooling have become values so intrinsically linked with modern states, we can hardly think of the world community recognizing a state or the legitimacy of ruling elites that did not enthusiastically embrace them. This link between child protection and state legitimacy is precisely why modern warfare has made innocent civilians and social institutions the casualties of choice (Machel 1996). There is no better way to challenge a state's legitimacy than to render visible the vulnerability of its civilian population and destroy those institutions associated with societal well-being.

Among the many challenges faced by reconciling societies, therefore, are the identity conundrums that wartime leadership identities place on peacetime ones (Lyons 2004; Manning 2004; "Remaking Guebuza" 2006). In many recent world conflicts, a good combatant must be ruthless enough to maim, brutalize, rape women and children, and burn down schools and hospitals (Machel 1996). As enemies become democrats in post-conflict societies, this wartime identity no longer serves them. The very same leaders who a short while ago expressed their power by killing babies must now legitimize their power by kissing and educating them. This "identity repositioning" (Liu and Hilton 2005) tends to inspire a case of selective amnesia: former enemies tend to forget and erase from social representations their own past atrocities while vividly remembering and documenting the past atrocities of their former enemies.

In the rest of this chapter, I will explore how the identity repositioning of reconciling ruling elites leads to decision-making behaviors that can jeopardize the long-term prospects for peace. Specifically, I will examine how this identity conundrum has compromised the post-conflict educational policy context in the case of Mozambique, with devastating consequences for addressing the needs of those most likely to lapse a country into violence (political, criminal, and/or interpersonal): war-affected youth and child combatants (Ember and Ember 1994; Everatt and Jennings 1993; Everatt 1995; Gilligan 2001). Mozambique is an interesting case because it is considered a success story in the international literature (Manning 2004; McMullin 2004; Pitcher 2004). The country has not lapsed back into war and many lessons learned from other failed peace processes (Angola, in particular) informed demobilization efforts in Mozambique. These efforts focused peace processes almost exclusively on the regulation of violence (prevent a return to war by focusing on a postwar agenda that enables a selective group of Mozambican leaders to blot out wartime identities) rather than the positive regulation of peace (encourage and facilitate the transformation of violence-adaptive identities into peace-adaptive ones throughout society through broad-based socio-political transformation).

By not explicitly attending to the identity work of average Mozambicans, the postwar policy context did not address the dynamics of protracted conflict mostly likely to institutionalize rage. War and political violence are some of the many forms of violence that actually threaten the long-term consolidation of peace; other types of violence come in the form of structural violence, interpersonal violence, crime, substance and domestic abuse and internalized violence. Unfortunately, since conventional wisdom defines a country “postwar” five years after the cessation of political violence, the connections between these lingering violences and the war are often rendered invisible, as are the ways in which the rage over unresolved war traumas and structural inequalities begets other forms of violence (Gilligan 1991; Errante 1999; 2003).

Mozambique’s experience illustrates that finding a solution to the postwar policy context’s penchant for breeding this long-term rage is complicated because it is a byproduct of a fundamental challenge faced by reconciling societies: the identity work required to regulate violence leads to decision-making behaviors among ruling elites that can compromise the identity work required to foster decision-making behaviors that would make the positive regulation of peace a priority.

 All Politics is Identity Politics: The Dilemmas of Power, Identity, History, and Policy in War-to-Peace Transitions

Identity is a construct that expresses as well as gives expression to our sense of power, power being the sense of personal and collective intactness that we experience when we have “access to and control over valued symbolic and material goods” (Comaroff and Comaroff 1992). Whether we are conscious of it or not, our sense of accomplishment in giving expression to valued identities such “parent,” “leader,” “healer,” “man,” “woman,” “patriot,” “warrior,” or “statesman” is contingent upon our ability to access the symbolic and material resources that confer status and legitimacy to those roles. Our identities can be multiple, nested, and in flux because our sense of access to and control over the symbolic and material goods valued within any given context can vary across time and space (Comaroff and Comaroff 2001; Stein 1987).

Since these valued symbolic and material goods are context-specific, their meaning to the individuals and groups that value them does not always seem “rational” to outside observers.[72] It has led to a realization that theories and processes of negotiation and conflict resolution that are based upon “rational actors” are problematic because human actors, though reasoning creatures, are not necessarily “rational” (a term that is also increasingly understood as a Western cultural construct). There has been a subsequent call for a canon of negotiation and conflict resolution that takes culture, power, and identity into account (Avruch 2006; Honeyman and Schneider 2004; Hughes 2004).

The reason to take non-rational, non-linear dimensions of human decision-making into account when trying to understand negotiation and the positive regulation of peace is because we already know how culture, identity, and power affect conflict escalation and the positive regulation of violence (Honeyman and Schneider 2004). Our sense of what constitutes a conflict or an attack derives from situations where access to the symbolic and material resources we believe we should have control over is threatened; when we say we—as individuals or groups—feel threatened, what we are actually experiencing are threats to the intactness of our individual and collective identities (Avruch 2006; Mahjoub et al. 1989; Wolfe and Yang 1996).[73] In moments of insecurity, particularly when these are protracted, we tend to protect ourselves from the threat of annihilation by denying this threat—and we do this by re-making our identities with narratives that re-inscribe "us" with an idealized sense of purpose and thus power, and defining, diminishing, and de-humanizing "them"—those that we perceive are attempting to instill insecurity (Volkan 1985, 1988). We thus repair the physical and symbolic boundaries of self and community that have been penetrated or threatened with penetration by constructing high and impermeable walls between "us," our friends and allies, and "them," our enemies, and their friends and their allies. Groups adopt new or re-fashion old ideologies—political, ethnic, religious, racial, gendered—that sustain these new "stories of us" (for examples, see Errante 2003; Peteet 1994).

In this way "realistic group conflicts (at the functional level) survive through social representations that provide a symbolic resource for national identities" (Liu and Hilton 2005: 543). It is no wonder, therefore, that Liu and Hilton (2005) found in a cross-national analysis of historical representations that military events constituted the majority of defining moments in national histories: wars and conflicts are precisely when we tend to become preoccupied with defining the boundaries of identity and giving them heightened importance. Historical representations can thus be understood as a group narrative to respond to new challenges (Liu and Hilton 2005). This is not a question of history being subjective; even facts that may be indisputable may be given different meanings by different groups at different times depending upon the utility of those facts for positioning collective identities in the present (Ebenshade 1995; Evans 2003; Teski and Climo 1995).

In this sense, all policymaking involves implicit and/or explicit historical representations. Policies address problems and issues by defining the present and future in relation to the past; to the extent they align the past with a particularly desired present and future, they are implicitly histories of the regimes and biographies of the policymakers that shaped them (Teski and Climo 1995). Therefore, policy discourse, formation, and implementation are as much “identity narratives” as histories themselves (Hunt and Benford 1994; Gobodo-Madzikizela 1995). It is why, in the end, “all politics are identity politics,” whether they support policies that justify the need to continue fighting or policies that justify the consolidation of peace.

And this is precisely the rub of identity politics in transitions from protracted conflict to peace. Identity politics steer the collective course: in times of protracted conflict, policies implicitly and explicitly reproduce social representations (some imagined “us” versus some imagined “them”) that inscribe the situation of violence with power thereby making it recursive. Elites and communities attempting to reconcile will only relinquish violence with power if they can be assured access to and control over the identity resources (symbolic and material goods) they feel will allow them to claim peace with power (Ross 2000). Long-term reconciliation and the positive regulation of peace after protracted violence is thus akin to changing the course of an ocean current; at no time is this process of identity repositioning more polemical and contested than during regime change (Evans 2003).

Yet the existing literature and conventional wisdom on war-to-peace transitions have addressed this dilemma in a very limited way, focusing almost exclusively on the “reintegration” of former adult military combatants, since the research shows that non-demobilized forces, especially mid-level officers are more likely to turn to organized criminal activities if they are not offered the symbolic and material resources with which to craft high status peacetime identities (Addison 2003; McMullin 2004).

Although the demobilization of adult troops is an important component of postwar identity repositioning, this focus by the donor community has obscured as much as it has illuminated the importance of identity work in war-to-peace transitions. First, reintegration implies that some members left a society that remained intact during wartime and now need to be brought back into the fold; this overlooks the degree to which protracted violence insinuates itself—and becomes normalized—throughout societies in conflict (Addison 2004; Errante 1999). In reality, a demobilization-centered model of peace consolidation is simply transferring combatants from one organization where violence is normalized (the military) to another (society at-large). It facilitates “making old soldiers fade away” in that success becomes defined as the “absence of visible differences between demobilised and non-demobilised” (Dolan and Schafer 1997 in Alden 2002: 342) and that it does tend to avoid a return to war (McMullin 2004). However, such a model does not attend to the broader dimensions of war-to-peace identity work which has to do with assisting all members of reconciling societies to integrate/interact in fundamentally different ways than they did in wartime and even before the war, so that these patterns of social relations are not reproduced and do not threaten peaceful resolution of differences in the future.

Despite the growing recognition that political violence begets other forms of violence (Gilligan 2001), and the increasing calls over the last decade for “broad-based recovery” from conflict (Addison 2003), this approach continues to be the ideal rather than the reality (Barakat et al. 2005; McMullin 2004; Tobach 2004). There are many dynamics of the long-term positive regulation of peace that are obscured by the donor community’s focus on the demobilization of adult troops, but I will focus on two interrelated aspects.

First, the donor community’s emphasis on the demobilization of adult troops means that reconciling ruling elites can reposition their identities and establish their credibility as “reconciling” leaders as long as they attend to former adult combatants in some way. It holds reconciling accountable only for the regulation of violence (not returning to war) rather than the positive regulation of peace (broad-based societal recovery). This means that reconciling groups can gain international recognition without ever attending to the broader needs of their war-affected populations and they do so essentially with the blessing of the international community.

The Mozambican case suggests that ruling elites prefer this limited mandate because it facilitates their own postwar identity repositioning, by allowing them to move forward while forgetting their roles in creating war-affected populations in the first place. It tends to result in another glaring omission in postwar recovery plans: the needs of child combatants and other war-affected youth.

 Child Soldiers? What Child Soldiers? No Child Soldiers Here...

The situation and policy implications of children born and reared in violent societies are especially critical to understand if we are to encourage peace for the long haul (Errante 1999; Errante and Efraime 2006). These so-called “lost generations” are not actually “lost.” Instead, war-affected youth that do not succeed in forming social and economic networks in peacetime to substitute for their wartime networks are those most likely to “disturb the peace” (Gilligan 1996; Everatt and Jennings 1993). Protracted conflicts “school” children and youth in violence and its proliferation while compromising their access to formal education. Their transition to peace is often marked by high levels of illiteracy and conflict-based behaviors, skills, and identities that do not easily translate into valued (and employable) peacetime ones. When peacetime offers them no other means of survival, war-affected youth are also likely to turn to the sex or drug industry (McKay and Mazurana 2004; USIP 2001). This exposure along with their vulnerability as refugees, combatants, and victims of sexual violence makes war-affected children and youth particularly susceptible to HIV infection (USIP 2001). To the degree that education constitutes a symbolic and material resource through which wartime values and identities can be transformed into high-status peacetime ones, the responsiveness of the post-conflict educational policy context to the needs of war-affected youth is a critical aspect of sustainable peace and security (Errante 1999).

Unfortunately, it is an aspect of long-term peace consolidation that is often overlooked and this is precisely what occurred in Mozambique. Mozambique’s marginalization of war-affected youth in its post-conflict educational strategic plan was a stunning reversal because Mozambique became an international model of interministerial efforts to address the needs of war-affected children during the FRELIMO-RENAMO conflict (Errante 1999). But these programs were not carried through in peacetime. Of all the educational programs proposed in the government’s 1998 National Education Program, only two were cut from its final 2000–2005 Strategic Plan for the Education Sector. The two programs that were cut were those assisting war-affected teachers and children, and out-of-school youth, such as former child soldiers, the children with limited access to schooling during the fourteen-year conflict, and those who were largely no longer of school age (Errante 1999; Errante and Efraime 2006). Such programs, considered a priority in earlier drafts of the reform, were relegated to civil society in the final version of the plan.

Mozambican civil society has been recognized as effectively mobilizing itself for peace and reconciliation in the immediate post-conflict period. By 2000, however, the community leaders at the forefront of such efforts (e.g., traditional healers, religious leaders, elders, especially women) were themselves economically and emotionally strained (Errante 1999). Conventional wisdom, however, continued to be that the ever-resilient African family and community could continue to sustain and support its youth.

Those sectors of Mozambican civil society that pressed on working with war-affected communities also found their efforts increasingly stymied. Since most donors classify a country “postwar” after five years of peace, by 2000 most Mozambican NGOs did not qualify for much international assistance. None of the existing aid in any case would have reached most child soldiers because funds set aside by agencies such as USAID for child combatants are only extended to youth up to the age of eighteen. Many of Mozambique’s child combatants reached the age of eighteen within a few years of accords being signed. Child combatants under the age of sixteen were regarded by the United Nations as unassembled troops and thus were not eligible for the demobilization benefits that their adult counterparts received. Women and girls, who had provided service in the various armies as combatants and concubines were not demobilized at all (McKay and Mazurana 2004).

The bureaucratic challenges in the post-conflict policy context seemed to be the result rather than the cause of much more fundamental issues related to identity politics. In my own fieldwork on post-conflict educational policies carried out between 1996 and 2001, I found a “silent impasse” (Scheff 1994) in regard to the issue of war-affected children in general and child soldiers in particular. For diplomats, officers of international donor agencies, and education ministry officials with whom I spoke, the issue was so contentious and sensitive that most would only speak off the record. Policy development and implementation were paralyzed in some instances because pro-RENAMO or pro-FRELIMO foreign governments insisted that agencies working with war-affected children work only with and acknowledge that one side of the previous conflict—FRELIMO or RENAMO, respectively—actually used child soldiers. The FRELIMO-led government insisted that its troops had not used child combatants and that only RENAMO had engaged in such behavior. Officers of international organizations that I knew had been heavily involved in wartime efforts to secure the well-being of children denied that their agencies had been involved or denied that they had ever produced final reports of written documents of such efforts. Those extensive interministerial education proposals developed during the conflict—and which I had followed from 1989 to 1993—seemed to simply vanish in peacetime.

It seemed that neither FRELIMO nor RENAMO wanted to take responsibility for the fact that best estimates to date suggest 27 percent of the total number of soldiers used by RENAMO, FRELIMO, and local militias were under-age conscripts (around 25,498). Of these 16,553 had served under FRELIMO and 8,945 (about 40 percent) under RENAMO (ONUMOZ 1994). Though both RENAMO and FRELIMO were ultimately forced to acknowledge the existence of child soldiers (though their numbers continue to be disputed), “child soldiers have been, and continue to be used as political currency” (Interact Report 2004: 5).

Interact’s 2004 report on “Children in Armed Conflict” demonstrates some of the difficulties of trying to understand the experiences of youth combatants and their war-affected peers. The report indicates that in interviews, “former child soldiers did not appear to differentiate between their own situations and those of their families and communities. They share, with the rest of young Mozambican populations, serious concerns about education, employment and governance” (p. 5). Given that 80 percent of the schools were destroyed during the conflict and as many as 20 percent of the school-age population was estimated to have been severely traumatized, defining the success of “integration” based upon the fact that youth combatants are no different from their peers is extremely misleading because, as the report suggests, the impact of war and poverty is so generalized. It points to the difficulties in the ways in which “success” in reintegration programs is measured (Barakat et al. 2005). Moreover, the cultural and political context of combatant’s responses must be understood. Though there are regional variations and traditions, generally speaking, the traditional Mozambican approaches to healing that proved so powerful in addressing the psycho-social trauma of war in the years immediately following the peace accord (Efraime and Errante 2002; Honwana 1997) are based upon the notion that once someone undergoes rituals of reintegration and is accepted back into the community, it becomes taboo to discuss the war; this is a culturally sanctioned form of identity repositioning. It is not surprising, therefore, that former combatants would not link their present situation to their past. It is also not surprising, given the high value placed upon strong communal bonds, that these combatants would not differentiate themselves from their communities. Finally, in my own fieldwork with Mozambican psychologists who worked with child combatants (Boia Efraime and his colleagues at the NGO Rebuilding Hope, for instance), we noted that fear and distrust of the government was prevalent. These youthful combatants feel they have been betrayed many times over by the current political elites (Efraime and Errante 2002). They still remember when the president of Mozambique was either the chief of the army whom they served—only to be betrayed by him and dis-acknowledged at demobilization—or the chief of the army that looked at them through the barrel of a gun. They have no great incentive to speak critically about those in power.

This is particularly so given that the international community seems to remain silent on the issue of war-affected populations. The Interact Report (2004) highlights that international donors and humanitarian organizations are caught between a rock and a hard place because their work depends on good relations with ruling elites; this was also the reason that my informants in the international community would only speak off the record of their experiences with the government regarding policies designed to address the needs of war-affected populations (Errante 1999). But others with whom I spoke took a more calculated approach. One international consultant who had worked on the Education Sector Strategic Plan responded to my queries regarding why war-affected youth had been eliminated from the plan by observing that countries simply had to absorb a “lost generation” and that anyway most of these child combatants would probably be dead of AIDS before they could become a nuisance to society. Some, sadly, would and will succumb to AIDs and other diseases related to poverty and poor nutrition; however, such cost-benefit analyses neglected to figure into the equation that many of these young people—like child soldiers and war-affected youth in other post-conflict societies—would leave behind a whole new generation of AIDS orphans.

So why this baffling lack of attention to war-affected communities by reconciling ruling elites? And why does the international donor community seem complicit in this? I propose that this posture is largely the result of the identity repositioning work of reconciling elites during regime changes, in particular the legitimizing function of education and child protection, and the transnational pressure for postwar nations to assume a national persona that is “post-postwar.”

 Regime Change and the Legitimizing Function of Education and Child Welfare in Mozambique

As an “identity resource,” the provision of education and the protection of children is deeply embedded in legitimizing the state and its political elites (Ramirez and Boli 1987). This legitimacy is an important form of socio-political capital for new regimes generally and for post-conflict regimes in particular; it facilitates economic development, international prestige, and the good graces of a variety of domestic as well as transnational forces (Arnove 1995; Marshall 1985; Fägerlind and Saha 1989). It is no wonder that the postwar Mozambican government was eager to put its “stamp” on a new strategic plan for the education sector. As a policy document, the Education Sector Strategic Plan is very much an identity narrative, and in this regard the initiatives included as well as excluded are important to consider.

The general exclusion of war-affected children is part of the amnesia that postwar ruling elites develop around issues that suggest they might have at any point contributed to child maltreatment, since the point of education policies in new regimes is to legitimate the regime (Fägerlind and Saha 1989). In order to formulate policies regarding war-affected youth, reconciling elites must first be willing to acknowledge their existence and, with their former enemies-cum-political opposition, reach some agreement about (a) what happened, (b) to whom, (c) by whom, and (d) what is the preferable solution. All of this requires a use of the past that does not suit the social representations that reconciling elites wish to create in the present. That representation is one of a government that works positively to support educational opportunities and child welfare.

To understand how this has worked in Mozambique, we need only take a journey through Mozambique's iconography of education because it provides an interesting window on the country's political evolution. In the fall of 1964, as the reality of the anti-colonial insurrections in Angola and Mozambique began to sink in among Portugal's ruling elite, pictures spoke the thousand words that the Estado Novo's strict censorship would not allow to be spoken. For the first time, the journal of Portugal's Education Directorate, Escola Portuguesa (1934–1974), began to depict not only African children on its cover, but African school children looking up to Mozambique's governor-general, Manuel Maria Rodrigues-Sarmento, dressed in full military regalia. But the 1960s, being a time of "polemical representations" (Moscovici 1988) in the Portuguese "overseas provinces" (aka "colonies"), gave rise to counter-iconographies challenging Portuguese state legitimacy. Mozambique's anti-colonial forces, FRELIMO (Frente de Libertação de Moçambique), legitimized its armed struggle against the Portuguese state on the grounds that the movement would educate while liberating (Errante 1994, 1995). Escola Portuguesa (1934–1974) became a symbol every bit as important as the gun and both of FRELIMO's earliest leaders—Eduardo Mondlane and Samora Machel—appear in countless photos dressed in military garb and embracing schoolchildren. FRELIMO's journals, Mozambique Revolution (1963–1975) and Voz da revolução (1965–1988), hardly had a cover that did not feature children, soldiers, or both learning to read. After Mozambique's independence in 1975, President Samora Machel continued to appear with schoolchildren, rallying the country to "study and think of knowledge as an instrument of the people's liberation" (1977) because "education was everyone's job" (1978).

Eighteen years and a bloody civil war later, RENAMO (Resistência Nacional de Moçambique), FRELIMO's nemesis-cum-opposition party in a multiparty democracy, would feature on the cover of its journal, Moçambique: Novos Tempos (March 1993), its president Afonso Dhlakama, in military garb and surrounded by schoolchildren. The pose is almost identical to many of those of Samora Machel taken nearly thirty years earlier. Now that peace accords had been signed and RENAMO had made the transition to opposition party, it was anxious, as RENAMO Secretary Vincent Ululu exclaimed, to show that "we [RENAMO] are not beasts with horns and a tail" (personal interview 2001). FRELIMO leaders, meanwhile—still the majority party in the new democratic legislature—did all they could to undermine RENAMO's attempts at this identity—repositioning, insisting upon referring to RENAMO leaders and government representatives as "armed bandits."

To understand this war of images is to understand the last thirty years or so of Mozambique's history—the role of education in that history—and why this history remains such contested terrain. Under Portuguese colonial rule, educational opportunities for blacks remained limited throughout the colonial period (Errante 1995). As a result, only 2 percent of Mozambique's population was literate at the time of independence in 1975 (Isaacman and Isaacman 1983). FRELIMO consolidated its legitimacy as the agent of armed struggle against colonial rule by constructing a large portion of its identity on its educational agenda. Education's prominence continued throughout FRELIMO's post-independence socialist development agenda. National reconstruction efforts, including literacy campaigns and the expansion of schooling, as well as the euphoria to sustain them were soon disrupted by political instability, economic turmoil, and natural disasters. Mozambique's socialist sympathies made it vulnerable to Cold War politics. It was also surrounded by the white minority governments of Rhodesia and South Africa that retaliated for their fear of Mozambique's black socialist leadership by engaging in campaigns of state-sponsored terrorism. In its zeal to create a socialist national persona, FRELIMO also marginalized (sometimes through force) all cultural and political remnants of traditional African society, which it considered "obscurantist." By the early 1980s, when Rhodesia, and then South Africa launched and supported an insurgency force, RENAMO, its leadership as well as rank and file included many disgruntled former FRELIMO supporters.

RENAMO's initial purpose was to destabilize the Mozambican state (Isaacman 1987; Vines 1991), and it did so through a cult of violence and extreme brutality directed at civilian populations and state institutions such as schools and hospitals (Wilson 1992). This brutalized representation inspired fear in civilian militia and FRELIMO troops, and the destruction of schools and hospitals was a direct challenge to state authority. FRELIMO defended its identity as the party that had brought education to Mozambique by organizing—with the assistance of international donors—a broad interministerial effort to develop educational assistance to students and teachers that would take into account the traumatic and violent reality in which many of them were living. Mozambique's efforts were exemplary in a country where conflict killed 1.5 million people, including 600,000 children, displaced 5 million people, and decimated the country's infrastructure (Msabaha 1995).

The postwar education policy sector has thus been especially contested terrain because of its historic symbolic significance to the wartime representations of both parties. It becomes impossible for the parties to discuss education sector issues such as the construction of schools without FRELIMO recriminations and RENAMO counter-recriminations. FRELIMO reminds RENAMO that new schools would not be necessary had RENAMO not destroyed them; RENAMO counters that in any case FRELIMO only built schools in regions that paid ideological patronage to FRELIMO's socialist agenda. Discussions to support culturally responsive curriculum are an invitation for RENAMO to remind FRELIMO that it was they that had defended African traditions against FRELIMO's attempt to wipe them out. RENAMO wants to claim the education sector and child protection as "its" platform as a way of undoing its wartime brutalizing identities. FRELIMO leaders have resisted all RENAMO's efforts; education is too closely tied to FRELIMO's identity for them to share it or surrender it to RENAMO. And this is one area where the personal truly is political. FRELIMO's ruling elites have been with the party since the liberation movement; the historical representation of FRELIMO is deeply enmeshed with the meaning of their own biographies. The same can be said of RENAMO's leadership.

And so, the parties alternate between periods of silent impasses and shouting matches in an interminable quarrel. Unresolved anger and shame have paralyzed national conversations regarding postwar healing and reconstruction in general and the needs of child soldiers and war-affected children in particular.

Because the donor community has focused on discouraging a return to war, it has not taken into consideration that these silent impasses not only temporarily stymie policy formulation, but they also encourage the institutionalization of a festering rage among ruling elites that is as potentially explosive as that which is festering among marginalized Mozambicans throughout the country because of the postwar reconstruction policies (and lack thereof). This rage manifests itself in FRELIMO “old guard” leadership refusing to step aside or mentor up-and-coming young leaders within the party who might be more willing to work with their RENAMO counterparts on policies that were mutually agreeable; in the refusal of presidential winners (to date members of FRELIMO) to appoint RENAMO members to cabinet positions; and in the lack of bipartisan efforts, with RENAMO largely confining its position as opposition party to voting down any policy put forward by FRELIMO (Manning 2003).

 Amnesia and the Need to Be Post-Postwar: The Role of Globalization

The disincentive for the postwar ruling elites to remember war-affected populations is also influenced by the incentives fueling their perceptions of the type of postwar social representations that are most desirable. The Education Sector Strategic Plan is replete with language concerning “capacity-building,” economic growth, educational excellence, and the preparation of a capable workforce. This is language that directly relates to Mozambique’s desire to cultivate its reputation as a success story as a modern African state. In other words, the best postwar state is one that is post-postwar.

Postwar countries need to reconstruct their infrastructures and their economic base for the purpose of economic development and poverty reduction, both of which are considered critical to the consolidation of peace. But how does a postwar government such as Mozambique’s convince both foreign and national investors that the political and economic climate is stable enough to invest? Postwar governments are under economic and political pressures to construct a future-oriented national image in which war is a thing of the past. This also tends to suppress policy discussions and priorities that address the needs of war-affected populations.

Thus, the identity conundrum: the general postwar policy climate creates a tension between attending to the social and human dimensions of prolonged conflict in the postwar context and attending to national reconstruction. These tensions have to do with the transitional state of postwar societies and how to best manage this transition: to what degree do post-conflict societies “look back” at the context of war and to what degree do they assume a future orientation in which the consolidation of peace is already assumed? International and national postwar policy contexts tend to foster a bias for the latter; that is, a need and desire for postwar governments to act as if they were already “post-postwar.” This policy bias creates a tension between poverty reduction priorities (including educational and vocational programs) aimed at the psychosocial reintegration of war-affected populations and poverty reduction strategies aimed at long-term national reconstruction.

 Conclusion

This chapter has addressed the ways in which and the degrees to which wartime cultures and identities affect post-conflict political and economic decision making in regard to the socialization of war-affected youth that, in turn, have been shown to compromise prospects for long-term peace and security. Policies regarding the rearing and well-being of war-affected children can become especially contested terrain. In terms of postwar identity politics, the worldwide institutionalization of Western schooling since the nineteenth century, and its attendant ideology of state responsibility for the well-being of children and youth have served as potent legitimizing forces of national polities (Ramirez and Boli 1987); and post-conflict policies that require reconciling parties to acknowledge their part in wartime atrocities against women and children trouble both the triumphalist wartime histories that reconciling parties-cum-policymakers are reluctant to surrender (where only the enemy engaged in such practices) and any new identity narratives of political legitimacy that might help them to do so.

Wartime identities are based upon the need to be right because that righteousness is the only thing that makes insecurity, death, and martyrdom bearable. The consolidation of peace requires reconciling elites to surrender the need to be right; in the case of FRELIMO’s and RENAMO’s senior leadership, this has turned out to be a difficult capitulation. It is too painful, too personal, and each remains unforgiven in the eyes of the other. Neither FRELIMO nor RENAMO seem especially interested in returning to the bush because the donor community’s focus on regulating violence has provided sufficient incentives for them not to do so. Like all reconciling elites, FRELIMO and RENAMO want “peace with power;” they only surrendered their wartime identities once they perceived themselves to have access to and control over symbolic and material resources that they associate with postwar high-status identities. These resources were, in turn, linked to the political economy of postwar reconstruction, which tends to have transnational dimensions, and to be deeply enmeshed with global capitalism. The long-term benefits to reconciling elites for their entry into global capitalism remains to be seen. [74] In the short term, overt violence has ceased, but without the cessation of underlying hostilities; the search for military solutions has ceased, but parties have not been motivated to engage in a long-term political solution to broad-based societal recovery. Instead, the political economy of postwar reconstruction has fostered a desire to formulate political, social, and economic policies that act as if countries were “post-postwar.”

The post-conflict situation of many war-affected youth is thus a kind of socially sanctioned violence, and in order to understand the nature of these privileged forms of violence, we need to stop focusing on the transmission of violence, and rather attempt to understand who controls its production. For this reason it is critical to understand postwar national and transnational policy contexts.

Societies pay a huge price for hoping war-affected generations will simply “get lost.” It is not enough for postwar recovery programs to return societies to prewar conditions because for most countries this means a state dominated by high levels of structural inequality that will ultimately breed violence and rage all over again. Postwar recovery initiatives must aim higher and strive to ensure that reconciling societies become better than their former selves.

[73] A concrete example of this would be the symbolic meaning of marital infidelity in our perceptions of a political leader’s legitimacy and power. In the United States, there is a tendency to perceive marital infidelity (as occurred in the final years of the Clinton administration) as a sign of moral weakness and therefore tends to weaken public perceptions of a leader’s power, which is itself deeply embedded in American understanding of moral rectitude. The link between marital infidelity and political power is understood quite differently in Mozambique. Mozambicans believed Americans were not being at all rational in their “obsession” with President Clinton’s sex life. Instead, such sexual liaisons were interpreted as signs of Clinton’s virility and general state of health and therefore positively associated with his capacity as a leader.

[74] Eastern and Western perspectives on power and identity differ radically; while in the West, we argue over which symbolic and material resources are attached to our sense of power, Eastern traditions—understanding that material and symbolic goods can come to have “power over” us—prefer to argue that the road to power lies where individuals and societies transcend their attachment to symbols altogether.

[75] There is some anecdotal evidence that business opportunities and partnerships with foreign multinationals were attractive incentives to ruling elites early in the peace process but that in the last few years, many of these elites have lost their controlling interests as firms have expanded. The result is that many ruling elites have remained or are returning to political life because it is the only way to make money. This would also explain the reluctance of the “old guard” to relinquish to newer forces within FRELIMO and RENAMO.

 References

<biblio>

Addison, T. 2003. Africa’s Recovery from Conflict. Helsinki, Finland: UNU/WIDER (United Nations University/World Institute for Development Economic Research).

Alden, C. “Making Old Soldiers Fade Away: Lessons from the Reintegration of Demobilized Soldiers in Mozambique.” Security Dialogue 33, 3 (2002): 341–356.

Arnove, R. “Education as Contested Terrain in Nicaragua.” Comparative Education Review 39 (1995): 28–53.

Avruch, K. 2006. “Toward an Expanded ‘Canon’ of Negotiation Theory: Identity, Ideological and Values-Based Conflict and the Need for a New Heuristic.” Marquette Law Review 89, 3: 567–582.

Barakat, S., Chard, M., and Jones, R. “Attributing Value: Evaluating Success and Failure in Post-War Reconstruction.” Third World Quarterly 25, 4–5 (2005): 831–852.

Comaroff, J., and J. Comaroff. 1992. Ethnography and the Historical Imagination. Boulder, CO: Westview Press.

Comaroff, J., and J. Comaroff. “On Personhood: An Anthropological Perspective from Africa.” Social Identities 7, 2, (2001): 267–284.

Ebenshade, R. S. “Remembering to Forget: Memory, History, National Identity in Postwar East-Central Europe.” Representations 49 (Winter 1995): 72–96.

Efraime, B., and A. Errante. 2002. “Kindersoldaten und traumata—Der fall Mosambik.” In Kindheit in Armut weheit, edited by K. Holm and U. Schultz. Germany: Leske and Budrich.

Ember, M., and C. R. Ember. “Prescriptions for Peace: Policy Implications of Cross-Cultural Research on War and Interpersonal Violence.” Cross-Cultural Research 28 (November 1994): 343–350.

Errante, A. “The School, the Textbook and National Development: Colonial and Post-Revolutionary Primary Schooling in Portugal and Mozambique, 1926–1992.” Ph.D. diss., University of Minnesota, 1994.

Errante, A. “Growing Up Assimilating: Oral Histories of Colonial Missionary Schooling in Mozambique.” Paedagogica Historica (1995), Supplemental Volume on Colonial Education.

Errante, A. “Peace Work as Grief Work in Mozambique and South Africa: Post-Conflict Communities as Context for Child and Youth Socialization.” Peace and Conflict: Journal of Peace Psychology 5, 3 (1999): 261–279.

Errante, A. “Where in the World Do Children Learn ‘Bloody Revenge’?: Cults of Terror and Counter Terror and Their Implications for Child Socialisation.” Globalisation, Societies and Education 1, 2 (2003): 131–152.

Errante, A. And Efraime Junior, B. 2006. “Failure is an Orphan: Postconflict Peace Education and War-Affected Children in Mozambique.” In A.A. Sikainga and O. Alidou (eds.) PostConflict Reconstruction in Africa. Trenton, NJ: Africa World Press.

Escola Portuguesa: boletim do ensino primário oficial (October 11, 1934-October 1974). Lisbon: Direcção Geral do Ensino Primário por Portugal. Ministério de Educação Nacional.

Evans, R. J. “Redesigning the Past: History in Political Transitions.” Journal of Contemporary History 38, 1 (2003): 5–12.

Everatt, D., and R. Jennings. 1993. Growing up Tough: A National Survey of South African Youth (A report of fifteen focus groups designed and analyzed for the Out-of-School Children and Youth Initiative and the Department of Education), National Youth Development Conference.

Everatt, D. 1995. School Reject or Eject? Contextualizing Out-of-School Youth in the New South Africa. Paris: UNESCO.

Fägerlind, I., and L. Saha. 1989. Education and National Development. Oxford: Oxford University Press.

Gilligan, J. 2001. Preventing Violence. New York: Thames and Hudson.

Gobodo-Madzikizela, P. “Remembering and the Politics of Identity.” Psycho-analytic Psychotherapy in South Africa (Summer 1995): 57–62.

Honeyman, C., and A. K. Schneider. “Catching Up with the Major General: The Need for a ‘Canon of Negotiation.’” Marquette Law Review 87, 4 (2004): 637–648.

Honwana, A. M. “Healing for Peace: Traditional Healers and Post-War Reconstruction in Southern Mozambique.” Peace and Conflict: Journal of Peace Psychology 3 (1997): 293–305.

Hughes, S. “Understanding Conflict in a Postmodern World.” Marquette Law Review 87, 4 (2004): 681–690.

Hunt, S. A., and R. D. Benford. “Identity Talk in the Peace and Justice Movement.” Journal of Contemporary Ethnography 22 (January 1994): 488–517.

InterAct. “Communication from Children in Armed Conflict Project.” Institute for Security Studies, 8(April 2004) http://www.iss.co.za.

Isaacman, A. and Isaacman, B. 1983. Mozambique: From Colonialism to Revolution, 1900–1982. Boulder: Westview.

Isaacman, A. “Mozambique and Regional Conflict in Southern Africa.” Current History 86 (1987): 213–216.

Liu, J.H. and Hilton, D.J. “How the Past Weighs on the Present: Social Representations of History and Their Role in Identity Politics.” British Journal of Social Psychology 44 (2005): 537–556.

Lyons, T. “Post-Conflict Elections and the Process of Demilitarizing Politics: The Role of Electoral Administration.” Democratization 11, 3 (2004): 36–62.

Machel, S. 1977. Estudamos e façamos dos nossos conhecimentos um instrumento de libertação do povo. Maputo: DTI.

Machel, G.M. 1996. Impact of Armed Conflict on Children. New York: UNICEF

Mahjoub, A., J.-P. Leyens, V. Yzerbyt, and J.-P. Di Giacomo. “War Stress and Coping Modes: Representations of Self-Identity and Time Perspective among Palestinian Children.” International Journal of Mental Health 18 (1989): 44–62.

Manning, C. “Armed Opposition Groups into Political Parties: Comparing Bosnia, Kosovo, and Mozambique.” Studies in Comparative International Development 39, 1 (2004): 54–76.

Marshall, J. 1985. “Making Education Revolutionary.” In A Difficult Road: The Transition to Socialism in Mozambique, edited by J. Hanlon. Boulder, CO: Westview Press.

McKay, S., and D. Mazurana. 2004. Where Are the Girls? Girls in Fighting Forces in Northern Uganda, Sierra Leone and Mozambique: Their Lives During and After the War. Montreal: Rights and Democracy: International Centre for Human Rights and Democratic Development.

McMullin, J. “Reintegration of Combatants: Were the Right Lessons Learned in Mozambique?” International Peacekeeping 11, 4 (2004): 625–643.

Moscovici, S. “Notes Towards a Description of Social Representations.” European Journal of Social Psychology 18 (1988): 211–250.

Mozambique Revolution. Official Organ of FRELIMO (1 [December 1963]–61[June 1975]). Dar-es-Salaam: FRELIMO.

ONUMOZ. 1994. Final Report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Operation in Mozambique S/1994/1449, 23 December. Retrieved October 15, 2005 from http://daccessdds.un.org/doc/UNDOC/GEN/N94/515/76/PDF/N9451576.pdf?OpenElement.

Parker, R.D. “Five Theses on Identity Politics.” Harvard Journal of Law and Public Policy 29, 1 (2005): 53–59.

Peteet, J. “Male Gender and Rituals of Resistance in the Palestinian Intifada: A Cultural Politics of Violence.” American Ethnologist 21 (1994): 31–49.

Pitcher, A. “The “Basket Case” and the “Poster Child”: Explaining the End of Civil Conflicts in Liberia and Mozambique.” Third World Quarterly 25, 3 (2004): 501–519.

Ramirez, F. O., and J. Boli. “The Political Construction of Mass Schooling: European Origins and Worldwide Institutionalization.” Sociology of Education 60 (January 1987): 2–17.

“Remaking Guebuza.” Africa Confidential 47 (March 17, 2006): 6–7.

Ross, M. H. “Creating the Conditions for Peacemaking: Theories of Practice in Ethnic Conflict Resolution.” Ethnic and Racial Studies 23, 6 (2000): 1002–1034.

Scheff, T. 1994. Bloody Revenge: Emotions, Nationalism and War. Boulder, CO: Westview Press.

Stein, H. F. 1987. Developmental Time, Cultural Space: Studies in Psychogeography. Norman and London: University of Oklahoma Press.

Teski, M. C., and J. J. Climo (eds.). 1995. The Labyrinth of Memory: Ethnographic Journeys. Westport, CT: Bergin and Garvey.

Tobach, E. “Peace Rebuilding Need Social Justice.” Peace and Conflict 10, 3 (2004).

USIP (United States Institute of Peace). 2001. AIDS and Violent Conflict in Africa. Washington, DC: United States Institute of Peace.

Vines, A. 1991. RENAMO: From Terrorism to Democracy in Mozambique? York: Center for Southern African Studies, University of York.

Volkan, V. D. “The Need to Have Enemies and Allies: A Developmental Approach.” Political Psychology 6 (1985): 219–247.

Volkan, V. D. 1988. The Need to Have Enemies and Allies: From Clinical Practice to International Relationship. New York: James Aronson.

Voz da revolução. Boletim da Célula de Trabalho Ideológico (May 1965-December 1988). Dar-es-Salaam: FRELIMO.

Wilson, K. B. “Cults of Violence and Counter-Violence in Mozambique.” Journal of Southern African Studies 18 (September 1992): 527–581.

Wolfe, A. W., and H. Yang (eds.). 1996. Anthropological Contributions to Conflict Resolution. Athens: University of Georgia Press.

</biblio>

 13. Reconstituting Guerrillas as Veterans in Postwar Zimbabwe

Norma Kriger

Former guerrillas who fought in Zimbabwe’s liberation war have played a prominent role in postwar politics since independence in 1980. In 1997, veterans engaged in high-profile, and often violent, street protests. With the tacit support of their colleagues who commanded the police and the army, ex-guerrillas threatened to remove President Mugabe unless he met their demands for state recognition of their liberation war services. President Mugabe conceded a gratuity of Z$50,000 (the ex-guerrillas had demanded ten times more) and a monthly pension of Z$2,000 for each of an estimated total of 50,000 ex-combatants, free education and health services for ex-combatants and their dependents, funds for business projects, funeral expenses, and 20 percent of future land resettlement plots. By local standards, the monetary payments were generous—70 percent of the urban population at the time earned less than Z$2,000 per month, and some skilled workers earned Z$50,000 in a year (Kriger 2005: 261–262). The gratuities cost more than twice total government funding on land reform, a major government policy objective, since 1980 (Selby 2006: 246, 255).

Analysts often view the large unbudgeted government payments to veterans as an economic turning point from which the economy did not recover. Observers also point to the 1997 pay-off as a political turning point, with the start of a close alliance between veterans and the ruling party against urban workers who increasingly drew white business support. From 2000, in the context of parliamentary and then presidential elections, veterans were in the forefront of state-sponsored land invasions of primarily white-owned farms and state-orchestrated violence against all known and suspected supporters of the opposition party, the Movement for Democratic Change (MDC). Over the past six years, the economy has contracted by an estimated 40 percent. The inner circle of ZANU PF, among which ex-guerrillas grew increasingly well represented, continues to reap material benefits from corrupt deals and patronage politics while the vast majority live in growing economic misery and often fear. At least 4 million Zimbabweans—arguably 25 percent of the total population—have fled to live in neighboring countries, the United Kingdom, or elsewhere.

There is a strong link between the postwar power of guerrillas in Zimbabwe and guerrilla integration strategies. In Guerrilla Veterans in Post-War Zimbabwe: Symbolic and Violent Politics, 1980–1987 (Kriger 2003), I argued that the British-mediated peace settlement that formally ended the liberation war left the newly elected ruling party with the task of acquiring control of state institutions. Not yet disarmed and demobilized, the guerrillas were both an asset and a threat to the ruling party in 1980. Elements in Mugabe’s ZANLA forces had their own aspirations to rule as did ZIPRA guerrillas affiliated to the chief opposition party, ZAPU. To build power and legitimacy, Mugabe’s party turned to the guerrillas. In its demobilization and military integration programs, the ruling party gave the guerrillas preferential access to state employment, and further privilege by treating them as the equals of the relatively well-paid Rhodesian soldiers. These privileges the party justified by celebrating the guerrillas’ contributions to independence. The initial even-handed treatment of guerrillas belonging to the two mutually antagonistic liberation armies was short-lived. ZANU PF used its ZANLA forces in a violent take-over of the new army and police and in the mass atrocities against ZAPU supporters. ZANLA guerrillas manipulated the ruling party's legitimating rhetoric of recognition for war contributions and used violence to extract further state resources. The relationship between ZANLA guerrillas and the ruling party came to be characterized by a political dynamic of conflict, accommodation, and further conflict. With the absorption of the devastated ZAPU by ZANU PF in 1987, the guerrillas —now including ex-ZIPRA too—and the party continued to have a similar relationship. The book's appendix draws parallels between the guerrilla-party relationship from 1980 to 1987 and after 2000.

For societies that must confront the challenges of guerrilla integration, the Zimbabwe experience offers at least two cautionary lessons. First, to evaluate successful guerrilla integration, one must ask the questions of "success for whom?" and "success by whose criteria?" Studies of guerrilla integration rarely do this, instead the prescribe stability and democracy as desirable goals that would make everybody better off. The quest for power, material gain, and status by groups and regimes are viewed as obstacles to stability and democracy whereas they may well be the raison d'etre of regime and groups. Second, it is important to understand guerrilla integration in the broader context of other groups' integration in the state, the ruling party, and the wider society. The tragedy of Zimbabwe stems from the mutual dependence that the guerrillas (ZANLA before 1987, ZIPRA and ZANLA after 1987) and the party had on each other for legitimacy, power and its concomitant privileges, and from which neither could move away. The guerrillas and the ruling party mirrored each other in the difficulty or low interest each had in mobilizing mass-based support without relying on violence or repression and pay-offs.

This chapter examines legislative programs for ex-guerrillas rather than administrative programs, which the demobilization and integration programs were. While one can demonstrate similar dynamics across these administrative and legal programs even as the political and economic contexts shifted, my goal is limited to demonstrating that the major laws affecting guerrilla integration embraced the same political ideas and values as the administrative programs. The guerrillas were to be treated as the equals of regular soldiers, and hence enjoy privileged rights to state resources when compared with civilians who did not join the guerrilla forces. The official recognition of ex-guerrillas' war contributions as superior to the strictly political contributions of ex-political prisoners and detainees, underscored the hierarchical political ideas of the ruling elite and reinforced a higher value for armed struggle over exclusively political roles. These were not only the views of the lawmakers but clearly tapped into widely held guerrilla ideas and expectations. The laws also made clear that unswerving party loyalty was a requirement to enjoy state benefits. The political construction of guerrillas into veterans, as articulated in legislation, provides insight into an exclusive, hierarchical, and intolerant nationalism, packaged by its architects as "revolutionary nationalism."

The chapter has two parts: the first part examines the political construction of guerrillas as war veterans through law, and the second part focuses on how guerrillas resisted challenges in the legislative arena from former political detainees to share in the status and benefits of being war veterans.

 The Political Construction of Guerrillas as Veterans

In Zimbabwe, there have been three major legislative instruments directed toward the former guerrillas of the liberation war: the War Victims Compensation Act, 1980; the incorporation of guerrilla war service years for the purpose of calculating retirement pensions in 1989–90; and the War Veterans Act, 1992. There has been almost no scholarly work on these laws despite their prominence and that of the ex-guerrillas in postwar politics.[75] I focus on the political construction of guerrillas as veterans in these laws. In particular, I highlight how guerrillas were given privileged access to state resources over civilians, including those who had participated actively in the liberation struggle, the justification being their superior war contributions. Besides the hierarchy among liberation participants, I also draw attention to the importance of guerrilla loyalty to the liberation movement and to the party-state after the war as a prerequisite for receiving state largesse.

* War Victims Compensation Act, 1980

The War Victims Compensation Act of 1980 provided pensions and rehabilitation for the war disabled, widow's pensions, and dependents' allowances in much the same way as the Victims of Terrorism (Compensation) Act of 1973, which it repealed. The new legislation incorporated war-disabled guerrillas and the widows and dependents of guerrillas who had died as a result of the war, redefined "acts of terrorism" to legitimate the guerrilla war, and removed provision for compensation for war-related property losses and damages.

The War Victims Compensation Act was introduced to provide compensation for war-disabled guerrillas (Motion–Presidential Speech 1980: 846). Introducing the Bill to the House on September 30, 1980, Minister Kangai remarked that catering for ex-guerrillas had motivated the drafting of the Bill, even though it covered war-disabled civilians too. "In late April this year, Cabinet noted that no compensation was payable in respect of war-disabled guerrillas. In terms of the existing compensation legislation, it was subsequently resolved to rectify this anomaly, and the result is before the House today in the form of the War Victims Compensation Bill. The Bill is designed to bring together into one consistent and universally applicable framework, compensation for all war-disabled persons and persons killed during the war, regardless of their race, background or affiliation. While former members of the Rhodesian security forces and some civilians have been catered for in terms of existing legislation, the same cannot be said of those former members of the liberation forces or their civilian supporters who have been disabled or killed" (War Victims Compensation Bill, Second Reading 1980: 1087).

Given that the size of disability and death pensions depended not only on the degree of disablement but also on earnings at the time of death or injury, how would this apply to former guerrillas who were not earning a wage at the time of injury or death? For the purposes of assessing their earnings, the guerrillas would be treated as if they had been Rhodesian soldiers. The Act stipulates: "In assessing...the earnings of a person who at the time of his death or injury was performing unpaid combatant duties [my italics], the Commissioner [of War Victims Compensation] shall, for the purpose of calculating that person's potential earnings, have regard to the level of seniority [years of service] and rank of that person in his military or guerrilla service at the time of his death or injury" (War Victims Compensation Act 1980: section 27 [76]). After consulting with the relevant military authority to establish the guerrilla's rank and seniority within his particular force, the Commissioner would relate it to the national army rank pay scales (War Victims Compensation Bill, Second Reading 1980:1091). In the minister's words: "The basic assessed income of the lowest ranking guerrilla will, therefore, equate to the basic pay of a regular private soldier, and the disability pension assessed accordingly" (War Victims Compensation Bill, Second Reading 1980: 1091). It remained ambiguous whether the guerrillas would be treated like African or European soldiers (War Victims Compensation Bill, Second Reading 1980: 1096–1097).

Assessing the earnings of the unpaid guerrillas as if they had been Rhodesian soldiers privileged the ex-guerrillas over unemployed African civilians whose earnings were assessed at minimum wage, which was significantly lower. The legislation did not indicate whether the guerrillas' collaborators—the young boys and girls who worked with the guerrillas—should be treated as guerrillas or civilians. In practice, though, the guerrillas' collaborators were treated as if they had been the lowest ranking guerrillas, underscoring an official hierarchy of sacrifices.

The War Victims Compensation Act, unlike the Victims of Terrorism Act, did not provide for compensation for property that was lost or damaged as a result of the war. Whites argued that the retroactive elimination of property compensation violated the constitution's protection of property rights, and gave this as the reason for rejecting the Bill. Minister Kangai focused his remarks on the consequences for the African population of the government not paying compensation for war-related property losses. The reasons for eliminating property compensation, Minister Kangai said, were that so many people had suffered for Zimbabwe's independence—at least 75 percent of the population—and the government could not afford to compensate them (War Victims Compensation Bill, Second Reading 1980: 1092, 1104). He noted, too, the problems of verifying who had lost property as a result of the war (War Victims Compensation Bill, Second Reading 1980: 1092).[77] Many Africans had suffered property losses or damages as punishment for supporting the guerrillas, as participants in the parliamentary debate on the proposed Bill acknowledged. Especially African rural civilians had sustained significant property losses—money, cattle, chicken, goats, and other food supplies—which they were obliged to give for the guerrillas' upkeep and which were not mentioned in the debate. The elimination of property compensation underscores the extent to which the ruling party privileged the generally property-less guerrillas over African civilians who had suffered war-related property losses.

The concerns of two black parliamentarians, men who had stayed in the country during the war, highlight how official efforts to recognize war sacrifices raised tough distributive issues even among those who had supported the guerrilla war. MP Mr. Kona was especially concerned about the adverse psychological impact of the government's exclusion of compensation on the many blacks who lost property as a result of the war, and in particular those who lost property for helping the freedom-fighters and who therefore could not get compensation under the previous regime (War Victims Compensation Bill, Second Reading 1980: 1101–1103). MP Mr. Moyo (ZAPU, Matabeleland North) asked if the minister was aware that some of the properties that had been lost had been bought on credit, which had to be repaid. Those who had been dependent on cattle that were destroyed in the war would not be able to repay their debts unless the government assisted them (War Victims Compensation Bill, Second Reading 1980: 1099–1100). To these parliamentarians, Minister Kangai said:

<quote>

surely there were a number of business people in the rural areas and there were a number of people who owned, say, farms, who were driven away from the farms who lost property; people whose cattle were driven away...that is indeed the price we had to pay for the independence of Zimbabwe.

If we are going to line up everybody and say: "Look, you are going to get a share of the independence of Zimbabwe," I am sure our Treasury will be bankrupt in no time.... The Government appreciates the role which all our people played in the liberation struggle and that at the moment they have been impoverished by the war. They need to be assisted and assistance is going on.... Therefore, I do not think there is any question that our people would think we have forgotten about their contribution.... We are fully conscious of the losses which people have incurred but the question right now is the reconstruction of our country: that is the important issue before us.”

<right>

(War Victims Compensation Bill, Second Reading 1980: 1107–1108)

</right>

</quote>

The War Victims Compensation Act termed the armed conflict a war rather than “acts of terrorism,” as in its predecessor, the Victim of Terrorism (Compensation) Act. In the Act, “the war” “means the armed conflict which occurred in Zimbabwe and in neighbouring countries between the 23rd December, 1972, and the 29th February, 1980, in connexion with the bringing about of, or resistance to, political and social change in Zimbabwe.” The neighboring countries referred to Zambia, Mozambique, Tanzania, Botswana, and Angola—countries that had hosted the liberation forces and refugees and had borne the brunt of Rhodesian attacks. Terming the conflict a war about social and political change recognized its legitimacy and removed the stigma of it being branded “acts of terrorism,” but the war dates were legal fictions, as guerrilla wars typically have ambiguous starting and ending dates.

* Recognizing Liberation War Service: 1989–1990

The government came under pressure from ex-guerrillas in the uniformed services to recognize their war services in the same way as the state had done for the Rhodesians in the uniformed services. How could the government count towards years of pensionable service the war duty of those who ostensibly had lost the war and who had opposed independence while not providing at least the same benefit to those who had won independence for their war services? Ex-guerrillas in the public services were soon to argue for and win recognition for their war service years in the calculation of their pensionable years on the basis of equality with exguerrillas in the uniformed services and their non-guerrilla colleagues in the public sector.

Gazetted on March 17, 1989, an amendment to the pensions regulations for the uniformed services—the police, army, air force, and prison service—incorporated ex-guerrillas' years of war service in the definition of pensionable service (Statutory Instrument 53A 1989). Also included in the definition of pensionable service for ex-guerrillas was the period after April 18, 1980, the date of independence, in which ex-guerrillas had been stationed in assembly places awaiting appointment to a uniformed force or had been attending a course of training under the auspices of the government before their appointment to the uniformed forces (Statutory Instrument 53A 1989).

Given the absence of guerrilla records, age was used as a proxy for ex-combatants' period of active participation in the liberation struggle. The regulations provided for five years of war service for those less than thirty-one years old in March 1989, six years for those thirty-one years or more but less than thirty-two years old, seven years for those thirty-two to thirty-three years old, eight years for those thirty-three to thirty-four years old, and so on, until the forty-year-olds and over who were granted fifteen years of war service (Statutory Instrument 53A 1989). This assumes that all guerrillas joined the liberation armies when they were fifteen years old, which was obviously not true. Moreover, most guerrillas joined the war effort in the latter part of the war (Cilliers 1984: 28, 43, 87, 239). The age profile of guerrillas based on a sample in assembly points in early 1980 shows that thirty-five percent of the guerrillas were twenty-five years or older, and were granted ten years' service, thus assuming that they joined the forces in 1970. Fifty percent of the guerrillas were between nineteen and twenty-four years of age, and were assumed to have been in the liberation forces for four to nine years, or to have joined between 1971 and 1976 (Motion—Presidential Speech 1980: 846). It is clear that the government wanted to calculate the guerrillas' years of service generously so as to mute any potential contention and to recognize guerrillas' war contributions.

The meaning of "ex-combatant" in the statutory instrument, which applied only to those who had been in the guerrilla forces, implied that April 18, 1980, was the end of the war. An “ex-combatant” was defined to mean “a member who participated actively in the liberation struggle as a combatant before the 18th April, 1980, otherwise than as a member of a uniformed force of the then Government of Rhodesia, but does not include a member who joins a uniformed force after the fixed date [the commencement date of the amendment]...” (Statutory Instrument 53A 1989). This implied end-of-war date is at odds with the explicit terminal point of the war—February 29, 1980—in the War Victims Compensation Act and underscores the fiction of imposing an end of war date on a guerrilla war. The divergence in the dates for the end of the war also highlights how ad hoc the fictions are, often driven by the contingencies of the particular law.

The exclusion of certain categories of ex-combatants from the right to count their war years towards pensionable service underscored the value the new government attached to loyalty to the liberation movement during the war and to the ruling party after the war. Those who deserted and those who were demobilized from the uniformed services were explicitly excluded (Statutory Instrument 53A 1989). Deserters would have included mostly ZIPRA ex-combatants, who, in the 1980s, were often victims of human rights violations or whose command authority was ignored for political reasons. Also, perhaps a disproportionate number of ZIPRA ex-combatants demobilized because of these unfavorable conditions in the army. Ex-combatants who served in the struggle but who joined a uniformed force of the government before Independence Day were also excluded (Statutory Instrument 53A 1989). This provision was intended to exclude liberation war guerrillas who had taken advantage of the former regime’s amnesties in 1978 and 1979. Ex-combatants who retired or resigned before age fifty without appropriate consent—from the president in the case of an officer, and from the commanding officer in the case of any member other than an officer—were denied the benefit (Statutory Instrument 53A 1989).

Another excluded category were the ex-guerrillas who were not in the uniformed services. Later, in 1989, the government introduced a statutory instrument to provide the identical right to count war service towards pensionable years for ex-guerrillas in the public service and then in 1990 extended the same right to ex-guerrillas who were officers in Parliament (Officers of Parliament [Pensions] Amendment Rules 1990). However, reflecting Rhodesian law, those in the uniformed services could retire at fifty without formal permission whereas those in the public service and in Parliament had to work until they were fifty-five years old. The incorporation of ex-guerrillas into state contributory retirement pension schemes created a new inequity between state-employed ex-guerrillas and their counterparts who were employed in the private sector, self-employed, or unemployed. The inequity was never eliminated. Instead, ex-guerrillas exerted enormous pressures on the ruling party and in August 1997 President Mugabe agreed to pay all ex-combatants a monthly life pension of Z$2,000 and a gratuity of Z$50,000. The scheme was legalized through the introduction of a statutory instrument in terms of the War Veterans Act, and included other benefits for war veterans and their dependents (Statutory Instrument 281 1997).

* War Veterans Act, 1992

The War Veterans Act was the product of intense pressure on the ruling party from the War Veterans Association.[78] The War Veterans Act was an enabling law that provided for the creation of government schemes to assist war veterans. The Minister of Labour, Manpower Planning and Social Welfare (or any other minister to whom the president assigned the administration of the Act) “may, by statutory instrument, establish one or more schemes for the provision of benefits or assistance to or in respect of any war veterans and their dependants or any classes of war veterans and their dependants, and may in like manner amend or abolish any such scheme” (War Veterans Act 1992: section 7 [79]).

The War Veterans Act interpreted “war veteran” to mean “any person who underwent military training and participated, consistently and persistently, in the liberation struggle which occurred in Zimbabwe and in neighbouring countries between the 1st January, 1962, and the 29th February, 1980, in connection with the bringing about of Zimbabwe’s independence on the 18th April, 1980” (War Veterans Act 1992: section 2). These liberation struggle dates were consistent with the dates of the armed conflict in the amended War Victims Compensation Act.[80] The definition of “war veterans” excluded deserters and those who were captured by the Rhodesians and then fought for them, emphasizing the importance of unswerving loyalty to the liberation movements.

Negotiations between senior ruling party members and the War Veterans Association leaders over a draft bill and the parliamentary debate on the bill itself exposed their radically different perspectives on the party's record of recognizing veterans' sacrifices. Introducing the Bill, the deputy minister rejected the media's depiction of government's attitude to ex-combatants as "ungrateful, uncaring and insensitive" and outlined the preferential measures government had taken "to alleviate the situation of ex-combatants and to integrate them into the society at large" (War Veterans Administration Bill, Second Reading, March 31, 1992: 4995). During the debate, war veterans—who constituted about one-third of the 150 members of parliament, of whom only three did not belong to ZANU PF (War Veterans Administration Bill, Second Reading, March 31, 1992: 5163)—and their supporters spoke of veterans having been victimized and discriminated against, not only by their former enemies but also within ZANU PF and the wider society.[81] These different perceptions about official recognition for veterans' sacrifices in the past shaped the conflicting views of the ruling party leaders as opposed to veterans and their supporters in parliament.

Despite their different viewpoints on how to recognize veterans, the ruling elite and veterans and their supporters shared a strong sentiment that the state had a special obligation to war veterans because of their sacrifices for liberation. In a memo to the Cabinet Committee, Minister John Nkomo portrayed the proposed Bill as having "generous and preferential provisions" for war veterans (War Veterans Administration Bill, Memorandum). Government favored welfare type schemes. The government's priority was the estimated 15,000 unemployed ex-combatants (War Veterans Administration Bill, Second Reading, March 31, 1992: 5000). The Bill provided for the introduction of welfare assistance for such veterans and their families. In his memo to the Cabinet Committee, Minister Nkomo said of the level of public welfare for which they were eligible: "It is contended that the level of such assistance is not always adequate and falls far below the poverty datum line. In view of the heroic participation of war veterans in the war of liberation it is contended that the level of welfare assistance granted to them, should be higher than that given in all other cases. For this reason welfare assistance to war veterans should come from separate fund [sic] which will adhere to the principle of preferential treatment of war veterans" (War Veterans Administration Bill, Memorandum). The government also seemed to favor the payment of pensions for unemployed war veterans when they reached the retirement age of fifty-five years (War Veterans Administration Bill, Memorandum; War Veterans Administration Bill, Second Reading, April 7, 1992: 5222).

Veterans and their supporters wanted the legislation to provide them with concrete rights to recognize their war contributions rather than have their rights be dependent on the minister's discretion to introduce statutory instruments.[82] Veterans wanted access to the wealth of the country, and especially land.[83] Hence they had called their draft Bill the War Veterans Investment and Administration Bill 1992 and wanted their schemes to be under the Minister of Finance, Economic Planning and Development, rather than the welfare ministry (War Veterans Investment and Administration Bill 1992). Their draft Bill's goal was "to transform liberation war veterans into active participants in the struggle for economic independence and development in practical and purposeful recognition of the frontline role and sacrifice they paid for the liberation of Zimbabwe" (War Veterans Investment and Administration Bill 1992). Veterans and their supporters in parliament persisted with these ideas during the debate on the War Veterans Administration Bill. Mr. Simon Moyo said: "We can no longer allow war veterans to continue for a day longer as hewers of wood and drawers of water in the land they liberated. War veterans must not be treated as objects of pity for they were our own political liberation peddlers yesterday, they should indeed be our own economic liberation peddlers today.... They need economic power...to deliver the country from... poverty..." (War Veterans Administration Bill, Second Reading, April 2, 1992: 5156). Supporting the allegedly belated Bill, Mr. Kudzedzereka said: "I know that people who joined the struggle did not do so to be rewarded. But would you be happy that some people who have not been in the struggle are enjoying the fruits of the country, because they have got money to buy a farm, money to buy a store or whatever they can choose yet there were people who did everything, those who have given us the freedom we have today are not enjoying that? They have got a right, it is not a reward, but it is a right we have got to give to our freedom fighters, the people who were in the bush to liberate this country" (War Veterans Administration Bill, Second Reading, April 2, 1992: 5202). Mr. Nzarayebani, himself an ex-fighter, said: "It was unfortunate for us that when our gallant fighters came home from the war in 1980 we did very little, except demobilising them from the army...these fighters are not asking for alms.... What the fighters want is to be part and parcel of the economic development of the land and they want the necessary resources to develop themselves and to become part and parcel of the economic welfare of the country. They do not want to be marginalised. They also want to own the basic means of production and the best means of production is the land" (War Veterans Administration Bill, Second Reading, April 2, 1992: 5134). As he and many others asserted, had it not been for the fighters, they would not be enjoying the political and economic fruits of independence.[84]

Many parliamentarians objected to the narrow definition of war veterans that excluded those who had contributed to the war other than through undergoing military training. Some parliamentarians favored subsequent legislation for non-fighters who had contributed to the struggle. Mr. Moyo indicated that it was his "sincere hope that the Bill to cater for political detainees and political prisoners will be brought to this House in the near future" (War Veterans Administration Bill, Second Reading, April 2, 1992: 5155–5156). Mr. Munyoro said that "the mothers and fathers who helped, sheltered and gave food to the war veterans must be recognised and be thanked for the work they did. I want to say, I hope the Ministry as it has said will look again and expand the net of recognition of helping the people who did something for the survival of this country" (War Veterans Administration Bill, Second Reading, April 2, 1992: 5175–5176). Mr. Sibanda lamented that the Bill had "forgotten about the refugees. Most of the refugees left this country because they wanted to join the war but some of them did not succeed to be taken. But when they came back they found all their homes destroyed.... So I thought perhaps they were going to [be] covered by this Bill. But nevertheless, I am looking forward that the next Bill must also cover the refugees..." (War Veterans Administration Bill, Second Reading, April 2, 1992: 5181). Mr. Shambambeva-Nyandoro emphasized that people fought in different ways, but felt the fighters should get priority government attention, as in the Bill, and that subsequent legislation could incorporate other groups. "If we want to do justice, we should look closely and think about the mujibas and those who were in detention who have not been compensated. If we observe closely, those who were at the front with guns should also be put at the front... this is the truth. These people are different. The mujiba is also different because he was practically in the war, but if we want to do justice we should not put them on par.... Many different people fought in the war, even those who were cooking for the ex-fighters, but we should see that they are included. This Bill cannot start by considering everyone" (War Veterans Administration Bill, Second Reading, April 2, 1992: 5209–5210).

Other members of parliament wanted immediate equal treatment for all who had sacrificed for the war. Chief Mangwende opposed the Bill's selective focus on the fighters: "As far as I am concerned, I am not looking at each and every individual who went to fight the war, because the war does not start with the gun only. It starts with planning to fight the war. In this fighting, there are some who are supposed to be carrying supplies and some who are supposed to do medical duties. All these people are part and parcel of the war, even though there are some who did not carry guns. Whatever they were doing was equivalent to carrying a gun. When you are looking at the people who were holding the guns only, what about those who were planning the war before the guns were there? Do you not see that those people are as good as those who were holding guns?... So how are you going to incorporate these people? Are they not the same as the people who were holding the guns?... When I look closely and see that we have selected people who were holding guns, I see that this is improper." He went on to ask whether the Bill would only look at ex-fighters who were still alive and not recognize those who had died or disappeared (War Veterans Administration Bill, Second Reading, April 2, 1992: 5203–5204). Mr. Masiane had problems with the limited definition of war veterans too. "I would like the Bill to include those people whose parents assisted in the struggle, either in cooking for the war veterans or by doing anything else. In the event of doing that, they met death through the enemy. They were shot or killed while helping out ex-combatants. I would like to see their families get help because they fought in a war and to me they are veterans. When a man fights, we do not only consider the man holding the gun, but we also consider even the man who uses a stick. If he kills the enemy that is a war veteran.... I also wish this Bill to included [sic] those who were either imprisoned or hanged when they were prosecuting the struggle. I believe they are also veterans.... This Bill should cover all" (War Veterans Administration Bill, Second Reading, April 2, 1992: 5207–5208).

Deputy Minister of Labour, Manpower Planning and Social Welfare, Mrs. Florence Chitauro, was impatient with the parliamentary discussions about who was a veteran because the ruling party's caucus had previously accepted the Bill's definition. "Members have surfaced again the issue of who is a war veteran. I think all those who attended Caucus here, that issue of who is a war veterans came up there. The definition was given. Members were not satisfied and we took that issue back to the Politburo and back to the Central Committee.... There are only three members who are opposition members and they could not attend the Caucus. So I can forgive them. The definition of a war veteran is, as stated in this Bill and that is what is agreed at the Central Committee and it was also agreed that the issue of the detainees, and issue of any other group will be dealt with at a later stage. So we are now focusing on the war veterans as stated in this Bill and at the moment, it is unnegotiable…" (War Veterans Administration Bill, Second Reading, April 2, 1992: 5220).

 The Political Construction of Veterans as Guerrillas

The exclusion of political detainees and political prisoners, themselves then well represented in parliament, led them to engage in a protracted struggle for their inclusion in the definition of "war veterans." Guerrillas resisted the incorporation of former political detainees in the definition of war veterans. Each group justified its claims on the grounds of its superior contributions to the struggle. After a fourteen-year legislative struggle, former political prisoners were accorded state recognition and benefits in 2004, but they were denied the status of war veterans and their benefits were substantially lower than those won by guerrillas in 1997. The guerrillas remained top dogs for their role in the "people's war." This section follows the legislative efforts to settle the status of former political detainees.

* Political Detainees Bill, 1996

Angry with the ruling party's inaction, MP Aeneas Chigwedere, a ruling party backbencher who had spent the war years as a civil servant in the Rhodesian Department of Education, notified the House on February 15, 1996, of his intention to obtain permission to introduce an amendment to the War Veterans Act to incorporate political detainees as war veterans. He subsequently withdrew the amendment bill because "it sadly came to my attention that some war veterans did not want to be bracketed together with the political detainees" (Political Detainees Bill, Motion, July 24, 1996: 362).

Chigwedere then sought to win rights for political detainees in a separate law. On July 24 1996 he introduced a parliamentary motion “that leave be granted to introduce a Bill to accord legal status and recognition to political detainees of various categories that were detained, restricted, or imprisoned for political activism in Zimbabwe between 1959 and 1980” (Political Detainees Bill, Motion, July 24, 1996: 360). For Chigwedere, 1959 was a critically important date. It was the year the first mass political party, the ANC, was banned and the Preventive Detention Act was passed to arrest and detain political activists. Without the politicians, he said, there would have been no war. Political detainees, he claimed, “were the political tutors of the African masses; they recruited the youths and organised them to go for military training; they made the decision to fight and negotiated with countries like Ghana, Egypt, Algeria, and China for the training of our liberation cadres. In short, the war veterans were the instruments of the political machinery and never vice versa…. Admittedly, without the fighting cadres, we would not have won the war…. Accordingly, it can not be just and fair to honour the war veterans without honouring the political detainee” (Political Detainees Bill, Motion, July 24, 1996: 365–366) and vice versa. Hence the need to extend legal recognition to political detainees, as had been done for war veterans. Seconding Chigwedere’s motion, MP Mr. Norman Zikhali, an ex-detainee, referred to political detainees as fighters. “All we are asking for is that this category of ex-fighters who are generally known as ex-detainees be also catered for by the State” (Political Detainees Bill, Motion, July 24, 1996: 368). Ruling party and government leaders made public promises to amend the War Veterans act to include ex-political detainees but took no legislative initiative (Political Detainees Bill, Motion, July 24, 1996: 381).[85]

On February 18, 1997, Mr. Chigwedere presented the Political Detainees Bill to parliament. It sought to make state assistance for political detainees and their dependents a legal right, subject to various conditions. In contrast, the War Veterans Act was merely enabling legislation, dependent on a minister introducing a statutory instrument for a particular type of scheme. The Bill defined “political detainee” to mean “any person detained, restricted or imprisoned in Zimbabwe for more than one year, for political activity in connection with the bringing about of political and social change in Zimbabwe between the 1st January, 1959 and 30th April, 1980 and is registered with the Board in terms of this Act” (Political Detainees Bill, section 2, 1996). Without support from senior ruling party members, this Bill was destined to die.

* War Veterans Amendment Bill, 1997

Minister of Public Service, Labour and Social Welfare Mrs. Florence Chitauro finally introduced the War Veterans Amendment Bill in 1997 when the war veterans had already won pensions and other state benefits. The Bill brought political detainees into the definition of war veteran. A “political detainee” was “any person who, before the 18th April 1980—(i) was served with an order for his detention or restriction in terms of any enactment then in force; or (ii) was convicted of an offence under any law then in force; as a result of his political activity in connection with the bringing about of Zimbabwe’s independence on the 18th April 1980, and who was detained, restricted or imprisoned in consequence of such order or conviction for a period of more than two years or for periods which, in the aggregate, amounted to more than two years” (War Veterans Amendment Bill 1997: section 2 [b]). Political detainees might begin to benefit from some of the schemes for ex-combatants, especially access to free health care, but not from pensions and gratuities (War Veterans Amendment Bill, Second Reading, November 25, 1997: 2536, 2564). Members of parliament objected to the lack of equity between ex-combatants who already had pensions and gratuities and detainees who would not enjoy such benefits. Also, perhaps because the Minister had referred to ex-combatants having at least six months’ military training (War Veterans Amendment Bill, Second Reading, November 25, 1997: 2536) many parliamentarians wanted the cut-off date for ex-detainees to be dropped from two years to at least six months. Chigwedere objected that “there is no intention of doing justice to the ex-prisoners, detainees and restrictees. In other words, the idea that they are a second class to the war veterans still persists in the mind of the Minister and possibly the others behind her” (War Veterans Amendment Bill, Second Reading, November 25, 1997: 2540). According to him, even 3 months in detention entailed more suffering than six months’ military training: “the first 90 days were, to say the least, excruciating, devastating—many perished. Those who went to Mozambique, Botswana and Zambia, for as long as they were in camps, and most of them were in the camps, they were safe for the first six months if not for the whole year until they were sent out or bombed over there. They were safer than the detainees, restrictees who were here” (War Veterans Amendment Bill, Second Reading, November 25, 1997: 2540–2541). The parliamentarians were also offended that the ruling party had ignored their prior rejection of a two-year cut-off in the party’s parliamentary caucus (War Veterans Amendment Bill, Second Reading, November 25, 1997: 2542).[86] Most unusually, Parliament rejected the Bill (War Veterans Amendment Bill, Second Reading, November 27, 1997: 2623). Perhaps rejection of the Bill had as much to do with a groundswell of resentment among backbenchers in the ruling party as how their leaders had disregarded caucus agreements.[87]

* War Veterans Amendment Bill, 1999

A War Veterans Amendment Bill introduced in 1999 offered a more generous definition of “political detainees” to be included as war veterans; it included those who spent more than one year in detention, restriction, or imprisonment in pre-independence Zimbabwe for political reasons, but still denied them the gratuities and benefits that other “war veterans” received (War Veterans Amendment Bill 1998, sections 2&3). Some again objected to the Bill’s unequal treatment of political detainees and those who received military training (War Veterans Amendment Bill, Second Reading, February 18, 1999: 4049, 4053–4054). Aeneas Chigwedere welcomed the relaxed definition of eligible detainees but objected:

<quote>

still I want to know the rationale behind this discrimination between the war veterans on one side and the political detainees on the other.

I happen to know that among the war veterans are large numbers of people who did not even receive training and the Mujibhas who were recruited in to the assembly points in 1980 at the time of cease fire. They are given all the benefits of the war veterans. Some of them have never been out of this country, never across the boarder [sic], they are recognised toay as war veterans.

<right>

(War Veterans Amendment Bill, Second Reading, February 18, 1999: 4043–4044)

</right>

</quote>

MP Njekesa made the case for paying the ex-detainees and treating them identically to the war veterans. He urged the government to find the money “because it will be unfair [otherwise]. I do not see the reason why they should not be made to enjoy the fruits of their suffering. We have people who have served 2/3/4 years in prison as much as we have ex-combatants who stayed in Mozambique for 1/2 years and they were paid” (War Veterans Amendment Bill, Second Reading, February 18, 1999: 4053–4054).

Some, like ex-combatant Mr. Nzarabeyani, felt the government should provide money for the detainees, even if it could not afford to pay them as much as the ex-guerrillas had received (War Veterans Amendment Bill, Second Reading, 18 February 1999: 4051). MP Hokoyo argued the government should provide the detainees with land “because this is what they fought for” (War Veterans Amendment Bill, Second Reading, February 18, 1999: 4062). She emphasized that ex-political detainees needed to be compensated by the state “because they did not get the opportunity to support their families. So they should support them now” (War Veterans Amendment Bill, Second Reading, February 18, 1999: 4062). MP Mudenda rejected the definition of political detainee as eliminating some who suffered the most but supported granting legal recognition without material benefits: “let the nation be warned that... anybody who participated one way or the other in the liberation struggle... did not do so because they were expecting some reward. They did so because people believed in their inalienable right to create freedom for Zimbabwe, to bring about the independence of Zimbabwe.... The danger that has befallen the nation now is that there has been too much concentration on reward, and as a result, some people have joined the band wagon for better or worse to demand compensation which was not the primary and fundamental issue in our liberation struggle” (War Veterans Amendment Bill, Second Reading, February 18, 1999: 4055–4056). Mr. Mujuru, ZANLA’s military leader at the end of the war and then head of the new army, dismissed the material claims of political detainees by belittling their contribution. “People suffered during the liberation struggle in the bush with the rains and the heat, but these ones want to be paid for what? They were guarded and they where [sic] protected…. We saw people suffering in the protected villages and some of them even died but those who were in detention were even protected” (War Veterans Amendment Bill, Second Reading, February 18, 1999: 4059–4060).[88] Beyond contestation over whether the detainees deserved material compensation, there were also some pleas for incorporating new categories, such as those who had been recruited to join the ex-guerrillas but did not actually cross the border because the war ended (War Veterans Amendment Bill, Second Reading, February 18, 1999: 4035, 4038), or deceased ex-detainees, their children, wives and widows (War Veterans Amendment Bill, Second Reading, February 18, 1999: 4041).

* Ex-Political Prisoners, Detainees, and Restrictees Act, No. 20 of 2004

In October 2004, the government finally passed a separate law to provide immediate benefits to the now elderly group of political veterans who had spent at least six months in prison, detention or restriction between January 1, 1959 and April 18, 1980. President Mugabe made the law operational just before the Senate election in November 2005. These benefits were substantially less than what the war veterans had received, reflecting the privileged position of war veterans vis-à-vis other liberation movement activists. In the context of hyperinflation, ex-detainees’ monetary payments were worth still less and likely to further exacerbate the economic decline (Kriger 2006: 1160–1161).

 Conclusions

The laws affecting guerrillas—war disability pensions, counting war service years towards years of pensionable service for ex-guerrillas in the army and later the rest of the public sector, and the War Veterans Act—consistently privileged guerrillas over other liberation war participants because their sacrifices for independence were considered to have been greater than others. Treating soldiers as war heroes and giving them preferential treatment is hardly new. What makes the Zimbabwe case interesting is the way in which the law was used to reconstitute guerrillas as veterans. Also, the essence of a guerrilla war is that the guerrillas are like fish that must swim in the sea; they must depend on the people, making civilian participation at least as important as guerrilla action. Though the government of Zimbabwe often used the rhetoric of the sacrifices made by all the people in the war, in law and in practice it elevated the guerrillas' status and preferential rights to state resources. The special treatment afforded guerrillas fuelled their sense of superiority over civilians and their belief in their entitlement to state resources. They focused on advancing their own self-interest through engagement with the ruling party and seldom sought to represent any broader social interests. The ruling party's continued dependence on the guerrillas long after the liberation war reflected its own failure to develop or retain other constituencies. Among the weaknesses of guerrilla integration studies is their disdain for power politics as detrimental to the goals of democratization and political stability. The case of Zimbabwe is less an illustration of the failure of guerrilla integration than of the logic of power-building that worked for a minority but brought ruin for the majority. Democracy and political stability were always less important or entirely irrelevant to those who sought to build and consolidate political power.

[76] In contrast, there have been quite a few studies of the more conventional demobilization and military integration programs.

[77] See also Minister Kangai, Committee Stage. War Victims Compensation Bill, October2, 1980, col.1194.

[78] War Veterans Administration Bill, Second Reading, April 2, 1992, Mrs. Dongo, col.5168; Mr. Marwodzi, col.5144; Miss S. Mugabe, col.5157.

[79] The commencement date of the war had been brought forward from 1972 to 1965 in the War Marriages Validation Act of 1984 and then to 1962 in the General Laws Amendment Act, 1994. No.20, Section 17.

[80] For example, War Veterans Administration Bill, Second Reading, April 2, 1992, Governor of Midlands, col.5174; Governor for Mashonaland Central, col.5177; Mr. Mhorombe, cols.5179–5180; Mr. Mudariki, cols. 5185–5186; Miss Sabina Mugabe, cols.5157–8; Mr. Chivende, cols.5188–9; Mrs. Dongo, col.5164.

[81] War Veterans Administration Bill, Committee Stage, April 8, 1992, Mr. Duri, cols.5367–68, 5370–72; Mr. Vuma, col.5372; Mrs. Dongo, cols.5376–77; Mr. Nza-rayebani, 5377–78; Mr. M. Chinamasa, 5378–79.

[82] War Veterans Administration Bill, Second Reading, April 2, 1992, Mr. Nzarayebani, col.5134; Mr. Duri, col.5138; Mr.Gara, col.5142; Mrs. Dongo, col.5167. See also Deputy Minister Mrs. Chitauro on the main thrust of the war veterans' request being land acquisition; see War Veterans Administration Bill, Second Reading, April 7, 1992, col.5218; Mrs. Dongo, War Veterans Administration Bill, Committee Stage, April 8, 1992, col.5377.

[83] War Veterans Administration Bill, Second Reading, April 2, 1992, Mr. Nzarayebani, col.5132–5133; see also Mr. Chafesuka, col.51337–51378; Mr. Marwodzi, col. 5144; Mr. Mudariki, col.5185.

[84] During the debate, Minister without Portfolio Joseph Msika informed the house that the ruling party had instructed the Ministry of Public Service, Labour and Social Welfare to amend the War Veterans Act to include ex-political detainees. In July 1996, then Minister of Public Service, Labour and Social Welfare Mrs. Florence Chitauro said no new Act would be introduced for political detainees but they would be incorporated in the War Veterans Act. ["War Veterans' Act to cater for ex-detainees," The Herald, July 31, 1996.] The following month on Heroes' Day, President Mugabe promised that the War Veterans Act would be amended so political detainees could benefit from its provisions. He said that they had not only played a vital role in laying the foundation of the struggle but had also participated in it. ["Veterans Act to be amended," The Herald, August 12, 1996.]

[85] See also the minister’s response to members of parliament’s questions where she wonders whether they are objecting to the Bill because they are concerned about the detainees’ welfare or are trying to assert their authority vis-à-vis the party leadership (War Veterans Amendment Bill, Second Reading, November 25, 1997: 2562).

[86] War Veterans Amendment Bill, Second Reading, November 25, 1997. Mr. Mavhaire said: “Not a single provincial chairman could say that we agreed on two years” (2542); Mr. Mvenge said: “We do not accept that just because somebody is a Minister whatever they say must go as in a family where the father detects [sic] to his children. I think they [sic] should be some democracy but if the leaders are patronising this will not be acceptable. They must give ample evidence that a Parliament is not a mere rubber stamp” (2549).

[87] Mr. Mujuru sometimes equated detainees’ and protected villagers’ sufferings and sometimes claimed the latter suffered more.

 References

<biblio>

Cilliers, J. K. 1984. Counter-Insurgency in Rhodesia. Beckenham, Kent: Croom Helm, Ltd.

Kriger, Norma. 2003. Guerrilla Veterans in Post-War Zimbabwe. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Kriger, Norma. “Veterans’ Pensions in Zimbabwe: Dispute Resolution and Nation-Building.” Ohio State Journal on Dispute Resolution 20 (2005): 1.

Kriger, Norma. “Patriotic Memories to ‘Patriotic History’ in Zimbabwe.” Third World Quarterly 27 (2006): 6.

Officers of Parliament (Pensions) Amendment Rules. (No. 9, 1990).

Political Detainees Bill. 1996.

Political Detainees Bill. Motion. House of Assembly, Zimbabwe (July 24, 1996) 23: 9.

Presidential Speech. Motion. House of Assembly, Zimbabwe (June 13, 1980).

Selby, Angus. 2006. “Commercial Farmers and the State: Interest Group Politics and Land Reform in Zimbabwe.” Ph.D. diss., International Development, University of Oxford.

Statutory Instrument 53A of 1989. Constitution. State Service (Pensions) (Uniformed Forces) (Amendment) Regulations, (No.8) 1989.

Statutory Instrument 281 of 1997. War Veterans Act Chapter 11:15. Revised edition 1996. War Veterans (Benefits Scheme) Regulations, 1997.

War Veterans Act. 1992.

War Veterans Administration Bill, Second Reading. House of Assembly, Zimbabwe (March 31, 1992), 18: 68.

War Veterans Administration Bill, Second Reading, House of Assembly, Zimbabwe (April 2, 1992) 18: 70.

War Veterans Administration Bill, Second Reading, House of Assembly, Zimbabwe (April 7, 1992) 18: 71.

War Veterans Administration Bill, Committee Stage, House of Assembly, Zimbabwe (April 8, 1992) 18:72

War Veterans Administration Bill, Memorandum by the Minister of Labor, Manpower and Social Welfare. Ref: 11/1/1. War Veterans Amendment Bill, 1997.

War Veterans Amendment Bill, Second Reading, House of Assembly, Zimbabwe (November 25, 1997) 24: 44.

War Veterans Amendment Bill, Second Reading, House of Assembly, Zimbabwe (November 27, 1997) 24: 46.

War Veterans Amendment Bill. 1998.

War Veterans Amendment Bill, Second Reading, House of Assembly, Zimbabwe (February 18, 1999) 25: 56.

War Veterans Amendment Bill, Committee Stage, House of Assembly, Zimbabwe (October 2, 1980).

War Victims Compensation Act No. 22 (1980).

War Victims Compensation Bill, Second Reading, House of Assembly, Zimbabwe (September 30, 1980).

War Veterans Investment and Administration Bill. 1992.

</biblio>

* Part V: Building Collective Identities: State/Democratic Rebuilding

 14. Africa’s Crisis of State-Building

Kidane Mengisteab

 Introduction: Manifestations of the Crisis of State-Building

As Adebayo Adedeji (1999) notes, Africa continues to be devoured by various types of conflicts. The continent now accounts for more war-related deaths than the rest of the world combined (Human Security Report 2005). In at least one African country, the conflicts have led to genocide. In others they have led to state collapse, gross human rights violations, including gruesome mutilations of large numbers of people. They have also produced millions of refugees and unknown numbers of internally displaced people. Moreover, the conflicts have caused severe economic dislocation and disruption in the provision of public services, contributing to economic crisis and grinding poverty in many countries. A typical civil war that lasts seven years is estimated to lead to a 15 percent decline in income and approximately 30 percent rise in the incidence of absolute poverty (Collier et al. 2003). The losses in human capital due to the direct and indirect effects of the conflicts are difficult to estimate but they are certain to be high. There are also growing indications that the conflicts are contributing to the spread of the HIV/AIDS epidemic in various ways.

With few exceptions, Africa’s armed conflicts are civil wars and, while the specific factors causing them vary from case to case, they are essentially reflections of a crisis in state-building. The primary goal of this chapter is to examine the most important factors contributing to the crisis of state-building in sub-Saharan Africa with emphasis on the Horn of Africa. The chapter is organized into three parts. The first part provides a working definition of state-building and briefly identifies the most important manifestations of the crisis of state-building prevalent in Africa. The second part explores the domestic, regional, and global factors that undermine the process of state-building in the continent. The last part draws concluding remarks and suggests some measures that may contribute to changing the conditions that impede state-building.

 Conceptualizing State-Building

For purposes of this chapter, the phrase state-building is used in lieu of nation-building in order to avoid confusion with the development of sub-state nationalism. State-building has two interrelated components. One component refers to building and strengthening the institutions of the state, including the leadership and the administrative infrastructure, to enhance their effectiveness in advancing the well-being of citizens and in managing society in line with the authority mandated by the community of citizens. Changes in the capabilities of the state can be measured by examining changes in security conditions, application of the rule of law, respect for human rights, and economic development, including access to health and educational services to the population.

The second component of state-building refers to the complex process of integrating different ethno-linguistic, religious, and sociocultural identities within the population of a country to form a political community of citizens living under shared socioeconomic systems and institutions. Given the African condition of fragmented economies, linking the different economic sectors and segments of society to form an interdependent and complementary economic system is an integral part of establishing a political community. Such internal economic integration entails transforming the large subsistence sector into an exchange economy and thereby integrating the dual economic systems that characterize the continent.

Both components of state-building are underdeveloped in Africa. The African state’s limitations in providing its citizens with the services commonly expected of the state are rather conspicuous. Its general failure to create suitable conditions for economic development and to raise the standard of living of its citizens is one manifestation. The state's inability to provide adequate basic public services, such as education and health care to all citizens, and to provide security by curtailing and resolving conflicts and respecting human rights are other manifestations.

The state in many African countries has also been unsuccessful in forging a political community of citizens out of its culturally diverse populations. Many countries have faced chronic rebellions by ethnic, regional, or religious entities and other social groups, who do not perceive that the political system and terms of their incorporation into the state accommodate their interests and aspirations. Such rebellions have often escalated to civil wars. Liberia, Sierra Leone, Ivory Coast, Nigeria, Somalia, Sudan, Ethiopia, Rwanda, Burundi, Uganda, the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Congo, Chad, Angola, and the Central African Republic are among the African countries that have encountered violent conflicts, while many other countries face moderate to low-intensity unrest that has the potential to escalate into civil wars.

African economies also remain fragmented with weak linkages between the modern and traditional sectors. As a result, the modern sector lacks a significant domestic market to rely on and depends excessively on the international market for its dynamics. However, failing to be competitive in the global market of manufactured products, it remains largely relegated to the export of primary commodities. The large traditional economic sector, on the other hand, is largely bypassed by the modern sector and the state and marginalized from the global market. This sector lacks a source of dynamism to pull it out of its near stagnant condition. Such fragmentation has contributed to the poor performance of African economies, which, in turn, exacerbates the civil conflicts as various ethno-linguistic and religious groups engage in vicious struggles over dwindling public resources.

The fragmentation between the modern and traditional sectors is not limited to the economic sphere. These sectors are also fragmented in terms of the institutions of governance they espouse. Large segments of the rural inhabitants, the overwhelming majority of the population in most African countries, continue to adhere principally to traditional institutions of governance. The postcolonial state, along with the urban areas, on the other hand, essentially emulates Western institutions of governance, which are often at odds with traditional African cultural values and the region's contemporary socioeconomic realities. In any case, the fragmentation of the institutions of governance is also another manifestation of the lack of progress in creating a political community governed by a coherent system of institutions. We now examine the most important factors that impede state-building in Africa.

 Factors Contributing to State-Building Crisis

There are a number of intertwined domestic, regional, and global factors that have contributed to undermining the process of state-building in Africa. The proto-colonial nature of the postcolonial African state is one of the key factors. As Lewis Namier (in Schwarz 1995) notes, historically, incorporation of different ethnic and religious entities into the state was mostly attained through coercive measures. Economic integration and democratization have, however, contributed to consolidating the process of state-building. In the African case, the colonial state created African states by forcibly merging disparate ethnic and cultural groups under the new colonial entities. But it provided little of the economic and political mechanisms that facilitate consolidation of state-building. Instead, it established socioeconomic systems that kept the subjects in the newly forged colonies internally fragmented along ethnic, religious, and regional lines. With the exception of the settler economies, the economies of the colonies, which largely produced commodities for the markets of the colonial powers, were tied to the economies of the mother countries in a feudal manner with little internal interdependence.

The populations of the colonies were further fragmented through various mechanisms. Often they were classified hierarchically causing ethnic-based animosities. The Belgian colonial state, for instance, identified the Tutsi in Rwanda and Burundi and the Bangala in the Congo as "superior" to the ethnic groups around them. Even when overt hierarchical classification was not evident, uneven access to opportunities was rather common. The Kikuyu in Kenya and the Buganda in Uganda, for example, enjoyed greater access to public services, such as education, compared to their compatriots (Rothchild 1968; Kasfir 1976). In some other cases the colonial state accentuated interethnic divisions by isolating certain ethnic groups ostensibly for purposes of preserving native culture. In the case of the Sudan, for example, the British prevented cultural integration of the south and Nuba with the dominant culture in the northern part of the country (Salih 1990).

The postcolonial state has made limited progress in replacing the colonial structures that obstruct state-building. One of the most conspicuous characteristics of the African political landscape is that the state has not been brought under the control of its citizenry. Given the legacies of the colonial state, the post-independence African state was, at the time of decolonization, expected by its constituency to be an agent for reclaiming the collective dignity of its citizens and to fundamentally change the fragmenting socioeconomic structures it inherited in order to facilitate state-building and development. Contrary to popular expectations, the state has remained imposed upon the population, in a manner similar to that of the colonial state. Instead of reconstituting the state, the political elite of the postcolonial state largely inherited the structures of the highly predatory colonial state with its extractive institutions and repressive security apparatus. The elite essentially placed itself in control of the extractive institutions and used them to advance its own interests, essentially reducing the state to a semi-private apparatus that advances the interests of those who control it.

This independence from the citizenry allowed many African leaders to behave as if they own the state and to use it as they wish in a self-serving manner. Mobutu of Zaire, Idi Amin of Uganda, Bokassa of the Central African Republic, Macias Nguema of Equatorial Guinea, Mengistu of Ethiopia, Abacha of Nigeria, and Taylor of Liberia are the most notorious examples. These dictators saw themselves as the state and used the state coffers as their private bank accounts and the security forces as their private armies (The Economist, May 11, 2000). Perhaps, as a result of the colonial oppression and the similar experience under such dictators, the African population makes little distinction between the state and the individuals who hold power. Those who support the leaders also consider that their allegiance is owed to the person in power rather than to the state (The Economist, May 11, 2000). Segments of the counter elite (elite not in power), on the other hand, see the state as a prize to be won in order to control the privileges of power. Rebellions, such as those led by Jonas Savimbi in Angola and Foday Sankoh in Sierra Leone, were clearly led by blatant drive to capture state power for self-serving purposes. Many of the military coups that took place between the late 1960s and early 1980s were also motivated by similar ambitions. Similar motives guide opposition parties in many African countries.

Even the leaders who were not widely viewed to be self-serving, such as Kwame Nkrumah of Ghana, Keneth Kaunda of Zambia, Sekou Toure of Guinea, Julius Nyerere of Tanzania, and Houphouet Boigny of the Ivory Coast, did not bring the state under the control of the citizens. The manner in which they governed was largely an expression of their own vision and benevolence rather than the expressed wishes of their populations. The unpopularity of Ujaama in Tanzania or many of Nkrumah's policies in Ghana are obvious examples. The situation has changed little with most of the current leaders in the continent, including the so-called "new breed," except perhaps with Mbeki of South Africa. Meles Zenawi of Ethiopia, Isaias Afeworki of Eritrea, Yoweri Museveni of Uganda, and Paul Kagame of Rwanda have not brought the state under the control of the citizenry any more than the dictators preceding them. Isaias Afeworki's banning of the private press and failure to implement the country's ratified constitution, is a clear indication. Rigging of elections and harassment of opposition parties by the others are other manifestations. The post-2005 election violence and the imprisoning of leaders of opposition parties in Ethiopia have, for example, shattered all democratic pretenses of Meles Zenawi's regime.

The differences between the self-serving dictators and the benevolent nationalist leaders not withstanding, both groups of leaders have undermined state-building in the continent. The latter group's failure to bring about economic development and democratic governance did not allow advancement of state-building. The former hindered state-building through various mechanisms, including appropriation of the state as a private club, gross human rights violations, and through the economic disasters it brought about. Moreover, many of the self-serving dictators have manipulated ethnic affiliation in manners similar to those of the colonial state in order to preserve their oppressive rule. Pressed by the advancing troops of the Eritrean People's Liberation front and the Tigray People's Liberation Front, the Mengistu regime in Ethiopia, for example, resorted to unmasked appeals for ethnic-based support in its final days. It attempted to incite public anger against what it called the “Tigray-Tigrignie” (Tigrigna-speaking ethnic group) threat to Ethiopian unity (Abay 1998).

Another aspect of the failure of the African state is related to its inability to project itself as a neutral arbitrator of the competing interests of the various ethno-linguistic entities within its constituency. Whether the state is a neutral arbitrator of various conflicting interests, as the liberal conception of the state suggests, or it is an instrument of domination, as the Marxist view asserts, remains a contentious issue. Perhaps, as Rueschemeyer and Evans (1985) suggest, the state plays these different roles at different times depending on the balance of power among social classes. In any case, the state is a major dispenser of various resources and privileges. As such, fairness in this role is a crucial element in the process of state-building. There is also an important difference between class and ethnic and religious differences in that the latter two are more rigidly exclusive than class differences that allow some social mobility. As a result, it is likely that ethno-linguistic and religious differences require more firm neutrality of the state than do class differences.

Views that ethnic and religious differences are primordial which would disappear with development have also proved to be unsustainable, as many developed countries have continued to face this intractable problem (Connor 1994). Neutrality of the state through carefully designed forms of representation and decentralized and democratic governance is, thus, an essential mechanism for managing problems related to ethnic and religious differences (de Varness 1999). Such measures help to safeguard both individual and group rights.

In multi-ethnic countries, especially where civil society is not well developed, it is perhaps not possible to create a completely neutral state. It is, for example, hardly feasible to use all the languages in the country as official languages or as mediums of instruction in schools. It is, however, essential that the state does not advance the interests of some ethnic groups at the expense of others and that it creates an inclusive polity instead of preserving ethnic hierarchy.

Expectations of fairness and neutrality are perhaps greater on the African state than on most other states due to the scarcity of resources and the underdevelopment of the private sector. However, Mauritius and, to a lesser extent, Botswana are among the few African states that have registered remarkable progress in mitigating ethnic-based conflicts by reducing the uneven distribution of power, resources, and opportunities among ethnic entities and by respecting the basic rights of all groups of citizens (Carroll and Carroll 1997). Once depicted as a society profoundly divided between ethnically based antagonistic group interests, Mauritius has distinguished itself as a success story in mitigating ethnic antagonisms (Eriksen 1994). In Mauritius's case extensive interaction between state officials and ethnic leaders is viewed as an important mechanism that has helped convince members of ethnic communities that the state is responsive to their needs and concerns (Carroll and Carroll 1997). Botswana's leadership, which undertakes frequent consultations with the Kgotla, a traditional gathering of all adult males, has also attained notable progress in reducing ethnic conflicts (Carroll and Carroll 1997).

Despite the small size of the sample, the experiences of the two relatively successful countries suggest the existence of a strong relationship between democratic governance and state neutrality. Fairness and impartiality are hardly compatible with dictatorial rule, especially since dictatorial regimes often use ethnicity as a tool to extend their tenure in power.

Another factor in the failure of the African state relates to its inability to develop appropriate vision and strategy for state-building. Following decolonization, state-building in Africa was widely perceived as forging a nation-state with a single cultural identity. Nations and ethnic groups were expected to give up their cultural identity and to assimilate into a common national culture, which essentially meant the culture of the dominant nation (or ethnic group). In the process, less dominant groups were expected to transfer their political and cultural loyalty from the nation to that of the state. With few exceptions, such as Nigeria, African leaders of the era of decolonization viewed federalism and other forms of decentralization, which give cultural autonomy as well as the right to self-governance to ethno-linguistic groups, as divisive arrangements that would reinforce ethnonationalism and lead to secessions. As a result, a centralized unitary strategy of state-building was widely adopted.

Ethiopia and Sudan are two good examples of countries that insisted on a centralized unitary state structure. Like many others, these two countries pursued a strategy of assimilation and are facing serious and chronic state-building crises. During Ethiopia's last two regimes, different national entities, especially the ethnic groups in the southern parts of the country, which were incorporated by conquest during the last decade of the nineteenth century, were allowed little space for autonomous cultural development, much less for self-rule. They were instead expected to assimilate into the culture of the dominant nation, the Amhara. Despite creating a parliament to disguise the nature of his rule, the last monarch, Emperor Haile Selassie, remained absolute with little regard for cultural diversity and the rights of nations to some form of self-governance. When faced with ethnic-based rebellions, the concern of the monarchy was primarily how to suppress them rather than how to address the legitimate concerns of the rebelling entities. Ethiopia's successive governments have failed to fundamentally alter the policy in favor of greater decentralization. The military government of Mengistu HaileMariam (1974–91) remained as centralized as the monarchy preceding it. The post-1991 government, which is led by the Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF), instituted a largely ethnic-based federal arrangement, which on paper appears to provide extensive decentralization. In reality, the regime maintains rigid centralization through the control of the ethnic-based satellite parties it created throughout the country (Mengisteab 2002).

Sudan is another country which, in an attempt to reverse the colonial policy of isolating the south from the north, adopted a policy of centralization and assimilation of the south to the dominant culture of the north. Despite resistance by the south, which culminated in a civil war, successive regimes in the Sudan essentially maintained a policy of centralization, although the country was able to stop the civil war for a decade (1972–83) by granting limited self-rule to the south.

Under conditions of competent leadership that safeguards the rights of all concerned and is perceived to be fair to all entities, a centralized system has some advantages. It is possible, for instance, that centralization allows faster implementation of policies and thereby expedite development. Since such leadership has rarely emerged in Africa, however, decentralization becomes a viable mechanism for reducing risks of state partiality. It also allows different groups to engage in self-governance, which may mitigate the adverse impacts of repressive regimes. In any case, centralized political systems along with repressive dictatorial rule and absence of neutrality of the state have undermined state-building and encouraged centrifugal tendencies in many African countries.

Given its undemocratic nature, the African state continues to rely on the coercive approach to state-building. When faced with challenges by sub-state actors, it usually resorts to suppressing the challenges by means of force. Coercive measures, however, rarely advance state building, even if they succeed in suppressing revolts. As Okafor notes, coercive approaches to state building fail because in “contemporary view of human rights, violent coercive unification and repressive homogenization are morally and socially bankrupt” (2000:525). Far from leading to long-term peace and stability, military victory often leads to a temporary lull in violent conflicts accompanied by intense resentment and resistance, which are likely to be followed by a new cycle of hostilities.

Several African civil wars were concluded after they ran their course with a military victory of one party or another. The Nigerian civil war (1967–70); the Angolan civil war, which ended in 2002 with the death of UNITA’s leader, Savimbi; the Ethiopian conflicts between the Mengistu regime and rebel groups, including the Ethiopian People’s Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF) and the Oromo Liberation Front (OLF), which ended in 1991, are some examples. The Rwandan civil war, which ended with the victory of the Rwanda Patriotic Front (RPF) in 1994, and the conflict in the Republic of the Congo, which ended in 1999, are other examples. In some cases, the wars came to an end with external intervention. The conflicts in Chad (1979–94), Sierra Leone (1991–2002), Liberia (1989–96) and the Katanga (1960–63) and the Shaba (1977–78) wars in the former Zaire are such examples. However, the military settlements of these civil wars have hardly translated to success in state-building as many of these countries remain embroiled in new conflicts or face growing ethnic and civil strife. Coercive measures simply do not integrate fragmented economies or create a cohesive political community. State-building in Africa, thus, has to take place within a democratic context. Unfortunately, the nature of the postcolonial African state has not allowed the democratic approach to state-building to materialize.

 Global Factors

Global factors in general and the manner in which Africa is incorporated into the global system in particular also play a major role in undermining the continent's state-building process. A brief review of the history of Africa's incorporation into the global economic system helps in explaining the impact of the global system. At least three different phases of Africa's incorporation into the global capitalist system can be identified.

The first phase took place prior to the era of decolonization, roughly between the middle of the fifteenth century and the middle of the twentieth century. This phase itself had at least three stages, including the early commercial incorporation, the plunder of Africa during the era of the slave trade, and the period of direct colonial domination. The pillage that took place during the era of the slave trade (ca. 1450–1870) and the naked exploitation during colonialism (1884–1960) were, however, the most important stages that shaped Africa's place in the global division of labor. Needless to say, the slave raids of the era of slave trade and the colonial policies of uneven development and practices of divide and rule left lingering effects in interethnic relations in many parts of the continent making it difficult to bond them together to form a political community.

The second phase of Africa's incorporation took place during the three decades between the beginning of its decolonization in the early 1960s and the end of the Cold War in 1991. Decolonization did not give African countries the power to determine their own terms of integration with the global system due to many factors. Nevertheless, decolonization meant a marked loosening of the monopolistic grip of African economies by European colonial powers, resulting in some diversification of the trading partners of African countries. The Cold War rivalry between the super powers and the welfare state ideology of compromise between social classes that prevailed during the Cold War era also allowed African states to expand public services, such as education and health care, to their populations and to initiate some level of industrialization behind protectionist policies. Despite these benefits, the Cold War context of decolonization impeded African countries from developing their own development strategies. Moreover, the Cold War environment subjected African countries to frequent external intervention from both the ideological camps and to engagement in various conflicts as proxies. Civil wars in the now Democratic Republic of the Congo, Mozambique, Angola, and Ethiopia are the most obvious examples.

The third phase of Africa's incorporation corresponds with the advent of globalization and represents new terms of integration of African economies into the global economy in the post-Cold War era. With globalization, economic liberalization has become a condition for integration into the global economy for African economies, as well as for those of other developing countries. Policies of liberalization, including retrenchment of state involvement in economic activity, including its public expenditures, institutional changes that foster openness of the economy and wide ranging deregulations, and expenditure switching policies designed to promote exports, have been imposed through a package of reforms known as structural adjustment programs. Crippled by the debt crisis and current account deficits, which were caused by a variety of factors, including the oil crisis of the 1970s and falling prices of primary commodities, African countries reluctantly succumbed to adopting liberalization policies dictated by the vision of globalization.

The liberalization mechanisms intended to integrate African economies with the global economy have, however, led to several problems, including loss of sovereignty of the African state in policymaking, worsening of social inequalities, and de-industrialization of the continent. All these outcomes have, in turn, exacerbated the crisis of state-building.

As noted, one aspect of the package of reforms that are used as a mechanism of integrating African economies into the global economy is that of institutional reforms, which include reduction of trade protectionism, deregulation of interest rates and financial flows, and privatization of financial institutions. According to proponents, reducing protectionism allows local opportunity costs of resources to be reflected more accurately. Decontrolling interest rates is also expected to raise rates and thereby to encourage savings and the adoption of appropriate technology by discouraging capital-intensive technology. Financial deregulation and privatization of banks are also expected to allow banks to allocate funds to finance private investments in industry. These policies, however, can also produce adverse results. Lifting protectionism can, for example, lead to loss of revenue and the destruction of potentially competitive local infant industry by cheap imports. Higher interest rates and tight credit may also hurt industry which tends to have higher working capital needs while privatization of banks may discourage investments in industry which tend to have longer duration and higher risks.

A number of African countries have already suffered significant losses due to cheap imports. In Nigeria, for example, the number of textile factories has fallen to forty, a quarter of the number seen in the mid-1980s. Nigeria has reacted by banning imports of all printed fabrics in order to protect its own ailing industry (BBC, October 3, 2002). Mozambique's largest textile factory, Textafrica, which once employed 3,300 workers, also closed in 2002 due to premature and indiscriminate free trade. In the previous year, a number of textile factories shut down in Mozambique leading to the loss of about 9,500 jobs (BBC, May 7, 2002). Malawi's decision to shut down the country's largest textile factory putting more than 2000 people out of work was also largely caused by cheap imports, including second-hand clothing from the Far East (BBC, September 6, 2002). Processing cashew nuts, which used to be Mozambique's main industry, was also closed following the World Bank imposed ending of state tariffs, which had allowed local processors to buy home-grown nuts cheaper. Over 40,000 jobs were lost as a result of this closure.

Beyond the identified examples of de-industrialization, the overall picture of Africa's industry since the implementation of the globalization mechanisms in the beginning of the middle of the 1980s is rather grim. In 1994, the World Bank, in its Adjustment in Africa Report, projected a rosy picture for the adjusting African countries, despite the skepticism of many observers. The evidence now reveals that Africa's industry has stagnated with the implementation of the liberalization mechanisms (World Bank 2002). A comparison of manufacturing value added (as percentage of GDP) for the years 1990 and 1999 shows a decline in twenty-three of thirty countries, while there was no change in four countries (World Bank 2001). A comparison of value added as percentage of GDP for overall industry for 1990 and 1999 also shows a decline in seventeen of thirty-one countries. A comparison of average annual growth rates of output in industry and in the manufacturing sector for the periods of 1980–90 and 1990–2000 also reveal a similar trend. In the manufacturing sector growth rates declined in twelve of twenty-three countries while growth rates in industry declined or remained unchanged in fifteen of twenty-nine countries (UNCTAD 2002). For sub-Saharan Africa as a whole annual growth rates of value added in industry have declined from 2.2 percent for the 1975–84 period to 1.7 percent for the 1985–89 period, and to 1.3 percent for the 1990–2000 period (World Bank 2001). Liberalization of its markets without reciprocity by the advanced countries in their marketing of agricultural products has relegated Africa to the export of primary commodities, which is unlikely to lead to a higher standard of living.

Another globalizing mechanism promoted through the Structural Adjustment Programs (SAPs) is retrenchment of public expenditures to reduce budget deficits of governments. This policy is intended to restrain the growth of the money supply and thereby lead to stable prices and a climate conducive for investment. Obviously unrestricted budgetary deficits are unsustainable as they are likely to lead to economic instability undermining the development process. However, in the African case, where the level of human development and development of infrastructure is extremely low, retrenchment of public expenditures is likely to limit investments on human development and development of infrastructure, curtailing the long-term prospects for overall development of African countries. Many sub-Saharan African countries have retrenched their expenditures on public services since adopting adjustment mechanisms. Public expenditure on education, for example, has declined steeply in many countries although modest increases are reported in others. For sub-Saharan Africa, in general, public expenditures on education as a ratio of GDP declined from 4.5 percent in 1992 to 3.3 percent in 1999 (World Commission on the Social Dimension of Globalization 2004). At a time when malaria and the HIV/AIDS epidemic are eroding the economic and social fabric of many African societies, total health expenditures as percentage of GDP show little effort by African governments to deal with the continent’s growing health crisis. Per capita health expenditures in 2001, for example, declined in twenty-three of thirty-nine countries (World Health Organization 2003).

Retrenchment of public expenditures and state involvement in the economy are also likely to exacerbate the already high poverty rates and social inequalities. Adjusted poverty rates in Sab-Saharan Africa have increased from 48 percent in 1970 to 60 percent in 1995 (Artadi and Sala-i-Martin 2003). According to the World Commission on the Social Dimension of Globalization (2004), the total number of the destitute increased from 241 million in 1990 to 323 million in 2000.

It is also unlikely that transformation of the subsistence sector and internal integration of the economy will take place under state disengagement. Inequalities in access to public services among regional and ethnic entities are also likely to linger without active state engagement. State-building in the continent is, thus, likely to be undermined when the role of the state, as a promoter of social justice, is curtailed. As noted, not many African states are champions of social justice. However, the liberal doctrine that guides the global system also provides ideological justification for denying social justice, exacerbating the problems of state-building and poor state-society relations.

Political liberalization has accompanied economic liberalization in much of Africa, partly due to donor conditionalities. Most African countries have since the early 1990s carried out multiparty elections, despite various electoral irregularities. In many cases, however, the elections hardly represent an advancement of genuine democratization. As post-election conflicts in countries, such as the Ivory Coast, Ethiopia, Togo, and the Democratic Republic of the Congo, reveal, elections without the establishment of political arrangements that accommodate the interests and perspectives of the various cultural entities, and without transformation and integration of the peasantry, are unlikely to advance genuine democratization or state-building.

Not unlike the era of the Cold War, the war on terrorism has also drawn many African countries as proxies. The countries in the Horn of Africa, for instance, find themselves on the verge of a potentially disastrous war, as the United States and Ethiopia are currently inching closer to military intervention in Somalia against the Union of Islamic Courts, which they accuse of having links to terrorism. In addition to derailing state formation in Somalia, this war, if it takes place, has the potential to destabilize the whole region and fuel religious cleavage within the individual countries.

 Regional Factors

Regional factors have also contributed to the state-building crisis, albeit to a lesser degree than the internal and global factors. African countries have not fought many wars against each other, despite the large number of border disputes that characterize the continent. Many African countries have, however, engaged in proxy wars that destabilize their neighbors. Many countries have actively supported rebel groups fighting against the governments of their neighbors or at least allowed them to operate from bases in their territories. Ethiopia and Somalia have supported each other's rebels. Ethiopia and Sudan have done the same. Ethiopia and Eritrea and Eritrea and the Sudan have also engaged in efforts to destabilize each other. Other African states that have attempted to destabilize each other include: the Sudan and Uganda; the Sudan and Chad; the Democratic Republic of the Congo and Rwanda, Burundi, and Uganda; Liberia and Sierra Leone; and Liberia and Guinea.

The reasons for such interventions vary from case to case. In some cases, irridentism is the main factor, as between Ethiopia and Somalia. In other cases, affiliation of ethnic or religious entities with the rebelling groups plays a role. Inability of governments to control their borders and to deny rebels from neighboring countries the use of their territories as bases of operation also plays a role. The Democratic Republic of the Congo and Sudan are good examples. In some cases, economic benefits have motivated interventions. Liberia's support of Sierra Leone's rebels was a case in point. Intervention in the civil war of the Democratic Republic of the Congo also revealed such motives. The absence of strong regional economic interdependence among African countries, despite the proliferation of regional economic integration schemes, has also made interventions less costly. In any case, regional factors have played a notable role in Africa's crisis of state building.

 Conclusion

The foregoing analysis suggests that overcoming Africa's crisis of state-building requires fundamental changes in the nature of the African state. It also requires major changes in Africa's global and regional relations. African civil wars have made it clear that state-building cannot be consolidated without democratizing the state. Democratization, in turn, requires reconstitution of the state not only to bring it under the control of society but also to integrate it with society's institutions and cultural values. Choices of development strategies and decisions on the role of the state in promoting social justice also need to be made in a democratic manner. Reducing democratization to merely conducting elections to recycle the elite in power, as is presently happening in much of Africa, hardly represents democracy and is unlikely to have significant impact on the continent's crisis of state-building. Botswana and Mauritius have made progress in democratization. These two countries have also made notable progress in state-building and development. Ghana and South Africa have also made progress in the areas of democratization, development, and state-building. These cases suggest that democratization, state-building, and development have become intertwined and require an integrated approach to advance.

Our analysis suggests that African countries also need to address the regional factors that undermine their state-building efforts by developing their regional integration schemes and the African Union. In August 2003, at Maputo, the members of the Southern African Development Community (SADC) entered a pact for a strong regional action to end civil wars. Under the pact, the members pledged that a conflict in a SADC country would automatically invite diplomatic, political or military response from all members. Putting in practice such intervention would not only curtail negative intervention by neighbors but it may also help in mitigating internal conflicts or, at least resolve them more quickly. It is timely that African countries set political conditionalities for membership in regional integration schemes as well as in the African Union. African countries should also perhaps encourage bottom-up integration by allowing freer cross-border trade.

The global factors are more difficult to address since they are not within the control of African countries. However, reconstitution of the African state, developing regional integration, and strengthening the African Union would go a long way in reducing Africa’s external dependency and vulnerability and in raising its bargaining power within the global arena.

 References

<biblio>

Abay, AlemSeged. 1998. Identity Jilted or Re-Imagined Identity? Lawrenceville, NJ: The Red Sea Press.

Adedeji, Adebayo. 1999. “Comprehending African Conflicts.” In Comprehending and Mastering African Conflicts: The Search for Sustainable Peace and Good Governance, edited by Adebayo Adedeji, 3–33. London: Zed Books.

Artadi, V. Elsa, and Xavier Sala-i-Martin. “The Economic Tragedy of the XXth Century: Growth in Africa,” Discussion Paper #0203–17, Department of Economics Columbia University, New York (May 2003).

Carroll, Barbara Wake, and Terrance Carroll. “State and Ethnicity in Botswana and Mauritus: A Democratic Route to Development.” Journal of Development Studies 33, 4 (April 1997): 464–486.

Collier, Paul, et al. 2003. Breaking the Conflict Trap: Civil War and Development Policy. Washington DC: The World Bank.

Connor, Walker. 1994. Ethnonationalism: The Quest for Understanding. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

de Varness, Fernand. “States Versus Minorities: A Legal Human Rights Approach to Understanding the Causes of Ethnic Conflicts in Asia.” Fourth International Conference of the Ethnic Studies Network, Moscow (June 8–11, 1999).

Economist. “The Heart of the Matter” (May 11, 2000).

Eriksen, Thomas Hylland. “Nationalism, Mauritian Style: Cultural Unity and Ethnic Diversity.” Comparative Studies in Society and History 36, 3(1994): 549–574.

Human Security Center. 2005. The Human Security Report, 2005. University of British Columbia.

Kasfir, Nelson. 1976. The Shrinking Political Arena: Participation and Ethnicity in African Politics, with a Case Study of Uganda. Berkeley: University of California Press.

Mengisteab, Kidane. 2002. “Ethiopia: State Building or Imperial Revival.” In The African State: Reconsiderations, edited by Ahmed Samatar and Abdi Samatar. New Hampshire: Heinemann.

Okafor, Obiora Chinedu. “After Martyrdom: International Law, Sub-State Groups, and the Construction of Legitimate Statehood in Africa.” Harvard International Law Journal 41, 2 (Spring 2000): 503–528.

Rothchild, Donald. 1968. Politics of Integration—An East African Documentary. Nairobi: East African Publishing House.

Rueschemeyer, Dietrich, and Peter Evans. 1985. “The State and Economic Transformation: Toward an Analysis of the Conditions Underlying Effective Intervention.” In Bringing the State Back In, edited by P. B. Evans, D. Rueschemeyer, and T. Skocpol, 44–77. New York: Cambridge University Press.

Salih, Kamal Osman. “British Policy and the Accentuation of Inter-Ethnic Divisions: The Case of the Nuba Mountains Region of Sudan.” African Affairs 89, 356 (July 1990): 417–436.

Schwarz, Benjamin. “The Diversity Myth: America’s Leading Export.” The Atlantic Monthly 275, 5 (May 1995).

UNCTAD. 2002. Escaping the Poverty Trap: The Least Developed Countries Report 2002. New York and Geneva: United Nations.

World Bank. 2002. African Development Indicators, 2002. Washington, DC: The World Bank.

World Bank. 2001. World Development Indicators, 2001. Washington, DC: The World Bank.

World Commission on the Social Dimension of Globalization. 2004. A Fair Globalization: Creating Opportunities for All. Geneva: ILO.

World Health Organization. 2003. The World Health Report, 2003. Geneva, Switzerland.

</biblio>

 15. Weak States and Democratization: Ethnic and Religious Conflicts in Nigeria

Muhammad Sani Umar

During the 1990s, the “third wave of democratization” swept across West Africa, with each of the countries in the region taking various steps toward democratization: ending the tenures of presidents-for-life, introducing multiparty elections, and making successful handovers from one administration to another via democratic elections. However, the 1990s also witnessed numerous violent political conflicts: ethnic and religious riots, bloody military coups, political assassinations, civil wars and anarchy in collapsed states. In this chapter, I address the question: Does democratic transition help to resolve or aggravate violent political conflicts in general, and ethnic and religious conflicts in particular?

To answer this question, the chapter begins with a brief regional overview of political developments in West Africa during the 1990s, with particular focus on the relationships between democratic transitions and violent conflicts that have ethnic and religious dimension, as well as the rise of Islamist movements in the West African region and their impact on conflict, democratization, and political stability. Next, the chapter focuses on Nigeria for a case-study of the complexities of these issues. From its national (Nigeria) and regional (West Africa) perspectives, this chapter contributes to the larger debates on democratization in the era of globalization.

The central argument of the chapter is that in the short term (within a single generation), democracy does not resolve preexisting violent political conflicts, particularly those with religious and ethic dimensions. In fact, democracy could aggravate such conflicts by transforming them into contests that are characteristic of democracy: contests of elections, ideas, policies, privileges, and positions of power. The centrality of these contests in a democracy carries the potential to intensify preexisting political conflicts, particularly in divided societies with weak states that are not capable of asserting state autonomy from sectional influences of ethnic and religious groups. The confluence of democratic contestation, divided society, and weak state helps to explain why democratic transition is followed by the explosion of ethnic and religious violent conflicts in Nigeria, and political instability in most of the West African countries, including civil war in Côte d’Ivoire and state collapse in Liberia and Sierra Leone. In the long term

(within at least two generations or more), democracy may in fact offer better potential than alternative political systems for solving the problem of violent political conflicts through various models of democratic power sharing and popular participation.[89] But even in the long term, democracy alone will not solve all the underlying social, economic, cultural, and political conditions that in the first place gave birth to violent political conflicts. The fallacy of all-good-things-go-together that informed the initial optimism about what "transition to democracy" heralded has since given way to sober realization of the limits of what democratization could accomplish not only in West Africa, but in other regions as well.[90]

In a very good review of the huge literature on transition to democracy in Africa, Clark Gibson points to an emerging consensus among political scientists that the political changes of the 1990s that swept away authoritarian regimes in Africa have not yet "consolidated" into "deep democracies." The first multiparty elections may very well have been "free and fair," terminated the tenure of presidents-for-life, and introduced laudable political reforms. Still, the political realities in African countries a decade after the first multiparty elections point to the staying power of the old political order, entrenched in the neo-patrimonialism that was partly responsible for the pervasive corruption and inefficiency that on the first instant provided one of the strong reasons for political reform. Gibson also calls attention to another emerging consensus among political scientists that rather than "transition to democracy" or "democratization," "political change" is a more accurate description, which also avoids the pro-democracy normative bias that prevented accurate understanding of significant political developments taking place in Africa over the last two decades (Gibson 2002). One cannot, however, deny that the general thrust of those developments has been (imperfectly no doubt) towards democracy, no matter what definition of democracy one adopts.

For example, the Annual Freedom in the World Country Scores 1972–73 to 2001–2002 compiled by the Freedom House (see Table 15.1) shows that of the twenty-one countries in the West African region, only three (Cameroon, Equatorial Guinea, and The Gambia) did not register any gain in political freedom during the period under review, while Côte d'Ivoire is the only country to remain unchanged. The survey also shows that the gains registered varied significantly from the countries that gained two percentage points or less (Chad, Guinea, Liberia, and Mauritania) to those that gained more than two percentage points (Benin, Burkino Faso, Cape Verde, Central African Republic, Ghana, Guinea Bissau, Mali, Niger, Nigeria, Sao Tome, Senegal, Sierra Leone, and Togo).[91] Thus, despite significant variations, the general direction of political changes in the region is toward more political freedoms that are characteristic of “deep democracy.” It is also important to note that Benin, Ghana, Senegal, and Mali have each experienced hand-over of power from one party to another through democratic elections—another important marker of democratic consolidation.

Following are some clarifying remarks: The characters representing scores for each year are, from left to right, political rights, civil liberties, and freedom status. Each of the first two is measured on a one-to-seven scale, with one representing the highest degree of freedom and seven the lowest. “F,” “PF,” and “NF,” respectively, stand for “free,” “partly free,” and “not free.” Countries whose combined averages for political rights and for civil liberties fall between 1.0 and 2.5 are designated “free”; between 3.0 and 5.5 “partly free”; and between 5.5 and 7.0 “not free.”

Yet even as West African countries move toward more substantive democracy beyond mere multiparty elections, the region did not avoid political violence, thereby highlighting the fact that democracy is not an instant panacea for all political problems. A study on conflict around the world concludes, “conflict has declined in eastern and central Africa in the last several years but may be intensifying once again in West Africa” (Marshall and Gurr 2003: 2). The phenomenon of political violence following in the immediate aftermath of transition to democracy is not unique to the West African region, for the same study of global conflict also concludes: “Democratic governance does not guarantee full respect for civil and political rights nor does it necessarily prevent regimes from using coercion against restive citizens or to ‘influence’ the electoral process. The third wave of democratization has been accompanied by an increase in the number of democratic regimes with mixed human rights record” (Marshall and Gurr 2003: 2).[92] Increasingly, the realization is spreading even in pro-democracy circles that democratization does not solve all the problems confronting different societies around the globe. In order to understand how the initial optimism heralding glad tidings in the wake of transition to democracy has so far failed to materialize fully, this chapter argues that African countries in general cannot become free and prosperous to the same level of the democratic countries of Western Europe and North America within a single generation. That desirable state of political bliss can only come about through the synergy of the modern state, capitalism, and liberalism functioning together with democracy in the longue durée. Let me now elaborate this argument with particular reference to Nigeria.

Table 15.1 Selected Years (1975–2000) of Freedom Scores for West African Countries

| S/1 | Country | 1975/76 | 1980/81 | 1985/86 | 1990/91 | 1995/96 | 2000/01 | Observation |

| 1 | Benin | 7,7,NF | 7,6,NF | 7,7,NF | 6,4,PF | 2,2,F | 2,2J | Gain |

| 2 | BurkinoFaso | 6,4,PF | 6,5,PF | 7,6,NF | 6,5,NF | 5,4 JPF | 4,4,PF | Gain |

| 3 | Cameroon | 6,4,PF | 6,6,NF | 6,7,NF | 6,6,NF | 7,5,NF | 7,6,NF | Decline |

| 4 | Cape Verde | 5,5,PF | 6,6,NF | 6,7,NF | 5,5 ,PF | UJ | W | Gain |

| 5 | Central African Republic | 7,7,NF | 7,6,NF | 7,6,NF | 6,5,NF | 3,4,PF | 3,4,PF | Gain |

| 6 | Chad | 7,6,NF | 6,6,NF | 7,7,NF | 7,6,NF | 6,5,NF | 6,5,NF | Gain |

| 7 | Cote d’Ivoire | 6,5,NF | 6,5,PF | 6,5 JF | 6,4,PF | 6,5,NF | 6,5 JPF | Same |

| 8 | Equatorial Guinea | 6,7,NF | 7,6,NF | 7,7,NF | 7,7,NF | 7,7,NF | 7,7,NF | Decline |

| 9 | Gambia (The) | 2AF | 2,2,F | 3,4,PF | 2,2,F | 7,6,NF | 7,5 ,NF | Decline |

| 10 | Ghana | 7,5,NF | 2,3J | 7,6,NF | 6,5,NF | 4,4,PF | 2,3,F | Gain |

| 11 | Guinea | 7,7,NF | 7,7,NF | 7,5,NF | 6,5,NF | 6,5,N 1 | 6,5,NF | Gain |

| 12 | Guinea Bissau | 6,6,NF | 6,6,NF | 6,6,NF | 6,5,NF | 3,4,PF | 4,5,PF | Gain |

| 13 | Liberia | 6,4,PF | 6,6,NF | 5,5,PF | 7,7,NF | 7,6,NF | 5,6,PF | Gain |

| 14 | Mali | 7,7,NF | 7,6,NF | 7,6,NF | 6,5,NF | 2,3,F | 2,3,F | Gain |

| 15 | Mauritania | 6,6,NF | 7,6,NF | 7,6,NF | 7,6,NF | 6,6,NF | 6,5,NF | Gain |

| 16 | Niger | 7,6,NF | 7,6,NF | 7,6,NF | 6,5,NF | 3,5,PF | 4,4,PF | Gain |

| 17 | Nigeria | 6,5,PF | 2,3,F | 7,5,NF | 5,5 ,PF | 7,7,NF | 4,4,PF | Gain |

| IS | Sao Tome and Prinicipe | 5,5,PF | 6,6,NF | 7,7,NF | 5,5,PF | 1,2,F | IAF | Gain |

| 19 | Senegal | 6,4,PF | 4,4,PF | 3,4,PF | 4,3,PF | 4,5,PF | 3,4,PF | Gain |

| 20 | Sierra Leone | 6,5,PF | 5,5JF | 5,5,PF | 6,5,PF | 7,6,NF | 4,5 ,PF | Gain |

| 21 | Togo | 7,6,NF | 7,6,NF | 6,6,NF | 6,6,NF | 6,5,NF | 5,5,PF | Gain |

Source: Freedom House, Annual Freedom in the World Country Scores 1972–73 to 2001–2002.

Following are some clarifying remarks: The characters representing scores for each year are. from left to right, political rights, civil liberties, and freedom status. Each of the first two is measured on a one-to-seven scale, with one representing the highest degree of freedom and seven the lowest. “F.” “PF.” and “NF.” respectively, stand for “free.” “partly free.” and “not free.” Countries whose combined averages for political rights and for civil liberties fall between 1.0 and 2.5 arc designated “free”: between 3.0 and 5.5 “partly free”: and between 5.5 and 7.0 “not free.”

 The Nigerian Case

Although Nigeria’s transition from military regime to elected civilian administration should be seen as part of the wave of political changes that swept away authoritarian regimes across the West African region during the last two decades, the differences among the countries of the region are obvious and important. In particular, Nigeria stands out on a number of important aspects, most notably its sheer size and ethnic heterogeneity. For example, Nigeria’s population estimated at 126.91 million is more than the total populations of half the countries in the region that have more than 5 million people: Burkino Faso (11.27), Cameroon (15.09), Côte d’Ivoire (15.95), Ghana (19.20), Mali (10.84), Niger (10.85), Senegal (9.53), Guinea (7.42), Benin (6.28), Togo (5.28), and Sierra Leone (5.03). None of these countries have more than ten different ethnic groups, whereas Nigeria has more than 250 different ethnic groups. Similarly, while only Cameroon and Côte d'Ivoire have gross domestic products of $10.04 and $11.89 million, respectively, Nigeria's gross domestic product stands at $32.184 millions (World Bank 2002: 5–15). Clearly, these differences between Nigeria and other West African countries must be considered in any comparative analysis —a point discernible in the different roles of Islam during the political transitions.

In May 1999, Nigeria returned to civilian rule after successfully holding elections that ended fifteen years of devastating military (mis)rule that nearly caused the disintegration of the country. For most Nigerians, as well as scholars of Nigerian politics and international observers, the expectations were very high. General Olusegun Obasanjo, the former military head of state who voluntarily handed power to civilians in 1979, was elected largely because he was believed to possess the moral and political integrity to begin the difficult task of reforming Nigeria's moribund political, social, and economic conditions. In his victory speech, General Obasanjo sounded messianic when he proclaimed the "rebirth of our nation" and characterized his election "as a mandate from the people of Nigeria and a command from God Almighty that I should spare no effort in rebuilding this nation" (Obasanjo 1999). The optimism of the international community was expressed by Michael Camdessus, managing director of the International Monetary Fund, in a speech he gave in Nigeria's capital, Abuja, shortly after General Obasanjo's electoral victory was announced. Camdessus declared: "Nigeria has created a new opportunity for economic progress, national harmony, and democracy. Around the world, hopes are high that Nigeria will recover the momentum of development and assume once again its leadership in Africa and among developing countries worldwide" (Camdessus 1999). These optimistic expectations have been cruelly dashed by the horrendous political developments since Nigeria's return to democracy, particularly the escalation of political violence during the last general elections in March-April 2003 (Human Rights Watch 2003). Regrettably, more lives and properties have been lost in repeated incidents of ethnic, religious and political violence since the return of democratic rule in 1999 than at anytime since the end of Nigeria's civil war in 1970.

A careful analysis of these negative political developments will show three sets of distinct but interrelated problems. First, there are problems resulting from weakness of state capacity as evidenced in poor management of the rising tide of ethnic, religious, and political violence as well as an increase in organized violent crimes. Second, there are problems of ethnic chauvinism, religious intolerance and the imperative of peaceful coexistence, and citizenship rights. And third, there are problems of crippling poverty and the widening gap between the rich and poor that have been aggravated by the serious failures of economic policies, including the structural adjustment programs imposed by the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund. Democracy can help to solve these problems in the long run, but in the short run each set of problems calls for a different solution.

More than any other problem, the recurrent waves of ethnic, religious, and political violence seem to have worsened since Nigeria's return to democracy. Although no exact figures are readily available, conservative estimates put the number of people killed at more than ten thousand, and those injured at more than double that number. Additionally, no one knows the exact number of other victims who have been traumatized through loss of family members, neighbors, friends, business associates, and colleagues. [93] Needless to say, no one thought that a return to democracy would produce such a terrible outcome. As Nigerians struggle to understand the seemingly endless and senseless violence, they are increasingly beginning to realize that not all of the political developments that came in the wake of return to democratic civilian rule are wholesome.

* Building Civil Society and Ethnic Identities

In particular, the political radicalization of ethnic identities under the guise of "civil society" and "pro-democracy activism" is beginning to receive critical scrutiny in light of its unhealthy relation to the ethnic militias and vigilante groups that have actively perpetrated some of the most heinous violence. Augustine Ikelegbe observes that consistent with the continental trend in Africa during the 1990s, civil society associations were in the forefront of the struggle for democracy in Nigeria, and were particularly courageous in their opposition to the military regime of General Sani Abach. However, Ikelegbe notes, "Recent events are pointing to the negative roles played by some civil groups in the construction of platforms for ethnic militancy and violent confrontation with other groups and the state." From his case-study of three ethnic associations that have become very active since Nigeria's return to civilian rule in 1999, Ikelegbe demonstrates that their "goals, methods, strategies and tendencies indicate intense primordialism, militancy, and violence." Ikelegbe finds that ethnic associations are becoming perverse by promoting anti-democratic agendas, including ethnic parochial interests and preference for political violence as the strategy for achieving legitimate and not-so-legitimate goals. Observing that ethnic militias are terrorizing innocent citizens to "the applause of their ethnic kinsmen and the horror of Nigerians," Ikelegbe cautions against the danger of ethnic militias: "in plural societies, civil society may become so parochial, divisive, divergent, and disarticulative that it actually undermines democracy" (Ikelegbe 2001: 1–24).

In contrast, R. T. Akinyele contends that ethnic militias, including the Oodua People's Congress (OPC), the Yoruba ethnic militia that had been using violence allegedly in order to protect "the interests of the Yoruba ethnic group," do not undermine the national stability of Nigeria, even though he concedes that "at times, certain ethnic groups have threatened to secede from the federation in order to draw attention to their claim of a right to a greater share of national cake" (Akinyele 2001: 625). Emphasizing the credentials of ethnic militias as civil associations by calling attention to professionals (physicians, lawyers, journalists, academics, and the like) in the ranks of their memberships, and their declared goal to "protect the identities and interests of the groups they represent within the federation (of Nigeria)," Akinyele contends, "the existence of ethnic congresses is compatible with a democratic system because democracy promotes the ideal of self-determination which they preach, and they also act to keep the exploiters in check." Akinyele urges that ethnic militias should be encouraged to form an umbrella organization under which they could articulate their demands. But rather than focusing on the individual rights of citizens, Akinyele neglects to note that the exclusionary demands of ethnic militias are undemocratic, and as Ikelegbe noted correctly, the demands of ethnic militias have been so divisive, often leading to unnecessary mayhem.

Yet despite his enthusiasm for ethnic militias, Akinyele could not overlook the political problems resulting from their use of violence when he concludes that "although…the degree of threat ethnic militias pose to the nation has been exaggerated, the danger becomes great when combined with the agitation for resource control, and adoption of “political sharia,” and inability of the police to guarantee the safety of people’s lives and property” (Akinyele 2001: 640). Akinyele’s conclusion is quite insightful because political violence is deeply connected with the three political problems (political sharia, resources control, and police inability to enforce law and order) that are the most crucial issues to surface in connection with ethnic and religious violence since Nigeria’s return to democracy.

Of course, democracy did not cause each of these three problems, but democracy is unlikely to solve them in the short term either. For example, police inability to protect life and property not only from the politically motivated violence by ethnic militias, but also from the steady rise of violent organized crime points clearly to weak state capacity. Armed robbery has been a major problem during the military regimes, but it has become more violent, more frequent, more brutal, and more daring. According to police statistics on crimes committed between August 2000 and June 2001, “84 policemen were killed nationwide, 273 civilians were killed, 133 policemen were injured, 718 robbers died and, 2,080 robbers were arrested, 729 weapons recovered and police lost 95 weapons” (Olukoya2003). Daily Nigerian newspapers carry screaming headlines on rising waves of violent crimes: “Robbers raid bank, kill two cops” (This Days News 2002), “Robbers injure policeman, snatch 4 cars” (This Days News 2002), “Armed robbers kill 3 policemen at M[uratal] M[ohammed] Airport”(Daily Trust 2002), “Eight feared dead as robbers raid commercial bank” (Vanguard Newspaper 2002), “Bandits kill 3 mobile policemen” (Daily Trust 2003). The criminals committing these outrages in broad daylight usually come in gangs of ten to fifty men dangerously armed with more fire power than the police; hence they easily kill innocent citizens and police officers with impunity. These well-organized criminal gangs are so powerful that they are not afraid to raid official residences of state governors, court premises, and commercial banks. But nothing dramatizes the impotence of Nigeria’s law enforcement agencies like the brazen assassination of Bola Ige, the erstwhile minister of justice and attorney general of Nigeria. Not surprisingly, supporters of ethnic militias and vigilante groups claim that their groups are necessary to give them security for life and property that the Nigerian police have become unable to provide. No one could plausibly claim that democracy caused the rise of organized violent crime. Although democracy may in the long run solve the social and political problems that contribute to the problem of violent crime, the most obvious solution that recommends itself in the short run is strengthening the institutional capacity of the law enforcement agencies of the Nigerian State. In order words, problems arising from weakness of the state call for strengthening the state, a project that is not easily accomplished by democratization.

* The Constitutional Debate

In the same vein, proponents of what has become known as political sharia make the same argument that the stern punishments for crime in Islamic law are the necessary deterrent needed to stem the rising tide of violent organized crime. The complexities of the politics of applying Islamic law in contemporary Nigeria are too many to analyze here; only some of the salient issues can be briefly discussed. First, it is important to realize that Islamic law has been operational among Muslims for centuries before British-imposed colonial rule at the turn of the twentieth century. It is equally important to realize that British colonial authorities suspended only aspects of Islamic criminal law (mainly penal sections of amputation and execution by stoning) that the British found repugnant to their sense of justice. Apart from these changes, the British incorporated Islamic law as one of the three integral parts of Nigeria's legal system—the other two parts were British Common Law and Native Law and Custom of non-Muslim communities. The legal order that the British bequeathed to Nigeria remained substantially unchanged since Nigeria's independence in 1960.[94] Although Muslims have acquiesced in the colonial compromise that omitted the penal aspects of Islamic law, they have occasionally wanted to enhance the status of Islamic law within the Nigerian legal system.

In 1976, the military regime of Generals Murtala Mohammed/Olusegun Obasanjo appointed a committee to draft a new constitution for Nigeria in preparation for returning the country to a democratically elected civilian administration in 1979. In the course of the constitutional debate, Muslims wanted to create constitutional provision for a court structure for Islamic law similar to the structure for Common Law. Such a structure would make it possible for cases involving Islamic law to be tried in sharia courts from local area courts through upper courts with appellate jurisdiction not only in the individual states that operate Islamic courts, but also at the Federal Court of Appeal. Although no Federal Sharia Courts of Appeal were provided for in the Nigerian Constitution of 1979, the compromise reached allowed for cases involving Islamic law to be tried before Judges of the Federal Court of Appeal and Justices of the Supreme Court of Nigeria who have competence in Islamic law.[95] This compromise remained in effect until the 1979 Constitution came up for review under the military regime of General Sani Abacha, ca. 1993–1998. Given the numerous political problems that developed during the 1980s and 1990s, most notably the tension between Muslims and Christians that erupted in a number of violent clashes,[96] the constitutional provisions relative to Islamic law became the subject of acrimonious debates. Christians sought to remove any reference to Islamic law in the Nigerian Constitution, and Muslims wanted to strengthen those provisions and extend the jurisdiction of Islamic law beyond the confine of civil and marital affairs.

The polarized positions were not resolved through a compromise similar to the one reached earlier in 1979; instead, the military regime imposed a lid on the constitutional debate on the issue, thereby keeping the 1979 compromise effectively unchanged. However, because the political atmosphere that made the 1979 compromise feasible has since been replaced by more bitterly polarized politics of violent clashes between Muslims and Christians and also between different ethnic groups, it was clear that the military fiat of terminating the debate on the status of Islamic law in the Nigerian constitution would not be the end of the matter. Therefore, it should not be surprising that when democratically elected civilians took over power from the military regime in May 1999, the hitherto suspended debates about Islamic law resumed in full force albeit in a different political arena.

After assuming office in 1999, the democratically elected Governor Ahmed Sani of Zamfara State announced his decision to expand the scope of Islamic law in order to allow Zamfara State to implement “the full sharia” (Doki 1999: 1–3), including the criminal and penal provisions of Islamic law that were suspended by the British colonial authorities during the colonial era from 1903 to 1960. Thus began the protracted political controversies and violent clashes regarding what has since come to be called “political sharia.” Following Governor Ahmed Sani’s decision in Zamfara, it became virtually impossible for all the democratically elected governors of states with substantial Muslim populations in northern Nigeria to resist tremendous popular demand for the implementation of full sharia. To date, twelve of the nineteen states of northern Nigeria have officially adopted similar but no identical policies of expanding the jurisdiction of Islamic law. One sentence of amputation for theft was carried out in 2000 in Zamfara, and two sentences for death by stoning for adultery were overruled on appeal to Sharia Courts of Appeal, while two other cases are still in process. Reactions to these developments have ranged widely from local activists to global organizations and even heads of governments, and from praise to outrage.[97]

Some of the issues raised in these reactions are particularly relevant here. First, violent clashes between Muslims and Christians have resulted on several occasions when proponents and opponents of implementing full sharia took to street demonstrations to make their case. In particular, the breakdown of law and order in Kaduna in 2000 and Jos in 2001 resulted in the horrific deaths of thousands and destruction of property worth millions. In addition, thousands have been forced to relocate to other states, losing their businesses, homes, friends and families. As already noted in Akinyele's article, non-Muslim Nigerians regard the overwhelming support of Muslims for implementing the full sharia as a politically calculated move by the Hausa/Fulani ethnic group (majority of which are Muslims) to compensate for their loss of power at the federal level since Nigeria's return to democratically elected civilian government, headed by President Obasanjo, who is a Christian, Yoruba, and from southern Nigeria. Seen by other Nigerian ethnic groups as political radicalization of Hausa/Fulani ethnic/religious identity, the violent conflicts over the full sharia become more difficult since they now relate to communal identity on which compromise is not as easy as in conflicts over other issues. Robin Williams, Jr. observes: "Both interethnic and ethnic-state conflicts tend to be severe, protracted, and intractable. At the extremes, the stakes are total: survival versus genocide" (Williams 1994: 49).[98] But the more relevant point to my main argument is that the increasing violence is severely overtaxing the already weakened ability of the law-enforcement agencies to maintain basic security of life and property; on several occasions, soldiers had to intervene because of police inability to restore law and order. Clearly, the popularity of "application of full sharia" is only one of the emerging responses to the weakening capacity of the Nigerian state that has been going on for at least the last two decades, a development that should be seen in the context of worldwide transformation of the state system in this era of globalization. Significant dimensions of the global transformation of the state system include: (1) contraction of state capacity through incremental decay resulting from patrimonialism, particularly in African and Arab countries; (2) deregulation and privatization of state economic enterprises through structural adjustment programs; and (3) emergence of new international norms rejecting state sovereignty and reason of state. Some of the vehement opposition to application of Islamic law in Nigeria has come from domestic and international organizations operating within these new international norms, including human rights advocacy and women empowerment groups (Human Rights Watch 2004).

The enormous popular political pressure that compelled many reluctant governors of states with Muslim majorities to adopt the full sharia raises the question of whether Islam is compatible with democracy or not. The contentious debate on this question has not yet come to terms with the paradox of democratic elections producing unintended consequences that could be anti-democratic. This paradox is unavoidable if democracy is understood to entail no more than change of government through periodic free and fair elections open equally to all eligible citizens. Nowadays, democracy is understood to include more substantive criteria such as protection of minorities, gender equality, respect of human rights, liberal attitudes toward cultural difference, secularization or at least tolerance for religious pluralism, equitable distribution of resources, and open market capitalism, and so on. These attributes that characterized the affluent democracies in Western Europe and North America are the outcomes of a well-articulated system comprising different elements: the organizational and technical capabilities of modern states, liberalism, efficient open-market economy (capitalism), and democracy. While different models of democratic rule (such as consociation and proportional representation) can effectively solve the political problems of divided societies, no model of democratic rule is particularly capable of solving the problems of weak states because state-building requires concentration of power but democracy dictates the need for power sharing. The disarticulation between the two conflicting imperatives of strengthening state and consolidating democracy helps to explain why Nigeria’s problems, including escalating organized crime, ethnic, religious and political violence, have persisted and in some cases worsened after the country’s return to democracy. Historically, states have only strengthened their capacities through war-making (Finer 1975: 84–163),[99] the quintessential act of violence.

The adoption of full sharia since Nigeria's return to democracy has generated a more favorable attitude toward democracy among Muslims in Nigeria. To explain this development, Michael Bratton speculates, "Because Muslims constitute almost half of the Nigerian population, they calculate that majority rule will not always work to their disadvantage. Or perhaps the introduction of sharia in northern states in the aftermath of democratic transition has favorably flavored their views." Using a public opinion survey conducted by the Afrobarometer between mid-1999 and mid-2001 in Mali, Nigeria, Tanzania, and Uganda, Bratton also demonstrates that "although adherents of Islam in Africa occasionally display distinctive political attitudes, they do not differ much from non-Muslims on the subject of democracy and their differences with others do not always run in an anti-democratic direction. Moreover, any hesitancy about supporting democracy among the African Muslims we interviewed is more due to deficits of formal education and other attributes of modernization than to the influence of religious attachments" (Bratton 2003: 494). This conclusion is consistent with the findings of more and more scholars who challenge the claim that Islam is incompatible with democracy with data from public opinion surveys (Rose 2002; Stephan and Robertson 2003: 30–44; Price 2002: 213–225).[100] Since Muslims constitute at least 15 percent and as much as 90 percent of the populations of West African countries, the interesting question arises: Does the situation in Nigeria predict the future roles of Muslim electorates in West Africa as democracy consolidates in the region?

 Muslim Electorate in West Africa

"Not necessarily" is the simple answer to this question; but a more complex answer will have to take account of the subterranean changes taking place within all the Muslim communities of West Africa. At the moment, none of the West African countries, including those with Muslim majorities, have any active Islamic political project similar to the application of Islamic law in Nigeria. In Senegal there are signs of increasing Islamic political activism. But the long standing modus operandi between the maraboutic families and their mass followers in the Sufi orders on the one hand, and, on the other hand, the Senegalese politicians and ruling elite is so deeply entrenched that the new Muslim political activists have not yet changed the status quo (Beck 2001: 601–622; Villalon 1995; Piga 2002: 43–68). Similarly, Muslim political activists in Mali were visible and loud during the April 2002 general elections. A coalition of Muslim associations campaigned in mosques and on the radio for their favorite presidential candidate, former Prime Minister Ibrahim Boubacar Keita; however, he did not win the election, thus indicating the limited electoral influence of Islamic political activists (Baxter 2002). The visibility of Islamic political activism is even more limited in the rest of West African countries, including countries with clear Muslim majorities, namely: Guinea, Gambia, and Niger. Therefore, one can safely conclude that there are currently no cases in the entire West African region that are comparable to the active role of Islam in Nigerian politics.

Yet the important changes that made Islam politically prominent in Nigeria are, to varying degrees, observable in virtually all the Muslim communities in West Africa. First and foremost are the educational changes shaping the emergence of a new Muslim elite across the region, a development that is also observable in the rest of the Muslim world. The advent of modern/Western education in West Africa came largely through Christian missionaries, who used their schools for effective proselytization. Throughout the colonial period, Muslims avoided sending their children to Christian missionary schools out of the justified fear that the children would be converted to Christianity. Even when public schools were established after independence, Muslims remained suspicious of modern/Western education because Muslims still regarded Western education (even when separated from Christian missions) as a corrupting cultural influence. Consequently, Muslims are politically marginalized because they do not have enough people with the requisite western educational qualifications to actively participate in public affairs, particularly in countries where Muslims are a minority (Benin, Togo, Liberia, Ghana) or simple majority (Burkino Faso, Sierra Leone, and Côte d’Ivoire). In fact, even in countries with clear/substantial Muslim majorities (Senegal, Mali, Guinea, and Niger Republic), the prevailing political order inherited from colonialism does not admit religious players into the system, and may in fact be openly hostile to Islamic political activists. However, three related developments in the last three decades suggest that significant changes in the political profiles of Muslim communities in West African states are on the horizon.

First, Muslims across the region are bridging the educational gap that has been excluding them from active participation in public affairs not only by the increasing acceptance of modern Western education offered in the public schools of their respective countries, but also by modernizing Islamic traditions of learning. The development of the madrasa, the Islamic school modeled on the institutional format of the public schools, has increasingly added modern secular subjects, including French/English, alongside Islamic religious education. Thousands of madrasa graduates have completed their university education, many of them in Arab countries. In Nigeria, the madrasa graduates constitute a new Muslim elite that is in the forefront of Islamic political activism, including the demand for application of Islamic law (Umar 2001:127–150; Barkindo 1993: 91–105; Reichmuth 1993: 179–197). In the rest of West Africa, madrasa graduates are also becoming new Muslim religious elite, agitating for Islamic reforms within their respective Muslim communities. This development has significant political implications not only in terms of leadership of local Muslim communities, but also in terms of the relationships between those communities and the governments of their respective countries, and the international Islamic networks as well.[101]

The second development is the proliferation of Muslim associations of the new nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) kind, whose links to the international networks of Islamic organizations provide them with significant resources and inspirations for political activism. These Muslim NGOs are veritable instruments for political mobilization, and they are poised to contest the political monopoly of the older leadership of Muslim communities. In Nigeria, sectarian divisions among Muslim organizations limited their potential influence in the electoral process. Still, Muslim organizations did provide powerful platforms from which the new Muslim elite could bargain with other political actors within the political order (Umar 2001: 130–138; Kane 2003: 149–177, 207–226; Loimeier 1997: 207–324). As the new Muslim elite become more and more organized, they will most likely chart a different political course in their interface with the governments of their countries, an outcome that is all the more likely in democratic system (Kaba 2000: 89–208; Piga 2002: 43–68).[102]

The third development is transition to democracy, which has been ongoing in the region for the second decade now. As democracy consolidates in various West African countries, the new Muslim elite, along with its civic associations, is likely to become more politically active; it also seems likely that the new elite will seek to mobilize the Muslim electorate. As already noted, the return of democratic politics in Nigeria since 1999 made possible the application of Islamic law in the expanded version that the elected governor of Zamfara state pioneered, and which, subsequently, became impossible for other elected governors of Muslim majority states to resist due to tremendous popular support for applying the full sharia. In free and fair electoral systems, even a small minority can produce significant political impact by casting the winning votes. Therefore, one should expect that as West African democracies consolidate, even the minorities of Muslims comprising 15–20 percent of the national populations of Benin, Ghana, Liberia, and Togo would play more critical political roles. In the countries with larger percentages of Muslims, political participation of the new Muslim elite can be expected to produce changes, even if not necessarily along the lines of the political prominence of Islam in Nigerian politics.

Whereas “no” is the simple answer to the question of whether pattern of Islam and politics in Nigeria predicts a likely trend in the West African region, the more complex answer must be “yes, even if somewhat differently.” The political and social forces that facilitated the increased prominence of Islam in Nigerian politics are three related developments: (1) modernization and expansion of Islamic education and Muslims’ increasing acceptance of modern education; (2) emergence of new Muslim elite and their challenge to traditional leadership of the Muslim community that used to mediate the interface between Muslims and their governments; and (3) Muslim civic associations capable of politically mobilizing Muslim masses. The interactions of these related developments in the Nigerian context play a very crucial role in saturating the public sphere with active Islamic political consciousness that provided the political constituency for popular demands to apply Islamic law after return to democracy. To the extent that similar developments are also observable in all the Muslim communities of West Africa, then the increased visibility of Muslim political activism cannot be entirely ruled out in the region. Of course, the local conditions in the different countries will certainly shape the trajectories and outcomes of Islam and politics in each country. Still, the local, national, and regional specificities of Islam and politics in West Africa in the era of global democratization can be compared meaningfully to similar developments in the other regions of the world as well.

 Conclusion

Does democratic transition help to resolve or aggravate violent political conflicts in general, and ethnic and religious conflicts in particular? Proponents of the “democratic peace” theories respond to this question in the affirmative. Although initially the democratic peace was thought to be observable only in the international relations among democracies, it has now been extended to support the contention that democracies are also more peacefully internally (Hegre et al. 2001: 33–48; MacMillan 2003: 233–243; Bueno de Mesquita et al. 1999: 791–807).[103] Proponents of democratic peace locate the obvious anomaly of political violence in newly established democracies in the relative weakness of the democratic institutions that serve as the causal mechanism that theoretically accounts for the observed phenomenon of democratic peace. For example, Hegre and his collaborators observe that whereas authoritarian states and established democracies experience fewer civil wars, intermediate regimes including semi-democracies, are more prone to political violence because “semi-democracies are partly open yet somewhat repressive, a combination that invites protest, rebellion, and other forms of civil disobedience. Repression leads to grievances that induce groups to take action, and openness allows for them to organize and engage in activities against the regime. Such institutional contradictions imply a level of political incoherence, which is linked to civil conflict” (Hegre et al. 2001: 33). Furthermore, Hegre and his collaborators contend: “in short run, a democratizing country will have to live through unsettling period of change. But if we focus on countries that are at least halfway toward complete democracy, the prospects for domestic peace are promising. There is a democratic civil peace, and it may be achieved in the short run in some countries” (Hegre et al. 2001: 44). The central weakness of this argument is the failure to isolate democracy as the cause for peace in the established democracies of Western Europe and North America since those countries are also characterized by strong states, prosperous economies and political liberalism—each of these three can equally plausibly explain the so-called democratic peace. The argument also neglects to note that it took centuries for these established democracies to evolve the synergy among their strong states, political liberalism, open market economies and democracy in a systemic way that has minimized political violence in the last fifty years or so.

Alternative explanation to the democratic peace emphasizes strong states as the most critical players in maintaining peace and security. For example, John Mueller has demonstrated that even a small cadre of disciplined and well-trained police force can easily contain internal political violence (Mueller 2003: 507–518); and that the external violence of war among states has become obsolete among strong states and “remnants of war” are observable only among weak states (Mueller 2000: 52–70). This line of argument has gained more credence through an empirical study of the causal relationship between political violence and democratization in African countries during the 1990s. In his insightful study, Zeric K. Smith draws a distinction between political liberalization, which entails “relaxation of political control on the part of authoritarian rules,” and democratization, which means “open contestation over the right to win control of the government, and this in turn requires free, competitive elections, the results of which determine who governs” (Smith 2000: 24–25). The critical difference is that political liberalization means respect for human rights and basic civil liberties such as freedom from arbitrary arrest and detention, freedom of press, speech, association, etc, but on the other hand democracy relates more directly to political rights to seek and hold power through free and fair elections open to all eligible citizens. Smith finds that political liberalization does not lead to an increase in ethnic conflict, and that “even after a two-year and a three-year lag, democratized political institutions seem to have no statistically demonstrable influence in lowering (or raising) ethnic conflict” (Smith 2000: 34). Thus, consistent with my main argument, the so-called “democratic peace” is not simply the direct outcome of democracy. Whereas John Mueller calls attention to the centrality of strong state in maintaining peace, Smith’s findings show that liberalization “has a significant and robust negative influence on ethnic conflict scores,” but democratization shows no impact on ethnic conflict.

Equally important in Smith’s findings is that more than either liberalization or democratization, economic conditions as measured in low rates of gross national product (GNP) and infant mortality rate (IMR) are more reliable predictors of ethnic conflict, because “rising levels of economic and social well-being are systematically related to lower levels of ethnic conflict” (Smith 2000: 35). Therefore, one can plausibly argue that extreme poverty and a widening gap between the rich and the poor are the root causes of the problems of political violence, and that democratic peace in the democracies of Western Europe and North America is due to their higher levels of economic prosperity than to their democratic system of government. In its simplest form, this point derives from the long-standing theories of deprivation. No matter how one disagrees with the classical formulations of deprivation, one must concede the strong relevance of economic realities in explaining social and political affairs, particularly the problem of political violence. As in the case with the problems of state capacity, the logic of economic development is not necessarily the same as the logic of democracy, as evidenced in the emergence of Southeast Asian new economies, which began to democratize only after their economies had become prosperous. It is also important to note that the Southeast Asian rapid economic development came not through unregulated market economy of the type that World Bank and IMF structural adjustment programs imposed on African countries, but through the well-coordinated policies of the "developmental state" (Leftwich 1996). While properly functioning market economy may in the long run be more prosperous than other systems, it is not capable of eradicating all economic problems, most notably the widening gap between rich and poor. Market economies work best in strong states that are capable of effectively regulating the market and pursuing healthy economic policies including reduction of poverty by increasing the income of the poor. But democracy by itself is not necessary for the proper functioning of market economy, and its coincidence in Western Europe is just that: a coincidence. The prosperous economies of Southeast Asia are the clearest proof, for even Japan's de facto one-party state is not nearly as democratic as it should or could be.

When capable state, political liberalization, effective market economy, and democracy are combined together in a functioning system, the system produces the wholesome effects that characterize the affluent societies of Western Europe and North America. Mere application of one component of the system will not do the magic. In fact, even if all the components of the system are in place, the European experience shows that it took a couple of centuries for the system to produce its present level of desired outcome. But the Southeast Asian example has also demonstrated that tremendous accomplishments can be attained within a single generation. The lesson for Africa is to take each component in due course, and with moderate expectations.

[88] For example, see Barnes (2001: 86–101).

[89] Examples include Ottaway (1999; 2003), Mengisteab and Daddieh (1999), and Joseph (1999). Also see the essays under “Debating the Transition Paradigm,” Journal of Democracy 13, 3 (July 2002): 5–38; and Smith (2003: 357–362).

[90] See Table 15.1.

[91] For more discussion of the relevant literature on this point, see the concluding section of this essay.

[92] For example, see the reflections of British Broadcasting Company correspondent in Nigeria, Bernaby Phillips, at end of his tour of duty in the country, “Farewell to Nigeria,” BBC News Online, World: From Our Own Correspondent, Sunday, 8 July, 2001, 17:58 GMT 18:58 UK. See also Usman (2003).

[93] For different perspectives on these developments, see Umar (2006:157–208); Osteien (1999). See also Anderson (1954: 171–224).

[94] For example, see Ofonagoro (1978); Abdullahi (1980: 37–42); Sulaiman (1981: 39–62); Laitin (1982: 411–30).

[95] For example, see Falola (1998).

[96] For example, see Kalu (2003: 389–408); Ukiwo (2003: 115–38); Center for Religious Freedom (2003); Yadudu (2002); Aliyu (2002: 31–44); Center for the Study of Islam and Democracy (2004:1–3); Naniya (2002: 14–31); Nmehielle (2004: 730–759); Ostien (2000: 1–35).

[97] See also Sanders (2002: 327–57).

[98] See also Young (1994: 77–140)

[99] See also the essays under “What is Liberal Islam?” Journal of Democracy 14, 2 (April 2003): 19–49.

[100] The most systematic study of the educational changes and their political and social implications is Brenner (2001). Also see Abdolaye (2002: 129–46); Holtedahl and Djingui (1997: 254–85). For the connections between Islam in West Africa and the international Islamic networks, see Hunwick (1998: 28–54).

[101] See also Launay (1992).

[102] See also Jungblut and Stoll (2002: 527–546).

 References

<biblio>

Abdolaye, Galilou. 2002. “The Graduates of Islamic Universities in Benin: A Modern Elite Seeking Social, Religious, and Political Recognition.” In Islam in Africa: Handbook of the Sociology Islam 4, edited by Thomas Bierschenk and Georg Stauth. Munster: Lit Verlag.

Abdullahi, S. U. “Shehu Abdullahi Ibn Fudi’s Legal View and Its Relevance to Contemporary Nigeria.” Kano Studie NS 2, 1 (1980).

Akinyele, R.AT. “Ethnic Militancy and National Stability in Nigeria: A Case Study of the Oodua Peoples Congress.” African Affairs 100 (2001).

Aliyu, Ibrahim A. “Sharia’ Implementation So Far: Problems and Prospects.” Journal of Islamic and Comparative Law 23 (2002).

Anderson, Norman J. D. 1954. Islamic Law in Africa. London: Her Majesty’s Stationary Office.

“Armed robbers kill 3 policeman at M[uratal] M[ohammed] Airport.” Daily Trust (May 27, 2002).

“Bandits kill 3 mobile policeman.” Daily Trust (August 22, 2003).

Barkindo, Bawuro.1993. “Growing Islamism in Kano City Since 1970: Causes, Forms, and Implications.” In Muslim Identity and Social Change in Sub-Saharan Africa, edited by Louis Brenner. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.

Barnes, Samuel H. “The Contribution of Democracy to Rebuilding Postconflict Societies.” American Journal of International Law 95, 1 (January 2001).

Baxter, Joan. “Mali’s Muslim Leaders Back Ex-Premier.” BBC News Online http://news. bbc.co.uk/. World: Africa, Friday (April 26, 2002, 18:09–19:09 GMT).

Beck, Linda J. “Reining in the Marabouts: Democratization and Local Governance in Senegal.” African Affairs 100 (2001).

Bratton, Michael. “Briefing: Islam, Democracy and Public Opinion in Africa.” African Affairs 102 (2003).

Brenner, Louis. 2001. Controlling Knowledge: Religion, Power and Schooling in a West African Muslim Society. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.

Camdessus, Michel. “Supporting Nigeria’s Recovery: An IMF’s Perspective.” Address delivered at “Nigera: The Way Forward” Conference. 18 March, 1899, Abuja, Nigeria.

Center for Religious Freedom (A Division of Freedom House). 2003. The Talibanization of Nigeria: Sharia Law and Religious Freedom. Washington, DC.

Center for the Study of Islam and Democracy (Washington, DC). “The Implementation of Shari’a in a Democracy: The Nigerian Experience.” Muslim Democrat 6 2 (November 2004). Available: www.islam-democracy.org (accessed on November 13, 2004).

De Mesquita. Bruce Bueno, et al. “An Institutional Explanation for the Democratic Peace.” American Political Science Review 93, 4 (December 1999).

Doki, Abdullahi. “Islamic State of Zamfara: What It Is; and What It Is Not.” Weekly Trust (Nigeria, Kaduna) 2, 31 (October 8–14, 1999).

“Eight feared dead as robbers raid commercial bank.” Vanguard Newspaper (July 19, 2002).

Falola, Toyin. 1998. Violence in Nigeria: The Crisis of Religious Politics and Secular Ideologies. Rochester, NY: University of Rochester Press.

Finer, Samuel E. 1975. “State- and Nation-Building in Europe: The Role of the Military.” In The Formation of National States in Western Europe, edited by Charles Tilly. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Freedom House. Annual Freedom in the World Country Scores 1972–73 to 2001–2002. www.freedomhouse.org Gibson, Clark C. “Of Waves and Ripples: Democracy and Political Change in Africa in the 1990s.” Annual Review of Political Science 5 (2002): 201–221.

Hegre, Havard, et al. “Toward a Democratic Civil Peace? Democracy, Political Change and Civil War, 1816–1992.” American Political Science Review 95, 1 (March 2001).

Holtedahl, Lisbet, and Djingui Mahmoudou. 1997. “The Power of Knowledge: The Life of Alhaji Ibrahim Goni, Islamic Judge in Nagaoundere, Northern Cameroon.” In African Islam and Islam in Africa: Encounters between Sufis and Islamists, edited by David Westerlund and Eva Evers Rosander. Athens: Ohio University Press.

Human Rights Watch. “Second Statement by the National Democratic Institute and The Carter Center on the 2003 Nigerian Electoral Process, March 16–21, 2003.” In Testing Democracy: Political Violence in Nigeria. 15, 9(a) (April 2003).

Human Rights Watch. “Political Sharia? Human Rights and Islamic Law in Northern Nigeria.” Human Rights Watch 16, 9(a) (September 2004).

Hunwick, John. 1998. “Sub-Saharan African and the Wider World of Islam: Historical and Contemporary Perspectives.” In African Islam and Islam in Africa: Encounters between Sufis and Islamists, edited by David Westerlund and Eva Rosander. Athens: Ohio University Press.

Ikelegbe, Augustine. “The Perverse Manifestation of Civil Society: Evidence from Nigeria.” Journal of Modern African Studies 39, 1 (2001).

“The Implementation of Shari’ah in a Democracy: The Nigerian Experience.” Muslim Democrat 6, 2 (November 1004): 1–3. Available: www.islam-democracy.org (accessed on November 13, 2004).

Joseph, Richard (ed.). 1999. State, Conflict, and Democracy in Africa. Boulder CO: Lynn Rienner.

Jungblut, Bernadette M. E., and Richard Stoll. “The Liberal Peace and Conflictive Interactions: The Onset of Militarized Interstate Disputes, 1950–78.” Journal of Peace Research 39, 5 (2002).

Kaba, Lansine. 2000. “Islam in West Africa: Radicalism and the New Ethic of Disagreement, 1960–1990.” In The History of Islam in Africa, edited by Nehemia Levtzion and Randall L. Pouwels. Athens: Ohio University Press.

Kalu, Ogbu U. “Safiyya and Adamah: Punishing Adultery with Sharia Stones in the Twenty-First Century Nigeria.” African Affairs (2003).

Kane, Ousmane. 2003. Muslim Modernity in Postcolonial Nigeria: A Study of the Society for the Removal of Innovation Reinstatement of Tradition. Leiden: Brill.

Laitin, D. P. “The Shari’ah Debate and the Origins of Nigeria’s Second Republic.” Journal of Modern African Studies 20, 3 (1982).

Launay, Robert. 1992. Beyond Stream: Islam and Society in West African Town. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press.

Leftwich, Adrian (ed.). 1996. Democracy and Development: Theory and Practice. Cambridge, UK: Polity Press.

Loimeier, Roman. 1997. Islamic Reform and Political Change in Northern Nigeria. Evanston, IL: Northwestern University Press.

MacMillan, John. “Beyond the Separate Democratic Peace: A Review Essay.” Journal of Peace Research 40, 2 (2003).

Marshall Monty G., and Ted R. Gurr. 2003. Peace and Conflict 2003: A Global Survey of Armed Conflicts, Self-Determination Movements, and Democracy, Center for International Development and Conflict Management (CIDCM). College Park: University of Maryland.

Mengisteab, Kidane, and Cyrilk Daddieh (eds.). 1999. State Building and Democratization in Africa: Faith, Hope, and Realitie. Westport, CT: Praeger.

Mueller, John. “The Banality of ‘Ethnic War.’” International Security 25, 1 (2000).

Mueller, John. “Policy the Remnants of War.” Journal of Peace Research l40, 5 (2003).

Naniya, Tijjani M. “History of the Sharia in Some States of Northern Nigeria to circa 2000.” Journal of Islamic Studies 13, 1 (2002).

Nmehielle, Vincent O. “Sharia Law in the Northern States of Nigeria: To Implement or Not to Implement, the Constitutionality is the Question.” Human Rights Quarterly 24 (2004).

Obasanjo, General Olusegan. “Nigeria Will Rise Again: The Text of the Address by General Olusegun Obasanjo, Following His Election as President of the Federal Republic of Nigeria.” (March 3, 1999).

Ofonagoro, W. I. (ed.). 1978. The Great Debate: Nigerian Viewpoints on the Draft Constitution, 1976/77. Lagos: Daily Times.

Olukoya, Sam. “Crime War Rages in Nigeria.” BBC (February 20, 2003, 10:14 GMT).

Onabu, Omon-Julius. “Robbers Raid Bank, Kill Two Cops.” This Days News (Benin) (April 18, 2002).

Osteien, Philip. 1999. A Study of the Court Systems of Northern Nigeria. Research Report No 1/99, Center for Development Studies, University of Jos, Nigeria.

Ostien, Phillip. “Islamic Criminal Law: What It means in Zamfara and Niger States.” Journal of Public and Private Law 4, 4 (2000).

Ottaway, Marina. 1999. Africa’s New Leaders: Democracy or Stare Reconstruction, Washington, DC: Carnegie Endowment for International Peace.

Ottaway Marina. 2003. Democracy Challenged: The Rise of Semi-Authoritarianism. Washington, DC: Carnegie Endowment for International Peace.

Piga, Adriana. 2002. “Neo-traditionalist Islamic Associations and the Islamist Press in Contemporary Senegal.” In Islam in Africa: Handbook of the Sociology Islam 4, edited by Thomas Bierschenk and Georg Stauth. Munster: Lit Verlag.

Price, Daniel. “Islam and Human Rights: A Case of Deceptive First Appearances.” Journal for the Scientific Study of Religion 41, 2 (June 2002).

Reichmuth, Stephan. 1993. “Islamic Learning and its Interactions with Western Education in Illorin Nigeria.” In Muslim Identity and Social Change in Sub-Saharan Africa, edited by Louis Brenner. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.

“Robbers Injure Policeman, Snatch 4 Cars.” This Days News. Dateline (May 5, 2002).

Rose, Richard. “Does Islam Make People Anti-Democratic? A Central Asian Perspective.” Journal of Democracy 13, 4 (October 2002).

Sanders, Jimy M. “Ethnic Boundaries and Identity in Plural Societies.” Annual Review of Sociology 28 (2002).

Smith, Adam M. “From Democracy to Conflict: The UN’s Search for Peace and Security.” Security Dialogue 34, 3 (2003).

Smith, Zeric K. “The Impact of Political liberalization and Democratization on Ethnic Conflict in Africa: An Empirical Test of Common Assumptions.” Journal of Modern African Studies 38, 1 (2000).

Stephan, Alfred, and Graeme B. Robertson. “An ‘Arab’ More than ‘Muslim’ Electoral Gap.” Journal of Democracy 14, 3 (July 2003).

Sulaiman, K. R. “The Position of the Shari’ah in the Nigerian Draft Constitution.” Journal of Islamic and Comparative Law 10 (1981).

Ukiwo, Ukoka. “Politics, Ethno-Religious Conflicts and Democratic Consolidation in Nigeria.” Journal of Modern African Studies 41, 1 (2003).

Umar, Muhammad S. “Education and Islamic Trends in Northern Nigeria: The 1970s-1990s.” Africa Today 48, 2 (Summer 2001).

Umar, Muhammad S. 2006. Islam and Colonialism: Intellectual Responses of Muslims of Northern Nigeria to British Colonial Rule. Leiden and Boston: Brill Academic Publishers.

Usman, Bala. “Violent Ethnic Conflicts in Nigeria: Beyond Myths and Mystifications.” Analysis 2, 2 (February 2003).

Villalon, Leonardo. 1995. Citizens and Disciples: Islam, Society and State Power in Senegal: Disciples and Citizens in Fatic. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Williams, Jr., Robin M. “Sociology of Ethnic Conflicts: Comparative International Perspective.” Annual Review of Sociology 20 (1994).

World Bank. 2002. African Development Indicators, 2002. Washington, DC: The World Bank.

Yadudu, Auwalu H. “Sharia Implementation in a Democratic Nigeria: Between Deference to Popular Will and Libertarian Challenges.” A paper presented at the 3rd Annual Conference of the Center for the Study of Islam and Democracy, held at the Sheraton Crystal City Hotel, Arlington, Virginia, USA, on the conference theme “Islam and Political Participation: Ideals, Actors and Process.” (April 6–7, 2002).

Young, Crawford. 1994. The African Colonial State in Comparative Perspectives. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

</biblio>

 16. The Intercultural Construction of Public Authority in Latin America[104]

Donna Lee Van Cott

In the 1990s, most Latin American states experienced steep declines in public support. These were attributable to severe crises of legitimacy and authority for democratic institutions, politicians, and the state that are rooted in long-standing practices of economic exploitation and political exclusion. Although democratic regimes were able to endure, they were unable to establish legitimacy. Increasing economic inequality and the concentration of economic and political power contradicted the value of equality on which democracy rests. Moreover, many sectors of society were unable to exercise in practice the political rights enshrined in existing constitutions or to receive protection from formal legal institutions.

After a long struggle to reestablish and stabilize elected civilian rule in the 1980s, in the 1990s social movements and civil society organizations pressed for improvements in the quality of democracy. They demanded that the state recognize a broad set of internationally recognized human rights and strengthen judicial systems to make them more accessible and accountable to disadvantaged groups. They demanded that political parties be more responsive to voters and that alternative routes to representation be created to circumvent parties' monopoly on formal representation. They demanded mechanisms to facilitate the direct participation of individuals and social groups in public policy decision making (Assies et al. 2002: 13). In addition, in response to the homogenizing effects of globalization, many individuals and social movements promoted the adoption of policies recognizing the region's ethnic diversity.

In response to these multiple crises and the demands of civil society, in the 1990s most states undertook radical constitutional reforms. Throughout the region indigenous peoples' organizations took advantage of these constitutional conjunctures, of their own increasing political strength and public support, and of the weakness of traditional political and social actors, to demand and secure collective constitutional rights that carved out a space of politico-territorial autonomy, while easing access for this once-excluded group to the formal political system. As a result, the region's new constitutions eschew universalist, individualist conceptions of citizenship in favor of recognizing the existence of multiple cultural identities, a limited number of collective rights, and spheres of autonomy for indigenous peoples and, in Colombia and Ecuador, communities of African descent that retain a distinct cultural heritage (Van Cott 2000).

Focusing mainly on the Andean region, this chapter examines how indigenous peoples' movements are using new constitutional rights to propose alternatives to the prevailing economic and political models and to construct intercultural forms of public authority intended to fill the vacuum created by the failure of the state and politicians to respond to pressing societal needs. This shift from "legal-rational" (state) and "charismatic" (populist politicians) to "traditional" (indigenous cultures) forms of public authority recalls Weber's famous articulation of three ideal types of authority and how shifts occur among them (Weber 1946: 78–79). Weber predicted that when one type of authority loses public support, people will search for leadership authority generated by one of the other two sources. In light of the failure of the state and populist politicians to fulfill societal needs, Andean communities have sought refuge in forms of authority derived from indigenous cultures, which are believed to have the sanctity of generations of past practice, but which are mixed with widely accepted, modern democratic practices, such as popular election and transparent policymaking. Following Weber's cyclical model, we may expect that once the new intercultural practices become institutionalized the rational-legal-bureaucratic source of their authority will increase and the cycle will continue.

I concentrate on three spheres of activity: (1) the construction of pluralistic legal systems that recognize indigenous customary law as public and binding, while connecting it to the larger national legal system; (2) the formation of political parties that, although based on indigenous social movement organizations, incorporate non-indigenous individuals and groups in a multiethnic coalition guided by traditional indigenous values; and (3) the efforts of indigenous-dominated local governments to create alternative models of participatory, inter-cultural democracy based on traditional indigenous forms of self-government. I argue that these activities are improving the quality of democracy in the Andes by promoting peaceful intercultural negotiation and infusing Western institutions with the values and authority of indigenous cultural institutions, which have grown in prestige and legitimacy in recent years.

I focus on the Andean region because it is the most ethnically diverse in Latin America (see Table 16.1). A deep divide separates the subordinate darker-skinned population of Amerindian and African descent from the ruling white-mestizo (mixed race) population. As a result, the Andes are home to many of Latin America's most militant and influential indigenous peoples' movements. These movements emerged at the local and regional levels in the 1960s and 1970s and expanded into consolidated regional and national-level social movement organizations in the 1980s and 1990s (Albó 1991; Stavenhagen 1992; Yashar 2005). The Andes are also home to large populations of African descent. Movements emphasizing black ethnic rights and identity emerged in Colombia, Ecuador, and Peru, often mimicking the discourse and strategies of indigenous movements, but they have been far less successful in attracting support from among the populations they claim to represent and in gaining concessions from the state. Therefore, this chapter focuses on the political activities of indigenous peoples.

Table 16.1 Indigenous and Afro-Latin American Populations in the Andes

| | BOLIVIA | COLOMBIA | ECUADOR | PERU | VENEZUELA |

| % indigenous | 6105% | 2.7% | 24.9% | 38.4% | 1.5% |

| % of African | .04% | 26.0% | 10.0% | 5.0% | 10.0% |

| descent |

Sources: 2001 Bolivian census. 1993 Colombian indigenous census. Dcruyttcrc (1997: I); Inter-American Dialogue (2003: 1). The last two sources are likely to undercount ethnic minorities.

 Legal Pluralism and the Intercultural Construction of Legal Authority[105]

Prior to the arrival of Europeans, the peoples indigenous to the Americas had their own legal institutions. The imposition of colonial rule destroyed some of these. Elsewhere they were adapted to the new situation of ethnic domination and to facilitate interactions between colonial and indigenous authorities. Colonial administrators tolerated the self-regulating activities of indigenous authorities with respect to minor, internal matters provided that they did not impinge on “divine and human law” (Yrigoyen 2000: 206). Some indigenous legal systems originated in the colonial period, often imposed by colonial authorities. Over time, Indians appropriated these systems and made them their own. After independence, indigenous legal systems were banned in most areas as part of Latin American states’ efforts to forcibly assimilate the indigenous. Nevertheless, indigenous legal systems persisted, particularly in more remote locations. Closer to state power structures, indigenous communities incorporated more aspects of Western law and culture and were more likely to coordinate their justice systems with those of the state, particularly in cases involving outsiders or serious offenses.

In the last decade, as indigenous movements gained political power and indigenous identity began to confer greater prestige and rights, many indigenous authority systems have been revived (Yrigoyen 2000: 204). These revived systems often undergo significant transformations and some indigenous communities actually have created new justice institutions. For example, García discovered a Quichua community in Ecuador in which community authorities, together with representatives from the Catholic, evangelical and Mormon churches, had established an Autonomous Social Justice Commission, which was not a part of traditional Quichua culture (García 2000: 15). Thus, while observers often receive an essentialized version of indigenous culture and legal systems that is static and purported to protect centuries-old traditions, contemporary indigenous legal systems are flexible and dynamic and many practices and norms are of recent vintage. Their "authenticity" is derived more from the autonomy with which their chosen authorities devise and develop them, than with their historical continuity.

These legal systems have survived because they help to maintain indigenous communities as culturally distinct collectivities, and because they are more efficient, accessible, and culturally appropriate than state systems. Whereas the state's business is done in Spanish in distant urban centers, indigenous legal authorities speak indigenous languages and are located within the community, where cases are handled more quickly and require no lawyers or court costs (Yrigoyen 1999: 44–45). Equally important, the values and goals of indigenous justice reflect those of indigenous cultures, rather than the foreign values of the Western system. For example, while the state emphasizes the goal of punishment, indigenous authorities prioritize the resolution of conflict between the transgressor and the community and the restoration of community harmony.

In the 1990s, recognition of indigenous customary law was incorporated into many Latin American constitutions (see Table 16.2). This recognition resulted from three main sources of pressure on states. First, highly mobilized indigenous organizations for more than a decade had been pressuring the state to recognize their collective rights as peoples (Assies, Van der Haar, and Hoekema 2001; Brysk 2000; Stavenhagen 1992). Second, state justice systems suffered from severe failures of accessibility, efficiency, honesty, and legitimacy. Recognizing indigenous justice systems enabled Andean states to extend the presence of public law throughout their territories, particularly in rural communities (Murga Armas 1999: 330; Van Cott 2000). Third, international norms on human rights had a profound influence in Latin America in the 1980s and 1990s as the region recovered from decades of military rule. All five Andean countries ratified International Labour Organization Convention 169 (1989) on the rights of indigenous and tribal peoples, which requires states to allow indigenous communities to conserve their legal customs and institutions, provided that they do not violate fundamental rights as defined by national or international law.

Table 16.2 State Recognition of Indigenous Customary Law in the Andes

| Country | | Recognition of Indigenous Laws{4} |

| Bolivia | 1967 | Constitution, reformed 1995, Article 171. The natural authorities of the indigenous and campesino communities may exercise functions of administration and application of their own norms as an alternative solution in conflicts, in conformity with their customs and procedures, always providing that they are not contrary to the Constitution and the laws. The law will establish the coordination of this special jurisdiction with the judicial power. |

| Columbia | 1991 | Constitution, Article 246. The authorities among the native peoples may exercise judicial functions within their territorial areas in accordance with their own rules and procedures, which must not be contrary to the Constitution and laws of the Republic. The law shall establish the forms of coordination of this special jurisdiction with the national judicial system. |

| Ecuador | 1998 | Constitution, Article 191. The authorities of the indigenous peoples may exercise functions of justice, applying their own norms and procedures for the solution of internal conflicts in conformity with their customs or customary law, provided that they are not contrary to the Constitution and the laws. The law shall make those functions compatible with the national judicial system. |

| Peru | 1993 | Constitution, Article 149. The authorities of the Campesino and Native Communities, with the support of the Rondas Campesinas, may exercise jurisdictional functions within their territorial ambit in conformity with the customary law, always that they do not violate the fundamental rights of the person. The law shall establish the forms of coordination between this special jurisdiction and the Justices of the Peace, and other instances of Judicial Power. Codigo Procesal Penal, art. 552. The oldest judge shall preside over the tribunal and will resolve [cases] in accordance with the usos y costumbres, equity, and the general principles of the Law whenever possible. |

| Venezuela | 1999 | Constitution, Article 260. The legitimate authorities of the indigenous peoples may apply in their habitat instances of justice based in their ancestral traditions, and that only affect their own members, according to their own norms and procedures, provided that they are not contrary to the Constitution, to the law and to public order. The law shall determine the form of coordination between this special jurisdiction and the national system of justice. |

{4} Constitutional and legislative language is my translation from the original Spanish.

The new regimes of legal pluralism require that some mechanism be created to coordinate them with state law and to mediate conflicts of jurisdiction or norms. In fact, things are not so simple. In recent years, as the state and Western society have encroached more upon indigenous spheres of autonomy, state law has had a profound influence on indigenous law. Exposure to state norms often prompts changes in how community justice is administered, particularly if authorities are not sure how to proceed, their own law is incomplete or unclear, or if they are worried about the penalties for breaking state law (Orellana 1998: 233). New forms of customary law—such as the crime-fighting rondas campesinas developed by indigenous peasants in northern Peru in the 1980s—often mimic what rural peasants consider to be the best practices of state law and police procedure (Starn 1999). In addition, the proximity of the state affects how indigenous authorities practice their judicial duties. The threat of referring a matter to the state if community members refuse to obey the rulings of community authorities is an important component of the sanctioning authority of indigenous customary law, while the possibility of state intervention induces indigenous authorities to exercise their powers with caution. Indigenous authorities may consider cases involving serious infractions but then decide to refer them to the state system, particularly when they result from conflicts that the community has been unable to reconcile internally, where the transgressor is a repeat offender, or where the case involves non-Indians (Assies 2003; García 2000: 17; Gómez 2000: 13).

Indigenous justice systems increasingly are available to non-Indians, and may even be preferred when state police and courts prove inaccessible or ineffective. In a study of Ecuadorian Quichua communities in the late 1990s, lawyers and judges in cities near indigenous communities that had recently strengthened their legal systems reported a “total absence of claims on the part of the indigenous in legal offices and courts in recent years” (my translation; García 2000: 15). Moreover, mestizos and Indians from communities lacking their own justice authorities were taking their problems to Quichua tribunals, particularly those disputes that the state could or would not resolve (García 2000: 20). Thus, in some areas indigenous justice systems are making public legal authority more available, more effective, and more legitimate for all citizens.

Constitutional language recognizing indigenous law was left deliberately vague and the details were left to ordinary legislation, which was supposed to “compatibilize” or “coordinate” state and indigenous jurisdictions to avoid normative and procedural conflicts. In practice, three issues have been difficult to resolve: (1) should parties to the dispute be allowed to choose between indigenous and state courts, or is one or the other venue mandatory? (2) should indigenous legal authorities adjudicate disputes involving non-Indians or Indians from other cultures and communities? and (3) should indigenous jurisdiction be defined geographically? In practice, such issues have generally been negotiated on a case-by-case basis (see, e.g., García 2000: 21). At the bottom of these disputes are concerns that indigenous law may violate liberal-Western standards of human rights, particularly with respect to the equality of women. In the absence of this legislation states have developed other means of implementing legal pluralism through the courts and through the construction of institutional mediators between the state and indigenous justice systems.

This brief sketch of legal pluralism in the Andes conveys a rosy view of how indigenous justice systems are carving a space for themselves within and articulating themselves to state systems. In some areas, relations between state and indigenous authorities are conflictual and even violent. In others, some community members, particularly women, who are underrepresented as indigenous authorities, are underserved or even exploited by indigenous systems. However, given the abysmal quality and coverage of justice in the Andes, recognition of indigenous legal authority constitutes a vital part of the effort to extend public legal authority throughout fragmented Andean territories.

 Indigenous Political Parties and the Intercultural Construction of Representational Authority

In the 1990s, Andean political party systems were altered radically. Once-dominant parties and party systems crumbled as voters rejected traditional politicians unable or unwilling to combat rampant corruption, to ease the pain of economic adjustment, or to protect citizens from spiraling violent crime. Public opinion polls registered dramatic drops in public support for political parties (Alcántara and Freidenberg 2001: Cuadro IV). Within this context, indigenous peoples formed political parties in all five Andean countries. With the exception of Bolivia, they did so for the first time, encouraged by the success of the indigenous mobilizations of the 1980s and early 1990s, as well as the political opening created by the collapse of party systems in Peru and Venezuela and institutional reforms that made electoral contests more accessible and winnable in Bolivia, Colombia, and Ecuador. They gained immediate success in municipal contests in all five countries, and even in national contests in Bolivia, Colombia, Ecuador and Venezuela (Van Cott 2005).

What is particularly noteworthy about the new indigenous-movement-cum-parties is that, although they promote a clear discourse of demanding rights for indigenous peoples, they have attracted considerable support from non-indigenous voters seeking an alternative to the corrupt, unresponsive political elite. The most successful indigenous parties are those that incorporate non-indigenous intellectuals, political operatives, and social movement activists. These usually are orphaned cadres of an electoral left that saw its vote share decline throughout the region as a result of the worldwide decline of socialism in the late 1980s and the ravages of structural adjustment on union and peasant organizations, the left's traditional base (Roberts 1998, 2002; Tanaka 1998; Burgess and Levitsky 2001). The tendency to court non-indigenous allies and sympathizers is seen both in Colombia, where the minuscule indigenous population needs non-indigenous votes in national elections and in subnational regions where it is a numerical minority, and in Bolivia and Ecuador, where the indigenous population is numerically significant enough to support at least one indigenous-only party.

Ecuador's Movement of Plurinational Unity Pachakutik-New Country (Pachakutik) exemplifies this intercultural strategy. It was formed in 1995 by the Confederation of Indigenous Nationalities of Ecuador (CONAIE) immediately following a successful CONAIE-led mobilization to defeat President Sixto Durán Ballén's neoliberal reform proposal, as well as institutional changes that made electoral participation more accessible for indigenous movements. The experience of working with other popular organizations during the 1995 anti-referendum campaign convinced CONAIE leaders to change their strategy, to broaden the movement's programmatic agenda, and to work on issues of concern to the poor majority and the economically precarious middle class—anti-neoliberalism, privatization and corruption—on which CONAIE could build solidarity with other popular movements (Collins 2001: 14). With few other viable electoral options, much of the left joined the Pachakutik alliance (Sánchez López and Freidenberg 1998: 71).

In 1996, Pachakutik won eight seats in the eighty-two-seat National Congress, which made it the fourth largest bloc, as well as six municipal mayors. It achieved similar results in the 1997 National Constituent Assembly and the 1998 national elections. In 2000, Pachakutik made significant gains in regional elections, winning five of 22 prefectures, twenty-five of 215 mayors, and 60 percent of seats on parish advisory councils. In 2002, Pachakutik formed an electoral coalition with Patriotic Society (PSP), a party led by retired Colonel Lucio Gutiérrez, who had joined CONAIE-president Antonio Vargas in a brief coup attempt in January 2000. The PSP-Pachakutik coalition won the presidential elections, and Pachakutik won five congressional seats on its own, six with the PSP, and three more in alliance with other parties. The alliance lasted less than a year, however; Gutiérrez expelled Pachakutik from the government in August 2003, after its congressional delegation refused to support the president's civil service law. Since that time, Pachakutik has encountered electoral setbacks owing to its association with the discredited Gutiérrez government.

In Bolivia, small groups of indigenous intellectuals and activists formed political parties in the late 1970s and early 1980s, but these never gained more than a seat or two in congress, and most had disappeared by the early 1990s. The militant coca growers' movement, based in Cochabamba, made a second, more successful attempt to launch an indigenous party in 1995, after a new municipal decentralization law provided for direct elections to more than 300 municipal governments. After a promising showing in the 1995 municipal elections, the Assembly of the Sovereignty of the People (ASP) expanded to the national level, winning four seats in the Chamber of Deputies, including one for coca growers' leader Evo Morales. A personal rivalry split the party in 1998. The rump ASP participated in the 1999 elections, but did not run on its own thereafter. The splinter party, Political Instrument for the Sovereignty of the Peoples (IPSP), led by Morales, made significant gains for indigenous peasants in the 1999 municipal elections. Technical difficulties with its registration required it to borrow the registration of the small leftist party Movement Toward Socialism (MAS). As persistent demonstrations against the government's coca eradication policy made Morales a national symbol of rejection of the economic and political status quo, the party's stature rose. In 2002, IPSP/MAS finished second in the presidential contest, less than two percentage points behind the winner. After dominating the 2004 municipal elections, the MAS won the 2005 presidential election with the most decisive victory in twenty years of elections: 54 percent of the vote. The victory also netted the party the largest delegation in the legislature and the leadership of numerous important committees. The MAS is poised to have a major impact on the design of democratic institutions: it dominated the 2006 National Constituent Assembly election, winning 54 percent of seats (www.cne.org.bo, accessed September 23, 2006).

Morales' main rival is Aymara radical Felipe Quispe, who heads the national peasant confederation and who ran for president in 2002 and 2005 with the Indigenous Pachakutik Movement (MIP). After winning a surprising 6.09 percent of the vote in the 2002 presidential election, Quispe's popularity dropped dramatically in 2004 as Morales effectively positioned himself as the most viable candidate of the center-left anti-neoliberal opposition. The party fared poorly in both the 2004 and 2005 contests. The personalist nature of the leadership of both Bolivian indigenous parties is unusual for the new wave of indigenous parties, most of which endeavor to build support for the party as an authentic representative of indigenous peoples, rather than for individual leaders.

Like Pachakutik, IPSP/MAS tried to represent the aggregated demands of the country's neglected and economically suffering poor, in the absence of other coherent, strong, labor or popular movements or leftist parties. Both parties also attracted votes from the middle class and even elites frustrated with the corruption and incompetence of the traditional political class. Party leaders played on growing anti-U.S. nationalism generated by the imposition of harsh structural adjustment policies and, in Bolivia, the forcible eradication of coca leaf.

Although there are some stridently ethno-national indigenous parties in the Andes—the Pachakutik Indigenous Movement of Aymara radical Felipe Quispe is a good example—most recognize that their electoral viability depends on their ability to attract support from non-indigenous voters. In addition, their experience as social movement activists has taught indigenous politicians that separatist appeals tend to backfire and lead to increased repression and the public's rejection of their more moderate rights claims. During the 1980s and 1990s, the discourse of most indigenous peoples' organizations was one of inclusion and equitable participation in the larger state and society, while protecting a zone of autonomy for the development of indigenous culture.

The new ethnic parties have had a number of positive effects on democratic institutions. One of the greatest problems of contemporary Latin American parties is their distance from social groups and lack of responsiveness to voters (Roberts 2002: 21). The new ethnic parties offer a healthy model of party-voter linkage because they are more effectively connected to civil society through organic ties to social movements and the associative networks in which they operate, and because they offer a coherent ideology and programmatic goals. Second, indigenous parties have put themes on the agenda that had not previously found a place in mainstream political discourse: the value of recognizing and respecting cultural diversity; the problem of racial discrimination and oppression; and the need of civil society groups for autonomy from political parties and the state. The popularity of these new themes has forced traditional parties to include them in their own agendas. Indigenous parties provide a national platform to challenge the political status quo and the ideologies, symbols, and values on which it is based (Herzog 1987: 326). They serve as voices for all of the disenfranchised and disaffected, offering a critique of the state and regime that otherwise might not be represented in national politics. Third, indigenous parties have introduced more transparent and democratic modes of doing politics. Several ethnic parties have been crusaders against corruption and patronage-based politics. In the Ecuadorian congress, although some indigenous legislators have been caught in the web of corruption and clientelism that pervades Ecuadorian politics, others have been among the most important crusaders against corruption, and have denounced and expelled party members linked to it. In Bolivia, following the 2002 elections, both indigenous party leaders refused to participate in the post-electoral pact-making on which Bolivian governments have been erected since 1982. Morales' party IPSP/MAS has distinguished itself by its ethical behavior. In August 2002, it championed a failed proposal to lower congressional salaries.

Finally, the new indigenous parties are more likely to be internally democratic, in contrast with many traditional Latin American parties, because they often incorporate indigenous cultural norms of consensus-building and participatory decision making. Although there are cases of a single figure dominating an indigenous party—such as Evo Morales or Felipe Quispe—there are more cases where leadership and candidate renewal is the norm. Participatory norms extend to public policymaking and parties' platforms are typically discussed in multiple, lengthy assemblies. After Pachakutik began a practice of discussing proposed laws with the people affected, some legislators from other parties began to incorporate more popular participation in the design of laws. From the beginning, Pachakutik promised not simply to gain power, but to transform politics, to make it more participatory, ethical, and moral. Luis Macas notes, "What we have achieved, then, is perhaps the participation of the people in the legislative process, the practice of social sectors mobilizing themselves when a law affecting them is discussed" (interview, Luis Macas, July 28, 1999).

 Alternative Models of Participatory, Intercultural Local Governance

Indigenous parties that have gained control of municipal governments have instituted a variety of institutional innovations to promote intercultural negotiation and consensus-building, while fostering a greater level of participation of common citizens in policy-making and development planning. The most dramatic changes have occurred in Ecuador, where capturing local government in order to install more culturally sensitive, equitable, and participatory governing processes has been a main goal of the indigenous movement since the early 1990s.

In Ecuador, experiments in intercultural government began after 1992, when indigenous movement leaders gained local office running with a variety of political parties. It followed a decade of decentralization efforts that resulted in the creation of new municipalities (Torres 1999: 15). Throughout Latin America, decentralization drives in the 1980s and 1990s opened space for experiments in participatory, more transparent, local democracy, which social movements increasingly demanded (Assies, Calderón and Salman 2002: 14). In Ecuador, these experiments intensified and attracted the support of international donors after 1996, when the new indigenous-movement-based party Pachakutik elected six mayors who promised to install a more participatory, ethnically inclusive model of government. International donors like the World Bank, who had been promoting municipal decentralization, participatory development, and ethnodevelopment, began to provide financial resources for development projects in indigenous-run municipalities (Radcliffe 2001: 2–4). Indigenous mayors' preferential access to international resources has been crucial in securing support from non-indigenous elites, who realize that they could not obtain such support on their own (Larrea and Larrea 1999: 149). Thus, in Ecuador, a variety of forces generated the new intercultural alternative municipal governments: the elite-driven policy of municipal and state reform; economic incentives and urging from international donors; links to a transnational discourse on decentralization, participatory democracy, and ethnodevelopment; demands of a variety of popular organizations, particularly indigenous organizations, for greater participation in local government; the conscious decision of the indigenous political party Pachakutik to offer a new type of local government; and the courage and determination of several indigenous mayors in fulfilling this promise (Ortiz Crespo 1999: 66; Radcliffe 2001: 7; Torres 1999: 21).

In Ecuador, although the state provided a legal framework for municipal decentralization, indigenous mayors and organizations worked with a variety of nongovernmental organizations to design new institutions. These new participatory institutions combined local indigenous cultural practices and values—such as a tradition of collective work, frequent public assemblies, and consensus-building—with participatory methodologies that NGOs developed or adapted from experiences elsewhere. Several have invoked the ancient Quichua governance motto: “don’t lie, don’t steal, don’t be lazy,” which indigenous delegates to the 1998 constituent assembly inserted in the Ecuadorian constitution (Flor 2001: 9). The mayors themselves have been the most important protagonists. They must confront the opposition of mestizo elites, who impugn their competence, as well as demands from indigenous organizations for their complete attention after years of neglect from municipal governments catering only to urban, mestizo constituents. The most successful mayors have made a concerted effort to reach out to urban, mestizo groups; they understand that without non-indigenous citizens on board, little can be accomplished (MUPP 1999).

By 1999, at least thirty (of 218) Ecuadorian municipalities were using some type of participatory planning methodology (Ortiz Crespo 1999: 70) and twenty were engaged in “participatory, sustainable long-term development programs” (Radcliffe 2001: 5). In indigenous-run municipalities, municipal spending is more transparent and clientelism has been reduced (Larrea and Larrea 1999: 137). Similar practices are underway in majority-indigenous Guatemala, which has the largest number of municipalities governed by indigenous officials (León 2002: 26). In April 1996, Guatemalan indigenous authorities formed the Guatemalan Association of Indigenous Mayors and Authorities in order to “defend, exercise and develop true municipal autonomy, in fraternity with the different municipalities, applying Mayan values of political participation” (Ruiz Hernández and Burguete Cal y Mayor 2001: 40).

Numerous obstacles exist to the construction of these promising local government alternatives in Ecuador and elsewhere in the Andes. Chief among them are the resistance of the politicians they displace, the lack of public management training and experience among indigenous politicians, the lack of resources and clear guidelines from weak national governments, a weak economic base for economic development initiatives, which are considered to be the backbone of local participatory democracy (Torres 1999: 32), and the persistence of racism and authoritarianism. In addition, gender discrimination pervades indigenous and mestizo-led governments alike. In majority-indigenous Bolivia, intercultural innovations in local democracy are inhibited by the rigidity of state-imposed municipal procedures and structures and the lack of a legal framework for the creation of “indigenous municipalities,” which would give indigenous-majority municipalities the right to incorporate indigenous cultural traditions into municipal government.

 Conclusion

I have argued that indigenous social movements have improved the quality of democracy in Latin America. As they launch serious challenges to the concentration of power in the hands of light-skinned elites and to their exclusionary models of governance they propose alternative models that are more participatory and tolerant of diversity. However, I do not mean to give the impression that these movements do not generate conflict and instability. On the contrary, indigenous movements in Ecuador, Bolivia, and Peru have contributed to the ouster of elected presidents and have led or participated in mass protests that severely disrupted the economy and generated moderate amounts of violence. Severe internal divisions—over strategy, access to leadership and resources, and ideology—impair the indigenous movements’ capacity to act as a coherent, unified voice for the indigenous population or the wider, disaffected public. Thus, even as indigenous movements improve the quality of democratic representation and participation, increase the availability of responsive justice mechanisms, and raise important issues that other civil society groups have been unable to put on the national agenda, they present significant challenges to Latin American states. These suffer from endemic weaknesses similar to but not as severe as those that Mengisteab and Umar identify in sub-Saharan Africa. In particular, Latin American legislatures and executives have difficulty making and executing decisions, judicial systems frequently violate or fail to protect the rights of poor and marginalized groups, public services are poor or nonexistent, and police are unable to stop rising crime rates. Although, ideally, state-building should precede the challenging tasks of democratization and interethnic accommodation, in Latin America all three processes are occurring simultaneously, with uneven and often-contradictory effects.

Indigenous mobilizations have fostered rather than weakened democracy because they have occurred in a context of profound and widespread public dissatisfaction with the prevailing economic and political models and of the weakness of the left and other popular movements in most Latin American countries. Thus, in some cases, only the indigenous movement is able to articulate a coherent alternative. Successful indigenous movements have made a conscious decision to seek non-indigenous allies and to work within existing political institutions in order to reshape them from inside. They seek not to monopolize access to national power but, rather, to appropriate an equitable share for all excluded groups. Although indigenous radicals promote a discourse of separatism and the construction of utopian, indigenous-only institutions, more numerous, moderate, Western-educated indigenous leaders are willing to negotiate for local indigenous autonomy in primarily indigenous zones, alongside more intercultural institutions at levels where indigenous peoples must coexist with others.

Second, indigenous peoples have a unique place as an ethnic group in Latin American society. National myths of nation-formation recognize the historical roots of the nation in pre-Colombian indigenous civilizations and enable all citizens in Andean countries to claim indigenous culture as part of their own history. This intellectual link to a shared pre-Colombian past lays the basis for claims of authority based in indigenous traditional cultures to resonate widely. The cases presented are especially instructive because they deal with indigenous peoples' rights, which present a particularly difficult challenge to liberal-Democratic institutions (Kymlicka 1995; Tully 1995; Young 1990), and because the states and economies involved are among the most troubled in the Western Hemisphere. If even modest achievements can be secured in these "most-difficult cases," perhaps they can offer useful lessons for intractable interethnic conflicts elsewhere, where the mobilization of ethnic identities within and across borders has resulted only in violence and the destruction of democratic institutions.

[103] The author wishes to thank Abril Trigo and the editors of this volume for helpful comments on a previous draft.

[104] This section is based on Van Cott (2006).

[105] For more information on and analysis of indigenous political parties in all five Andean countries, see Van Cott (2005).

 References

<biblio>

Albó, Xavier. 1991. “El retorno del indio.” Revista Andina, año 9, 2 (dic.): 299–331.

Alcántara Sáez, Manuel, and Flavia Freidenberg. “Los partidos políticos en América Latina. América Latina Hoy 27 (April 2001):17–35.

Assies, Willem, Marco Antonio Calderón, and Ton Salman. 2002. Ciudadanía, cultura política y reforma del estado en América Latina. Michoacán: El Colegio de Michoacán, IFE.

Assies, Willem. 2003. “Indian Justice in the Andes: Re-rooting or Re-routing?” In Imagining the Andes: Shifting Margins of a Marginal World? edited by Ton Salman and Annalies Zoomers. Amsterdam: CEDLA.

Assies, Willem, Gemma van der Haar, and André Hoekema (eds.). 2001. The Challenge of Diversity. Indigenous Peoples and Reform of the State in Latin America. Amsterdam: Thela Thesis.

Brysk, Alison. 2000. From Tribal Village to Global Village: Indian Rights and International Relations in Latin America. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press.

Burgess, Katrina, and Steven Levitsky. “Explaining Mass Populist Party Adaptation: Environmental and Organizational Determinants of Party Change in Argentina, Mexico, Peru and Venezuela.” Paper prepared for the XXIII Meeting of the Latin American Studies Association, Washington, DC (September 6–8, 2001).

Collins, Jennifer N. 2001. “Opening Up Electoral Politics: Political Crisis and the Rise of Pachakutik.” Paper prepared for the xxiii meeting of the Latin American Studies Association. Washington, DC (September 6–8 2001).

Deruyttere, Anne. 1997. Indigenous Peoples and Sustainable Development. The Role of the Inter-American Development Bank. Washington, DC: Inter-American Development Bank.

Flor, R. Eulalia.. “Interculturalidad al fronterizar poder, política y representación en Ecuador: Experiencias en algunos municipalidades.” Paper prepared fpr the xxiii Meeting of the Latin American Studies Association. Washington, DC (September 6–8, 2001).

García Serrano, Fernando. “Formas indígenas de administración de justicia: Tres estudios de caso de la nacionalidad quichua de la sierra y amazonía ecuatoriana.” XII Congreso Internacional Derecho Consuetudinario y Pluralismo Legal. Desafíos en el Tercer Milenio. Arica, Chile. (March 13–17, 2000). http://geocities.com/alertanet/index.html.

Gómez, Magdalena. “Derecho Indígena y constitucionalidad.” Ponencia presentada en el XII Congreso Internacional de la Comisión de Derecho Consuetudinario y Pluralismo Legal.” Arica, Chile (March 2000) Obtained from Alertanet web site, http://geocities.com/alertanet.

Herzog, Hanna. “Minor Parties: The Relevancy Perspective.” Comparative Politics 19 (April 1987): 317–329.

Inter-American Dialogue. 2003. Race Report. Washington, DC: Inter-American Dialogue.

Kymlicka, Will. 1995. Multicultural Citizenship. Oxford: Clarendon Press.

Larrea, Ana María, and Fernando Larrea. 1999. “Participación ciudadana, relaciones interétnicas y construcción del poder local en Saquisilí.” In Ciudadanías Emergentes: Experiencias democráticas de desarrollo local. Quito: Ediciones Abya Yala.

León, Jorge. 2002. “La política y los indígenas en América Latina: La redefinición de las relaciones entre el Estado y los pueblos indígenas.” Prepared for Oxfam America and Ford Foundation.

Macas, Luis. Personal Interview (July 28, 1999).

MUPP. “Desafíos de los municipios innovadores.” Pachakutik. Revista de debate político 1 (July1999): 66–67.

Murga Armas, Jorge. 1999. “Efectos de la nueva Legislación Procesal Penal para los Pueblos Indígenas de Guatemala (Los Juzgados de Paz Comunitarios).” In Memoria. II Seminario Internacional sobre Administración de Justicia y Pueblos indígenas, 323–344. San José: Instituto Interamericano de Derechos Humanos.

Orellana Halkyer, René. “Escenarios Locales de Resolución de Conflictos: Derechos Consuetudinario y Recorsos naturales en el Perú.” América Indígena LVIII (1–2) (June 1998): 223–235.

Ortiz Crespo, Santiago. 1999. “Participacion cuidandana y desarrollo local: Algunas pistas de reflexion.” In Ciudadanias Emergentes: Experiencias democraticas de desarrollo local, 63–86. Quito: Ediciones Abya Yalas.

Radcliffe, Sarah. “Indigenous Municipalities in Ecuador and Bolivia: Transnational Connections and Exclusionary Political Cultures.” Prepared for the workshop, “Beyond the Lost Decade: Indigenous Movements and the Transformation of Development and Democracy in Latin America.” Princeton University, Princeton, New Jersey (March 2–3, 2001).

Roberts, Kenneth M. 1998. Deepening Democracy? The Modern Left and Social Movements in Chile and Peru. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press.

Roberts, Kenneth M. “Party-society Linkages and Democratic Representation in Latin America.” Canadian Journal of Latin American and Caribbean Studies 27, 53 (2002): 9–34.

Ruiz Hernández, Margarito, and Aracely Burguete Cal y Mayor. 2001. “Indigenous Peoples without Political Parties: The Dilemmas of Indigenous Representation in Latin America.” In Challenging Politics: Indigenous Peoples’ Experiences with Political Parties and Elections, edited by Kathrin Wessendorf, 20–63. Copenhagen: IWGIA.

Sánchez López, and Flavia Freidenberg. “El proceso de incorporación política de los sectores indígenas en el Ecuador. Pachakutik, un caso de estudio.” América Latina Hoy 19 (1998): 65–79.

Starn, Orin. 1999. Nightwatch: The Politics of Protest in the Andes. Durham, NC: Duke University Press.

Stavenhagen, Rodolfo. “Challenging the Nation-State in Latin America.” Journal of International Affairs 34, 2 (Winter 1992): 421–440.

Tanaka, Martin. 1998. Los espejismos de la democracia: El colapso del sistema de partidos en el Peru, 1980–1995, en perpectiva comparada. Lima: Instituto de Estudios Peruanos.

Torres, Víctor Hugo. 1999. “El desarrollo local en el Ecuador: Dicursos, tendencias y desafíos.” In Ciudadanías Emergentes: Experiencias democráticas de desarrollo local. Quito: Ediciones Abya Yala.

Tully, James. 1995. Strange Multiplicity: Constitutionalism in an Age of Diversity. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Van Cott, Donna Lee. 2000. The Friendly Liquidation of the Past: The Politics of Diversity in Latin America. Pittsburgh, PA: University of Pittsburgh Press.

Van Cott, Donna Lee. 2005. From Movements to Parties in Latin America: The Evolution of Ethnic Politics. New York: Cambridge University Press.

Van Cott, Donna Lee. 2006. “Dispensing Justice at the Margins of Formality: The Informal Rule of Law in Latin America.” In Informal Institutions and Politics in Latin America, edited by Gretchen Helmke and Steven Levitsky, 249–273. Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins University Press.

Weber, Max. 1946. From Max Weber: Essays in Sociology. Translated, edited, and with an introduction by H. H. Gerth and C. Wright Mills. New York: Oxford University Press.

Yashar, Deborah J. 2005. Contesting Citizenship in Latin America: Indigenous Movements and the Postliberal Challenge. New York: Cambridge University Press.

Young, Iris Marion. 1990. Justice and the Politics of Difference. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Yrigoyen, Raquel. 1999. Pautas de coordinación entre el derecho indígena y el derecho estatal. Guatemala City: Fundación Myrna Mack.

Yrigoyen, Raquel. 2000. “The Constitutional Recognition of Indigenous Law in Andean Countries.” In The Challenge of Diversity: Indigenous Peoples and Reform of the State in Latin America, edited by Willem Assies et al., 197–222. Amsterdam: Thela Thesis.

</biblio>

* Part VI: Coda

 17. Can Violence Be Regulated?

Esther E. Gottlieb and J. Craig Jenkins

<quote>

The problems of violence still remain very obscure.

<right>

--George Sorel ([1906] 1914: 59)

</right>

</quote>

George Sorel’s remark over a hundred years ago is still true today. The chapters in this volume illustrate how durable identity conflicts are and that they are ultimately never “resolved.” Conflicts can instead be regulated, meaning that they can be moderated, channeled, and controlled so that they appear in more or less nonviolent forms. Our key focus has been identifying ways in which rules, institutionalized practices, unifying symbols, and inclusive identities can regulate conflict, converting zero-sum interactions into positive-sum relations.

Past work on identity conflicts has largely focused on the practical question of conflict management. While these issues are important, our goal has been to develop a general framework for understanding the origins of identity conflicts and the possibilities of regulating them. Our primary concern has been showing how cultural and institutional regulation can work and fail. No single theory of identity conflict underlies the chapters in this volume. Rather our authors pose a series of questions about the nature of identity conflict, its causes, and various methods of regulating it. Some teach by negative example, highlighting failures of conflict regulation, while others offer positive instruction. The chapters differ widely in their empirical application. In addition to covering all world regions, some chapters work at the micro level by addressing face-to-face interaction. Others address meaning, examining discourse, performance, and collective symbols. Still others focus on groups and institutions, tracing how these interact in the making or the regulation of identity conflict. Several chapters examine whole countries, regions, and global processes. One rule that emerges is that the linkages among various cultural and social systems are loose and should not be considered as a single integrated system of beliefs, values, and behavior (Clifford 1988). Instead, there are contradictions and inconsistencies that routinely operate through these various sociocultural and political processes.

 Methods of Conflict Regulation

This volume identifies four methods for regulating identity conflict. First and foremost are formal rules, which can set limits on behavior, create a sense of fair treatment and recognition, and thereby moderate conflict. Discussions of post-conflict reconstruction typically focus on new rules of political representation, methods for insuring minority representation, formulas for making decisions, and the creation of rule-making and rule-enforcing institutions, such as legislatures, courts, police, and militaries. The basic objective is to create an equitable set of rules and procedures that protect all parties and create a rough balance between “giving” and “getting,” thereby creating a social contract between the various parties. Without a framework of rules, some parties will think that they are being punished or treated unfairly. Several chapters illustrate how such rule-based regulation works and how it may go astray. Norma Kriger’s study of the demobilization of guerrilla troops in Zimbabwe shows how ad hoc rule-making and political manipulation can corrupt a demobilization process, creating a violent repressive force that is as dangerous as the previous “war” situation. Such rules also require effective agencies for enforcement. In looking at ethnic conflict in sub-Saharan Africa, Kidane Mengisteab and M. Sani Umar make the central point that democratization without building effective governmental institutions will only exacerbate conflict. The state cannot implement effective policies, however well designed, meaning that democratization merely creates opportunities for greater ethnic mobilization.

Secondly, conflict regulation needs to go beyond rules by building social networks and trust. Without a sense of trust and positive social ties, contenders are unlikely to put aside their differences and focus on the positive gains that could come from further interaction. Rules can engender trust but these must be built from dialogue. In her discussion of intercultural communication, Donna Lee Van Cott shows how Amerindian leaders have devised new political strategies that foster inter-group networks and coalitions. Democratization and various protections for ethnic autonomy and self-governance are of course an important framework, but the dialogue itself and the positive networks and trust that it engenders are central to peace-building processes.

A third element is new policies. In their analysis of post-conflict societies, Collier et al. (2003) show that the most favorable policies are social investments in education and health. These create a sense of membership in the broader society on the part of previously excluded groups as well as address long-standing social problems. Military spending and arms buildups have the opposite effect, heightening tensions and re-igniting conflict. Economic growth and policies that foster growth are also important. It is always easier to allocate resources when there are more resources to go around. Growth, however, is an elusive goal when there are strong conflicts over the definition of the nation or the formulas for rule. Strong identity conflict creates a “catch 22” situation in which little can be done to stimulate the economy but the resources to regulate conflict are unavailable. Aseel Sawalha shows how urban development policy in post-conflict Lebanon has failed to break the impasse between the various contenders, threatening a possible restart of the civil war.

Fourth is the forging of new inclusive identities that foster social tolerance and diversity instead of narrow exclusionary identities that fail to integrate. In his discussion of the colonial mentality, Leo Ching shows how negative identity regulation works, creating over-conformity to imperial definitions. While resistance might seem an option to the outside observer, colonial subjects not only accept the definitions but also over-identify with their masters. A more fluid situation makes it possible for new and more complex identities to emerge. Diane Nelson shows that the more open political situation in Guatemala has facilitated the development of more fluid and complex identities. Actors can now present both a Mayan and an assimilated self while displaying distance from both.

 Processes of Identity Conflict

Our chapters capture five fundamental processes of identity conflict. First is the forging of identities, whether by negative or positive regulation. Addressing negative regulation, Leo Ching examines the case of colonial Taiwan, arguing that colonial authority was able to make resistance “unthinkable” for at least a significant segment of the aboriginal population. This identification was not, however, a simple linear process but was based on a complex dialectic. Colonial definitions simultaneously strengthened the inhibited aggression and suppressed anger of the colonized aboriginals while creating an internalization in which the colonized over-identified with their oppressors, becoming loyal defenders of the colonial system. In the first step of this process, the logical possibility emerges that the “whole social structure [can be] changed from the bottom up.” Second is suppression of this counter-identification, which leads to the third step—over-identification with the colonial power. The result, Ching argues, is that the colonized become the defenders of their own oppression, willingly sacrificing their lives to defend the system that oppresses them.

How do people recover from genocide and forge new identities? What types of identities do they forge? Diane Nelson addresses identity displays among Mayans in post-genocide Guatemala. In her field research, she found herself repeatedly faced with the question of the authenticity of Mayan identity. In view of the government’s past attempt to eradicate all traces of the Mayan race, do public displays of Mayan identity indicate an ethnic revitalization? Her analysis suggests that identity is dynamic and contradictory, pointing simultaneously in multiple directions. The younger multi-lingual Mayans project multiple selves, both a Mayan and an assimilated or conformist self. In their rituals, celebrations, and dances, they project both their dispossession and their new autonomous powers.

A third setting where new identities are being forged is Muslim-majority countries. Traditionally dominated by secular authoritarian governments that negatively regulated religious expression, these countries, Eickelman and Salvatore argue, are developing a new type of positive regulation, which they dub “Public Islam.” In contrast to the anti-modern conformist picture provided in much Western discussion of contemporary Islam, they find a growing plurality of voices and positions with a new dialogue over the nature of social justice, right and wrong, and ways of organizing public authority. A diverse set of religious scholars, self-described religious authorities, secular intellectuals, Sufi orders, mothers, students, workers, engineers, and many others advance multiple positions. As Susan Buck-Morss (2003) argues, acknowledging that Islamism enables political discourses that are modern in their own terms does not entail defending all Islamist movements or positions. This new Islamic dialogue has created challenges to authoritarian rule, a more fragmented religious and political authority, and increasingly open discussions of the “common good” (al-maslaha al-’amma or simply maslaha). As Eickelman and Salvatore show, ideas of the common good are not a simple heritage of specific religious or normative traditions but rather a set of ethical concepts and social norms that are contested and redefined through interaction, practice, and transmission over generations.

Part II of our volume addresses the suppression of identities. Much like the negative regulation of identity discussed above, this section discusses how identities are suppressed and the impact of such processes. Dru Gladney's chapter traces the diverse adaptations of Muslim minorities in China, showing that some have become fully assimilated to the dominant Han culture while others have supported various autonomy movements. While constituting less than 2 percent of the total Chinese population, the two largest groups--the Hui and the Uyghurs—have preserved their cultural distinctiveness and recently supported various autonomy movements. The Chinese government has oscillated between minority protection, recognizing ten distinct Muslim nationalities and regulating anti-minority attacks, and pressing for linguistic and religious assimilation, especially during periods of internal political purges such as the Cultural Revolution and the recent "war on terror." Meanwhile, Chinese Muslims have continued to travel abroad freely for pilgrimage and study, bringing them into contact with Islamic internationalism and other reform movements in the Middle East and Central Asia. There has also been a significant growth of "cyber-separatism," primarily in the Uyghur diaspora, which numbers over 500,000 and provides a ready audience for human rights advocacy and monitoring projects, supporting Neil Smelser's comments about the impact of globalization on local ethnic mobilization.

The net result is complex and does not fit either a simple suppression or a resistance model. On the one hand, many Chinese Muslims are unsympathetic and uninvolved in any autonomy activity whatsoever. On the other hand, a small but growing minority of Chinese Muslims is active in supporting human rights advocacy and other cultural autonomy efforts with a handful possibly involved in separatist activity. In a way that parallels Eickelman and Salvatore's analysis (chapter 5), this has created greater pluralism within Islam and contributed to a broader public debate about the meaning of Islam and its implications for public life.

In his chapter on the Kurdish question, Michael Gunter argues that geopolitics is the primary factor suppressing Kurdish identity. All the major regional powers have joined forces with the United States and Western Europe to oppose the idea of an independent Kurdish state. In its place, the Kurds are offered regional autonomy (Iraq), democratic citizenship within a more or less pluralistic nation (Turkey), or special protected religious status (Iran and Syria). In Turkey, the Turkish Kurds seem to be moving away from a violent insurgency towards accepting citizenship in a multi-ethnic Turkish state. In Iraq, the favored solution seems to be regional autonomy within a federal state while Iran and Syria, with smaller Kurdish populations, are providing greater religious autonomy.

What are the mechanisms by which identity is suppressed? In her analysis of the symbolic struggle over married vs. celibate Buddhist priests in South Korea, Pori Park shows that the critical mechanism was the symbolic association of the married priests with the previous Japanese colonial power. Proponents of celibacy were a small minority but, because of their symbolic association with tradition and national identity, they were able to claim religious purity and launch a successful purge of the priesthood, driving out all the married monks. Later, however, they found themselves undercut because of their collaboration with an increasingly unpopular military regime. This experience parallels the ongoing involvement of Buddhist monks in a purification movement in Sri Lanka. Like the South Korean celibate monks, the Buddhist purification movement has allied itself with the Sinhalese-dominated government, effectively suppressing Tamil and other minority identities. Seneviratne (1999) argues that this has blocked the development of a more inclusive Buddhist modernism that could pave the way for a more pluralistic civil society. As Park concludes, this has undermined the promise of this post-colonial purification movement and a more inclusive national identity.

Part III of this book addresses problematic identities where conflicts could suddenly erupt or remain quiescent. Robert Hislope examines the tense relations between Serbs and Albanians in Macedonia, using community-level comparisons to show that, as long as there is a gap between expressive and actionable hatred, violence can be regulated. The key seems to be a durable multi-ethnic coalition government. Despite widespread and intense hatred between the two groups and the presence of multiple triggering incidents in the form of violent attacks, local elites in some communities have used their cross-ethnic ties to prevent these from setting off a violence cycle while, in other communities, local elites have tolerated growing violence, eventually leading to widespread rioting. In addition to illustrating the idea of inter-group civic networks, Hislope shows that elites can play a central role in regulating conflict despite the presence of widespread and intense ethnic hatreds. Ethnic violence is not simply a question of primordial sentiments or expressive hatred, but must be mobilized. Elites play a critical role in determining when and how it is mobilized.

Georgi Derluguian provides a more negative assessment of the conflict potential in Abkhazia, a mini-republic that is trying to break away from Georgia. He shows that the origins of this conflict lie in the history of Soviet and even pre-Soviet rule when Russian officials and wealthy tourists used Abkhazia as a resort, giving it a special autonomy, affluence, and ethnic mix. With the breakup of the Soviet Union, Abkhazian nationalists made a bid for full independence, precipitating a civil war in which thousands of Abkhazian and Georgian ethnics were forced from the region. With Russian sponsorship and the opportunities created by a weak Georgian state, the Abkhazian rebels have been able to sustain their autonomy bid, but the future is highly problematic. Since Derluguian wrote this chapter, the Georgians have launched military offensives to recapture the region and Abkhazian nationalists have destroyed the major bridges and railway links giving access to the region. This chapter shows that the actual history of ethnonationalist struggle is often more contingent and chaotic than suggested by subsequent histories and that it is important to understand the structural origins of identity conflicts as well as their short-term dynamics.

The 2006 Israeli-Hezbollah war in Lebanon highlights the relevance of Aseel Sawalha’s analysis of the politics of ethnic heritage in post-conflict Lebanon. A twenty-year civil war left behind thousands of displaced Shiite refugees, many of whom settled in the suburbs surrounding Beirut. With the arrival of an uneasy peace in the late 1990s, politicians and urban planners launched efforts to reconstruct the city, appealing symbolically to the need to create “An Ancient City for the Future.” Public art and museums became important sites symbolizing this new identity but, given the assumptions of elites, were designed in ways that excluded the Shiite refugees. This is evident in the way the refugees and their heritage were symbolized. On the one hand, this largely rural population was seen as an obstacle to constructing a new modern and prosperous Beirut. Urban planners proposed razing their slums and resettling the population. On the other hand, this rural heritage was seen as authentic and something that should be preserved, studied, collected in the museums and commemorated in public art. This created a contradictory collective memory in that Shitte refugees are in practice presented as “dirty” and “undesirable,” while at the same time their ruralness is presented as an honorable source of tradition that is “pure, original and authentic.” These contradictions point to an underlying tension over Lebanese national identity, which so far has failed to incorporate the diverse groups in a way that will sustain the peace.

Part IV of the volume addresses problems in the reconstruction of identities in post-conflict societies. One of the major challenges facing post-conflict societies is how to educate its youth about the conflict and the processes that created it. How are the various contenders to be presented and characterized? Are they heroes or villains? In her chapter on educational policies in postwar Mozambique, Antoinette Errante finds that these policies have largely failed to create a realistic understanding of the conflict or a set of new identities and norms that will preserve the peace. Instead, educators and the government have assumed that the best approach is to ignore the issue, blotting the civil war from collective memory. This, however, is a mistake, for it allows the conflict to go on outside the classroom unaddressed and unreconstructed. Conflict transformation means that identities must be restructured and take on a more inclusive role that recognizes the legitimacy of the interests of others. It also means that the actual political economy is reconstructed so as to provide access to all. Wartime identities are based upon the need to be “right” because that righteousness is the only thing that makes insecurity, death, and martyrdom bearable. The consolidation of peace requires reconciling elites who surrender this need to be “right.” The youth Errante interviewed are not interested in returning to the bush because the donor community has provided sufficient financial incentives to avoid this. Like all reconciling elites, the ex-guerrillas want “peace with power.” They want to surrender their wartime identities only once they have secured control over new symbolic and material resources. The educational system has, however, failed to create a mutual awareness of the conflict or a set of identities that will prevent conflict from reemerging. Nor has the distribution of resources changed significantly. Instead, elites act as if the situation was a type of “post-postwar” condition, leaving the framework for renewed violence.

A second problem is the disarmament, demobilization, and reintegration (sometimes called “DDR”) of former soldiers, both those in the official military and in guerrilla units. Reconstruction requires finding new employment and status for former soldiers whose only job skill is using violence and intimidation. Unintegrated, they will likely revert to criminal or other violence. Norma Kriger examines the flawed reintegration of guerrilla soldiers in post-conflict Zimbabwe, showing that the use of ad hoc rules, political manipulations, and ineffective career alternatives has created a more volatile and dangerous situation. The government has reconstituted the former guerrillas as military veterans with pension rights and privileged access to civil service jobs. While this may have temporarily removed these former guerrillas from the battlefield, it has created an aggressive new paramilitary force, which the Mugabe government has then used to suppress dissent and democratic political competition. The problem does not lie in the concept of reintegration but rather in the way in which reintegration was organized and conducted, failing to transform these former fighters into civilian activities.

Part V addresses the construction of new identities in the context of state-building and democratization. Many have promoted the idea that democracy is the best way of transforming identity conflicts, instituting new rules to guarantee political representation and protect minority rights. Our final three chapters support this basic idea but propose important qualifications on this argument. Kidane Mengisteab argues that the problems confronting states in sub-Saharan Africa are far more complex, stemming from economic dependency, economic and institutional fragmentation, as well as the flawed development strategies of African states. Despite various attempts at regional integration, the average African country still trades primarily with its ex-colonial power and is heavily dependent on exporting primary products. This creates persisting poverty and anemic economic growth. On average, per capita income is lower in contemporary sub-Saharan Africa today than it was at independence in the 1960s and early 1970s. A second factor is the ethnic heterogeneity of the “new states,” which typically underwent attempts to impose ethnic unity by force with military coups, ethnic wars and geno/politicides. This has undermined economic growth and created arbitrary autocratic rule. Third has been the institutional weakness of African states, few of which have strong civil service traditions, independent courts, or effective police and law enforcement systems. Routine dispute resolution is better handled through traditional forums than the formal state. Sub-Saharan Africa is repeatedly rated as having the largest concentration of corrupt governments in the world (Transparency International, 2006). Over the past decade, the World Bank and other international nongovernmental organizations (INGOs) have promoted political democratization as a way of opening up societies, encouraging market reforms, and creating political accountability. While there are some successes (e.g., South Africa, Tanzania), failures are more numerous. Corruption pervades most of these new democracies and undermines market reforms. Without internal capital and diversification, market reforms will accomplish little and may be detrimental by cutting off needed investments in human capital and public health. Another proposed reform has been regional economic pacts to promote trade and collective security. Mengisteab finds that few of these efforts have been effective, despite their significant potential.

In his chapter M. Sani Umar questions the effectiveness of democratization when basic problems of state-building remain unresolved. Although political democracy may create a more favorable context for conflict transformation, the key problem is the inability to deliver fundamental public services. Independent courts, non-corrupt police and militaries, and effective schools and public health systems need to be constructed before democratization. Introducing democratic government in the context of a weak and ineffective state and widespread poverty is more likely to intensify ethnic hatred and conflict by creating opportunities for mobilization alongside the frustrations stemming from ineffective government. In this context, democracy alone is no panacea but rather must be preceded by state-building and economic development.

A more favorable reading of democratization is provided by Donna Lee Van Cott, who examines the indigenous movements in the Andean region of South America. Over the past two decades, this region has witnessed significant democratization and the mobilization of Amerindian movements. The longstanding victims of colonial conquest and the mestizo elites that took over in the post-colonial period, these indigenous populations have remained relegated to the margins of these societies. By challenging exclusionary governments throughout the Andes, these movements have promoted and built upon alternative democratic models. There is significant instability associated with these protests. Amerindian movements in Ecuador, Bolivia, and Peru have helped to oust elected presidents and have mounted protests that disrupted the economy and created violence. On the whole, however, these movements have developed new ways of negotiating peacefully with state authorities and traditional political actors with the help of domestic and transnational NGOs, foreign governments, and multilateral organizations. Media reports have overemphasized the violence and anti-democratic behavior in some settings while missing the positive developments. By building on widespread popular dissatisfaction with the traditional left and right, these movements have forged inter-ethnic coalitions with lower class mestizo groups that have an interest in opposing corruption and poor governmental services. By securing local indigenous autonomy in primarily indigenous zones, alongside promoting more intercultural institutions at levels where indigenous peoples must coexist with others, these coalitions have promoted a more inclusive definition of citizenship and national identity.

In contrast to some of the other cases presented in this volume, national myths of nation-formation in the Andean region recognize the historical roots of the nation in pre-Colombian indigenous civilizations. Although indigenous cultures are usually recognized as relics of a glorious Incan past, and numerous prejudices persist concerning such cultures, national myths of mestizaje (racial mixing) enable all citizens in Andean countries to claim indigenous culture as part of their own history. This intellectual link to a shared pre-Colombian past lays the basis for claims of new identities based in indigenous traditional cultures to resonate widely.

 Can Identity Conflict Be Regulated?

Pointing out the how violence can be reduced and conflict regulated is an even more demanding exercise. There are no uniform, straightforward answers to the question of how violence can be regulated. As the chapters in this book have demonstrated, each conflict is different in time, space, parties involved, intensity, issues, the types of violence, and the ways in which they are manifested. It is likely that different conflicts will require different approaches to understanding the violence and to mapping out ways to regulate it. The multiple dimensions of conflict that are well documented in the chapters of this book recommend multiple strategies.

We have organized our discussion to address five processes ranging from the formation of identity, the suppression of identities, the mobilization of groups, attempts to create new identities, and changes in basic rules and symbols of national unity. This discussion suggests that identity conflict can be regulated by creating more open and effective political systems and inclusive identities, and by countering exclusionary ideologies. Creating a sustained dialogue is central to the process. Where dialogue is blocked by poverty, ethnic hatred, corrupt institutions or negative beliefs, conflict transformation is unlikely. Ethnic violence is predicated on the idea that the other is subhuman. If this belief can be systematically countered, this constitutes a first step towards regulating violence.

It is important to have a context-specific understanding of identity conflict; nevertheless, there are some general rules that emerge from our discussion. Conflict regulation works on multiple levels, both through the introduction of rules and the creation of integrated symbols and new identities. At the same time, we need to be aware that identity conflict is never “resolved” in the sense of completely eliminated. In fact, conflict can be functional in the sense that it serves as a source of innovation and increased flexibility. The aim of conflict regulation is placing boundaries on identity conflict so that it operates with a minimum of violence. The multiple dimensions of identity conflict have shown that violence does not cease when violent actions stop. Violence, like domination, according to Simmel (1955: 151), “is not so much the exploitation of the other as the mere consciousness of the possibility.”

 References

<biblio>

Buck-Morss, Susan. 2003. Thinking Past Terror: Islamism and Critical Theory on the Left. London and New York: Verso.

Collier, Paul, V. L. Elliott, Havard Hegre, Anke Hoeffler, Marta Reynal-Querol, and Nicholas Sambinis. 2003. Breaking the Conflict Trap: Civil War and Development Policy. Washington, DC: World Bank and Oxford University Press.

Seneviratne, H. L. 1999. The Work of Kings: The New Buddhism in Sri Lanka. Chicago and London: University of Chicago Press.

Simmel, Georg. 1955. Conflict and the Web of Group Affiliations, translated and edited by Kurt H. Wolff. New York: Free Press.

Sorel, George. 1914 (1906). Reflections on Violence. New York: B.W. Huebsch.

Transparency International: The Global Coalition against Corruption. 2006. Global Corruption Report. www.transparency.org/publications/gcr.

</biblio>

 [Back Matter]

 Contributors

Leo T. S. Ching is associate professor and chair of the Department of Asian and African Languages and Literature at Duke University. His current research focuses on colonial discourse; postcolonial theory; Japanese mass culture; and theories of globalization and regionalism. Recent publications include: “Japan in Asia,” Blackwell Companion to Japanese History (2006); Cheng wei “ribenren” (Becoming “Japanese”) (2006); and “Give Me Japan and Nothing Else!”: Postcoloniality, Identity, and the Traces of Colonialism," in South Atlantic Quarterly (2000).

Georgi M. Derluguian is associate professor of sociology and international studies program at Northwestern University. He is a Carnegie Scholar of Vision, with interests in historical macrosociology, state-making, and contention, including ethnic conflict. He has recently published Bourdieu's Secret Admirer in the Caucasus: A World-System Biography (2005); and "How Soviet Bureaucracy Produced Nationalism, and What Came of It in Azerbaijan," in Fighting Identities: Race, Religion and Ethno-Nationalism (2003).

Dale F. Eickelman is Ralph and Richard Lazarus Professor of Anthropology and Human Relations at Dartmouth College. His publications include Public Islam and the Common Good, co-edited with Armando Salvatore (2004); Muslim Politics, co-authored with James Piscatori (new ed. 2004); The Middle East and Central Asia: An Anthropological Approach, 4th ed. (2002); New Media in the Muslim World: The Emerging Public Sphere, co-edited with Jon Anderson, 2nd ed. (2003). He is a former president of the Middle East Studies Association of North America, and current senior advisor to the American University of Kuwait.

Antoinette Errante is associate professor in the College of Education at Ohio State University. Her current research is focused on democratization, community violence, war and postwar conflicts, and culture dimensions of psychotherapeutic interventions in wartime and postwar context. She has recently published "Where in the World Do Children Learn 'Bloody Revenge'? Cults of Terror and Counter-Terror and Their Implications for Child Socialization" in Globalisation, Societies and Education (2003); and "Kindersoldaten und Traumata Der Fall Mosamik," with B. Efraime, in Kindheit in Armut welheit (2002).

Dru C. Gladney is president of the Pacific Basin Institute and professor of anthropology at Pomona College. He has conducted long-term field research in Western China, Central Asia, and Turkey. He has authored over fifty academic articles and chapters, as well as the following books: Dislocating China: Muslims, Minorities, and Other Subaltern Subjects (2004); Muslim Chinese: Ethnic Nationalism in the People's Republic, winner of the Phi Kappa Phi Award (2nd ed.1996); and Ethnic Identity in China: The Making of a Muslim Minority Nationality (1998), He is editor of Making Majorities: Constituting the Nation in Japan, China, Korea, Malaysia, Fiji, Turkey, and the U.S. (1998).

Esther Gottlieb is an education comparativist. At Ohio State University she administers Clusters of Interdisciplinary Research on International Themes. Her research has focused on the analysis of discursive practices. Among her publications are Education, Social and Economic Change in Korea, with Don Adams (1993); "The Academic Research-Teaching Nexus in Advanced Industrialized Countries"(1997); and "Appalachian Self-Fashioning: Regional Identities and Cultural Models" (2001).

Michael M. Gunter is professor of political science at Tennessee Technological University. His research has focused on the Kurdish people, international organization, and transnational Armenian activism. He has published widely on the Kurdish question. Among his books are Historical Dictionary of the Kurds (2004); The Kurdish Predicament in Iraq: A Political Dilemma (1999); The Kurds and the Future of Turkey (1997); and Transnational Armenian Activism (1990). He has co-edited with Mohanned M.A. Ahmed, Kurdish Exodus: From Internal Displacement to Disapora (2002), and The Kurdish Question and International Law: An Analysis of the Legal Rights of the Kurdish People (2000).

Robert Hislope is associate professor of political science at Union College. His research is currently focused on comparative politics and ethnic and racial conflicts, particularly in Macedonia. Recent publications include: "Crime and Honor in a Weak State: Paramilitary Forces and Violence in Macedonia," in Problems of Post-Communism (May/June 2004); "Between a Bad Peace and a Good War: Insights and Lessons from the Almost-war in Macedonia," in Ethnic and Racial Studies (2003).

J. Craig Jenkins is professor and chair, sociology and faculty associate, the Mershon Center for International Security at the Ohio State University. His major focus is the politics of conflict and social change. He has published widely on the politics of social protest, the impact of social movements on political change, comparative studies of political violence, the organization and policy impact of nonprofit political advocacy, and early warning models of political crises and humanitarian disasters. He is author of The Politics of Insurgency: The Farm Worker Movement of the 1960s (1985); The Politics of Social Protest: Comparative Perspectives on States and Social Movements, with Bert Klandermans (1995); and numerous articles and chapters. He is currently working on the 4th edition of The World Handbook of Political Indicators.

Norma Kriger is an independent research scholar. She was a peace fellow at the United States Institute of Peace, a visiting fellow at the Center for International Studies at Princeton University, and, in 2003, a visiting fellow at OSU Mershon Center for Security Studies. Her recent publications include: Guerrilla Veterans in Post-War Zimbabwe (2003); “Veterans’ Pensions in Zimbabwe: Dispute Resolution and Nation-Building,” in Ohio State Journal on Dispute Resolution (2005); and “The Role of Law in Zimbabwe’s Political Transition,” in Postconflict Reconstruction in Africa (2006).

Kidane Mengisteab is professor and head of the African and African American Studies Department, Pennsylvania State University. His research has focused on globalization and its implications on Africa’s development, African democratization, and the relevance of Africa’s traditional institutions to institution-building in contemporary Africa. His publications include Ethiopia: Failure of Land Reform and Agricultural Crisis (1990), and Globalization and Autocentricity in Africa’s Development in the 21st Century (1996). He has co-edited State Building and Democratization in Africa: Faith, Hope and Realities (1999); Globalization and the Dilemmas of the State in the South (1999); and Beyond Economic Liberalization in Africa: Structural Adjustment and the Alternatives (1995).

Diane M. Nelson is associate professor of cultural anthropology at Duke University. She had done fieldwork in Guatemala since 1985. Her research and fieldwork focused on the impact of civil war on the indigenous communities in Guatemala, as well as Mayan cultural rights. She is the author of Assumed Identities: Duplicity and Reckoning in Post War Guatemala (forthcoming); Revisiting Guatemala's Harvest of Violence, with C. McAllister (forthcoming); and Un Dedo en la Llaga: Politicas Corporales en Guatemala Quintocentenario (2005), Spanish-language version of A Finger in the Wound: Body Politics in Quincentennial Guatemala (1999).

Pori Park is assistant professor of religious studies at Arizona State University. Her research interests include: Buddhism, Korean religions, and the interaction between Buddhism, modernity, and nationalism. She has recently published "Buddhism in Contemporary Korea," in Buddhism in World Cultures: Comparative Perspectives, edited by Stephen Berkwitz (2006); and "Korean Buddhist Reforms and Problems in the Adoption of Modernity during the Colonial Period," in Korea Journal 45, 1 (Spring 2005).

Armando Salvatore is senior research fellow at the Institute of Social Sciences, Humboldt University, Berlin. He has published extensively on Islam, modernity and the public sphere. Selective publications include Public Islam and the Common Good, edited with Dale F. Eickelman (2004), and Religion, Social Practice, And Contested Hegemonies: Reconstructing The Public Sphere in Muslin Majority Societies, edited with M. LeVine (2005).

Aseel Sawalha is an urban anthropologist in the Department of Sociology and Anthropology at Pace University. Her research interests include issues of identity, culture and gender relations in postwar Beirut, Palestinian refugees, urban reconstruction, and women in the arts. She has published "Healing the Wounds of War: Placing the War-displaced in Postwar Beirut," in Wounded Cities: Destruction and Reconstruction in a Globalized World (2003); and "Place Attachment and Interest Groups in Ayn al-Mreisi” in S. Shami (ed.), Capital Cities: Ethnographies of Urban Governance in the Middle East (2002).

Neil J. Smelser is Professor Emeritus of Sociology at the University of California, Berkeley. His research topics include sociological theory, economic sociology, collective behavior, and social change. He has authored many books, among them: Economy and Society, with Talcott Parsons (1956); Comparative Methods in the Social Sciences (1976); Problematics of Sociology: The Georg Simmel Lectures, 1995 (1997); and The Social Edges of Psychoanlysis (1999). More recently, he has edited The Handbook of Economic Sociology, 2nd ed., with R. Swedbery (2005); Terrorism: Perspectives from the Behavioral and Social Sciences, with Faith Mitchell (2002); and authored, “Pressures for Continuity in the Context of Globalization,” in Current Sociology (2003) and “Sociological and Interdisciplinary Adventures: A Personal Odyssey,” in American Sociologist (2000).

Muhammad Sani Umar is associate professor of religious studies at Arizona State University. He has published works on modern Islam and liberalism, Islam and colonialism, Islamic juriprudence, and theories and methodologies of religion. Recent publications include: “Education and Islamic Trends in Northern Nigeria: 1970s-1990s” in Africa Today 48, part 2 (2001); and “Muslims‘ Eschatological Discourses on Colonialism in Northern Nigeria,” in Journal of American Academy of Religion (1999).

Donna Lee Van Cott is associate professor of political science at the University of Cincinnati. Her publications include From Movements to Parties in Latin America: The Evolution of Ethnic Politics (2005); “The Emergence and Formation of Ethnic Parties in Latin America: A Subnational Statistical Analysis,” (with Roberta Rice), Comparative Political Studies (2006); and “Building Inclusive Democracies: Indigenous Peoples and Ethnic Minorities in Latin America,” in Democratization (2005). Currently, she is researching ethnic politics in Latin America, particularly with respect to ethnic parties, movements, and legal rights.

 Index

[Page numbers don’t correspond to this version.]

<biblio>

Abacha, Sani, 246, 267

Abay, Amel Seged, 247

Abdul Hamid II, 115

Abdurixit, Abdulahat, 101

Abdushelishvili, M.G., 168, 169

Abkhazia, xvi, 9,167–81, 304

Aborigine, 43–45, 47, 48, 50, 51, 52 53, 54, 56, 57, 58

Acculturation, 97

Addison, T., 206, 207

Adedeji, Adebayo, 243

Adelkhah, Fariba, 81, 85–86

Adnan, Abu, 192, 193

Afeworki, Isaias, 247

Afghanistan, 27, 101, 109

Africa, 173, 247; sub-Saharan xviii, 243, 253, 293, 300, 306

African Union, xviii, 255–256

Ahmad, Ibrahim, 121

Akinyele, R.T., 265, 268

Albania, xvi, 12, 150, 154–61, 303

Albó, Xavier, 283

Alcántara, Sáez, 287

Alden, C., 207

Ali, Mohammed, 192

Al-jazeerah, 105

Alptekin, Erkin, 101

Alptekin, Isa Jusuf, 101

Al-Qaeda, 109

Al-Sistani, Ali, 122

Altman, Yochanan, 173

Alusevski, Sime, 161

Americanization, 8

Amerindians, 16, 300, 305

Amin, Ida, 246; Samir, 66

Amnesia: collective, 187, 195; selective, 204, 211, 214

Amnesty International, 100, 101

Anderson, Liam, 123

Andes, 16, 17, 282, 283, 285, 287, 289, 292, 307

Andreas, Peter, 153

Angola, 204, 212, 226, 244, 246, 251

Animosities: ancient, 149, 151, 172; interethnic, 150; latent, 150

Appadurai, A., 30

Arendt, Hannah, 1, 179

Armenia, 114, 172, 173, 174, 175, 177

Armitage, Richard, 107

Arnove, R., 211

Arrighi, Giovanni, 66

Ascherson, Neal, 170

Asian Development Bank, 103

Assembly of the Sovereignty of the People (ASP), 288, 289

Assies, Willem, 281, 284, 286, 291

Assimilation, 28, 30, 44, 47, 49, 56, 96, 171, 249, 302

Authoritarianism, 8–9, 81, 180, 292

Authority: public, 282, 302; religious, 85, 88, 120

Autonomy, 282, 286, 289; ethnic, 300; Kurdish, xv, 113, 121; state, 260

Avruch, K., 205

Azerbaijan, 173, 174, 309

Baber, Zaheer, 106

Baile de la Culebra, 63–65, 67, 69, 73

Balalovska, Krisitna, 150, 157

Ballén, Sixto Durán, 288

Bangala, 246

Bangladesh, 126

Barakat, Hoda, 198

Barakat, S., 207, 210

Barkindo, Bawuro, 271

Barzani, area, 114

Barzani, Massoud 117, 121, 123

Barzani, Mulla Mustafa, 120–121, 124

Barzani, Nechirvan Idris, 124

Basbug, General Ilker, 122

Basil, Joseph, 195, 196

Basque, 28

Bassao-Mona, 48

Bastos, Santiago, 70

Bates, Robert, 151

Baxter, Joan, 270

BBC, 105, 252

Beauvoir, Simone de, 151

Beck, Linda J., 270

Beg, Badr Khan, 115

Beijing, 98, 99,107,108,109

Beissinger, Mark R., 152, 171, 175–77

Belgium, 71, 245

Benedict, K., 24

Benford, R.D., 206

Benin, 261, 263, 271, 272

Beria, Lavrenti, 168, 174, 176

Bettelheim, Bruno, 7

Beyer, P., 25

Bin Laden, Osama, 109

Bishop Tutu, 6

Bissau, 261

Black Sea, 168, 170, 171, 178

Boigny, Houphouet, 247

Bokassa, 246

Boli, J., 211, 215

Bolivia, xviii, 287, 288,289, 292, 293, 307

Bolsheviks, 174

Bombay, India, 79

Borden, Anthony, 156

Boskovski, Ljube, 160–161

Bosnia, 94,106,152, 154

Botan, 115

Botswana, 226, 234, 248, 255

Bourdieu, Pierre, 178

Bowen, John R., 153

Bratton, Michael, 269–270

Brezhnev, Leonid, 175

Brintnall, Douglas, 70

British Royal Air Force (RAF), 120

Brubaker, Rogers, 151

Brysk, Alison, 284

Buck-Morss, Susan, 302

Buddhism: Japanese, 131; Korean, 131, 133, 134, 141

Bueno de Mesquita, 273

Buganda, 246

Bunce, Valerie, 173, 175

Bureaucracy: 16, 157, 282; Buddhist, 139, 143

Burgess, Katrina, 287

Burguete Cal y Mayor, Aracely, 292

Burkino Faso, 261, 263, 271

Burtless, G., 25

Burundi, 244, 246, 254

Calderón, Marco Antonio, 291

Cambodia, xi, 17

Camdessus, Michael, 263

Cameroon, 260, 263

Camus, Manuela, 70

Canada, 9, 10, 105, 108

Cape Verde, 261

Capitalism: 46, 60, 261, 269; global, 185–186, 189

Carroll, Barbara Wake, 248

Carroll, Terrance, 248

Casanova, José, 80

Castles, S., 30

Catholic Action, 70, 74, 76

Celibacy, 132, 135, 143

Central African Republic, 244, 246, 261

Central Asia, 86, 95, 96, 98, 99, 101–05, 302

Chachba, Prince Sefer-bei, 170

Chad, 244, 250, 254, 260

Chandra, Kanchan, 153

Charif, Hassan, 185

Chauvinism: Arab, 124; ethnic, 264

Chechnya, 167, 170, 171

Chief Mangwende, 231

Chigwedere, MP Aeneus, 234–35

Child soldiers, 208–211, 214

China, xv, 10, 53, 86, 93, 111, 233, 302

Chinese State Council, 107

Ching, Leo, xiv, 7, 66, 301

Chitauro, Florence, 232, 234

Ch ngh i, Pak, 142

Chong’uk, Yi, 133

Churchward, Jack, 105

Cinar, Alev, 84

Citizens Against Chinese Communism, 105

Civil, associations, 265, 272

Civil Patrol (PAC), 72, 75

Civilization: arrested, 86–87; culture and, 87, 110; clash of, 8, 86–7

Climo, J.J., 206

Collier, Paul, 243, 300

Colonel Lucia Gutiérrez, 288

Colonialism: 9, 29, 59, 143, 251, 301; Japanese, 6, 16, 50, 52, 303

Coloniality of power, 44–45, 46, 49–50

Columbia, 285

Comaroff: Jean, 205; John L., 205

Committee of Rebuilding Buddhism, 140

Communism: 30, 100; post-, 173, 175, 176, 177, 179, 180

Community: imagined, 17, 18; Quichua, 284, 286, 291

Confederation of Indigenous Nationalities of Ecuador (CONAIE), 288

Conference of Buddhist Clerics, 138 139

Conflict: cycles of, 2–3; FRELIMO-RENAMO, 208–209, 212–14; frozen, 179–80; functions of, 3, 308; interlocked, 7; management, 13, 299; and media, 159; post-, 305; realistic vs. non-realistic, 3; regulation, cultural, 16; regulation, defined, xiii, 2, 299, 303, 304, 307–308; regulation positive and negative, xiv, 6, 13–15, 16–18, 301; resolution, 3, 13–14; suppressed, 6–7; theories of ethnic, 10–12, 16–18; transformation, 3–5, 13, 14, 299, 300–01, 305, 308; violent and non-violent xiii, 7,9, 32, 137, 244, 250, 259, 268

Confucianism, 86, 97

Congo, 244, 246

Connor, Walker, 31, 248

Cook, Michael, 81

Cooperation, Turkish-Kurdish, 127

COPMAGUA, 68

Coser, Lewis, 3–4

Côte d’Ivoire, 244, 247, 254, 260, 263, 271

Coughlan, Reed M., 154

Croatia, 9, 152

Croatian Democratic Community, 152

Cross-cutting: cleavages 7, 11, 12, 154; ties, 12

Culture: conflict of, 2, 8; material, 67; reconstruction of, 18, 213

Cultural Revolution, 53, 98, 103, 109, 302

Cuxil, Demetrio Cojti, 71

Cyber-separatism, 10, 302

Dadao-mona, 48

Daily Trust, 266

Dakkis-navi, 46

Dakkis-nobin, 46

Dance of the snake, see Baile de la Culebra

De Varness, Fernand, 248

De Waal, Thomas, 173, 178, 169

Decentralization, 122, 249, 288–289, 291

Decolonialization, 131, 143;

Democracy: democratic transition, 7, 259; democratization, xviii, 4, 11, 13, 15, 18, 30,117, 176, 237, 245, 259, 272–73, 290, 293, 300, 306–07; and Islam, 85

Democratic People’s Party (DEHAP), 118

Democratic Republic of the Congo, 244, 251, 254, 255

Democratic Society Party (DTP), 118

Dependency, economic, 256, 306

Deprivation, relative, 9, 32

Derluguian, Georgi, 9, 168, 178, 304

Dervishi, Feriz, 158

Development: and reconstruction, 214; economic, 263, 273; human, 255; topdown, 186, 188

Dhlakama, Afonso, 2 12

Diakonoff, Igor M., 169

Diaspora: xv, 8–10, 30, 88, 171; Kurdish, 114; Uyghur, 103, 105, 106, 109, 302; Muslim, 93–94

Dillon, Michael, 94

Disarmament, Demobilization, Reintegration (DDR), 16, 305

Doki, Abdullahi, 267

Dorian, James, 103

Dulovi, Lirim, 160

Dumezile, Georges, 171

East Asian Muslims, 93

East Germany, 178

East Timor, 126

East Turkestan Islamic Movement, 103–104, 106, 107

East Turkestan Liberation Organization, 108

East Turkestan Republic, 100–101

Eastern Turkestan National Freedom Center, 106

Ebenshade, R.S., 206

Economist, The, 246

Ecuador, 282–88, 291, 293, 306

Education, xvii, 4–6,15, 29, 44, 51, 70, 73, 155, 195, 211, 212–13, 300

Efraime Junior, B., 208, 210

Egypt, 93, 233

Eickelman, Dale F., 83, 84, 87, 96, 302–03

Eidai, Hayashi, 56

Eller, Jack David, 154

Ember, M., 204

Emergency Sangha Assembly of Rebuilding, 140

Emperor Haile Selassie, 249

Empire: Byzantine, 170; Ottoman, 170

Epistemology, 46, 52, 56

Equatorial Guinea, 246, 260

Erdogan, Recep Tayyip, 118

Eriksen, Thomas Hylland, 248

Eritrea, 126, 247

Eritrean People’s Liberation Front, 247

Errante, Antoinette, xv, xvii, 204, 206, 207, 208, 210, 305

Estado, Novo, 212

Ethiopia, 9, 126, 244, 246, 247, 249, 251, 254, 255

Ethiopian People’s Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF), 249

Ethnic: cleansing, 36, 134, 180,199; entrepreneurs, 11–12; hate, xvi, 2, 9, 12, 149, 304, 306, 308; identity, xv, 1, 12, 32–33, 151; inter-ethnic coalitions, 282, 303, 307; nationalism, 25,110; rivalry, 158; violence, xix, 11–13, 35–36, 173, 176; war, 152. See also genocide

Ethnocentrism, 11, 46

Ethnolinguistic entities, 244, 245, 247–48

Ethno-religious identity, 94

European Union: 27, 84, 113, 117, 118, 127; Copenhagen Criteria, 117

Evans, Peter, 247

Evans, R.J., 206

Everatt, D., 204, 208

Ex-Political Prisoners, Detainees, and Restrictees Act, 236

Exxon, 102

Fägerlind, I., 211

Fanon, Frantz, 58–59

Faour, Ali, 185

Fearon, James D., 151

Federalism: 122–123, 174, 249; ethnic, 126

Fernandez, Luistxo, 104

Finer, Samuel E., 269

Fisun, Oleksandr, 177, 180

Fletcher, Joseph, 96, 97

Flor, R. Eulalia, 292

Ford, Peter, 158

Foster, Derek, 106

France, 87

Frckovski, Ljubomir, 149

Free East Turkestan, 105

Free Turkestan Movement, 107–108

Freedom House, 260

Freidenberg, Flavia, 287

Furman, Dmitry,167

Fuss, Diana, 75

Gagnon, V.P., 151

Galbraith, Peter, 122

Galtung, Johann, 14

Gambia, 260, 270

Ganev, Venelin, 177, 180

Garcia, Alfonso, 67–70, 73

García, Serrano, 284, 286

Gasakhurdia, Zviad, 177

Gaza, 9

General League of Buddhist Reforms, 133–134

Genocide: 17, 32, 36, 43, 63, 203 301; Mayan, 64, 71, 72, 73. See also ethnic cleansing, ethnic war, conflict, violence

Gentaro, Governor General Kodama, 47

Germany, 87, 114

Ghana, 233, 247, 255, 261, 263, 271, 272

Ghannouchi, Rasheed, 86

Gibson, Clark, 260

Gilligan, J., 204, 207, 208

Gladney, Dru, xv, 9, 94, 100, 103, 302

Globalization: xiv, 1, 8–9, 13, 18, 24, 28, 29, 75, 214–15, 250–54, 268–69, 281, 302; cultural, 8, 24–25

Gobodo-Madzikizela, P., 206

Godoy, Natalia, 68

Goldstone, Jack, 172

Gómez, Magdalena, 286

Gonzalez, Domingo, 71, 73

Gonzalez, Matilde, 72

Gonzolaz-Quijano, 84

Gorbachev, Mikhail, 176, 177

Gottlieb, Esther, 5, 35, 65

Grant, Bruce, 175

Great Britain, 100, 119

Greece, 172

Green, Linda, 72

Guatemala, xv, 301

Guatemalan Mayan Language Academy (ALMG), 71, 75

Guinea, 247, 254, 260, 261, 263, 270, 271

Gulen, Fethullah, 82

Gunter, Michael, xv, 125, 303

Gurr, Ted Robert, 4, 9, 10, 13, 28, 29–30, 32, 33, 34, 36, 261

Guttiérez, Marcelo, 69

Habermas, Jurgen, 80, 88, 111

Hacking, Ian, 153

Hamas, 5, 107

Han, 110, 302

Han’guk, 137

Hany ng, Pak, 133

Hardin, Russel, 25, 32

Harff, Barbara, 29–30, 33, 36

Hariri, Rafiq, 186

Haruo, Sato, 47

Harvey, David, 65–66, 76

Harwit, Eric, 05

Hass, Ernst, 27

Hatred, actionable, 150

Hattori, Heijirô, 43, 44

Hayaski, Eidai, 56–57, 58

Hazret, Mehmet Emin, 108–109

Hechter, Michael, 151

Hee, Park Chung, 140

Hefner, Robert W., 85

Hegre, Havard, 273

Held, Donald, 24

Heritage: authentic, 192; national collective, 194, 196; and popular culture, 195, 196; popular, 188–189, 190; understanding of, 191

Herzog, Hanna, 290

Hewitt, B.G., 169

Hilton, D.J., 204, 206

Hirsch, Marianne, 194

Hislope, Robert, 11, 33, 153, 177, 303–04

HIV/AIDS, 211, 243, 253

Hizb-ut-Tahrr, 107

Hoekema, André, 284

Hogo tribe, 49

Holmes,Leslie, 177

Home of East Turkestan Youth, 107

Honeyman, C., 205

Honwana, A.M., 210

Horowitz, Donald, 4, 150–151, 154, 155, 159, 161

Hokoyo, MP, 235

Hughes, S., 205

Hui, 94, 110, 302

Human capital, 243, 251, 306

Human rights, xiv, 8, 13, 14, 17, 86, 88, 102, 104–05,109, 118, 228, 243–44, 247, 250, 261, 274, 281, 284, 291–92, 302–03

Human Rights Watch, 159, 160, 263, 269

Human Security Report, 243

Humphrey, Caroline, 177

Hunt, S.A., 206

Huntingon, Samuel P., 8, 30, 86–7

Hussein, Saddam, 17, 113, 117, 119, 121, 122, 123, 125, 126,127, 128, 194

Huyssen, Andreas, 194

Icevska, Gordana, 156

Identities of dispossession, 65

Identity: 17, 301, 303–305; building, 71–72, 301; conflicts, xiii, xix, 1, 3, 10, 14, 18, 301–303; group 3, 25, 31–3, 154; groups, 26, 34–5, 64; Mayan 65, 70, 75, 292, 301; movements 25, 28, 32–6; over identification, 301; peace adaptive, 204; polarization, 3–4, 7–8, 9, 133; post-war, 198; politics, 26, 203,

205–06, 209, 212–13, 215; reconstruction 205, 305–306; religious, 81, 84, 268; suppression of, 302–03; violence adaptive, 204

Ige, Bola, 266

Ikelegbe, Augustine, 264–265

Imperial Army, 43

Independent Electoral Commission of Iraq, 125

India, 11, 84

Indigenous Pachekutik Movement (MIP), 289

Indonesia, 82, 126; Bali, 79

Institutionalization, 173

Institutions: building. 27, 311; democratic, 289, 290, 293–294, institutionalization, 173; political, 293; traditional, 244–245. See also democracy, state-building

Insurrection, Akto, 101

Integration strategies, guerilla, 222–223

Integration, regional, 254

Intercultural dialogue, xix, 15–16, 56, 193, 300, 307

Inter-Governmental Organizations (IGOs), 17, 18, 27,

International Labor Organization Convention, 284

International Monetary Fund, 27, 263, 264, 273

International Non-Governmental Organizations (INGOs), 17, 18, 306

International, assistance, 209; trade, 103

Ioseliani, Djaba, 176, 177

Iran, xv, 9, 85, 86, 88, 93, 113, 114, 115, 120, 121, 125, 127, 192, 303; women’s movement, 80

Iranian Revolution, 80

Iraq, xv, 9, 17, 79, 82, 84, 113, 114, 117, 119–27, 303; US occupation of, 84, 119

Isaacman, A., 213

Iskander, Fazil, 170, 174

Islam: global, 99; Islamic internationalism, 99, 302; Islamic jurisprudence, 82; Islamic movements, 82, 86, 97, 99, 259; Naqshabandi Sufi, 115; Islamic orders, 96; public, 80, 81, 82, 302; Sufi 87, 94–6, 98, 270, 302

Islamic Party of Turkestan, 105

Islamist, 10, 124, 259, 302

Islamist AK Party, 118

Israel, 5, 17

Israeli, Raphael, 94

Istanbul, Turkey, 84

Italy, 117

Jamaat, Tableeghi, 107

Jänick, M., 28

Japan: 93; Japanese spirit, 55

Japan Peoples Party, 50

Jenkins, J. Craig, 8, 11, 12, 35, 65

Jennings, R., 204, 208

Johnson, Paul, 86, 100

Jordan, 171, 192

Jordan, Tim, 106

Joyabaj, 63–64

Kaba, Lansine, 272

Kadir, Rebiya, 100

Kalyvas, Stathis, 179

Kane, Ousmane, 272

Kang, Inch, 133, 134, 144

Kangai, Minister Kubirai, 223, 225, 226

Kant, Immanuel, 82

Kaphwan, Ch’oe, 137

Karabagh, 167, 169, 173

Karadzic, Radovan, 152

Kasfir, Nelson, 246

Kasim, Abdul, 107

Katô, Kunihiko, 54–57

Kaunda, Keneth, 247

Kawakami, Jôtarô, 50–52

Kazakhstan, 101, 103

Kazem-Zadeh, 173

Keita, Ibrahim Boubacar, 270

Kemal, Mustafa, 115, 117

Kenya, 117, 246

Kepel, Gilles, 80, 85

Kgotla, 248

Khodarkovsky, Michael, 168

Khosrokhavar, Farhad, 85

Khoyboun (Independence Party), 115

Khrushchev, Nikita, 168, 175

Kiavaz, 173–174

Kikuyo, 246

King Hussein of Jordan, 192

King Solomon, 114

King, Charles, 170, 175

Kirkuk, 124–125

Kirli, Cengiz, 84

Kissinger, Henry, 121

Kitovani, Tengiz, 177

Kollock, Peter, 106

Kona, MP, 225

Kondo, Masami, 47

Kondo-Gisaburo, 48

Kôno, Mitsu, 50, 52

Kosovo, 94, 150,155, 156, 157, 167, 171, 180, 181

Kovacevski, Slobodan, 158

Kriger, Norma, xvii, 6, 221, 300, 305

Ku, Kim, 134

Kumanova, Macedonia, 150, 156–58, 161

Kumar, Radha, 151

Kuran, Timur, 154

Kurdish tribalism, 114

Kurdish Worker’s Party (PKK), 9, 116–17, 118, 119, 127

Kurdistan Democratic Party (KDP), 117, 120, 123

Kurdistan Regional Government, 113, 122, 123, 124

Kurds: 9, 94, 303; Iraqi, 119, 126, 128; Turkish, 115–16, 303

Kurtynova-Derluguian, Liubov, 168

Kyrgyzstan, 101

Kyusik, Kim, 133

Laicism, 82. See also secularism

Laitin, David D., 151, 154

Lakoba, Nestor, 174

Land rights, 225–226, 230

Langhorne, Richard, 24

Larrea, Ana María, 291, 292

Larrea, Fernando, 291, 292

Latifi, Veton, 157, 158

Latin America: xviii, 15, 16, 65, 72, 80, 81, 281, 293; Movements, 283

Latvia, 30

Laue, Robert, 14

Law: common, 267; Buddhist property, 141–42; customary, 284, 286; Islamic, 265–269, 272; native, 267

Lawrence, R., 25

League of Nations, 173

Lebanon: 5, 16, 115, 185, 187, 196, 301, 304–05; Beirut: 5, 185, 188, 197, 304

Ledeneva, Alena, 173

Leftwich, Adrian, 273

Lerner, Daniel, 87

Levine, Armando, 83

Levitsky, Steven, 287

Liberalism: 261; and liberalization: economic, 251–253, 269; political, 254, 269, 273

Liberation War Services, 226–228

Liberia, 244, 246, 250, 254, 260, 261, 271, 272

Lisitsian, Stepan, 173

Litan, R., 25

Liu, J.H., 204, 206

Localization, 99

Loimeier, Roman, 272

London, England, 79

Loplyk, 101

Lowenthal, David, 185, 189

Lukes, Steven, 6

Lyons, T., 203

Macas, Luis, 290

Macedonia, 12, 303; Bitola, 150, 158, 161; ethnicity, 154, 159

Machel, G.M., 203

Machel, Samora, 212

MacMillan, John, 273

Madrasa, 271

Madrid, Spain, 79

Mahjoub, A., 205

Majoritarian rule, 15, 152

Malaysia, 5, 126

Mali, 261, 263, 269, 271

Mann, Michael, 173, 179

Manning, C., 203, 204, 214

Mannoni, Octave, 44

Marginalization of children, 208

Marriage: cleric, 131, 134–36; inter-, 156

Mars, Gerald, 173

Marshall, J., 211

Marshall, Monty, 261

Martin, Terry, 172, 174, 175

Marx, Karl, 76

Marxism, 28, 247

Masud, Khalid, 80, 87

Mauritania, 261

Mauritius, 248

Mayan movement, 71, 301

Mazurana, D., 208, 209

Mbeki, 247

McAllister, Carlota, 72

McGrew, Anthony, 24

McKay, S., 208, 209

McMullin, J., 204, 206, 207

McNeal, Dewardic, 107

Mecca, 82, 87, 98

Medes, 114

Media: and public Islam, 85; censorship, 104

Meeker, Michael E., 84

Mehmeti, Kim, 156

Memmi, Albert, 57

Memory: collective, 33, 187, 193–94, 304–05; cultural, 190, 194

Menchú Tum, Rigoberta, 68, 70

Mengisteab, Kidane, xviii, 15, 293, 300, 306

Mengistu, 246, 247, 249

Mestizo, xv, 307

Middle East, xv, 312

Migration, 30, 66, 68, 75

Migration, international, 9, 93

Milchin, Vladimir, 160, 161

Military: demobilization of, 179, 204, 207, 209, 210, 222, 300; regime, 259, 263–64, 267, 284; training of, 212, 231, 233; volunteerism in, 44–45

Milosevic, Slobodan, 17

Milosevic’s Socialist Party, 152

Misk, Zeina, 188

Mobilization: 288, 294; internet, 10

Mobutu, 246

Modernity: xvii, 18, 64, 73, 80, 185–186, 192, 196–197, 311; and modernization, xix, 7, 8, 12, 13, 28, 80, 270, 272

Modular self, 82–83

Mohammed, General Murtala, 267

Moldova, 174

Mona-rudao, 48, 51

Mondlane, Eduardo, 212

Monks, Buddhist, 16, 303

Monks, Sŏn, 135, 136

Morales, Evo, 288, 290

Mormons, 284

Morocco, 79, 82

Moscovici, S., 212

Movement for Democratic Change (MDC), 221

Movement Towards Socialism (MAS), 289–90

Movements: social, 3, 28, 31, 34, 36, 76, 106, 281–83, 287, 290–92

Moyo, MP, 225, 231

Mozambique, 203, 16, 251, 252

Mudenda, MP 236

Mueller, John, 151, 273

Mugabe, Robert, 16, 221, 222, 227–28, 236, 305

Muhajeers, 171

Mujuru, Mr., 236

Mukhlisi, Yusupbek, 107

Mukt’aek, Kuk, 136

Multiculturalism, 30–31

Munyoro, MP, 231

Murga Armas, Jorge, 284

Museveni, Yoweri, 247

Muslim consciousness, 80

Muslim transnationalism, 102

Muslims: 9, 10, 11, 302; Chinese, xv, 302, 303; Shiite, 5, 304

Naegele, Jolyon, 155, 158, 158, 159, 160

Naimark, N. M., 36

Namier, Lewis, 245

National Assembly, 137–138

National Indigenous and Campesino Committee (CONIC), 69, 74

Nationalism: 25, 29, 56, 99, 114, 171, 244, 249, 289; Chinese, 98, 103; Kurdish, xv; Muslim, 99, 101–03, 125; revolutionary, 223

Nation-state: 10, 29, 31, 34, 75, 173, 248; sovereignty of, 24–25, 27; modern, 28, 111; post-, 17, 18

NATO, 27, 94, 117, 118, 119, 178

Nelson, Diane M., xv, 64, 301

Networks, social, 2, 3, 156, 190, 192, 300, 304

Nextie, Muarem, 160

Nguema, Macias, 246

Niger, 261, 263, 270, 271

Nigeria, 244, 246, 249, 252, 261, 269

Njekesa, MP, 235

Nkomo, Minister John, 228

Nkrumah, Kwame, 247

NKVD Colonel Gvishiani, 168

Nodia, Ghia, 175, 179

Northern Ireland, 167

Nuba, 246

Nyerere, Julius, 247

Nzarabeyani, Mr., 235

Obasanjo, General Olusegun, 263, 267, 268

Oberschall, Anthony, 34, 151

Ocalan, Abdullah, 116–117

Oglesby, Liz, 66

Okafor, Obiora, 250

Olson, Mancur, 34

Olukoya, Sam, 266

Olzak, S., 34

Oodua People’s Congress (OPC), 265

Open Society Institute, 160

Ordanoski, Saso, 157

Order, Chogye, 131, 135, 140, 141–42, 143

Ordinance, temple, 132, 133, 134, 141

Orellana, Halkyer, 286

Organization for the Liberation of Ui-ghurstan, 107

Organizations, Islamic, 271

Orientalism, 87

Oromo Liberation Front, 250

Ortiz Crespo, Santiago, 291, 292

Ottoman Empire, 84, 86, 115, 170

Overconformity, 6–7

Ozaki, Hotsuki, 54

Pachakutik, 288–91

Pakistan, 88, 101, 109, 126

Palestine: 5, 17, 126; Palestinians, 9, 10

Palestinian Liberation Organization (PLO), 5

Park, Pori, xv, 16, 303

Participation, political, 83, 227, 260, 271–72, 281

Party of Democratic Action, 152

Pashu, General Insan Nuri, 115

Patriotic Society (PSP), 288

Patriotic Union of Kurdistan (PUK), 121, 123

Peace accords: Dayton, 16; Oslo, 5

Peace: durable, 5, 13, 15, 16, 18; building, xvii, 2, 4, 14, 300; enforcement of, 14; keeping, 13, 14, 27; making, 13, 18

Pensions, war, xvii, 16, 221, 227, 305

People’s Democratic Party (HADEP), 117, 118

People’s Liberation Army, 98, 108

People’s Police, 108

Peoples: displaced, 197–198; indigenous, 31, 64, 67, 281, 282, 283,285, 287, 289, 291, 293, 307; indigenous Abkhazes, 169; indigenous Taiwanese, 7

Percy, Charles, 188

Perlmutter, Amos, 86

Peru, 293, 307

Petar, Orthodox Bishop, 160

Peteet, J., 206

Petruseva, Ana, 156, 158

Phillipines, 43

Piga, Adriana, 270, 272

Pino-sappo, 49

Pino-waris, 49

Pinto,Paulo G., 82

Piscatori, James, 87

Pitcher, A., 204

Pluralism: 30, 103, 265, 269, 282, 303;legal, 283–287

Pol Pot, 17

Poland, 80, 81, 175

Political Detainee Bill, 233–234

Political: economy, 172, 177, 179; parties, 281, 282, 287–91; representation 300

Political Instrument for the Sovereignty of the People (IPSP), 289–90

Pŏmlin, Kim, 133, 137

Pŏmsul, Ch’oe, 133

Pongmo, Chŏng, 136

Pongong, Pak, 136

Portugal, 212

Post-colonialism, 9, 29, 57,131, 271

Primordialism, 11, 12, 25, 26, 33, 46, 110, 149–52,154, 248, 264, 304

Pritchard, Ellie, 156

Privatization, 176, 177, 186

Protectors, dharma, 136

Protestant fundamentalism, 80

Public Islam, xv, 80–1, 83, 302

Purification, 97

Putin, Vladimir, 180

Qing government, 96, 97

Quijano, Anibal, 44

Quispe, Felipe, 289, 290

Rabushka, Alvin, 153

Racism, 155, 292

Radcliffe, Sarah, 291

Radio Free Asia, 104

Rage, 204, 214, 216

Ramirez, F.O., 211, 215

Rapoport, David C., 36

Rationalization, 173, 282

Rebellion: Musha, 7, 43–60; Tunceli, 116

Reconciliation, 6, 14, 17, 206, 208

Reconstruction: African 243, 259; political, 2–3, 18, 305; measures of, 4, 6

Reichmuth, Steohan, 271

Reintegration, xvii, 16, 206, 207, 210, 215, 305–06

Relations, Hindu-Muslim, 11, 84; Taiwan-Chinese, 53

Remaking Guebuza, 203

Reminjse, Simone, 66, 69–70, 72–73

Republic of Georgia, 9, 167, 170, 172–81, 304

Revolution: French, 85; Haitian, 46; Mozambique, 212; Rose, 180

Rhodesia, 213

Richard the Lionhearted, 115

Ridolfo, Kathleen, 127

Riza, Sheikh Sayyid, 116

Roberts, Kenneth M., 287, 290

Robertson, Graeme, 270

Robertson, R., 25

Rodrigues-Sarmento, Manuel Maria, 212

Rokkan, Stein, 29

Rose, Richard, 270

Rosenau, James N., 17

Ross, M.H., 206

Rothchild, Donald, 246

Rothman, David, 14

Roy, Olivier, 87

Rudelson, Justin Jon, 100, 108

Rueschemeyer, Dietrich, 247

Ruiz Hernández, Margarito, 292

Rushkoff, Douglas, 106

Rusi, Iso, 150

Russia, 9, 30, 167, 170–73, 175–81, 304

Rwanda, 17, 244, 246, 254

Rwandan Patriotic Front (RPF), 250

Saakashvili, Mikheil, 180

Saha, L., 211

Said, Abdul A., 31

Saladin, 115

Salih, Kamal Osman, 246

Salman, Ton, 291

Salvatore, Armando, xv, 83, 84, 87, 302–03

Samarasigne, S. W. R. de A., 25

Sangha, Korea, 132

Sangho, Kim, 136

Sani, General Ahmed, 267–268

Sankoh, Fodog, 246

Sao Tome, 261

Saramao, 47

Saudi Arabia, 79, 102, 106

Sauimbi, Jonas, 246

Sawalha, Aseel, xvi, 16, 301, 304

Scheff, T., 209

Scherrer, Christian, 31

Schneider, A.K., 205

Schulze, Reinhard, 80

Schwarz, Benjamin, 245

Scotland, 28

Sectarianism, 82, 195

Secularism, 83–5. See also laicism

Selby, Angus, 221

Senegal, 261, 263, 270, 271

Separatism, Kurdish, 116, 120

Separatists, 94, 98, 101

Serbia, 9, 150, 152, 157, 303

Serbian Democratic Party, 152

Settlements, war, 5, 15

Shambambeva-Nyandoro, Mr., 231

Shame, 214

Shapiro, R., 25

Sharaf Khan Billisi, 115

Sharia, see law, Islamic

Sharrarah, Waddah, 197

Sheikh Mahmud Barzinji, 120

Sheikh Said, 115

Shepsle, Kenneth A., 153

Shevardnadze, Eduard, 177

Shovel massacre, 176

Sibanda MP, 231

Sierra Leone, 244, 246, 250, 254, 255, 259, 260, 261, 263, 271

Silj, Alessandro, 150

Silver, Beverly J., 66

Simmel, Georg, 7, 11–12, 308

Simmons, Luiz R., 31

Singapore, 126

Sinhalese, 303

Sino-Muslims, 94

Smelser, Neil J., xiv, 8, 25, 34, 302

Smith, Mark A., 106

Smith, Valerie, 194

Smith, Zeric K., 273

Snyder, Jack, 151

Socialization, xvii, 11, 215

Society, segmentary, 7

S kjin, Im, 136, 141

Solidarity, 80, 81

Solidere, 185, 188, 191

Solnick, Steven, 177

Somalia, 244, 254, 255

Sorel, Georges, 299

South Africa, Republic of, 6, 17, 126, 213, 247, 255, 306

South America, 307

South Korea, xv, 16, 46, 131–32; US Military Government, 134

Southeast Asia, 273

Southern African Development Community (SADC), 255

Soviet Union, 9, 28, 113–14, 126, 132, 173, 304

Spivak, Gayatari, 76

Sri Lanka, 9–10, 79, 303

Stalin, Joseph, 168, 174

Stansfield, Gareth, 123

Starn, Orin, 286

State: building, xvii, 15–16, 177, 243, 244–50, 252, 254, 255, 269, 293, 300, 306–07; capacity, 180, 264, 265, 269, 274; failed, 29, 126; intervention, 132, 286; state-society relations, 246; unitary structure, 249; modern, 203, 261, 269; Zamfara 267–268, 272

Stavenhagen, Rodolfo, 283, 284

Stein, H.F., 205

Stein, Jeff, 84

Stephan, Alfred, 270

Stinchcombe, Arthur, 179, 180

Strike Hard, 101

Structural Adjustment Programs (SAP), 253, 287

Sudan, 244, 246, 249, 254, 255

Suharto, President, 82

Sulaiman, Sadek, 85

Sulaymaniya incident, 119

Sŭngman, Yi, 132, 134–36, 138–39, 142

Sŭnim, Hyobong, 141

Sunni Muslim, 113

Suny, Ronald, 170, 172, 174, 175, 177

Sykes-Picot Agreement, 119

Syria, xv, 9, 113, 117, 171, 303

Tabad, Jad, 187

Tadjikistan, 174

Tahan, 190

Tai, Kuo-hui, 46, 49, 53

Taiwan, 94, 103, 301

Takasago Volunteer Army, 54, 56

Talabany, Jalal, 120–121, 123

Taliban, 107

Tamils, 9–10, 303

Tanaka, Martin, 287

Tanzania, 247, 269, 306

Tarim Basin, 100

Tarrow, Sydney, 12, 34

Taylor, Scott, 160

Teski, M.C., 206

Tewao-rudao, 48

Theories of mobilization, 34

Theory: constructivism, 11, 12, 149–51, 152, 153, 154; democratic peace, 273; ethnic competition, 11–12; instrumentalism, 149–151,152, 154; liberal political, 28; secularization, 28; social movement, 12; sun, 116

This Days News, 266

Three Jewels Monestary, 135

Tibet, 94, 99, 107

Tigray People’s Liberation Front, 247

Tilly, Charles, 33, 35

Tobach, E., 207

Togo, 254, 261, 263, 271

Torres, Víctor Hugo, 291, 292

Totalitarianism, 180

Toure, Sekou, 247

Tourism, 99,103, 185, 192, 195

Toynbee, Arnold, 86

Transcaucasian Federation, 174

Transitional Administrative Law, 122

Transnational Muslim politics, 87

Transnational organizations, 17, 18, 27–28

Treaty of Lausanne, 115, 120

Treaty of Sèvres, 115, 120

Trendle, Giles, 185

Trippner, 96

Trouillot, Michel-Rolph, 45–46, 52

Truman Doctrine, 118

Tsutsiev, 174

Tuhwan, Kim, 137

Turkestan, 98, 102. See also East Turkestan Republic

Turkey, 9, 82, 85, 93, 102, 108, 112, 171, 303

Tutsi, 245

Ubeydullah, Sheikh, 115

Uganda, 244, 246, 254, 270

Ujaama, 247

Ulama, 84–85

Ululu, Vincent, 212

Umar, M. Sani xvii, 15, 36, 293, 300

Umar, Muhammad, 271, 272

Union of Islamic Courts, 254

Union of Writers, 168

United Nations, 15, 27,121, 126, 156, 179, 209

United Revolution Front of Eastern Turkestan, 107

United State Institute of Peace, 208

United States, 8, 9, 32, 85, 114, 117, 118, 119, 121, 122, 254, 303

Uno, Toshiharu, 47

Unthinkability, 45–46, 47, 58, 76

Urban, Michael, 177

URNG, 68, 74

Urumqi, 99, 101, 103, 105, 110

Urwin, Derrick, W., 29

US Congressional Research Service, 100

USSR, 168

Uyghur: 101, 102, 302; American Association, 100; Human Rights Coalition, 105; Muslims, 98, 99

Uzbekistan, 101, 102

Vakhidi, Ashir, 107

Vaksberg, Arkady, 177

Van Cott, Donna Lee, xvii, 16, 282, 284, 287, 300, 307

van der Haar, Gemma, 284

van der Veer, Peter, 86

Vanguard newspaper, 266

Varshney, Astok, 11

Veterans, guerilla, 237

Villalon, Leonardo, 270

Vine, Deloria, 33

Vines, A., 213

Violence: xvi, 1, 3, 7, 11, 45, 51, 64, 75, 93, 107, 149, 206, 216, 269, 305; cycles of, xiii, 204; and identity, 3, 26, 204; political, 261, 264, 274; regulation, xiii, xvii, 24, 45, 94, 204, 215, 307–308; social, 35–36; structural, 204; war, 190. See also ethnic cleansing, ethnic violence, genocide, war

Virtual Information Center, 107

Volkan, V.D., 205

Wales, 28

War Veterans Act, 223, 228–32

War Veterans Amendment Bill, 235

War Veterans Association, 228

War Victims Compensation Act, 223–26

War: Angolan civil, 250; Caucasus, 168; civil, 243, 244, 250; Cold, 9, 53, 251, 254; dharma, 132; Gulf, 121; identity, 2; Israeli-Hezbollah, 304; Kurdish civil, 121; Lebanese civil, 185, 186, 196; proxy, 254; World II, 158; Yugoslav, 152. See also Violance

Waris-pino, 58

Warren, Kay, 70

Weber, Max, 282

Website funding, 106

Weidner, H., 28

Weinberg, Leonard, 36

West Africa, 259–260

Western Europe, 8–9

White, Jenny B., 85

Wigdortz, B. H., 103

Wilkins, David E., 33

Williams Jr., Robin, 268

Williams, R. M., 34, 122

Wilson, K.B., 213

Wilson’s Fourteen Points, 115

Wolfe, A., 205

Woodward, Susan L., 151

World Bank, 102,103, 252, 253, 264, 273, 274, 291, 306

Wu, Harry, 102

Xeabaj, 72

Xhaferi, Arben, 159

Xiaoping, Peng, 98

Xinjiang, 94, 100

Xinjiang Producation and Construction Corps, 102

Yang, H., 205

Yashar, Deborah, 283

Yassine, Abdesslam, 82

Yassine, Nadia, 82

Yavuz, Hakan, 84

Yinewai, 97

Yŏp, Hŏ, 133

Yoshimura, 48

Youth Party for Korean Independence, 132

Yrigoyen, Raquel, 283, 284

Yugoslavia, 6, 9, 17, 126, 157, 171, 173, 180

Yusuf, Anwar, 106

Zacuapa, 64

Zaire, 9, 246, 250, 251

Zaman, Muhhammad Qasim, 80

Zambia, 247

ZANLA, 16, 222, 236

ZANU PF, 222, 228

ZAPU, 222

Zartman, William, 13

Zaslavsky, Victor, 177

Zenawi, Meles, 247

Zimbabwe, 16, 300, 305

ZIPRA, 222

Zucconi, Mario, 150

Zur, Judith, 72

</biblio>

#title Shattering the Myth: Islam beyond Violence

#author Bruce B. Lawrence

#authors Bruce B. Lawrence, James Piscatori, Dale F. Eickelman

#date Apr 30, 2000

#isbn 9780691004877

#source <[[https://press.princeton.edu/books/paperback/9780691004877/shattering-the-myth][press.princeton.edu/books/paperback/9780691004877/shattering-the-myth]]> & <[[jstor.org/stable/j.ctv3f8r2b][https://www.jstor.org/stable/j.ctv3f8r2b]]>

#lang en

#pubdate 2024-08-03T08:20:39

#topics

#cover b-b-bruce-b-lawrence-shattering-the-myth-islam-bey-10.jpg

#notes Princeton Studies in Muslim Politics

#publisher Princeton University Press

#DELETED temporarily

 [Front Matter]

 Princeton Studies in Muslim Politics

Dale F. Eickelman and James Piscatori, Editors

Diane Singerman, Avenues of Participation: Family, Politics, and Networks in Urban Quarters of Cairo

Tone Bringa, Being Muslim the Bosnian Way: Identity and Community in a Central Bosnian Village

Dale F. Eickelman and James Piscatori, Muslim Politics

Bruce B. Lawrence, Shattering the Myth: Islam beyond Violence

Ziba Mir-Hosseini, Islam and Gender: The Religious Debate

in Contemporary Iran

Robert Hefner, Civil Islam: Muslim Democrats and State Violence in Indonesia

 [Title Page]

Shattering the Myth

ISLAM

BEYOND VIOLENCE

Bruce B. Lawrence

PRINCETON UNIVERSITY PRESS

PRINCETON, NEW JERSEY

 [Copyright]

Copyright © 1998 by Princeton University Press Published by Princeton University Press, 41 William Street, Princeton, New Jersey 08540 In the United Kingdom: Princeton University Press, Chichester, West Sussex All Rights Reserved

Third printing, and first paperback printing, 2000 Paperback ISBN 0-691-00487-0

The Library of Congress has cataloged the cloth edition of this book as follows

Lawrence, Bruce B. Shattering the myth : Islam beyond violence / Bruce B. Lawrence. p. cm. — (Comparative studies in Muslim politics) Includes bibliographical references and index. ISBN 0-691-05769-9 (cloth : alk. paper)

1. Islam—20th century. 2. Violence—Religious aspects— Islam. I. Title. II. Series.

BP163.L34 1998 297‘.09‘04—dc21 97–38776

This book has been composed in Sabon typeface The paper used in this publication meets the minimum requirements of ANSI/NISO Z39.48–1992 (R 1997) (Permanence of Paper)

[[http://pup.princeton.edu][http://pup.princeton.edu]]

Printed in the United States of America 10 9 8

ISBN-13: 978-0-691-00487-7 (pbk.)

 [Dedication]

TO MIRIAM

COMPANION, CATALYST, CRITIC, AND, ABOVE ALL, FRIEND

 [Epigraph]

<quote>
Islam’s middle position can be recognized by the fact that Islam has always been attacked from two opposite directions: from the side of religion that it is too natural, actual, and tuned to the world; and from the side of science that it contains religious and mystical elements. There is only one Islam, but like man, it has both soul and body … For the future and man’s practical activity, Islam means the call to create a man harmonious in his soul and body, and [the call to create] a society whose laws and socio-political institutions will maintain—and not violate—this harmony.

</quote>

<quote>

—’Alija ‘ Ali Izetbegovic, Islam between East and West

</quote>

<quote>

Jihad means ‘‘to insure that the real-world struggles of Muslims for social justice and peace may bear fruit. The ultimate goal of every Muslim is Islam, the state of peace, of submission in the certainty and power of Allah.’’

</quote>

<quote>

—Digital Jihad, an entry for the Activist Resource Center of the Dunya and Cyber Muslim Information host line of the World Wide Web, 26 February 1996

</quote>

 Contents

List of Illustrations xi

Foreword

Acknowledgments

INTRODUCTION

Islam across Time and Cultures

PART ONE:

european colonialism and its sequels 31

CHAPTER 1

The Three Phases of Modern-Day Islam

CHAPTER 2

Islamic Revivalism: Anti-Colonial Revolt

CHAPTER 3

Islamic Reform: Secular Nationalism

CHAPTER 4

Islamic Fundamentalism: Religious Nationalism

PART TWO:

muslim women and islamic fundamentalism 107

CHAPTER 5

The Double Bind Revisited

CHAPTER 6

The Shah Bano Case

CONCLUSION

Convergent Signposts: Jihad and Corporate Culture

Notes

Bibliography

Index

 Illustrations

Figure 1. The Muslim world (Africa and Asia) 34

Figure 2. Two veiled women by the sea wall in Tunis.

Photo: Trish O’Rielly, 1985 82

Figure 3. A swimsuit ad with veiled passerby in Tunis.

Photo: Trish O’Rielly, 1985 82

Figure 4. A light moment between the award-winning director Moufida Tlafli and Amel ben Aba, feminist, teacher, and advocate of women’s rights. Photo: Amel ben Aba, 1997 83

Figure 5. The feminist perception of the new family code in Tunisia. Photo: Amel ben Aba, 1997 83

Figure 6. ‘Ali, the major figure in Shi<i veneration. Photo: Iranian Airport Authority, 1996 102

Figure 7. Hussein, ‘Ali’s son and the major martyr of Shi<i veneration. Photo: Iranian Airport Authority, 1996 102

Figure 8. Khomeini’s official portrait. Photo: Iranian

Airport Authority, 1996 103

Figure 9. Khomeini’s tomb mosque. Photo: Iranian Ministry of Culture and Islamic guidance, 1996 103

 Foreword

VIOLENCE is never far from popular assumptions of Muslim politics. Islamists, or Muslim “fundamentalists,” are thought to be single-mindedly pitted against the secular state; suicide bombings and hostage-taking are viewed as a critical, if not the decisive, component of the modern Muslim-Western encounter; and the subordination of women in Muslim societies has acquired the normative status of a cliche. As with all received understandings, there are elements of truth in these formulations, but adequate analysis requires a fuller exploration of the contexts in which Muslim societies have evolved and of the ways they interact with larger economic and political orders. Bruce Lawrence has provided just such an informed interpretation of the contemporary Muslim experience.

For Muslim societies from the eighteenth century onward, as for countless other peoples, the defining event has been the imperialist intrusion of the West and the advent of colonial dependency. The consequences have been manifold: the distortion of economic development and subordination to “global”—that is, Western— trade, investment, and production requirements; the emergence of local bureaucratic elites that, in the name of independence, replicate the nationalist ideological superstructure of the colonizers; the reaction of counterelites that seek to affirm their own claims to power and legitimacy by contesting the bases of political and cultural “authenticity.” This course of history is scarcely unique to Muslims, and to the extent that they, like others, are buffeted by larger currents, explanations for Muslim political conduct based on such categorizations as “Muslim rage” seem not only reductionist, but also parochial.

If Muslims have been subjected to structural violence like others, the common victims of economic and political hegemonies, they have not, however, lost control over their destinies. Indeed, to grant that they possess agency, the means to respond to the challenges and dilemmas of modern life, is to recognize the analytical and policy significance of what is evocatively called the “Islamic difference.” Although ideologically determined explanations may well end in unhelpful caricatures, Muslim symbols and values have a place in our examination of Muslim politics for they often shape discourse and influence conduct. Muslims do more than simply react; motivated by their own norms and ideas, they routinely reshape their world—and Islam—even as they reshape through interaction the worlds of the postcolonial or, generally, non-Muslim “Others.”

This process, described in the pages to follow, is complex. On the one hand, although the term “Muslim politics” may at first glance appear to suggest uniformity of intent or practice, it is grounded in the assumption of variability and change. Circumstances affect the contours of that politics, and Lawrence’s explanations for the particular states of affairs in Egypt, Iran, Pakistan, and Malaysia, among other cases, are compelling. Yet, on the other hand, there are broadly shared characteristics, notably the manipulation of symbolic resources and the permeability, even volatility, of boundaries. Women, to a large extent, have emerged at the core of politics in Muslim societies because they have been invested, or have invested themselves, with the representation of “Islam.” They become the bearers of cultural orthodoxy, the very symbol of the faith and purity of the community. However, the production and maintenance of this symbol, like others, is an intensely political act that speaks directly to—at times sustaining but often subverting—established hierarchies and approved codes of social conduct. Thus, contention over the status, legal and otherwise, of women in Muslim societies both delineates and challenges the boundaries of public morality.

Negotiations are a constant feature of the Muslim landscape, but a more visible aspect is protest, whether it be against colonial or neocolonial power, the dominant local state apparatus, the religious establishment, or the prevailing economic system. In a sense, this focus on negotiation almost naturally flows from the fragmentation of authority that marks Muslim societies today. Political and religious bureaucracies, officially sanctioned ‘ulama or religious authorities, Islamist movements, urban intellectuals, Sufi orders—all present in Lawrence’s study—represent the range of competitors for the mantle of defender of the faith. Their very competition spurs a sense of discontent with the status quo and the search for alternative futures. But Professor Lawrence refines our understanding of the dynamics of protest by noting the importance of timing and sequence, placing protest into a historical framework that distinguishes among revivalist, reformist, and fundamentalist phases.

Revivalists were preindustrial and overwhelmingly Sunni, responding to a potent combination of direct European intervention, disruptions to traditional trade, demographic shifts, and agricultural decline and finding a cushion of sorts in the reaffirmation of Islamic identity and values. Reformers, who formed an intellectual elite and were the product of the colonial presence, adapted to the nationalist and ideological legacies of the West and saw them as compatible with Islam. Whether they acknowledged it or not, they found in these Western ideas a rival standard to that of the divine text. It is thus no surprise that, from the 1970s, fundamentalists have sought to right the imbalance and to wrest power, and therefore the control of authenticity, away from the “modernists.” Structural realignments of global economic, political, and military power provide the context in which these protest movements hope to overcome the interconnected senses of vulnerability and cultural outrage and to achieve empowerment.

We come full circle, then, to the specter and reality of violence. Although not all fundamentalists have the same goals and adopt the same strategies, it is obvious that many deploy directly confrontational means in their assault on the mighty state or what they regard as the neoimperialist West. But, as Lawrence acutely observes, other voices, whether from Bosnia or from Malaysia, are beginning to be heard as well, and basic concepts are being redefined in the direction of pluralism. The current debate over whether Islam is compatible with democracy turns in large part on whether Islamic values and symbols are seen as evolving and flexible or as definitive and unyielding. Lawrence’s argument in this regard is subtle and penetrating. Muslims, particularly Muslim women of course, face economic underdevelopment within their own societies and marginalization in the high-technology global economy; even the oil-rich Gulf states are disadvantaged in their reliance on Western technology and science. However, just as economic and political need provided the engine for change in the past, so too now the concept of jihad, long reviled in the West as a sign of Muslim aggressiveness, has emerged in some quarters as an internal challenge to Muslim societies. Despite what fundamentalists may say, the real struggle of the modern world is against economic dependence, and rather than seeing neocapitalist corporate culture as a sterile conformity with, or capitulation to, the global hegemon, some recognize that striving toward that culture— jihad—is consistent with evolving Islamic norms of economic responsibility and social justice. As Muslims accept that accommodationism of this kind is both necessary and desirable, space may well be created for tolerance between Muslims and others—but, perhaps more importantly, among Muslims themselves—and the cause of pluralism advanced.

The challenge in evaluating the manifold dimensions of contemporary Islam is to accord analytical respect to the evolving normative code while avoiding the overdeterminism sometimes implicit in notions of religious politics. Muslims, we often forget, do not always act as Muslims or as members of a religious community; rather, they respond to economic, social, and political needs that may direct conduct more than ideological signposts do. Yet, at the same time, the “world view” or imagination of Muslims remains a renewing source of guidance in a world undergoing bewildering transformations. Bruce Lawrence’s distinguished contribution is to demonstrate a balance of perspectives that is instructive, and to alert us to the salutary effects that an Islamic difference can make.

<right>

James Piscatori

</right>

<right>

Dale F. Eickelman

</right>

 Acknowledgments

IT IS IMPOSSIBLE to thank everyone in a project such as this, but foremost recognition belongs to the Harry Frank Guggenheim Foundation, which funded the research and writing of much of this book in the early 1990s. Karen Colvard, the senior program officer at the Harry Frank Guggenheim Foundation, not only helped me to conceptualize the project but also organized a seminar to provide valuable feedback on the manuscript after it had been accepted for publication by Princeton University Press. Karen was as generous with her imagination as with her time, and I am glad to acknowledge my indebtedness to her on both counts. I also benefited from the interventions of several scholars who attended the March 1997 seminar at the Harry Frank Guggenheim Foundation: Janet Abu-Lughod, Pinar Batur Vanderlippe, Miriam Cooke, Hamid Dabashi, Ainslie Embree, Abdullah Hammoudi, Robert Hefner, Arlene MacLeod, and John Vanderlippe. Joel Wallman, another program officer of the Harry Frank Guggenehim Foundation, helped facilitate the March seminar, quietly but effectively assisting in this as in other dimensions of my work with the foundation; I acknowledge with gratitude his role as well in the making of this book.

The Fundamentalism Project of the University of Chicago gave me both programmatic and financial incentive to craft an earlier essay on the Shah Bano case, which appears as chapter 5 below and was first published in slightly different form in The Journal of Religious Ethics 22.1 (Spring 1994). In their complementary roles, Martin Marty and F. Scott Appleby of the Fundamentalism Project have been consistent, helpful supporters of my work, and I thank them for including me in several useful workshops in Cambridge and Hyde Park. I also thank The Journal of Religious Ethics for permission to reprint the Shah Bano essay.

The United States Information Agency funded trips to Pakistan in the 1980s and to Malaysia in the 1990s, trips which permitted me to give lectures, make contacts and, above all, develop an onsite acquaintance with fluctuating, often unpredictable developments.

I also benefited from a trip to Iran in early 1996. At the invitation of the Ministry of Culture and Islamic Guidance, I traveled to Tehran to give a plenary paper on the significance of Persian culture in the study of Islamic civilization. A side benefit of the trip was the possibility that it afforded me to observe firsthand the latest phase of the Islamic Republic of Iran. I am especially indebted to Dr. Nasrollah Pourjavady, director of Tehran University Press, for facilitating that trip, and for making every aspect of the conference a pleasurable reintroduction to present-day Iran.

I have also benefited from colleagues who have read and responded to versions of this book in earlier drafts. I want to acknowledge Vincent Cornell and Carl Ernst, in particular, for thoughtful comments that exceed collegial responsibility, even as they reinforce the meaning—and value—of friendship.

Graduate students at Duke University, whether in seminars or in library stacks, have devoted time, expended energy, and shown creativity in helping me to think through some of the issues addressed throughout this book. I would like especially to thank Mark Lynch, Charles Wilkins, Maddie Adelman, Kelly Jarrett, Randy Styers, Scott Kugel, Ann Burlein, Munis Faruqi, and Eric Boyd.

One staff person at Duke University has also assisted me immeasurably: Connie Blackmore, administrative coordinator for Comparative Area Studies, not only gave me feedback on the form of earlier versions but actually typed the entire manuscript prior to its submission to Princeton University Press. She has been a spectacular example of quiet efficiency and unfailing good humor, even when tested, as indeed she was, by gaps and inconsistencies in my text. More recently, both Lynda Harrison and Lillian Spiller of the Department of Religion have aided me in putting the revised manuscript into publishable form, and I would be remiss in not acknowledging their support as well.

As this project has moved through the manuscript stage to the book stage, I have become increasingly indebted to Ann Wald. First as religion editor then as editor-in-chief at Princeton University Press, Ann has encouraged me to pursue submission, review, and preparation of this book for Princeton University Press. Without her creative advice I still would have written and published this book, but it is no exaggeration to say that it has become a far better book because of her oversight.

Few persons are as lucky as I am in my academic labor; I share travels abroad as well as writing at home with one who also shares almost all other aspects of my life yet never stints from offering me fresh perspectives and occasional goads. If I have read nearly everything she has written and published, she has read all of mine. We work together, but I consider myself the one more profited. It is to my wife, Miriam Cooke, whom I dedicate this book.

Yet neither Miriam nor anyone else is responsible for the use to which I have put their generous gifts of time and thought. For over twenty years I have continued to reflect on the complexity of contemporary Muslim life. I remain perplexed at its diverse norms, but I also remain in awe of its persistent values. This book mirrors my ongoing engagement with Islam and with Muslims. Its errors, like its judgments, remain mine; both are but the latest way station in a lifelong journey.

 Introduction: Islam Across Time and Cultures

MY MAIN argument is simple, yet it is at odds with most popular and academic understandings of Islam. I argue that Islam cannot be understood except as a major and complex religious system, shaped as much by its own metaphysical postulates and ethical demands as by the circumstances of Muslim polities in the modern world. The last two hundred years have witnessed challenge upon challenge, from colonial subjugation to sporadic revivalism to elitist reform movements to, most recently, pervasive struggles with fundamentalism or Islamism. During each phase, Muslims have had to address internal tensions as well as external threats. The success of anticolonial struggles was followed by the disappointment of indigenous neocolonialisms. More recently, postcolonial Muslims—some Arab, most non-Arab—have been playing ever greater roles in economic changes, both regional and global. As the impact of these changes has become evident on societies everywhere, they have propelled new actors into public view. The most remarkable new presence is that of Muslim women.

In what follows I argue that the experience of Muslim women, above all, calls for a more nuanced approach to Islam and global change. It is time to counter negative stereotypes about Muslim women with knowledge about their newly constituted roles.

Yet few books attempt to synthesize data from regionally separate and geographically discrete countries with a majority Muslim population. Where such an effort has been made, it is usually through multiauthored or edited volumes that belie the very coherence suggested by their titles. While I do offer an in-depth study of one pivotal judicial saga, from India, I have otherwise drawn together data provided by others in order to demonstrate (a) that Islam is not inherently violent and (b) that the longer view of Muslim societies offers hope, rather than despair, about the role of Islam in the next century.

This book offers three convergent foci: the crystallization of Islamic sociopolitical movements, women as the key index of Muslim identity, and finally the staging of new global economic developments that bode an unexpected Muslim difference in world affairs.

The Muslim difference will remain hidden, its force unacknowledged, unless the dominant stereotype is exposed: Islam is not violence, nor are Muslims intrinsically prone to violence. The stereotype amounts to a slur, and it must be addressed at the outset if the emerging profile of postcolonial Muslims is to be understood.

 Islam Beyond Violence

Islam is ... Islam is ... Islam is ... Islam is many things. Just as there is no single America or Europe or the West, a seamless caption etching diverse groups and persons with the same values and meanings, so there is no single place or uniform culture called Islam. There is no monolithic Islam. There is a Muslim world spanning Africa and Asia. It is as pluralistic as the West, outstripping both Europe and America in the numerous regions, races, languages, and cultures that it encompasses. The Afro-Asian Muslim world is also internally pluralistic, containing multiple groups who might be said to represent Islamic norms in each Muslim country. And Muslims themselves are aware of how necessary, and how difficult, it is to specify differing notions of Islam. An Indonesian friend of mine once quipped: “There are three Islams: the popular Islam which anthropologists are fond of studying, mostly as curious spectators; the public Islam with which political scientists, journalists, and policy makers identify, mostly as adversaries; and the academic Islam in which Orientalists delight, whether as art historians, linguists, or religion scholars, each studying artifacts esteemed by their guild. In Indonesia we try to provide our visitors with all three.”[1]

If Islam is so diverse and Muslims so accommodating, then why has Islam so often been viewed by non-Muslims as alien at best and violent at worst? I suggest that the principal reason for the negative view of Islam is the predominance in popular thinking of the second view: public Islam. In that view, Islam emanates from a hostile, “Arab” Middle East. Most journalists, and many policy makers, continue to discount any but Arab Islam, or what is conjured up as Arab Islam in projecting the orthodox face of puritanism and militancy. In the 1990s most Euro-American journalists continue to echo the sentiments that drove European kings and their subjects to launch their crusades almost a millennium ago, crusades whose enemy was Arab Muslims. In the aftermath of the Cold War the enemy, once again, has become the one Islam, the militant, unyielding, violent face of “Arab” Islam. Whether one picks up a popular book claiming to represent “Western cultures and values” under attack from Islam,[2] or lead articles of The

New York Times, such as the recent “Seeing Green: The Red Menace Is Gone. But Here’s Islam,”[3] the message is the same: Islam is one, and Islam is dangerous.

The Muslim enemy is invariably male, whether a foreign warrior conjured from the past or a potential terrorist stalking modern America. The fierce Kurdish anti-Crusader Salah ad-din Ayyubi, known popularly as Saladin, seems to have multiple contemporary look-alikes. Whether it is Ayatollah Khomeini denouncing the United States as the Great Satan or the Egyptian Sheikh Omar Abdel Rahman plotting to bomb the World Trade Center and other New York public buildings, Muslim leaders continue to be newsworthy principally for their adversarial words and deeds.

Behind the hostile Muslim men, Americans imagine the faces of Muslim women, homebound creatures marked alike by seclusion from the outside world and apparent oppression by their tyrannical husbands. The reality of Muslim women’s active participation in their societies is glossed, covered, as it were, by a veil that projects the violence of male “Arab” Muslims everywhere. They hate the West and abuse their women.

Both images depend on singularizing Islam and then describing it as both different and violent. That stereotype remains remote from Islam as lived experience. Popular Islam is more than just the remote village or exotic domain of anthropologists. It is also the shared notion of a world view and a pattern of living that characterizes most Muslims in Asia and Africa. It provides enormous challenges and hopes and satisfactions for Muslim women and for Muslim men. Islam offers all Muslims no fewer possibilities than every major religious tradition offers the women and the men who identify with it.

Because gender imbalance pervades both popular understanding and Muslim historiography, I will call attention to the places where women have been excluded. I will also draw out the implications of their exclusion. How best to weave the multiple levels of women’s history and their interests into a narrative that also takes account of macropolitical changes has not been an easy task. I have decided to do a separate section on women’s history for three countries—Iran, Pakistan, and Egypt—in order to show how different that history looks from the “standard” history I provide in the earlier analyses of these same countries. While the preponderance of dates given in country chapters highlights male actors, it is the significant dates for women that highlight chapter 5, where I explore the double bind of Muslim women in the current period of Islamic fundamentalism. In chapter 6 I limit analysis to one nonMuslim country and one famous court case, that of Shah Bano in India. The Shah Bano case is important for India but also for its Muslim majoritarian neighbors, Pakistan and Bangladesh. Since these three polities govern the largest number of Muslims in the world, I have tried to demonstrate how the Shah Bano case discloses the juridical structures that define, and also restrict, the public opportunities for Muslim women throughout the Asian subcontinent.

To some, the arrangement of chapters might seem to perpetuate the perverse axiom “equal but separate” as applied to women in general and Muslim women in particular. My intent has been the opposite: to argue for the inclusion of a perspective on Muslim women that complicates the standard interpretation of Muslim norms and values, at the same time that it does not obscure the prevalence of violence as a condition that affects both Muslim men and Muslim women, in much of Asia and Africa but also in Europe and America.

Why do I begin with violence? Because violence is where most non-Muslims begin to think about Islam, especially if they live in a society where Muslim citizens are either silent or absent. In some cases, Muslims are too few to be properly viewed as multiple rather than singular in their outlook. Such is the case with America in the mid-1990s, where popular attention focuses on Louis Farrakhan and his message of hatred as if that messenger speaks for most Muslims as well as many African American males.[4]

Though there are episodes in which Muslims, like members of any contemporary religious community, do commit violence, and though there are other Farrakhans in the world outside the United States, violence remains an aberration rather than the norm. Violence is no more intrinsic to Islam than to Judaism, Christianity, Hinduism, Buddhism, or Sikhism. The distorted link of Islam to violence has to be brought into the full light of critical enquiry.

It is to restore balance to the popular Euro-American understanding of Islam and Muslims that I begin my foray into recent Muslim history by focusing on violence. Violence fully exposed can illumine how Islamic rhetoric and symbol function for Muslim leaders and institutions. If violence pervades Muslim public life throughout this century, it is because violence pervades the world order, old and new. It affects all Muslims indirectly, but it has a direct and immediate impact on those who are marked as Muslim political figures.

Take, for example, ‘Alija Izetbegovic. The president of Bosnia-Herzegovina, Izetbegovic provides the first epigraph for this book. “Islam,” in his view, “means the call to create a person harmonious in body and soul, and [the call to create] a society whose laws and socio-political institutions will maintain—and not violate— that harmony.” Why Izetbegovic? Because he has lived during a period of unprecedented turmoil for himself and for his countrymen. The Cold War ended abruptly in 1989, yet the promised new world order did not emerge, at least not in Bosnia. Izetbegovic, however, continues to struggle as an East European Muslim who refuses to parochialize Islam or to advocate a defensive Islam against an offensive West. Izetbegovic exemplifies the crucial, transregional scope of impulses to locate Islam within rather than against global processes.

Who is Izetbegovic? Except for his dour countenance flashed from time to time on CNN, he remains little known to most Americans or Europeans. Yet he is an intellectual turned activist. Neither Arab nor Asian nor African, he is fully European. His being European calls into question the standard set of equivalents attached to religious affiliations that tend to frame Islam as Afro-Asian, Christianity as Euro-American. A lawyer and a philosopher, Izetbegovic is conversant with the major intellectual and social challenges of this century that originate from the so-called West, that is, the nation-states of Europe (and America) located to the west of Bosnia.[5]

To some Izetbegovic might well be dubbed a “violent” Muslim, since violence forms part of his world view and he does not flinch from its consideration in his writings. But he views physical violence, including military confrontation, as a last resort only, a counterforce to others’ violence. What he advocates is a defensive, not an offensive, resort to violence: violence to achieve a more harmonious political-social order. In Bosnia, and elsewhere, Izetbegovic seeks a pluralist polity where Islam becomes not the preemptive religion but the pragmatic middle way, a modus vivendi between remnants of the formerly Communist East and the emerging European Union, with its global allies.

Yet violence of another kind does loom large, casting its dark shadow over Izetbegovic's Bosnian homeland, as it does over the destiny of most Muslims in most parts of the globe at the end of the twentieth century. It is a structural violence that reduces the range of choice for European, as for African and Asian, Muslims. It is a structural violence that restricts the options for Muslim nationstates in a post-Cold War world, but it also does something far more subtle and consequential: it victimizes Muslim intellectuals by imposing limits on discourse about Islam at the end of this century. It talks about some other, in this case Muslim others, but never talks from a perspective that is self-critical about location (Euro-American) and time (end of a century).

But which century is ending? It seems obvious, almost banal, to state "the twentieth century" because we take it for granted as our century. We presume the Christian century as a universal time gradient, though there is also a new Muslim century (the fifteenth) that is only in its second decade. Most persons calculate "real" time only by the Christian calendar, and that is fitting since the century that is coming to an end in the year 2000/2001 is a supremely Christian century. The common calendar reflects the axis of global power: the twentieth century belongs to Christian nations or to "secular" nations with a residual Christian ethos or a majority of Christian citizens. Muslim players have been few and peripheral. This century, more than any that preceded it, will be remembered and portrayed as the Euro-American century. And it is against that backdrop of taken-for-granted hegemony, a kind of blind structural violence writ large, that the relationship of Islam to violence needs to be reconsidered.

Izetbegovic, alert to French science, British history, and Russian literature, able to cite Freud, Marx, Engels, and Buber with equal ease, should be in the so-called Western camp: both by training and by disposition he is a Muslim modernist. The first of two epigraphs for this book was taken from his major theoretical writing published in 1984, long before the debacle of 1991 in ex-Yugoslavia. Yet already Izetbegovic felt himself beset by enemies. Despite being an eclectic pluralist broadly engaged in the scholarly tradition of modern Europe, he asserts (a) that Islam is under attack and (b) that Islam under attack is always split into two Islams, one etherialized as religion, the other demonized as politics.

Izetbegovic rejects the dichotomization, which amounts to the demonizations, of Islam. He acknowledges the link between Islamic rhetoric and some acts of political violence, but he stops short of making Islam either the primary cause or the principal motivation for violence. Instead he tries to project and preserve the Islamic middle ground or middle way. He also tries to restore Muslim intellectuals to a role of mediation in charting the future for Muslim polities and the Muslim world as a whole.

In what follows I will try to chart my own middle way, steering between the twin minefields of apologetics and polemics. While no one can deny that some Muslims perpetrate acts of violence, I will attempt to show how the variability of Islam permits not one but several Muslim responses to violence: loyalty to Islam may be invoked as easily to avert cyclical violence (as in the case of Izetbegovic) as to pursue violent confrontation in the name of Allah. Nor is such variability unique to Islam; it is shared by other religious traditions—Hindu, Buddhist, or Sikh—that also share with Islam the experience of being shaped by a Christian century, one stamped by “the West” in its colonial and now postcolonial configurations of public space and institutions.

To disconnect the equation of Islam with violence, I will employ a double stratagem. The first stratagem will be definitional: I will explore how Islam is more than what is commonly presupposed as religion. In the deepest sense, Islam remains a religion, since those who profess belief in Allah and in Muhammad as His final prophet are marked with a distinctive set of rituals and laws. Yet Islam is also a modern ideology subordinated to the dominant ideology of this century, nationalism, and it is the relationship of Islam to nationalism that is at once pivotal and understudied.

It is fashionable in some circles to debunk nationalism, and to project either the “end of history”—in Francis Fukuyama’s misguided slogan—or a “coming clash of civilizations”—in Samuel Huntington’s vaporous restaging of postnational, global conflict.[6] A close look at day-to-day affairs, however, suggests both that nationalism is alive in the mid-1990s and that the nation-state is far from obsolete as an instrument of power. As one shrewd observer has lamented, the nation-state remains “the politics of the first person plural.” It coalesces ideological forces precisely because “the sense of being ‘we’ ... is the necessary foundation for any durable political system” and “only the nation-state possesses this necessary sense of identity.” “The nation-state will last longer than most people had thought.”[7] And because most Muslims exist within postcolonial Muslim nation-states, the ubiquitous character of nationalism has to be acknowledged in any discussion of contemporary Islam. At the same time, one must be alert to recall, as Bruce Kapferer has reminded us, that nationalism itself is far from a unitary movement; it reflects much more than European norms, First World values, or elitist experiences.[8]

If my first stratagem is to revisit and redefine basic categories, my second stratagem will be discursive: I will focus on how European colonial powers have used religion in the service of ideology to divide and control major segments of the world, from West Africa to Southeast Asia. The record does not permit blanket condemnation of all legacies from the colonial period, for the modern sector of Muslim societies has produced creative advocates and notable benefits. Yet fifty years after the founding of the United Nations and the near elimination of European control over much of Asia and Africa, one must remain wary of how postcolonial independence has been shaped by the immediate past. The British may have gone home, and the French mission to civilize (la mission civilisatrice) declared a failure, but British and French, as also Dutch and Russian, legacies persist in the Muslim world. Part 2 will explore the durable influence of postcolonialism in specific Muslim nation-states.

I approach this task conscious that I am limited as well as enabled by who I am. I am male. I am Anglo. I am upper middle class. European in ancestry, I was born in America. Raised non-Muslim, I remain non-Muslim. Yet after studying both the Arabic language and Middle Eastern history from an early age, I remain deeply attracted to Islam as a life force: it animates many Muslims with whom I have lived and worked and whom I count among my closest friends.

While these are ascriptive limits shaping my viewpoint, I am further limited by what I embrace: I choose to be both an intellectual and an unabashed humanist. Despite the many assaults on the humanities from within and beyond the academy, I remain not only a humanist but a late modern humanist.

I am not a postmodernist humanist, however. I continue to scan metanarratives in the pursuit of local histories. I seek patterns that interconnect numerous Muslim histories, whether local, national, or regional, and also link them collectively to global forces. At the same time, I reject the judgment that none but the persons invoked can talk about themselves. In that case, only the words of informants count, and they must be cited as the trump authority, or if one does not cite their exact words, goes the argument, then at the least one must use terms that these same informants would be comfortable having others use.[9]

The Syrian philosopher Sadik al-Azm has exposed the foolhardiness of embracing rank nominalism as a benchmark of scholarship. Rhetorically, he asks: “Were I to take seriously the subjectivist advice of those who ask us never to ‘apply words to describe people that they would not accept and apply to themselves,’ would I ever be able to say that such and such a Middle Eastern ruler is ‘a brutal military dictator,’ considering that he never applies such words and descriptions either to himself or to his regime?”[10]

The evident answer is “NO!” But too often it is a muted or defensive “No!” It needs to be announced again and again as a “NO!” “NO” to relativism, “NO” to delusionary escapism from the interlocking character of late capitalist culture and social movements that relate to it even when they claim to be independent of its influence.

At the same time, I do not advocate the total neglect of other people's self-presentation. It does matter what people say about themselves, the categories they use, the arguments they construct, or the goals they advocate. It does matter what people say, yet as the American religious critic Robert Segal deftly put it, "there is a difference between starting with the actor's point of view and ending with it.... The actor may be right, but the assumption that the actor automatically is right is dogmatic."[11]

Beyond trying to make comparisons through explicit and interdisciplinary categories, I espouse cross-cultural enquiry as a genuine form of academic labor. It is not reducible to the new Orientalism that the feminist critic Gayatri Spivak claims it to be. In Spivak's view, cross-culturalism serves only to perpetuate banality in a postcolonial world,[12] but it can do more: it can also become a pathway to exploratory dialogue that is both interdisciplinary and international.

But cross-culturalism, if it is to generate useful dialogue, must first accept "open appraisal, the typical plausibility tests, the bargaining adjustments regnant in an open pluralist market of ideas." The criteria are set forth by the sociologist Jose Casanova.[13] I advocate the same criteria, and I advocate them as a humanist who is at the same time a perspectivist. In an open pluralist market of ideas, I set out self-consciously what beliefs, attitudes, and assumptions inform my approach to the social reality of the Muslim world.[14] And it is from the perspective of the humanities that I challenge both humanists and social scientists to rethink how their own prior convictions—religious, political, and social—have shaped their approach to contemporary Islam. What units of analysis are suitable to assessing Muslim thought and Muslim societies? What presumptions do some of the taken-for-granted categories carry? How do we account for the difference that they convey from a context that is predominantly Christian and secular to one that is Muslim and often nonsecular?

I begin with the category religion.

 Islam as Religion and Also Not Religion

<quote>

The history of the twentieth century has confirmed something well known to all the historians of the past, something our ideologies have stubbornly ignored: the strongest, fiercest, most enduring political passions are nationalism and religion.

</quote>

<quote>

—Octavio Paz, One Earth, Four or Five Worlds

</quote>

To unhinge the reflexive stereotyping that plagues too much scholarship on modern-day Muslims, I begin at a point of reference outside the Muslim world but within the so-called Third World. I take as my starting point Octavio Paz, the Mexican Nobel Laureate in Literature. Like many contemporary Euro-American intellectuals, Paz implies not only that religion and nationalism are equivalent passions but also that religion, like nationalism, is an undifferentiated whole that evokes deep-seated political passions. He concurs with the cultural historian Daniel Pick that nationalism is a form of mimetic religion, “involving a kind of faith, indeed something of the aura of ‘religion’ which it arguably both displaces and substitutes.”[15] In that sense, religion can be both opposed to nationalism and allied with it. Yet religion is more than political and it is other than passion; it also entails language, values, and institutions. One cannot begin to compare religion and nationalism without recognizing at the outset that they are very different categories of individual expression and collective experience. While they have been engaged, each with the other, since at least the sixteenth century, Paz argues that it is in the present century that their interrelationship has become most explicit and most dangerous. Why? Because only in the twentieth century did historians for the first time recognize nationalism as evoking a passion equivalent to religion; only then did both become enduring passions—not just enduring, but “the strongest, fiercest, most enduring.”

While religion can be and should be conjoined with nationalism, there remains a deeper, crucial question: Is religion privileged or diluted by being paired with nationalism? The question cannot be avoided, and Paz does give an implicit answer: in the twentieth century religion has been superseded by nationalism. Its influence, defensive and residual, becomes felt to the extent that its advocates can couple their goals with nationalist aspirations, their structures with the administrative, political, and commercial apparatus of the state. In short, for Paz religion can succeed, but it can succeed only when it becomes part of the nationalist agenda.

Yet Paz's notion of religion, never stated, seems restricted to Christianity and at the same time divested of the early modern history of Christian missions. He ignores the role and influence of "colonialism" as the vanguard and often the partner of Christian missions.[16] His notion of religion needs to be expanded beyond its most immediate referent group, Euro-American Christian elites living in the postcolonial era. Few Muslim intellectuals, still facing the legacy of colonialism, juxtapose religion to nationalism as equivalent categories, for Islam still retains a symbolic force independent of nationalism, just as it projects a pragmatic function that can, and often does, challenge nationalist ideologies.

Consider the Muslim intellectual with whom we began this book: Izetbegovic. Religion as a category remains problematic for Izetbegovic precisely because it projects belief as Christian belief unaffected by the historical process that led to European control over much of Asia and Africa. Yet Christian missions and missionaries were married to the colonial project in much of Asia and Africa, even when, as in the case of India, British officials attempted to limit missionary activity in order to curtail civil unrest. Religion can never be neutral when it is controlling or linked to structures that control.

At the same time, religion should have, and does have, political valence apart from the state. The Islamic "difference," in Izetbegovic's view, is to project a holistic world view that invokes religious norms as a corrective to political practices. Religion becomes a vehicle for the redress of public life, not its betrayal, since Islam advocates control—of mind, of body, of space—as an explicit dimension of religion.

Whereas Paz links religion with nationalism, Izetbegovic contrasts religion with worldly gain. Islam, in Izetbegovic's view, escapes the too Christian/European dialectic of religion and nationalism because pure Islam, ideal Islam, is not mere religion: it applies alike to the inner and outer life; it couples belief with action in a single, equal accent. The most palpable site of belief enacted is the mosque. It functions as a place of worship and education. "That is why schools in the Islamic world cannot be classified according to the European criterion: secular-spiritual."[17] They are both spiritual and secular, even as Islam is both other-worldly and this-worldly. The stress is double rather than staged; to believe in the next world is to be engaged in this world.

Yet engagement with this life entails more than educational pursuits; it also requires attention to the pivotal role of politics. Ideal politics are channeled to a higher vision than narrow self-interest. Islam, according to Izetbegovic, should be invoked not for expedient political ends but rather for justice: How then does one serve justice?

<quote>

In principle, force has nothing to do with morality. But in real life, there is no justice without force. Justice is the unity of the idea of equity and power ... the impotence of religion[18] to carry out in practice even a part of the great ideals it preaches, compromises its demands before the humble and the repressed. Violence and politics, on the contrary, have been justified to a certain extent, for they created the means needed for realizing the great ideas which religion had discovered or inspired but could not manage to translate into reality.[19]

</quote>

Though Izetbegovic's view is that of an idealist, his views very closely match those of the Cyber Muslim host line citation that appears, along with his, at the outset of this book: the goal of lived Islam is "to insure that the real-world struggles of Muslims for social justice and peace may bear fruit." In pursuit of his ideals, Izetbegovic went to jail under Tito. Later he was maligned by both Serbs and Croats for his commitment to a pluralist polity in Bosnia-Herzegovina. He remains a committed exponent of Muslim universalism, seeing Muslims as one group among many, not Islam as a socioreligious orientation superseding others in the civil domain.

Yet, in trying to make Islam more than an exclusionary religion, Izetbegovic overlooks the challenge that nationalism has posed to the autonomy of religious language, religious values, and, above all, religious institutions. Especially in this century nationalism has become a quasi-religion, displacing prior religions. There are several instrumental reasons, such as the emergence of print-capitalism,[20] that help to explain the success of nationalism. But still more important has been the ability of nationalism to provide an alternative vocabulary to religion. Nationalists preempted the public authority of religious leaders and institutions. Beyond the instrumental force of language, one must also calculate the values of nationalist leaders. These values, as I have argued elsewhere,[21] often clashed with those of religious leaders, at the same time that nationalists either undercut or co-opted the resources of religious institutions for their own ends.[22]

Islam—no less than Christianity or Judaism, Hinduism or Buddhism—is shaped by its world historical context, in which nationalism occupies center stage. However much religious symbols may be invoked or religious leaders coopted, or religious buildings sprinkled on the landscape, nationalist fervor remains at heart a rival to the universalist claim of religious fervor. In the twentieth century nationalism and ethnic/regional markings have superseded religion as the hallmark of collective identity. Nationalism does for the modern era what religion did, or tried to do, in the premodern era: to direct the hopes of the majority toward its norms while also engaging their energies in its public life.

The displacement of religion by nationalism on these grounds needs to be closely examined if we are to understand the shifting valence of Islam in the high-tech era. Can religion become an adjunct of the state and still function as religion, or does co-optive nationalism amount to little more than a thinly disguised variant of the secularization hypothesis?

These questions are crucial to any reconsideration of postcolonial Muslim hopes, for behind all the arguments about Islam and politics remains the twinfold assumption that (a) Christianity defines “true” religion, and Islam as religion must, or should, resemble Christian models, and (b) all religion is premodern and antirational while the state is both modern and rational. Assumptions die hard, and the most closely held resist even sympathetic exposure. Underlying the critique of religion in general and Christianity in particular is an evolutionary bias. Religion, whether Christianity or Islam, could not stand the light of scientific truth. When the modern era fully dawned, the superstitious and backward nature of antecedent myths (scriptural dicta, creedal formulae, local magic) became evident, their hold on believers gradually eroded or disappeared. And in those instances where religion did not vanish, it was at least revalued and consigned to its proper domain, which is to say, private spaces of individual choice, far from the public realm of scientific progress and rational pursuits. To the extent that civil society was independent of political society and the state, it provided a haven for belief in, and pursuit of, prescientific myths.[23]

Such is the assumption of evolutionary “believers.” Seldom exposed, their convictions permeate much so-called neutral or objective scholarship on religion. A corollary of evolutionism is also claimed with equal conviction, namely, that societies where religion lingers as something other than a gnostic symbiosis between self and other[24] remain suspect. In the new order heralded by all modernists (and not just liberals), public loyalty to religious precepts connotes what Laroui once called historical retardation. That is to say, religion comes to symbolize a willful resistance to the tidal wave of change that must move the premodern (religion) off center stage in order to propel the modern (nationalism) onto it.[25]

By this approach, there can be good and bad nationalisms but no religious nationalisms since the very phrase “religious nationalism” embodies a logical impossibility, an illusion, an oxymoron.

Major First World nationalisms, according to one widely cited sociological study, can be deduced from the review of five nationstates, all of which have forged more or less adequate roads to modernity. All are roads to the modern, which is to say, industrial, high-tech era. The dominant trope, the goal to which these and other nationalist polities aspires, is liberal democracy; no other candidate of social organization can be admitted. Religious structures, like religious actors, are omitted, or else defeated, in the great venture of nation-building.[26]

Just as nationalism is deemed to be the exclusive carrier of secular modernity, so is it further presumed that the reason only some countries succeeded in the high-tech era is that only some were able to modernize. Nationalism becomes but one more way of differentiating the modern West from all its precursors, which in the post-Cold War era have also now become its dreaded nemeses. Nationalism cannot be ascribed to any premodern point in the preindustrial past.[27] With nationalism, as with industrialism, all those groups who have not already succeeded can succeed only by mimesis. Nationalism occurred in one place, among those groups prefiguring the high-tech era. They clustered as the nations of Western Europe and North America. All other nations came later. They were compelled by events beyond their control to imitate antecedent Euro-American models. In Richard Falk's haunting phrase, all the non-West was transformed into state-nations hoping to become nation-states,[28] yet destined to flounder and fail.[29] Economic inequality led to despair and often violence, causing the have-nots to drift still farther to the margins of global exchange.

There have been some who question this view of nationalism, but they choose to make their's a rearguard protest. They resist from the margins, as those who acknowledge their powerlessness even while voicing their opposition to the dominant view. The 1980s witnessed the emergence within critical theory of a new generation of Asian and African intellectuals. They challenged extant paradigms of nationalism. In particular, they "opposed much of the prevailing academic practice in historiography and the social sciences because it failed to acknowledge the subaltern (i.e., the indigenous non-elite) as the maker of his [or her] own destiny."[30] Despite excesses and shortcomings, a group of scholars linked to the Asian subcontinent, known as the Subaltern School, has made evident the problem of social scientific assertions about what nationalism means and how it can best be studied. To the centrist, top-down gaze of Ernest Gellner and Benedict Anderson, subaltern scholars counterpose views from the margins or from the bottom up. To complicate a public-sector, masculine view that excludes women actors or voices, they highlight a private domain where women, along with elders and minors, contribute to postcolonial developments.[31]

Yet even those who oppose a hegemonic, Eurocentric view of nationalism have not thought to restore religion to a place of distinction compatible with other ideological options. The ideal nationalism remains one that enshrines Profit, Progress, and Peace. (The other P's—Poverty, Population, Pollution, and Proliferation—are usually ignored, or else treated as problems that will be solved along the way.[32]) Where is religion in this forward gaze? Religion might relate to Peace: insofar as it either protects or threatens peace, it can be included in the nationalist project, but it is deemed out of bounds on the major subjects of Profit and Progress. Mark Juergensmeyer,[33] for instance, not only has given new life to the term "religious nationalism," he has also argued that religious sensibilities should be conjoined to the nationalist project, where they would serve as a valuable counterweight or deterrent to violent outcomes.

Religion in the national interest? That suggests a return to theocracy, and a nationalist theocracy would attempt to transform history, not merely recuperate and validate a golden past. As Juergensmeyer himself notes about the Iranian revolution, "it was not simply a revival of an earlier form of Muslim rule, but a new form of Islamic politics. In a curious way, it was the shah's vision of an Iranian nationalism come true."[34]

Despite the clarity of Juergensmeyer's thesis, late twentieth-century theocracy frightens most analysts of religion and nationalism. It conjures up particular fear when applied to the case of Islam because ideal Islam, like the premodern Catholic Church, functions as the comprehensive defining code for public as well as private pursuit. While every religion, from a modernist viewpoint, is "bad," to be minimized or better excluded, there remain degrees of exclusion. Islam remains the worst religion, the spoiler for a nationalist utopia. It remains the worst because many scholars argue that no Muslim nation-state, including Turkey and Tunisia, has ever experienced social modernity. Social modernity is linked to the formation of an urban middle class. Turkey since the 1920s may have come close to generating an indigenous secular bourgeoisie, but even Turkey is said to have failed, just as Tunisia appears to have been stymied by an overgrown urban bureaucracy. Other newer Muslim nations, like Malaysia and Indonesia, are excluded because the general public and even many academics deem them too remote from the Middle East heartland to be considered “real” Muslims.[35]

Yet the historical “failure” of Turkey and Tunisia is minor compared to the ongoing “threat” of Iran. For among all those premodern nations that cling to Islam as arbiter of public norms, Iran stands out as the most glaring culprit. While official Turkey in the 1920s distanced itself from Islamic symbols in trying to emulate European/secular norms, the Iranian revolution of the 1970s threatened to bring Islam from offstage to center stage in the realm of global politics. It posed a twin threat, making Islam central and the West villain. It was against this twin threat of the Iranian revolution—its perceived impossibility, its geopolitical unacceptability—that the dread of Islam’s antiquarian status as antimodern was rekindled. In its most distinctive religious guise, Islamic “fundamentalism” was seen to be inseparable from the undiluted opposition of Muslims to Christian or pluralist influence. In vain could an Izetbegovic try to demonstrate that Islam is already modern, and that a middle class is not the analytical key to its character, for from Iran came a flood of literature suggesting the opposite: Islam can never become modern, not because Muslim countries lack a bourgeoisie, but because Muslims—in this case, Iranian Muslims—themselves invoke religion to perpetuate the continuing, unremitting primitiveness of Islam. The renowned Iranian essayist Jalal Al-i Ahmad speaks for numerous others when he lauds an “Islamic totality”:

<quote>

India reminds one of Africa as a linguistic Tower of Babel and agglomeration of races and religions. Think of South America becoming Christianized with one sweep of the Spanish sword or of Oceania, a collection of islands and thus ideal for stirring up dissensions. Thus only we in our Islamic totality, formal and real, obstructed the spread (through colonialism, effectively equivalent to Christianity) of European civilization, that is, the opening of new markets to the West’s industries. The halt of Ottoman artillery before the gates of Vienna concluded a process that began in 732 C.E. in Andalusia. How are we to regard these twelve centuries of struggle of East against West if not as the struggle of Islam against Christianity? ... In the present age, I, as an Asian, as a remnant of that Islamic totality, represent just what that African or that Australian represented as a remnant of primitiveness and savagery I, as an Asian or an African, am supposed to preserve my manners, culture, music, religion and so forth untouched, like an unearthed relic, so that the gentlemen can find and excavate them, so they can display them in a museum and say, “Yes, another example of primitive life.”[36]

</quote>

<quote>

</quote>

<quote>

</quote>

Al-i Ahmad cannot escape the contradiction embedded in his eloquent lament. Though he decries the reification of a Muslim mindset as unchanging, at once anti-Christian, anti-Western, and now antimodern, he, unlike Izetbegovic, perpetuates the mindset that he opposes. He offers no alternative to what he opposes and, by invoking an Islamic totality, confirms the stereotype of European observers, and now their American successors. Al-i Ahmad demonstrates that Islamic obscurantism is not solely the whimsical distortion of colonial administrators and political commentators; it also becomes the project of certain Muslim advocates insofar as they repeat, without modifying, the profile of a primitive and unchanging, a defiant and challenging Islam.

To offset the dialectic of self-other, progressive-primitive that pervades Muslim and anti-Muslim rhetoric alike, we must reveal its tenuous, recent origins; we must not only cite the alternative, modern view of Izetbegovic, which announces a dialectic of accommodation, we must also examine the many faces of Islam that, though less evident, are as real as its one face, the face of bloclike antagonism, whether to Christians, to the Christian West, or to the post-Christian modern world.

 The Many Faces of Islam

Though Izetbegovic is right about the ambivalent status of Islam in the late twentieth century—it is too often seen as either sociopolitical or religious but seldom both—his argument still needs to be extended. While Islam is not “mere” religion, it is also more than “mere” religious politics. Islam can be as well a kind of symbolic resource or world view that invites accommodation to other world views, not confrontation with them. Islam as religion, Islam as politics, Islam as world view—all three, and not merely the first two, need to be explored.

Such categorization emerges out of critical reflections on the role of imagination in defining and projecting identity. Imagination is both collective and individual. Collectively imagination is nourished by the institutions of a society; individually it is shaped and reshaped by members of that society. In religious discourse, it is imagination—the ability to play with the material world and its limits, including the too evident limits of love and death—that sustains the conscious advocacy of a range of beliefs and practices deemed to be inseparable from the “real” force of life. Names abound for the Object/Subject of imagination: Yahweh, God, Allah, Other. Let us call it Other. Other is always a transtemporal force; exceeding time, it also exceeds all other human limits. Yet Other also must always be mediated in human discourse and through social institutions. In its most intellectual form it becomes theology, in its most pervasive expression popular religion, and in still another form ideology.[37]

Numerous Muslim apologists who assert that Islam is, above all, religion mean that Islam as religion concerns itself with the practice of imagining the Other, also known as divine revelation. Whether systematic or pragmatic, theological, popular, or ideological, Islam, in their view, is always religion. Even when it assumes a political dimension, Islam expresses a religious impulse. It is the impulse to align the human imagination with the divine imagination, so that social norms and individual conduct are always directed toward a path already specified. While obstacles on the path may vary, the contours of the path, as also the requirements it imposes on those who would tread it, have not changed. This is the message, for instance, of Muhammad Qutb in his diatribe, Islam: The Misunderstood Religion (1977). Examining all the facets of modern science and European civilization, he summarizes them as embodiments of an age-old pattern of slavery. Islam rejects slavery, slavery of men and women, slavery of whole nations and classes. Since both capitalism and communism, the two ideologies of the modern West, continue age-old patterns of slavery, they must be opposed in the name of Islam. It is only Islam as the “third” way that can provide guidance on the path that will help humankind “get out of the darkness it has long since been plunged in.”[38]

While Muhammad Qutb’s writings do have a political message, the message is implicit rather than explicit: he does not advocate a specific political system nor a set of political reforms. Others do. More than a few modern-day Muslim writers see Islam as preeminently an ideology, that is, “an organized and polarized formulation” of a system that must be equally secular and sacred, encompassing the instrumentalities of politics as well as the pieties of mosque, court, and home. Among those who argue for political Islam is Muhammad Qutb’s older brother, Sayyid Qutb. He is the oft-cited ideologue of Islamic extremism or fundamentalism. A founding figure of the Muslim Brethren in prerevolutionary Egypt, he opposed Nasser when the latter came to power. His opposition led to jail and eventually to the gallows: he was hanged, along with two other Brethren leaders, in August 1966.

But it was not just Nasser whom Sayyid Qutb opposed. Sayyid Qutb opposed Nasser as the advocate and embodiment of Arab nationalism. The true evil was nationalism—whether Arab, Iranian, Turkish, or Pakistani—nationalism as an ideology rivaling Islam. Qutb’s numerous writings gradually came to stress a Manichaean divide: on one side was justice, rule according to the precepts of the Qur’an and Islam, that was the sign of hakimiyya, or divine lordship. On the other side was jahiliyya or opposition to hakimiyya, the willful persistence in ignorance, perversity, and error. It consisted of glorifying any -ism, whether communism or capitalism, scientism or humanism, instead of God. Nationalism became one more Godlessism. Loyalty to it, like loyalty to any other -ism, was false. It was a sign of jahiliyya. The difference between hakimiyya and jahiliyya was epitomized by Sayyid Qutb in a famous set of slogans that subverts the nationalist agenda. In true Islam, when hakimiyya prevails, according to Qutb, “nationalism will be recognized as belief, homeland as Dar al-Islam, the ruler as God, and the constitution as the Qur’an.”[39]

Yet those who advocate Islam either as an oppositional religion (Muhmmad Qutb) or as religious politics (Sayyid Qutb) reduce Islam to a single platform of protest against the dominant forces of the modern world system. Despite the urgent, impassioned, and often impatient tone of their writings, they do not advance arguments that integrate Islam either with its own past history or with the issues that commonly confront humankind. They too easily elide human imagination with the divine imagination read as divine will. As one shrewd observer of Islamic movements wrote, their advocates make political philosophy shoulder the role of metaphysics: “God’s relevance can only be seen in a political context.”[40]

“Divine” politics is a meaningless concept unless related to history. Raimundo Panikkar, a seasoned cultural critic, was only halfright when he declared that in the modern period “religion without politics becomes uninteresting, just as politics without religion turns irrelevant.”[41] The crucial factor remains historical location, and for contemporary Muslims the most significant dimension of their history is marked by European colonial expansion and consequent anticolonial nationalist movements. One cannot talk about modern Islam without paying attention to the world-transforming activity of the eighteenth, nineteenth, and early twentieth centuries. It was only in the colonial period that nationalist movements involving Muslims first emerged, and the subsequent history of Islam is inseparable from nationalisms both European and indigenous. There are specific turning points in this history that merit recapitulation, if we are to understand why Islam is more often the victim than the agent of violence.

1. Colonial rule gave birth to national movements organized in secular terms with mythical appeals, structural features, and institutional mechanisms that reflected, even when they did not imitate or replicate, the same instruments characteristic of the colonizers’ country of origin. Ethnic nationalism became the primary organizing principle or symbolic engine to liberation from overseas rule. This was so even when religious symbols were invoked, or religious movements, such as Pan-Islamism, drew sizable numbers of followers. It is crucial not to accept at face value the assertions of Muslim revivalist leaders. For instance, one scholar, after charting the Pan-Islam movement in massive detail from primary sources, concluded that in the 1990s “Pan-Islamists (along with other consociational groups) may well turn a 120-years’ old dream from what seemed a utopia into a political reality.”[42] Yet another scholar, taking a functional view of this same movement, chose to look not at what Pan-Islamists say, but rather at the impact their movement had on subsequent nationalist endeavors. In so doing, he reached a conclusion opposite to the first scholar: not only is there no future to Pan-Islamism, but “the rise of Pan-Islamic sentiments helped to establish the credentials of particularized nationalisms.”[43] Why? Because Pan-Islamic ideologues posed, albeit indirectly, the question of permeable boundaries and drew attention to both ethnic nationalism (qawmiyya) and region-specific nationalism (wataniyya) as alternative polities—alternative not only to European rule but also, more importantly, to the universal Muslim community (umma). Pan-Islamism may conjure the “fear of Islam” yet it itself proved to be a restricted, short-lived movement. The antidote to fear is to look beyond slogans and examine the historical development of a protest movement. Pan-Islamism relies more on ideological accents than on pragmatic strategies. Throughout the twentieth century links among Muslims of different races, regions, and languages remain more rhetorical than pragmatic, signaling a loose affinity of faith, not an actual alliance of forces, whether military or political or both.

2. Islam as a pragmatic referent in organizing social or economic life was denied autonomy under colonial rule, even when certain farsighted elites attempted to forge a link between Muslim and national identity, as did Muhammad Abduh, for instance, in British Egypt. “What had begun as an attempt to protect Islam by reinterpreting it tended to end as a discussion of the possibility of creating a secular society with nationalism as its animating principle, and with Islam as its inherited culture rather than a guide to social action.”[44] The subordination of Islamic ideals and values to political pragmatism continued in postcolonial polities. As a result, Islam remained a reservoir of symbolic dissent, often couched in violent terms, available to marginalized, aggrieved groups.

During the postcolonial period, as political independence was achieved by more and more newly formed Muslim polities, appeals to Islam were slow to garner attention. Whether hidden from European eyes or ignored by indigenous elites, it was not until the late 1960s and early 1970s that Islamic rhetoric and Islamic loyalty were brought to the forefront of domestic, regional, and international issues. Nationalism did not provide the panacea for a host of ills and inequities, and Muslim spokespersons began to contend not only with external non-Muslims but also, just as often, with internal, "impure" Muslim others.

Again, there is no uniform view of the "Islamic difference." Even within the ranks of social science, the lack of consensus is evident. Two social scientists concerned with Egypt disagree on how Egyptian elites viewed the ideal postcolonial polity. One German-based political theorist argues that nationalism, like modernization, rules out religion. He cites as proof of this maxim the stance of the nineteenth-century Egyptian Rifa'a al-Tahtawi, for whom "the social was more important than the religious." Al-Tahtawi's neologism hubb al-watan, "love of country," was thoroughly secular, since it conveyed the sense of wataniyya, the Arab(ic) equivalent of patriotism, a concept divorced from religion.[45] But in the view of an American political scientist, it is not al-Tahtawi but another twentieth-century Egyptian theorist, Tariq al-Bishri, who augurs the future stance for his country: neither a secularist nor a fundamentalist but a liberal (of sorts), al-Bishri argues that Arab nationalism cannot omit Islam, while at the same time admitting that Islam cannot be made the sole basis for Arab/Egyptian nationalism. What should be the modus operandi then for Muslims and the state? Islam, according to al-Bishri, should play an instrumental role in fostering what are the primary goals, namely, "independence, cultural authenticity, and political integration."[46] While al-Bishri does not offer his own prescription for an ideal Muslim state, his engagement with Islam is a far cry from al-Tahtawi's vision of a secular state.

3. It is the presence of colonialism that linked all Muslim collectivities, throughout the Afro-Eurasian oikumene, especially in that heavily populated cosmopolitan area south and east of the Mediterranean. There has been an attempt from time to time to isolate Saudi Arabia, as though what happened on the peninsula was immune from events around it. But it was not, for as Marilyn Waldman has pointed out: “though not all Muslim territories were colonized, nearly all experienced some kind of dependency, be it psychological, political, technological, cultural, or economic

Even in Saudi Arabia oil exploration, begun in the 1930s, brought European (and then American) interference.”[47]

If the colonial experience has a crucial mediating role in the development of the present-day Muslim world, it is a role that commands attention in order to avoid a double myopia. One is the myopia of indigeous elites who claim to be exponents of “true” Islam. To the extent that they ignore the colonial period, except as a reminder of the “defeated” enemy, such elites tend to project their own polities as homogeneous associations, at once natural and voluntary. The other myopia is that of dissidents who claim, on behalf of Pan-Islamic ideology, that there has always been a borderless Muslim nation, that all nation-states are fictive, postcolonial inventions, their leaders impeding the reemergence of the pristine Muslim collectivity, the umma.

The misfortune of recent scholarship is to perpetuate, rather than correct, these reinforcing myopic readings of the Muslim past. There are two dominant social scientific approaches to Islam and nationalism. One offers a straightforward narration of Muslim polities, linking them to each other and not to neighboring or similar non-Muslim polities, as if the mere label “Islam” were sufficient to merit their clustering as a discrete group separate from all other groups.[48] The other approach traces how Muslim polities took on relevance only with reference to an invasive colonial administration, whether Dutch or Russian, French or British. This blindness is much more serious than the first, because it erases the Islamic “difference” and freezes all Muslims into the role of defensive opponents of an emergent global order. Its proponents claim that Muslim elites, in competing with one another under the same non-Muslim aegis, became redefined: they came to differ as much from their precolonial Muslim ancestors as they did from their contemporary non-Muslim compatriots. The cultural marking of Islam, if not irrelevant, was at best residual, while the temporal marking of modernity became all-important. From the premise that the European/Christian West as colonial overlord provided the crucial dimension is drawn the conclusion that only attention to the colonizing process will generate analytical insights into the relationship of Muslim polities to nationalism.[49]

While the first approach oversimplifies the emergence of Muslim polities from a common colonial past, the second overloads the significance of the colonial experience. Its advocates deny the agency of their Muslim subjects, dismissing urban intellectuals, in particular, as little more than hapless purveyors of an ossified or retarded civilizational legacy.

The truth is more complex. If Europe transformed the Muslim world, it did not itself remain immune from change. The direction of influence between Europe and the Muslim world was never unilinear; it was always interactive. Those European colonial powers that extended their influence, whether by direct or by indirect rule,[50] were themselves reshaped by the experience of their colonial subjects. But they seldom acknowledged their own reshaping as a direct experience of the other. Instead, colonial history, when not luxuriating in the romance and mystique of the Orient, masked its own change as economic gain, commercial profit, overseas investment, or civilizational uplift. Implicit in the exercise of massive military and political power was the denial of agency anywhere in Africa or Asia, including countries with major Muslim populations.

Yet not all Europeans acted with the same motivation or the same set of interests: in the early phase of British colonial rule in India, for instance, not only administrators but also often linguists identified with their subjects, as Richard Fox has shown in his critique of the Orientalism thesis.[51] And when the imperialists did succeed the colonialists, as happened in most cases after the 1870s, there was a heightened degree of intra-European rivalry—from French-British in the Sudan to British-Dutch in the Asian archipelago—that shaped the regional outcome of colonial projects.[52]

Often wrapped into social scientific analysis of Islam is a variant of the economic determinist argument: capitalist forces are placed in the foreground and credited with changing the colonial and postcolonial Muslim world. Particular emphasis is placed on the dismemberment of the central premodern Muslim polity, the Ottoman Empire.[53] Modern-day Turkey becomes the chief negative case representing all Muslim polities stumbling into the twentieth century: its leaders could neither reverse outdated modes of production nor generate a viable middle class.[54] Absent in the Turkish case as elsewhere, we are told, were mechanisms of exchange. Without either accountability or obligation, how could one produce either a viable democracy or a modified authoritarianism? One could not, according to these theorists, and so most African/ Asian polities were doomed to be undemocratic; oil merely worsened their economic malaise in the late twentieth century.[55]

Perhaps the most negative assessment of oil production/export and its impact on Arab/Muslim state formation has been set forth by the Lebanese political commentator Georges Corm. Corm offers an intensely detailed, closely argued variation of Delacroix's thesis about the evils of a distributive economy and rentier state. Corm is especially bitter about the petromania unleashed since the early 1970s. "In the deserts of the Arabian Peninsula, ... the oilexporting countries of the Gulf barely had sufficient manpower, managerial staff, technicians, employees and teachers to meet the needs and projects this new oil wealth gave rise to. Other Arab countries (and also Pakistan and Bangladesh) were suddenly drained of the most dynamic among their active populations, which further undermined their already eroding social structures."[56] In the case of Pahlavi Iran, petromania did not cause an influx of Muslim outsiders, but it did create a too rapid immigration of rural Iranians to Tehran, leading to structural asymmetries that have persisted in post-Pahlavi Iran.[57]

To place the colonial period and the determinist interpretations of Islam in a broader perspective, one must move beyond both politics and religion to the contingencies of history. The best place to begin is with the boldly revisionist thesis of the world historian and American Islamicist Marshall Hodgson. As Hodgson explained, Islamic loyalties relate above all to a larger, complex process that he labels the Great Western Transmutation. The Great Western Transmutation was "great" because it was global: European norms of political rule and social and economic exchange were introduced throughout Asia and Africa. It remained "Western" not only because it was European in origin but also because it reflected changes going on in the New World, especially North America. But finally it remained a transmutation because it depended on a variety of factors rather than a single, predictable response to European events and actors; it was not inevitable to one region or one culture or one time; it was not even a transformation but rather, following biological models, a transmutation.

The Great Western Transmutation was local as well as global, since the process it spurred was framed within indigenous contexts and limited by indigenous responses, in our case Muslim responses to European norms. To the extent that we can depict a composite Muslim profile, it emerged only after World War I and did not achieve widespread prominence till after World War II.[58] What it revealed was a world turned inside out.[59] Neither Muslim collectivities nor individual Afro-Asian Muslims could any longer operate from a position of parity in the world-system.[60] All Muslim elites—whether by choice or compulsion, whether explicitly adjusting or implicitly demurring—were reshaped by European norms and expectations.[61] Precisely because their lives were under constant stress, their identities remained in flux, and Islam became a symbolic resource both shared and debated. Colonial and postcolonial reverberations were most evident in urban metropolitan centers, yet their impact also extended to rural or peripheral groups, even when these groups seem not to be affected or represented by the momentous events occurring at the center.[62]

To understand the difficulty of this circumstance, but also to locate the kernel of hope within it, one must revisit the colonial period and attempt to analyze its internal shifts, or successive phases, reflecting the views of Muslim "others" as well as European overlords. One must recognize that not all colonizers had the same agenda nor did all periods yield the same record of brutal conquest and systematic negation of Africans and Asians who happened to be Muslim. Instead, one must look at three major periods that overlap but still need to be distinguished each from the other: revivalist, reformist, and fundamentalist.[63]

* Part One: European Colonialism and Its Sequels

 Chapter 1. The Three Phases of Modern-Day Islam

EACH BROAD-SCALE Islamic movement—revivalism, reform, and fundamentalism— belongs to a pattern of interaction between Europe and the Muslim world. The latest chapter of that interaction begins with European colonial expansion in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. The initial response was revivalism. When revivalism failed to achieve long-term results, it was replaced by efforts at Islamic reform that worked in tandem with nationalist movements. It was only with the failure of the latter that Islamic fundamentalism emerged.

As a preamble to considering each of these movements one must note, and then repeat, and repeat again, that the Muslim world is at once very large and very diverse. The more than 800 million believers in Allah and His prophet Muhammad are as diverse as any comparable community would be. They exhibit marks of ethnic, linguistic, and cultural diversity, and while no single graph can encompass the range of this diversity, it is hoped that figure 1 will suggest at least the broad contours of what coheres as the Muslim world.

Muslims total between one-quarter and one-third of the world’s population. More Muslims are Asian than African, more African than Arab. The numbers are startling: perhaps 200 million Middle Easterners are Muslim, but that is only if you include Turkey’s 50 million plus Iran’s 55 million. In other words, less than 90 million Middle Eastern Muslims are Arabs. About the same number are Turks if you add to Turkey’s 50 million plus the 30 million Muslims of Turkish descent who live in the Commonwealth of Independent States, formerly known as Soviet Central Asia. There are more Arabs living in the two North African countries, Morocco and Algeria, than in the whole of the Middle East outside of Egypt. In sub-Saharan Africa, Nigeria alone has more Muslims than any Arab country: its closest rival would be Egypt, with 40 million Muslims, yet it is hardly a close rivalry since Nigeria, the most populous country in Africa, has a population approaching 110 million, of whom about 60 million are Muslim.

[[b-b-bruce-b-lawrence-shattering-the-myth-islam-bey-1.jpg][Figure 1. The Muslim world (Africa and Asia)]]

However, it is South and Southeast Asia that outstrip all other claimants to majoritarian representation in the Muslim world. Until 1947 South Asia, which includes Pakistan, India, and Bangladesh as its principal polities, formed a single administrative unit under British rule. Today they are home to at least 300 million Muslim inhabitants. Farther east, Indonesia, with more than 13,000 islands and a population exceeding 170 million, can boast that it is, and will remain for some time to come, the largest Muslim country in the world: 150 million Indonesians profess faith in Allah and His prophet Muhammad.

In the face of such numbers it is nonsensical to speak of Muslims and Middle Eastern Arabs as if the two were interchangeable. A recent book outlining major Western misconceptions of Islam listed as number one the notion that “Muslims are mainly Arabs, and Islam is the exclusive religion of the ‘Middle East.’ ”[64] Even more shortsighted is attention to the Arab-Israeli struggle as the epitome of Muslim global concerns.

What matters most for Muslims lies beyond Palestine. It is an economic rather than a territorial nightmare. It relates to the present uneven distribution of global resources; above all, to the grinding calculus that not only sorts out the world into haves and have-nots but makes the division between the advanced industrialized bloc and all others wider and wider, year after year. Although economic constraints are not the only way to understand Islam and the Muslim world,[65] it would be foolhardy to speak of cultural norms and societal options without taking into account economic indices. Where then can one find a neutral benchmark to address economic disparities? The best seems to be the OECD, an acronym for the transnational Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development. In 1979 the OECD published its decadal report, Facing the Future. Its authors concluded that the Third World is “defined in relation to the developed countries more than in relation to itself; it comprises all the human societies which could not or did not want to adapt to the shock imparted by Georgian England and which, as a result, now display common characteristics both as to their present reality and (future) dynamics.” In other words, countries of the Third World, including all majority Islamic nations, are willy-nilly out of step with their First World contemporaries.

There are exceptions, such as Turkey, Egypt, Iran, Pakistan, and Malaysia, yet most lack deep-rooted democratic traditions even more than did Second World or Communist countries before 1989. Enjoying neither economic nor social parity with Euro-America, they have been branded inferior in every other category.

The recent ascendancy of the Pacific Rim countries has only served to give the Islamic difference a stronger negative accent. Over a decade ago Eric Hoffer, author of The True Believer, declared: “No Islamic country has mastered industrial production or achieved anything remotely comparable to what was accomplished in Japan, Taiwan, South Korea, Singapore, Hong Kong and (also) India.”[66] Hoffer’s characterization must now be modified because of dramatic strides taken by Malaysia and Indonesia in the past decade. Both are Muslim countries, if not Islamic states, and both have recently generated high-tech, rapid-growth economies that compete on a global scale. Is it pure accident that both are also part of the Pacific Rim prosperity zone?

As bright as the future looks for both Malaysia and Indonesia, their exceptionalism brings up a further dilemma of perception for the U.S. public. Ever since the gasoline shortages of 1973, most Americans have tended to scapegoat the Muslim as Saudi Arabian, accepting the frequent cartoons that depict a wealthy Muslim sheik depriving cowed motorists at the gasoline pumps. The blanket ascription of wealth is as much in need of correction as the monochrome Islamic identity. The oil-rich Arab states, such as Saudi Arabia, Libya, the Gulf states, and also Iraq, are the least populous, and also the least professionally inclined. The resource-poor Arab states, particularly Egypt and Sudan, are overpopulated, though with an excess of trained but underemployed professionals in every branch of the modern sector, from medicine to engineering to business.

So great are the disparities within the Arab world that the gift of black gold, as oil is often called, has not been an unmixed blessing. Counterintuitive though it may seem, the tyranny of oil burdened the rich as well as the poor Middle Eastern countries between 1945 and 1973. For the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia as for many of its oil-rich Arab neighbors, an avalanche of petro-dollars produced neither an immediate release from poverty nor the emergence of a kind of modern-day version of capitalist utopia in desert sands. Rather, it created a panic of spending. In Georges Corm's view:

<quote>

Not since the fall of the Abbasid empire (in the 13th century) has the Arab world seen population movements on such a scale. Like Libya, the oil-exporting countries of the Gulf barely have sufficient manpower, managerial staff, technicians, employees and teachers to meet the needs and projects this new oil wealth has spurred. Other Arab countries have been suddenly drained of the most dynamic among their active populations, which has further undermined their already eroding social structures. Expatriates earning high salaries have remitted savings to their home countries, increasing not only the flow of capital but also the craving for consumption and subsequent inflationary pressures.[67]

</quote>

Nor has religion been exempt from this same gold rush mentality. For it was due to the sudden flush of extraordinary wealth, produced by the quadrupling of oil prices in 1973, that Saudi Arabia and other oil-rich Muslim nations were able to sponsor the unprecedented World of Islam Festival. Convened in London in 1976, it was the most lavish display of Muslim art and architecture, replete with replications of Bedouin life and extraordinary coffee table picture books, that the non-Muslim world had ever seen. It marked not the end but the beginning of Saudi, Libyan, and Gulf funding for a variety of Islam-related activities. Might not Islamic fundamentalism turn out to be nothing more than "an enormous malaise brought on by poorly assimilated and badly shared-out oil wealth clogging up the scrawny frames of these societies, still historically deprived of real industrialization"?[68]

Corm's rhetorical question begs for qualification. It denies Muslims agency for their own future. It smacks of economic determinism ratcheted to the highest level. Yet Corm's cynicism serves as a healthy antidote to the flood tide of journalism and scholarship that parrots Muslim assertions about Islamic revolution as if such revolution were at once self-evident and inevitable.

No real revolution has succeeded, either in Iran or elsewhere in the Muslim world. The real litmus test for success remains the global socioeconomic order. No revolution can be deemed successful unless it challenges, and attempts to level, socioeconomic disparities. One need not be a Marxist or a capitalist to apply the standard of distributive justice, nor does one have to accept the judgment of modernization theorists, that Muslims must accommodate to the values as well as the structures of modernity, and to the extent that they do, they will inevitably abandon Islam.[69] Muslims can be modern and democratic as well as loyal to the tenets of Islam, but their options for self-expression are nonetheless limited by the current criteria of economic privilege. One cannot ignore what is happening throughout the so-called Third World, at every level among all groups, advantaged and disadvantaged. Those who have been excluded from the front rank of technicalizing societies suffer stark structural inequities. The list of handicaps is grim: political limitations, reflected by the prevalence of military dictatorships or clan rulership permitting only restricted popular participation; economic disparities, situating a few landed or mercantile rich above masses of urban and rural poor, precluding the emergence of a middle class; educational restrictions, especially at the top, where overcrowding in too few universities and the absence of high-tech institutions force elites to send their children abroad while others are denied training in essential skills; and, of course, gender asymmetry, characterized by the invocation of tradition as the reason for excluding women from the public sphere, which conceals the real issue: job scarcity for unemployed or underemployed men.

Faced with these structural constraints, Muslim nation-states are as stymied by the presence of oil revenue as they were deprived by its absence. Islamic societies cannot escape the hierarchical gradient that privileges the advanced nations of Western Europe, North America, and the Pacific Rim while precluding others from competition except in subordinate relations of implicit or outright dependency.

This observation is directed to external criteria and to the global economy. Within the so-called advanced technicalistic nations there exist major groups who also suffer from their positioning at the lower end of the spectrum of educational access and economic privilege, whether they be the urban poor of London and Manchester or Los Angeles and Detroit. Yet the presence of marginalized others in the West merely tempers, it does not refute, our basic contention, namely, that Asian-African Muslims experience wholesale marginality not because Islam is at base defective but because they are located within imposed, and still contested, nation-state borders. Due to the arbitrary construction of these borders, tribal rather than constitutional processes prevail, and authoritarianism is the norm, even when socioeconomic success at some level can be claimed.[70] One need not be surprised that many members of ex-colonial states have come forward to challenge the process by which they were constituted as “self-evident” states. Saddam Hussein became merely the latest, and most extreme, of those who hoped to remake their national boundaries. We must revisit the process itself if we are to understand why Muslim groups have been at such a disadvantage in making their newly formed, postindependence governments work. It is this large-scale process that demands more attention than the specific form by which some groups were placed within a certain state and others displaced from that state or denied their own identity altogether.

 Chapter 2. Islamic Revivalism: Anti-Colonial Revolt

IT IS within such a global frame of reference that the story of Islamic revivalism needs to be retold. All blanket words such as revivalism, reformism, or fundamentalism are arbitrary invocations of the English language; they do not, and cannot, describe the varying degrees of Islamic loyalty and protest.

Why, then, do I continue to use these terms? Three guidelines inform my choice of nomenclature.[71] One comes from a comment made by Ihab Hassan in another context. Trying to justify the far-flung use of the term “postmodernism,” he noted that “There is a will to power in nomenclature, as well as in people or texts. A new term opens for its proponents a space in language.”[72] Because fundamentalism has assumed a new connotation since 1979, when for the first time it was consistently applied to evidence outside Protestant American Christianity, it has in effect become a new term, global fundamentalism, with the potential to “open for its proponents [who are its academic analysts] a space in language.” Second, as Norma Salem observed in her perceptive essay on Islamic fundamentalism in Tunisia, if one surrenders to local, in-group usage and relies on indigenous terms to the exclusion of all others, the resulting “cultural relativism leads to a dead end ... since it cannot distinguish between ‘etic’ categories, referring to the perception of the informant, and ‘emic’ categories, referring to epistemological concepts developed beyond the limits of the culture involved.” In her view, which is also mine, “we cannot avoid using cross-cultural concepts in order to forge links between the informant and the observer.”[73] Third, clustering the concepts revivalism, reformism, and fundamentalism together helps us to understand the limits of each in the contemporary Muslim world. But first they must be situated historically within a frame of reference that takes account of how all three have been shaped as defensive reactions to European colonial expansion. The novelty here is to suggest that these three terms, taken together, provide a unique function, helping us to understand why we have reached the point when fundamentalism, and not revivalism or reformism, looms large on the political horizon of Muslim nations.

There is no generic category of religious protest that applies to the past three centuries of Islamic history. Instead, there are three distinct phases of protest. In each phase certain Muslim groups revolted against the ascendant world order. Linked to Western Europe, the ascendant world order in time became the dominant order, but not without resistance, protest, and rebellion. Not all protestors were Muslim, nor did all Muslims protest, but the nature of the religiously valorized Muslim protest merits careful consideration. Only the first phase is properly speaking revivalist. It is succeeded by a second that should be termed reformist, and it is only after the revivalist and reformist phases, and in large part due to their failures, that there emerged recently what can be termed Islamic fundamentalism.

All three—revivalism, reformism, and fundamentalism—are historically specific socioreligious movements propelling a few male leaders into public view as they attempt to reclaim the space that was challenged and reduced, then impoverished and redefined, by European expansion (first through sea power, but later through land power supported by naval control of sea trade).

From the eighteenth century to the present, all the major Muslim polities experienced financial crises, demographic disruption, and agricultural stagnation. Some of their malaise resulted from indigenous challenges. Provincial Arabs chafed under Ottoman Turkish rule, Afghans protested when Qajar control in Iran was extended to them, Marattas rebelled against Mughal hegemony in South Asia. In each instance, however, the situation of ruling elites was complicated and worsened by (1) the external diversion of commodity trade from the Mediterranean and Indian Ocean routes to the Atlantic Ocean following discovery and exploitation of the New World; and (2) the internal infiltration of European trade through a nexus of foreign merchants and local middlemen or compradores cooperating to establish new products, new markets, new communication networks, and new sources of profit and reinvestment. To speak of Islamic revivalism is to recognize the ideological reaction of particular Muslim interest groups to the losses that they experienced. Islam became an emblem of protest against the gradual contraction of internal and external trade, brought about by the mercantile activities of European maritime nations, specifically, the Portuguese, the Spanish, the Dutch, the British, and the French. What was contested in the name of Islam by Islamic revivalists was control over vital commodities—textiles, slaves, coffee, tea, spices—gold—all trafficked along the major trade routes from the Atlantic coast of West Africa to the Indonesian archipelago.

The major Muslim revivalist movements were without exception preindustrial. Their leaders mobilized followers in response to the European redirection of global trade, even when they did not acknowledge the extent to which European advances were reshaping their lives. Not all the revivalists directly confronted Europeans; some challenged weakened local elites seen as mediators between Europeans and indigenous groups.

One of the earliest instances of European influence concerns the rebellious Wahhabis. In western Arabia the Wahhabis aligned with a Najdi chief named Ibn Sa‘ud. That combination in time produced what is now regarded as a legitimate government, though it remains the only Muslim polity named after a tribal group: the present-day Kingdom of Saudi Arabia. Both Ibn Sa‘ud and his appointed ideologue, Ibn ‘Abd al-Wahhab, benefited from the loss of revenues suffered by their chief rival, the Sharif of Mecca, who in the eighteenth century reigned as the legitimate ruler of the Hijaz. Dependent as he was on the lucrative Indian trade, primarily in textiles, indigo, and spices, the Sharif could not sustain its diversion away from the Arabian peninsula by the British. Weakened economically, he also became militarily vulnerable. His Najdi rivals rallied to their side other groups who had been deprived by the British ascendancy in trade, and toward the end of the eighteenth century they were able to dislodge and replace the Sharif of Mecca. Although the Wahhabis had other battles to wage, with the Turks and with Muslim loyalists from rival tribes who did not accept their leadership, their initial success was a byproduct of incipient European colonialism.

The pattern evident in Arabia had numerous analogues elsewhere on the seams of commercial activity that came increasingly under the flag of the Union Jack. In Northwest India, the Barelvis, sometimes confused with the Wahhabis because of their intensely Islamic profile, tried to wage war against indigenous groups, Sikhs and Hindus, but the latter were better positioned than the Barelvis vis-a-vis British commercial interests. The Barelvis were strategically isolated before being defeated on the battlefield by Sikhs. Elsewhere, in Northeast India, the Faraidis also resorted to Islamic symbols and tried to mobilize fellow Muslims when they perceived the shift to a moneyed, international economy as advantageous to Hindu landlords while impoverishing Muslim peasant laborers. The Faraidis, under Hajji Shari‘atallah, did attract widespread support, at first in local protests and later in regionwide acts of defiance; yet neither succeeded in reversing the tide of change.[74]

It was the same story, with different actors but a similar outcome, in Africa. The best documented of the revivalist movements, the Fulani-Qadiris in Nigeria, pitted Muslim herdsmen and traders against British markets and middlemen, the middlemen often being recruited from rival Muslim tribes. Though the revivalists enjoyed superb Islamic credentials, they were eventually defeated on the battlefield. There were temporary successes: the Sanusis prevailed in the Cyrenaica region near the Ottoman province of Libya, strengthening Islamic identity for over fifty years till the Italian invasion of 1911. A Somali chieftain, too, was able to mobilize interior tribes against British, Italian, and French forces in the coastal areas near Mogadishu. He won several battles and continued to rule for over twenty years, only to have the British bomb and machine-gun their way to victory in 1920. Finally, on the other side of the Muslim world, in Southeast Asia, there emerged a puritanical movement, also linked to the Wahhabis and known as the Padris.[75] The Padris galvanized Sumatran Muslims dispossessed by the shift from gold and pepper trade to a new cash crop, coffee. During the course of the nineteenth century the Padris, after causing much initial concern among local elites and their foreign allies, were harassed and coerced by better organized opponents. They endured defeat after defeat in bloody encounters before finally succumbing to the Dutch authorities.

All these revivalist movements occurred at crucial seams in the expanding imperium of maritime Europe. All were Sunni Muslim movements. The single parallel within Shi‘i Islam were the Bahais, a group still despised by Twelver Shi‘i clergy. The vilification masks a deeper fear: the first Bahais embodied and then projected the latent messianic impulse of Twelver Shi‘ism. They were Shi‘i revivalists. Yet Bahaism would have been crushed and ignored, as have been many other protest movements, had its adherents not benefited from the communication networks attendant on the economic penetration of European capitalism into both Iran and Turkey. The newly emergent world order provided havens of refuge for those Bahais who survived persecution in their native Iran. They shifted first to nearby Turkey and then, by the third generation, to the New World. Today they proselytize not for Shi‘i Islam but for a doctrine of world peace and universal prophethood, and they proselytize from Wilmette, Illinois, at the same time as they continue to protest the treatment of their coreligionists who remain in Iran. The history of the Bahais is therefore doubly instructive: they offer an early success story of global capitalism, and they also attest to the power of Islamic revivalism as a form of symbolic capital beyond the Afro-Asian Muslim world.

 Chapter 3. Islamic Reform: Secular Nationalism

THOSE ISLAMIC revivalist groups who, unlike the Bahais, remained in their country of origin were succeeded by Islamic reformers. Islamic reformers were closely linked to nationalist movements, and indeed in retrospect it can be seen that despite their universalist rhetoric, almost all the Islamic reformers were shaped by the influences of the colonial period. Especially keen is the emphasis on science and technology in education, on constitutional structures and parliamentary democracy in politics, and on the revised role of women in social life. If Muslim nationalism became mimetic, it should be no surprise that movements that claimed a loyalty to Islam were also mimetic, picking up elements from Europe that they hoped could be transformed into an Islamic system. There is no spontaneous Islamic movement after the colonial period; all are reacting to some force, or series of forces, that emanates from the Western world, which is to say, first from Northern Europe and then from the United States. Even within Northern Europe, however, the cast of characters is limited: with the exception of the Italians in Libya and the Horn of Africa, the major players in the Islamic world till World War II were Britain, France, and Holland.

It is important to note both the size and the outlook of the reformers. They were very few in number, and their elite character has often been overlooked by outside scholars who feel kinship for the reformers as Muslim thinkers not unlike themselves in outlook and ambition. Despite their small numbers or perhaps because of them, the reformers recognized the power of the institutions that were propelling certain European nations to a unique position of global prestige. The reformers came from those countries whose Muslim elites were most engaged by the specter of European commercial and military penetration—Egypt and India, Iran and Turkey before World War I, but then following the war, also Tunisia, Algeria, and Morocco. The North African reformers coalesced into a movement known as Salafiya, or Islamic advocacy. In their own terms, they saw the generation of the Prophet Muhammad as a group to be commended for its energy, vision, and dedication, but also as a model to be re-created in the modern era. Their opponents turned their zeal against them, criticizing the Salafiya for their unwitting promotion of historical retardation. Since the Salafiya seemed to hark back to a golden age that never existed, or at least could never be reconstructed, their passionate pleas were seen to be draining energies away from the crucial task at hand: to accommodate to the new reality of a European world order.[76]

Yet most of the reformers did act in good faith, as committed Muslims conflicted by the gap between Europe’s pragmatic success and what seemed to be its spiritual vapidity. It was as though they were witnesses to a novel and “unholy” revelation. As the European presence shifted from trade to government to social services to ideology, its challenge moved to the deepest register of self-reflection; it became religious. For Muslim reformers, “the arbiter of truth and knowledge suddenly ceased to be enclosed in the revealed word of God. Another text, with no specific author or format, had made a permanent intrusion. It was the West with its political systems, military presence and economic domination which now appeared in the background as an authoritative code of practice.”[77]

But the authoritative code was not uniform. As they intervened, the European powers quarreled with one another. Some Muslim polities, such as the Sharifian Kingdom of Morocco, benefited from these quarrels, able to resist direct rule because no Mediterranean power wanted its rivals to control the prize of the Arab/Muslim West. But all polities were affected by the two world wars, sometimes known as the Christian wars, of the twentieth century. It was due to the enormous expenditures and consequent destruction of these wars, and also the personal participation of colonized Muslims in these same wars, that Islamic protest movements were able to cohere and emerge into national liberation movements. Gradually, as the smoke cleared from the second of these horrific Christian wars, most Muslim ruling elites succeeded in grasping the laurel of independence.

Even so, not all were marked by the same opportunities or the same political order. A glaring anachronism was the persistence of monarchs, dynastic rulers who compel allegiance to themselves, their values, and, above all, their interests. Almost one-fifth of all Arab Muslims still owe allegiance to a total of three kings (Hassan II of Morocco, Hussein of Jordan, and Fahd of Saudi Arabia), one sultan (Qabus of Oman), and nine emirs (all from the Persian Gulf, including the Emir of Kuwait).

In those nations where monarchs have not survived, they have often been replaced by quasi-monarchs embracing a top-down, closed system of governance, enabled by mukhabarat or citizen surveillance that often produces a national security state.[78] As long as colonial patterns persist, democracy will remain a challenge. Even countries that were not colonized directly, such as Saudi Arabia and Iran, did not escape the effects of European economic penetration into the eastern Mediterranean and Indian Ocean, and the structures that arose after independence reflect this influence, above all in the sphere of bureaucracy, centrist politics, and commercial law.

It was because the nature of self-rule was shaped more by European than by indigenous models that one must speak of “mimetic nationalism.” Though nationalism was embraced by Arab, as by non-Arab, Muslim leaders to chart the path to independence, the models of governance were derived from the departing colonials. Whether one looks to constitutional charters or to the adoption of separate executive and legislative bodies, the impress of European precedents is evident. At the same time the boundaries of new nations reflected a patchwork of compromise implementing the wishes of European powers rather than the preferences of their Muslim subjects. Saddam Hussein’s attempt to readjust Iraq’s borders with Kuwait in fall 1990 was at once justified and spurious: justified because the borders of all African and Asian countries were set in the colonial period or its immediate aftermath; spurious because many countries benefited as well as lost from such manipulation. Without the addition of parts of Kurdistan, especially the oil-rich region around Mosul, Iraq, for instance, would not have had the geopolitical resources that make it potentially the economic giant among all Arab states.

The truth about the process by which postcolonial borders were decided may be simpler, though no prettier, than conspiracy theories allow: disparate communities of Asia and Africa had been welded together as parts of the British or French or Dutch empires. They could not be dissolved and reconstituted in their precolonial form with independence. Often the very conditions of self-rule had to be set by colonial authorities and imperial administration because consent could not have been secured on any other basis. Yet the end result was to make the entire process of Arab/Muslim nationalism seem imitative. It appealed only to a limited stratum of elites. Military control had been a wing of colonial administration—not just a wing but the foundation. With independence, mechanisms to curb military intervention and to spur the emergence of a civil society were never set in place.

It is important to note how most theorists of nationalism stress a few distinct traits as crucial for the coherence of a national ethos and the moblization of a nationalist movement. Religion is not among them. Homogeneity, literacy, and professionalism are the crucial traits, according to Ernest Gellner, the late British sociologist.[79] Each nationalist movement finally seeks to create a world in its own image, a world of theoretically independent and equal nation-states. Hence, in Gellner's view, twentieth-century European nationalism "is revealed as an optimistic, secular and practical ideology." Even when it incorporates elements from prenationalist religious cultures, nationalism transforms them to its own ends. Religion is usually suppressed or collapsed into a personal sphere, defined by its exclusion from the state-dominated public sphere into which it continually threatens to erupt.

What Gellner does not discuss but what becomes evident from his trait analysis is the deep fear that most European nationalists had of theocracy. Not only did they want to prevent religious institutions and leaders from reclaiming a public space they had once dominated, but they also hoped to provide the social cohesion that would make the state an effective instrument of power against both internal and external challenges to its authority. It has been the retention of political power, not the assertion of religious truth, that has loomed as the ultimate goal of European nationalists.

While most Europeans and Americans have lived within "secure" national borders for several generations and see themselves as beneficiaries of the tradition of nation-state loyalty, many Third World citizens, and Afro-Asian Muslims in particular, do not share either their experience or their trust. For most Muslims, it is hard to applaud the arbitrary, top-down process, imposed from outside, by which almost all Afro-Asian polities came to assume their present form.

And not only the external boundaries of territory but also the internal boundaries of identity are open to challenge and reformulation. In thinking about Islamic protest, it is especially important to note how the clash at the core of all other clashes between nationalists and fundamentalists is the totalizing impulse guiding each. As Kenneth Cragg once noted, in the Muslim world the state functions as an obedience context.[80] The majority of Muslim states are praetorian or, in Richard Bulliet's apt phrase, neo-Mamluk dictatorships: the form of military bureaucracy on which they depend imitates the Mamluks, though in fact it derives from the legacy of colonial rule.[81] Each demands total compliance with a vision of state control in which Islam is projected as a legitimating factor, even though no open debate about what constitutes “true” Islam is tolerated. Tacitly it recognizes that the norms it imposes are not universally shared by all Muslims, yet publicly it arrogates to itself and to its custodians the right to decide which elements of Islamic belief and practice are to be supported. The memory of other Islams is too strong, however, to be erased. In each instance Muslims have to decide how to preserve their symbolic identity within a public order that is antireligious at worst, as in the former Soviet Union, China, Indonesia, and Turkey, or pseudoreligious at best, as in most Arab states, Iran, Pakistan, and Bangladesh.

The greatest failure of mimetic nationalism is that it left each of the colonized countries, many of them in Africa and Asia, many of them majoritarian Muslim, with the illusion that they could reclaim both identity and purity as nation-states. The nationalist leaders of Muslim states played to these hopes. Having ended foreign domination, they could claim to have banished the hated foreigner. Yet the foreigner did not go away. Frantz Fanon made prophetic warnings about the danger of independence, namely, that colonial values might persist even after the colonizers had left.[82] As a result, twentieth-century nationalism produced for the entire Muslim world a cleavage of enormous magnitude. The most evident cleavage was between Muslims and the dominant culture of Western Europe. But an equally great cleavage was among Muslim reformers, between those who were attracted to European achievements, seeking to appropriate their benefits but packaged in an indigenous idiom, and those others who sought to oppose them, arguing that no accommodation was possible without loss of authenticity. The danger for reformers was their apparent affinity with that which they admired but did not embrace. Even when colonialism finally yielded to independence movements, they as well as nationalist leaders were seen to be tainted by neocolonialism, representing, as Fanon put it, black/brown skins wearing white masks.

If the final legacy of colonialism was to reshape the Muslim world into truncated territories and contested borders, capitalism left it with economies that could only function on the margins. Capitalism benefited its captains, the major powers of the high-tech era. These powers are the technologically advanced, professionally differentiated, and economically privileged societies of Western Europe, North America, and now East Asia. Even before the rubric of First, Second, and Third Worlds was invented in the 1950s,[83] there existed a proto-Third World. It embraced all Muslim societies, even those that were to benefit from the petro-dollar infusion begun in the 1950s and 1960s but then accelerated through the 1970s and 1980s before flattening out in the 1990s. It is this economic gradient that undergirds, or should undergird, all attempts to explain Islamic fundamentalism.

 Chapter 4. Islamic Fundamentalism: Religious Nationalism

THE SUDDEN dramatic increase of oil revenues in the 1970s did not produce, but it did catalyze, the eruption of an uncoordinated set of protests against Muslim rulers who seemed to accept the dominant and un-Islamic global order. That chain reaction has been dubbed Islamic radicalism, Islamic fundamentalism, or just plain Islamism. Even as Islamic revivalism cannot be separated from the introduction of European commerce in the early modern period at a certain moment in time, so Islamism or Islamic fundamentalism cannot be divorced from the structural realignment of global power— economic and social as well as political and military— that preceded the rise of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries (OPEC). There might have been Islamic fundamentalism without OPEC, and economic factors alone do not explain its myriad expressions, yet the global context is crucial to understanding how Islamic fundamentalism has appeared and reappeared during the last quarter of this century.

While petromania was contagious in the 1970s, the tyranny of oil, in Georges Corm’s apt phrase, had begun much earlier. It culminated in the 1970s due to the coincidence of political frustration after the bitter Arab-Israeli War of October 1973 with the overdue readjustment of oil prices leveraged through the newly founded union of oil-producing states named OPEC. OPEC was a union rather than a cartel, as is often supposed. By any standard of proportionality, its members were more than justified in seeking a fairer share of profits for their extraction of a nonrenewable resource.

But proportionality, and with it higher profits for OPEC members, did not pave the way to higher status in the international community, nor did it ensure independence from the skills and ambitions of others. The new wealth was monetary. It had to be invested or distributed in a way that would allow these preindustrial societies to enter the postindustrial or high-tech era. The way was never found, in part because financial resources could not be transformed into social restructuring without reliance on the technoindustrial complexes of Europe and America that pioneered modernization even while projecting an “alien” civilization. Genuine independence proved impossible, and in its stead emerged a selfdestructive frenzy. Drawn into an economic order where they remain marginal, the principal members of OPEC can only function with the assistance of other, more advanced and more powerful countries. They require foreign assistance in everything from agricultural goods to military weapons to construction projects to transport vehicles. They employ an enormous number of expatriate workers to help them try to keep up with the modern world. Some do recognize the irony of sudden riches. As a Saudi official once lamented, “We Saudis are rich while you Americans are wealthy. I’d rather be wealthy.” By this he meant that the true criterion of national prosperity is not export-import surpluses or per capita income but rather the potential to construct and maintain an economic infrastructure that is globally competitive without foreign assistance. By that criterion, Saudi Arabia, like every OPEC country, including Iran, remains underdeveloped and therefore dependent on others for what it needs to exist and to compete as a modern nation.

As long as the greatest field of play in the high-tech era remains science—scientific discovery, technological adaptation, commercial deployment—Muslim countries will remain disadvantaged, and Islamic fundamentalism will function as a spoiler. Its ideological appeal is strengthened by the failure—the inevitable failure—of other ideologies, namely, nationalism, socialism, pan-Arabism, or even pan-Islamism. Yet the state against which the fundamentalists rail is a durative institution. Not only have governments proven their ability to survive insurgency, with the solitary exception of Iran, but the state, in the words of a Lebanese observer, “has become the strongest dominant shadow over the lives of the individual and society.”[84] From control of the army and secret police to ownership of major industries to recruitment in administrative bureaucracies, the new postcolonial state exercises centripetal pressures unimaginable in the pre-World War II era. Fundamentalists can challenge the state. They can even kill the pharaoh, as some Egyptians did when they assassinated Sadat in 1981, but there will be other pharaohs and other centrist deployments of power.

There is more, much more, to Islamic fundamentalism than can be gleaned from the “great man” approach to history, an approach that in this case would conjure a list of fundamentalist heroes, from the Pakistani Mawdudi to the Egyptian Qutb to the Tunisian Ghannouchi, and then show how they have influenced the way alienated Muslims come to express their grievance with global patterns of economic and cultural exchange. Instead of offering biographical snapshots of fundamentalist heroes, I will look at the socioeconomic as well as the cultural profiles of particular countries that have experienced a series of postcolonial crises. I begin with Pakistan and Egypt in order to gauge the extent of fundamentalist protest in former British colonies. I then turn to Tunisia and Syria to illustrate parallel protests in the ex-French colonial sphere. I conclude by focusing on Saudi Arabia and Iran because their intrinsic rivalry is even more important than their evident and explicit policy differences. Each polity claims Islamic credentials and yet each has responded to the threat of exogenous control in opposite ways, the Saudis by allying with Western capitalism while suppressing the fundamentalists in their midst, the Iranians by pursuing a form of theocratic capitalism that permits limited but real internal dissent.

 Antinationalist Discourse

If one can locate a substantive kernel of Islamic fundamentalist thinking, it comes from the subtle religious response to the limits of secular-style Arab nationalism. It is well illustrated in two statements by Jordanian Islamic spokesmen. They reflect the antinationalist mood of Sunni Arab Islamists or fundamentalists, as experienced in Jordan but also in many countries caught between the ascendant West and their own memory of a glorious Muslim past. A leading jurist who has authored over forty books, ‘Abd al-‘Aziz Khayyat once summed up the five divinely mandated preservations that were at the heart of Muslim law (shari’A). They are:

<quote>

Self-preservation, enjoining what is proper to eat and drink, while prohibiting indulgence in prolonged fasting

</quote>

<quote>

Preservation of the mind, or mental health, encouraging literacy and education while prohibiting alcohol, hashish, or drugs

</quote>

<quote>

Preserving the species, requiring marriage while also limiting the number of wives to four, and making even that option remote by mandating conjugal parity

</quote>

<quote>

Preserving wealth and property, by honoring labor and investment of money while also prohibiting unfair interest or usury or excessive accumulation of wealth

</quote>

<quote>

Preserving belief since belief in God as One, in Muhammad as His final prophet, and in the Qur’an as His perfect revelation are enjoined on Muslims, while superstition and idolatry in all forms, including the elevation of country above God (nationalism), are prohibited[85]

</quote>

Note the order in which these preservations are cited. The two most specific preservations, concerning food and marriage, are first and third. Both are traditional. Both are modern. The first inveighs against Sufi brotherhoods that deem fasting to be a meritorious way of encouraging dependence on God alone (tawakkul). The third acknowledges the option of four wives but also, following the Qur'an, makes clear that each wife must be treated equally. Since most modern-day nations support monogamy, this implicit compromise is an effective way of being both modern and Muslim.

What is most curious, however, is the reiteration of the most basic creed of Islam as the fifth preservation. At first this seems to be out of proportion to its operative importance, but in fact its intent is not merely to reinforce monotheism but to suggest that true compliance with Oneness may supersede other loyalties. Many Jordanians, especially those of Palestinian origin, would read this as a rationale for demurral from honoring King Hussein too highly, but at the same time it could be seen as a not-so-veiled message to the Palestinians that they should honor their own commitment to a Palestinian homeland less intently than their devotion to God!

The very fact that this ethical digest could allow for alternative readings illustrates its appropriateness as a list of fundamentals. They are all terms which most observant Muslims would generally accept. They do not incite violence or even active resistance to political authorities, yet they project as a seamless program norms on which there is not a consensus, leaving open how various Muslims would apply them as directives to their own lives.

Equally adept at couching emotive language in abstractly displaced referents is Dr. Mohamed Sakr, an economics professor at the University of Amman and a member of the Jordanian branch of the Muslim Brothers. In a magazine interview Dr. Sakr, who earned a Ph.D. degree in economics from Harvard University, blasts the West. Without once mentioning a specific Western country as the culprit or villain, he is adamant that "the West is against us." Having lived in the United States, he claims to know it as "a civilization stricken by forces from within." The alternative to the West, he suggests, is a united Muslim world, one that would allow countries to share their resources in a complementary fashion. "Some countries like Saudi Arabia and Qatar have money, and others like Jordan and Egypt have the labor force. Unity would bring greater benefits for all." Unity would allow benefits of oil extraction to be shared because "today the wealth of the region is in the hands of a few sheiks, and the majority of the people are poor." In the end, the masses will take decisions into their own hands, he warns. What, then, should the West do? Two things: first, it should take note that "we have millions of people who have U.S. educations and who are not slaves of the West"; and second, Euro-American firms should stop squeezing profits out of the region, instead allowing its citizens to govern themselves "without dictation from Washington, Paris or Bonn."[86]

Though admittedly fragmentary because it was gleaned from an interview, the above captures the tone of the discourse common to Islamic fundamentalists. The finger of accusation points with equal pique to enemies at home and abroad. Those who are the real Muslim culprits are "the few sheikhs" who take money from the West for oil. Yet, in the same breath, these Sheikhs are asked to join an Islamic unity movement that would provide their countries labor from Jordan and Egypt in return for "fair" wages. It is a plea for distributive justice likely to fall on deaf ears in Riyadh and Kuwait City.

Should one then ignore the appeal of this argument? No, for despite its seeming incoherence, it exactly mirrors the dilemma of Islamic fundamentalists in the 1990s: to have the best of the West—its education, its technology, and its dollars—and yet to evolve into a separate, Islamically renewed, world order. In the words of Roy Mottahedeh, "Islamic government is for many Muslims what the old but recently revived phrase 'civil society' is for many liberals: a repository of collective hope and an aspiration that the fundamentally good values at the roots of their traditions can be recovered and strengthened." That is the goal but, as Mottahedeh goes on to note, "the actual agreed-upon content of Islamic government remains very limited and, more often than not, severely disputed."[87]

 Examples of Islamic Fundamentalism

No appeal works unless it matches the mood and the options for change in particular countries. The sameness and the difference of Islamist movements can best be grasped by looking at specific Muslim nation-states. The following six cases are selective, but they are not random. While they show the limits of fundamentalist movements, they also represent different aspects of the colonial experience. Two—Pakistan and Egypt—suffered British rule. Two others—Syria and Tunisia—became victims of la mission civilisatrice or French rule, while the final two—Saudi Arabia and Iran — operated only within spheres of influence, escaping direct rule from a European capital. Each of these six countries signals changes within its own sociopolitical sphere at the same time that it portends trends of broad significance for postcolonial Islamic identity. Though I draw attention to the arch rivalry between Saudi Arabia and Iran, I also highlight Iran as the most significant symbolic site for understanding, and misunderstanding, contemporary Islam. Without the Islamic Republic of Iran, there would be no Islamic fundamentalism, nor would the “menace of Islam” ever have become a siren call for both Euro-American policy makers and the public at large. It is because of its singular importance that I conclude the country-by-country analysis with Iran.

* Pakistan

Principal key dates,[88] including major leaders since independence:

| 1858 | Beginning of direct British rule of India |

| 1906 | Founding of the Muslim League separate from the Indian National Congress |

| 1941 | Founding of Jama’At-i Islami in East Punjab |

| 1947 | Formation of East and West Pakistan, independent of both Britain and the Republic of India |

| 1947–50 | Muhammad ‘Ali Jinnah |

| 1956 | Pakistan proclaimed an Islamic republic |

| 1958–69 | Ayub Khan |

| 1969–71 | Yahya Khan |

| 1971 | Revolt of East Pakistan, formation of Bangladesh |

| 1971–77 | Zulfikar ‘Ali Bhutto |

| 1973 | Promulgation of constitution officially declaring Pakistan to be an Islamic republic |

| 1978–88 | Zia al-Haq |

| 1988–90 | Benazir Bhutto |

| 1990–93 | Nawaz Sharif |

| 1993–96 | Benazir Bhutto |

| 1997- | Nawaz Sharif |

After an experiment with parliamentary democracy, Ayub Khan, a general, assumed direct rule through a coup in 1958. Field Marshal Yahya Khan and General Zia al-Haq also invoked martial law, with the Bhuttos (father and daughter) and Nawaz Sharif being the only duly elected, nonmilitary leaders of Pakistan during the past three decades.

Pakistani Islamic fundamentalism cannot be understood apart from Pakistani history, which is also a function of geography. A part of the Asian subcontinent, Pakistan is linked by historical development to India, by faith orientation to Central and West Asia (i.e., the Middle East). Its hundred-million-plus inhabitants are predominantly Muslim. Three hundred years of Mughal rule provided Muslim elites in North India with a sense of their continuity to Central Asian forebears. Yet it was British colonialism that shaped the profile of present-day Pakistan: Lord Mountbatten presided over the partition of a vast region along communal lines, religiously defined. His goal was to ensure maximum political influence and future economic opportunity in England’s “crown jewel,” even after independence was granted. His was a fatal error, resulting in the death of millions but also destroying the dreams of other millions.

Some of those dreams were Muslim dreams of a united postcolonial Indian state. I can remember discussing Partition with a distinguished Indian Muslim scholar from Delhi in the mid-1980s. I asked him which side he chose at the end of British rule. “Both,” he answered calmly, and then, his voice cracking, he explained. “Both. I wanted to be both Indian and Muslim. I still want to be both Indian and Muslim. There was no destiny to create this division of brothers. An Islamic state? It was a human error, not the divine will. An Islamic state is where Muslims live together in peace with their neighbors. Bharat [the Sanskrit name for the subcontinent] is an Islamic state, not this bid’A [innovation] called Pakistan. What an error! What a havoc!”[89]

Though many Indian Muslims did favor a separate Muslim polity, not all wanted to be joined together in the same Islamic state. The subsequent rift between East and West Pakistan resulted in the formation of Bangladesh in 1971, again with much bloodshed. Two incompatible parts came unbound from the mold into which they had been cast in 1947. The result was three separate nationstates that held in common only a constitution as their norm of governance, but even the constitutions differed in what they specified as the basis for the state: one, dominated by Hindus, was constitutionally secular (India); another, with a Muslim plurality, had an avowedly Islamic constitution (Pakistan); while the third (Bangladesh), though dominated by Muslims, remained constitutionally secular till 1987.

The great dilemma for Pakistan was how to be an Islamic state while also accommodating diverse ethnic/linguistic groups within its Western and Eastern wings. No figure from East Pakistan ever attained consensus support from West Pakistan as a national leader. All the political, juridical, economic, and social structures of the new state were shaped in West Pakistan. The national language also was Urdu, not Bengali, and all those Bengali leaders who had to fly to Islamabad for parliamentary meetings had to speak Urdu once they boarded the Pakistani International Airlines plane in Dhaka.

Among those who stood forth as religious nationalists from West Pakistan was Mawlana Abu>l-’Ala Mawdudi. Every history of Islam in Pakistan cites his name prominently, and it is with reference to him that the tale of Islamic fundamentalism is told, the claim of its prestige in the subcontinent advanced.

A trained journalist rather than a religious professional or <alim, Mawdudi experienced a powerful second conversion to Islam in his twenties and thereafter became a prolific pamphleteer, spokesman, and activist on behalf of Islamic causes. Especially because he was a skilled wordsmith, it is important to distinguish what he said from what he did: he was able to articulate ideals that in practice neither he nor others could uphold.

In 1941 Mawdudi founded the Jama'At-i Islami, an organization dedicated to promoting Islamic norms within India. He was opposed to the Pakistan movement and to the Muslim League, arguing that the Muslims of India were effectively irreligious and that the creation of a separate state would not help them any more than it had helped the irreligious Muslims of Iran and Turkey (even though neither Iran nor Turkey had been founded as self-consciously Islamic states). Yet when Pakistan came into being in 1947, Mawdudi ignored his disagreement with Muhammad Ali Jinnah and, despite the secular tone of the Muslim League, migrated to Lahore. Through the Jama'At-i Islami he played the role of religious gadfly, repeatedly challenging the government's claims to be Islamic, risking imprisonment and even the death penalty (in 1953). After being freed from prison, he came to terms with the military regime of Ayub Khan, and from 1962 till his death in 1979, with few interruptions, he continued his work on behalf of the Jama'At-i Islami.

Mawdudi confronted the traditional religious professionals, the <ulama, as well as the successive governments of Pakistan. His was an inclusive, consistent critique of human failure to come to terms with the radical message of true, which is to say originary, Islam. He so simplified that message that it seemed to be accessible to all. From his initial publication of a book on jihad through his subsequent essays on virtually every domain of contemporary Muslim life, Mawdudi applied twin hermeneutical principles, both related to the Qur'an: (1) God's word provides the supreme yardstick for human conduct; and (2) it is possible to derive a single, correct interpretation of its meaning for the present age. It is as if he took upon himself the enormous task of "proving Islam's ability to supersede modern secular ideologies."[90]

Mawdudi did live under very secular governments, none more so than the martial rule of Ayub Khan. In 1970, after Ayub had resigned, Mawdudi lamented that "it was the leftists who had really controlled his government.

All religious elements were crushed and the administration went into the hands of the leftists. Press, news agencies, radio and television—in fact all the organs of the mass media—were used by leftist forces [while] Jama'At-i Islami had very little opportunity to work."[91]

Despite the passion of Mawdudi's protest, his posture was compromised on two fronts, or at least so his opponents have argued. One weakness in his lament derives from the nature of the state he was attacking; the other, from his own engagement with representatives of that state. It is important to understand both positions to see how precarious, and fragile, is the future of Islamic fundamentalism in Pakistan. Mawdudi waged a kind of internal jihad against the Pakistani government: though its leaders claimed to be "good" Muslims, Mawdudi criticized their policies as un-Islamic. Most heads of state were military rulers with little engagement in religious subjects, but when they claimed to act on behalf of some ideal higher than self-interest, that ideal was invariably Islam. Even a nonmilitary ruler, such as the socialist Zulfikar 'Ali Bhutto, attempted to legitimize his tenuous authority with reference to Islam. What other ideology could compete with Islam? Could socialism or capitalism or democracy? No. Islam was the cement holding together the diverse elements within Pakistani society, and every leader wrapped himself (or herself) in the mantle of Islamic legitimacy. There was the liberal-modernist Islam of the early parliamentary phase. Ayub sponsored a developmentalist Islam; his successor Yahya Khan, a nationalist Islam; and the secular Zulfikar 'Ali Bhutto, a socialist-populist Islam. The successor to Bhutto, who also proved to be his fatal nemesis, Zia al-Haq, claimed that his was a revivalist (though it was actually a fundamentalist) Islam. In the aftermath of his 1988 death, Bhutto's daughter Benazir perpetuated a socialist-populist Islam, while her successor, Nawaz Sharif, advocated a capitalist Islam that she did not entirely abandon after replacing him, and to which he reverted when becoming prime minister for the second time in 1997.[92]

And so Mawdudi had to compete with variant notions of Islamic identity within the government. At the same time, he had to placate other Islamic activists outside the government. One such was Dr. Israr Ahmad, a fellow member of the Jama'At-i Islami. According to Dr. Israr, as he likes to be known, Mawdudi changed after his release from prison in the 1950s. He retreated "from his fundamentalist position and instead sought allegiance, first with the religious groups and then with avowedly secular political parties." Mawdudi, in other words, tacitly cooperated with the very government that he openly criticized; he only appeared to be remaking Pakistan in the image of true Islam. As a result of this shortfall between words and actions, Dr. Israr resigned from the Jama'At in 1957. Later, in 1974, he formed his own organization, Tanzim-i Islam. His project in many ways resembles Mawdudi's, as Vali Nasr has pointed out.[93] Yet there are two major differences. First, Dr. Israr adamantly excluded women from the public work force, stressing the need to "honor" them for their unique domestic roles. (Mawdudi had also advocated the seclusion of women, until the 1964 elections, when he did an about-face and supported, albeit half-heartedly, the candidacy of a woman who was running for president against Ayub Khan!) Second, Dr. Israr understood that a religious movement, to succeed in the late twentieth century, required modern media. Skillfully he used both television and overseas travel to project the image of a worldwide organization: reaching beyond Pakistan, he reinforced his local, regional, and national standing as the bellwether of Islamic ideals. He often seemed to use media professionals, whether journalists, radio commentators, or television program planners, to his own ends. Once, during a 1982 visit to Pakistan, I picked up the English evening newspaper, The Leader, only to find the headline: PAKISTAN ON THE VERGE OF ISRARIZATION. The lead article went on to highlight how the growing influence of Tanzim-i Islam was feared in many quarters, not least among professional women.

The worse did not come to pass, however, because the Zia al-Haq regime realized that its own fundamentalist image was not served by this headstrong Punjabi activist. Since the Pakistani media is government controlled, Dr. Israr could be, and was, denied access to the airwaves and also to the headlines. His star faded, as the nation-state in Pakistan made clear that it was the decisive forum for shaping acceptable Islamic ideology. When Benazir Bhutto came to power in the fall of 1988, Dr. Israr suffered a further setback: female domesticity could no longer be flaunted as the sole appropriate model of Islamic womanhood.

Other expressions of fundamentalism have also been undercut by the lack of popular support for either the Jama'At-i Islami or its competitors, many of which are advocates of local ethnic nationalisms. Muhajirs are the Urdu-speaking refugees from India who settled in the Sind region of Pakistan, especially in the large cities of Karachi and Hyderabad. They have become Sindhis by default: though at first some were drawn to the Jama'At-i Islami, they now embrace a variant of Sindhi nationalism and advocate refugees' rights, rather than religious norms, through secular political parties.

During the 1990s Islamic fundamentalism, though partially eclipsed in Pakistan, has not died out. It simmers because the social, ethnic, and economic unrest that continues to paralyze much of Pakistani public life cannot be easily or quickly ended. As crises recur, one may expect the clarion cry for a "simple" solution, one rooted in the Qur'an and in age-old precepts. Yet its appeal will be not to the masses but mainly to members of the bloated government bureaucracy. It will also have little appeal to urban, underemployed young professionals who want to distance themselves from both religious and ethnic politics. Most of its supporters will be men, though they will claim the support of women, even as they argue that their mission is to defend the honor of their own female family members.

The long-range message from Pakistan is cautionary: while no one would be foolish enough to say that religious activism or a variant of fundamentalism will not influence Pakistan's future, the lessons of the past fifty years suggest that fundamentalist ideology will continue to elicit a limited response, its declamatory excesses more evident than its programmatic achievements.

* Egypt

Principal dates and rulers in the modern era:

| 1882 | 'Urabi Revolt and British Occupation |

| 1936 | Limited independence from England

| 1936–52 | King Faruq |

| 1952 | Free Officers' Revolution |

| 1954–70 | Gamal 'Abd al-Nasser |

| 1956 | Suez Crisis |

| 1967 | June War with Israel |

| 1970–81 | Anwar Sadat |

| 1973 | October War with Israel |

| 1979 | Camp David Accords with Israel |

| 1981 | Sadat’s assassination by Islamic fundamentalists |

| 1981- | Hosni Mubarak |

| 1992 | Assassination of journalist Farag Foda by Islamic fundamentalists |

Many observers think of Egypt as the heartland of the Arab and the African worlds. Located at a strategic juncture between the Mediterranean Sea and the Red Sea, in the heart of the Middle East, Egypt has spearheaded both the expansion of European commercialism and indigenous reaction to external manipulation. The anger of its intellectuals against the British occupiers was first heard in the nineteenth century and echoed in the newly founded presses of Cairo and Alexandria, which reached far beyond their borders.[94] Calling for the expulsion of foreigners, Egyptians hoped to challenge European world hegemony by counterposing to it a modernized civilization at once Arab and Islamic, with Egypt in the vanguard. Not all Egyptians were so utopian, however. Not all espoused Pan-Arabism or “greater” Egypt. Other elites, both political and commercial, accommodated to the shift in commercial and strategic options offered by the British presence. At the same time, the large majority of Egyptians experienced the colonial and postcolonial era only in an indirect sense: they remained peasants (fellahin), often in debt to absentee landlords, and for them survival was—and is—the overriding concern.

Two parallel but divergent groups protested against British influence in Egypt. During the early years of the twentieth century, the nationalist movement coalesced around the figure of Sa<d Zaghlul. He himself had been inspired by the leading light of Islamic reformism, Muhammad ‘Abduh, and founded the opposition Wafd party on principles that reflected an elision of political independence with religious dedication to Islam. Formal independence was granted in 1922, yet British control of defense and foreign affairs persisted. Zaghlul died in 1927, still protesting. Others continued to protest till the Wafdist and the British finally signed a treaty in 1936. Yet extremists demanded total British withdrawal, a withdrawal that did not seem possible as long as King Faruq, who had succeeded to the throne in 1936, ruled.

Challenging not only the British and his royal lackey but also the Egyptian nationalists was a group called the Muslim Brothers. Formally established in 1929 under the leadership of Hasan al-Banna, they advocated nothing less than the restoration of Islamic identity to all levels of Egyptian society, but particularly the government. They were less confident than either the reformers or early nationalists that independence from foreign rule would bring a renewed dedication to Islamic norms.

Their fears proved correct when an army coup brought the Free Officers to power in 1952, with Gamal ‘Abd al-Nasir (Nasser) assuming full control in 1954.[95] Nasser claimed to free Egypt from British tutelage, and the Suez Crisis of 1956, as well as later flirtations with the Soviet Union, seemed to confirm his nonaligned status. Yet Nasser also governed through a centralizing bureaucratic state that changed the rhetoric but little of the substance of the monarchist era. Despite the high-sounding claims made by and about Nasser, Egypt did not experience either a social or an economic revolution under his rule.

Nor did it experience a religious revolution. Nasser was not antipathetic to Islam: like other officers who cooperated in the coup of 1952, his first views had been shaped by a madrasa education. Yet religion for Nasser played essentially an instrumental role, to strengthen the bonds between Egypt and other Muslim nations, but above all to draw attention to Egypt as the hub of the Muslim world. He stopped far short of acclaiming Egypt an Islamic state. To Nasser, as to Ayub Khan in Pakistan, the shari’A or Islamic law should not be used as a technical term signaling public commitment to Islamic ideals. The shari’A portended a retreat from, not an advance into, the modern world. Yet for many observant Muslims, the honor of Islam was intertwined with the observance of the shari’A; relaxing or denying its influence was tantamount to defaming Islam. While Nasser never officially denied the shari’A, he held it at arm’s length from his own ideological repertoire. In Nasser’s Egypt the shari’A remained, but it became an option that was voluntary rather than mandatory, its compliance private rather than public. In 1952 Nasser abolished the Mixed courts, in which British judges applied British law in Egypt, a detested legacy of colonial rule, yet two years later he launched a single state secular system that, in effect, superseded the shari’A courts as well as the minority religious courts (established for Christians and Jews).

It is hardly surprising that in the same year, 1954, Nasser became the target of an assassination attempt by a member of the Muslim Brothers. Though the attempt failed, it highlighted what was already apparent to many: Nasser’s socialist ideology was on a collision course with nascent Islamic fundamentalism. Fundamentalists could not gain the center of power, but they could challenge all those who used power in ways that they construed to be against the highest ideals of Islam.

Far from rejecting Islam, Nasser did not hesitate to co-opt state-appointed religious functionaries in order to issue decrees approving what he did, while at the same time denouncing the “terrorist” activities of the Muslim Brothers. As was the case in Pakistan, it was not a war between Islam and non-Islam, but between competing versions of Islam.

To his opponents, however, Nasser was merely projecting a Muslim veneer on a secular and foreign reality: he was dressing up European ideas and Western myths in Arab clothes. While Nasser may have been indulging in a game of political charades, he was also appealing to a major, crucial constituency: the Arab middle classes, who wanted to maintain the status quo of a progressive bureaucratic state. It may have been impossible for Nasser to advocate both Arab socialism, which supported class interests through government control, and economic justice for the masses. Through Nasserism, an ideology of Arab unity projected far beyond the borders of Egypt, he invoked distributive justice while pursing the interests of those who remained directly dependent on him.[96]

The year 1967 proved to be the year of destiny for Nasser. As the symbol of Arab leadership, he brought Egypt and its Arab neighbors into open confrontation with Israel. The result was a rapid and catastrophic defeat for Egypt that only confirmed in the eyes of his critics what they had said all along about Nasser: his temporizing policies could not withstand the test of time.[97]

Nasser threatened to resign, but by popular demand he remained in power. His stature was such that for a time he seemed to experience a psychological recuperation transcending his military debacle. Yet he died in 1970. The pharaonic tradition of statesmanship did not die with him. Nasser had inherited it from King Faruq, and Anwar Sadat, succeeding Nasser, adapted the same authoritarian structure of the Egyptian state to his own ends. Like Nasser, he failed to deal with the massive, underlying social inequities perpetuated by what one writer has called the “hydropolitics of the Nile.”[98] Though Sadat did achieve a pyrrhic victory over Israel in the 1973 war, the gap between the ideals of an Islamic state and the reality of a secular, pragmatic government became even more apparent in the 1970s, especially after the Camp David accords of 1978.

In October 1981 Sadat arrived at his moment of destiny. Was it inevitable that he would be killed by representatives of those who opposed him? Was it inevitable that his killers would be a clandestine unit of fundamentalists who had infiltrated the Egyptian army? The answer, as analysis after analysis makes clearer and clearer, is no. Khalid Islambouli and his accomplices were fixated on Sadat the image rather than Sadat the man. They blamed all the shortcomings of present-day Egypt on Sadat’s refusal to enshrine the shari’A as the law of the land. Instead of an Islamic state, he had tried to jumpstart the stagnant Egyptian economy through an opening (infitah) to the West. Instead of a reforged Arab alliance against Israel, he had made peace with Israel at Camp David. And so Islambouli and his accomplices attacked Sadat as a secular despot ignoring the ideals of both Islam and Arab unity. They wanted to kill the pharaoh. Sadat the symbol embodied the pharaonic despot whom fundamentalists, along with others, had come to revile. They killed the symbol but scarcely affected the system.

The turbulence of Egyptian politics should not obscure the issue that matters most about fundamentalism and fundamentalists: winning the battle for Islamic legitimacy. Yet fundamentalists have no monopoly on either religious rhetoric or religious praxis. Throughout the postcolonial era of Egyptian history, “Islam [has] remained the widest and most effective basis for consensus despite all efforts to promote nationalism, patriotism, secularism, and socialism.”[99] But consensus for whom? Islam has come to mean divergent values and conflicting norms for different Egyptians. All attempts at constitutional legitimation in Egypt have reflected pervasive loyalty to Islam. In 1964 under Nasser and again in 1971 under Sadat, Islam was designated as the state religion of Egypt. The people’s council (majlis ash-sha<b), appointed by the government, has continued to receive proposals for heightening the state’s public commitment to Islamic norms. Opposition political parties vie with one another as well as with the government in claiming the mantle of Islamic legitimacy.

In such an atmosphere, suffused, as it is, with the symbols and sanctity of Islam, it is imperative to identify who the fundamentalists are. It is not enough to analyze their ideological claims or to chart their public attacks. One must also see what classes of Egyptian society they represent. Those who have been identified as fundamentalist invariably come from upwardly mobile middle-class backgrounds: they are not the poor, downtrodden, and dispossessed, but rather those who have had sufficient education to perceive another reality than the one they daily confront. They are underemployed doctors or engineers, or journeymen technicians with no stable career path. They may also be marginalized merchants or disgruntled army personnel. They have enough education to frame their protest in either-or ideological categories, categories that admit of black and white but not gray Mawdudi was a harbinger of all Islamic fundamentalists: seeing whatever was not Islam as shirk or unbelief, he could attack a pervasive enemy, without ever once suggesting how that enemy was to be transformed into an observant cobeliever.

The postcolonial experiences of Egypt and Pakistan provide a benchmark for some of the enduring arguments about political Islam. Separation of religion from politics became a trip wire, a shibboleth for all that was wrong with colonialism and its legacy, and all that was right about Islamic norms. Fundamentalists refuse to acknowledge the separation of church and state, waging an internal jihad against all who pretend to clarify and enforce such a separation. Islam, in their view, is both church and state. The Arabic words din (religion) and dawla (state) are conjoined with the meaning of Islam. In the words of an early member of the Muslim Brothers, “politics is part of religion. Caesar and what belongs to Caesar is for God Almighty alone Islam commanded a unity of life. To impose upon Islam the Christian separation of loyalties [into church and state] is to deny it its essential meaning and very existence.”[100]

Islam then becomes a giant anomaly. On the one hand, it is more than a religion. It encompasses both the spiritual and the political, the private and the public domains. Attention to one sphere presumes engagement in the other. To do less is to trivialize and confound Islam. To talk about a mosque-state division in Islam is to talk about dividing Islam.

Yet at the same time, religious specialists are not in charge of making Islam into an overarching, socioeconomic, religiopolitical reality. For the Muslim Brothers and their various subgroups in Egypt, as for the Islamic Society in Pakistan, emphasis on the unity of Islam does not imply the creation of a theocracy. Sunni Muslims attach minimal importance to a class of religious specialists; the <ulama are ordinary Muslims who happen to be religious functionaries. They are not endowed with the high rank or social prestige of Shi<ite clerics. Islamic fundamentalism represents the radicalizing synthesis of Muslim laymen, not clergy.

In the postcolonial era, the nation-state is the inescapable context for all public life, and the Egyptian fundamentalists who challenged the political leadership in Cairo did so by claiming that they, not the army officers turned politicians, were the true claimants to the seventh-century Medinan state inaugurated by the Prophet Muhammad. Nationalism, in their view, resurrected the kind of tribalism or jahiliyya that Muhammad opposed and that early Muslims temporarily overcame. In its stead, there should be a transnational patriotism that seeks the benefit of all Muslims everywhere. Sayyid Qutb, the Muslim Brother who opposed Nasser and was executed on charges of sedition in 1966, used a string of homologies to stress how Islam, if correctly defined, offered a nationalism worthy of Muslims. In true Islam, wrote Qutb, “nationalism is belief, homeland is Dar al-Islam, the ruler is God, and the constitution is the Qur’an.”[101]

As secular nationalism falters in the Muslim world, one might expect religious fundamentalism, also known as Islamism, to surge forward. That would be a facile, and possibly inaccurate, expectation. Though the effective appeal of nationalism is to a limited, sophisticated urban elite, the power of the modern state allows these same elites to exercise coercive authority over a much wider segment of the population. At the same time, fundamentalists, despite the religious idiom of their discourses, are handicapped by the counterappeal of other religious authorities, and the lack of concrete goals in their stated programs. Their greatest appeal is to urban discontents with at least high-school-level education. Seldom do they appeal to the greater number of their semiliterate or uneducated countrymen. And, as in Pakistan, their rhetorical power exceeds their pragmatic accomplishments even when they provide, as some have, social, medical, and educational services that surpass those of the often corrupt, ever inefficient state bureaucracy.

If the pattern of protest that marks Islamic fundamentalism in Pakistan and Egypt is in part the legacy of British colonial rule and in part the response to regional tensions and national dilemmas arising from the post-World War II era, can the same be said for Muslim majority countries that had been under French colonial rule? To explore that question I will focus on two Arab/ Muslim countries that experienced French colonial rule: Syria and Tunisia.

* Syria

Principal dates and rulers:

| 1914–17 | Ottoman conscription of Syrians during World War I led to widespread famine; Armenian massacres |

| 1920–46 | French mandate |

| 1946 | Independence

| 1958–63 | Egyptian-Syrian alliance (United Arab Republic)

| 1963 | Baath party comes to power

| 1964 | First Hama riots against Baath secularism

| 1967 | June war with Israel

| 1967–70 | Hafiz al-Asad consolidates power in Correctionist Movement and becomes president |

| 1973 | New “secular” constitution; October war with Israel |

| 1976 | Deployment of troops to Lebanon

| 1982 | Israeli invasion of Lebanon and subsequent de facto division of Lebanon into Syrian and Israeli spheres of influence
Muslim Brothers’ uprising in Hama crushed |

| 1994 | Death of Basil Asad, oldest son and likely successor to Hafiz al-Asad |

Syria, like Egypt, remained within the Ottoman sphere of influence for nearly four centuries, from the early sixteenth to the early twentieth century. It was not till the defeat of the Turks at the end of World War I that the French established a mandate over the region. Its unpopularity led to an early uprising (1925–27), a treaty with France before World War II and finally full independence in 1946.

Independence did not bring stability, however: Syrians were merely left with a geographical entity, that piece of territory from the Mediterranean to the Euphrates that the French had ruled, together with Lebanon, since 1920. The struggle to take control of postcolonial Syria was waged along several regional, sectarian, class, and ideological lines. Over time it became a battle between a landowning, urban, mercantile elite and a rising group of rural army officers who favored modernization within a praetorian state.

It was under the banner of the Baath party that the latter group won, and since 1963 they have ruled in Syria. The current president, Hafiz al-Asad, was a rural army officer turned Baathist. He became the undisputed ruler of Syria after deposing a party rival in 1970. To maintain his power base in

Damascus, he had to outwit even his own brother, the ambitious Rifaat al-Asad, whom he sent into exile in 1984.[102]

Within the context of regional politics, many observers have criticized Asad for the severity with which he has punished dissenters from his autocratic rule. The showcase for Asad's alleged brutality is his handling of the Hama rebellion in 1982. What begs for amplification, however, is the historical background to the Hama rebellion. It requires attention both to the social formation of the fundamentalist protestors who spearheaded that rebellion and to the search for religious legitimation on the part of a precarious, minoritarian regime.

The Muslim Brothers have existed in Syria almost as long as in Egypt. Appearing in the mid-1930s, they opposed the French mandate and resented the benefits it conferred on the modernizing sector of the Syrian economy. Those who supported the Brothers clustered in the region around Hama, an ancient trading center some 150 miles north of Damascus. Merchants and landlords, they numbered about one-sixth of Syria's population. In the 1960s, the Brothers sparked two organized protests against the Baathist regime. The first took the form of a series of merchant strikes in 1964 that openly challenged Baath policies as un-Islamic, secular, and therefore unacceptable. The first Hama riot forced the new government to intervene and even to shell a mosque. It was followed by another strike the next year. Once again, the government had to intervene, and once again it broke the strike with force.

When Hafiz al-Asad took control of the Baath party in 1970, the Brothers were initially silent, but by 1973 they had come to view him as an Alawite secularist. After all, Asad, like Nasser, his erstwhile hero, had sponsored a new constitution, and like Nasser's, his new constitution did not enshrine Islam as the state religion. Merchant strikes and violence spread to Hama. Asad put down the protest but at the same time declared that only a Muslim could serve as Syria's president. Yet he remained an Alawite, and many still regarded Alawites as heretics. To put to rest qualms about the Islamic status of Alawites, Asad set about projecting an Islamic image for himself and his family. He launched two architectural projects in his native village of Qardaha, situated in the heart of the Alawite mountains. For his deceased mother he built a lavish mosque, and for his oldest son Basil, who was tipped to be his successor but died in 1994, a vast funerary complex. Reminiscent of a Muslim saint's shrine, it features Qur'anic recitation and projects Basil as, above all, an observant Muslim.

From Damascus Asad increased the salaries of religious functionaries throughout Syria. Nor did he stint in his patronage of religious sites, either building new monuments or restoring historic landmarks. His pride may also be remembered as his folly: the Umayyad Mosque of Damascus now memorializes Asad through his signature on the band of one of its newly rebuilt minarets.

Throughout the 1970s the face of Syria was transformed both politically and economically. In 1973 Syria, along with Egypt, was drawn into still another war with Israel. Despite initial victories, which included the Syrian recapture of Qunaitra, both Egypt and Syria were finally defeated. Yet over twenty years later the Baathist regime continues to celebrate what is lauded on state-run television every October as "the victory of Qunaitra." Political obfuscation can succeed only because economic progress during the same period has been real, at least for some Syrians. While the highest levels of Baath leadership have remained exclusively male, some women have emerged as public figures: both the minister of education and the minister of culture are women, the latter having held her post for almost two decades. Women have also been encouraged to work, and to work at higher paying, salaried jobs where they were often trained in skills denied to previous generations of women. The Women's Union, a government-sponsored group, advocates causes such as greater female employment opportunities and increased literacy for women of all classes. The literacy rate of Syrian women and their prominence in education have become touted achievements of Baathist rule during the past three decades.

Both women and men gained from the increase of petrodollar profits in the Gulf after 1973, since some of those profits were channeled to Syria through labor and services. This meant that goods and services improved but prices also escalated. The newly rich and the newly empowered benefited at the same time that traditional mercantile classes felt slighted or even betrayed. Their frustration took on an added religious coloration when Syria intervened on behalf of the Maronite Christians and against the Palestinians, both Muslim and Christian, in the early stages of the Lebanese civil war (1976). The legacy of that intervention lingers among Muslim activists. Initially it spurred Sunni Syrians who opposed Asad to identify him as a secularist and to challenge the non-Sunni, specifically Alawi, tone of his leadership.

During this same period the Brothers expanded their influence and trained cadres in urban warfare. Mosque study circles on weekends became a recruitment nexus for their cells. When a noted Hama cleric was imprisoned and died, they also used his funeral as a rallying point for mobilizing new recruits. By 1976 they had embarked on an assassination campaign against key state officials. When Asad's brother Rifaat was attacked in February 1978, many began to suspect that there was sympathy for the Brothers even within the officer corps.

The struggle escalated in June 1979: a terrorist unit of the Brothers attacked an artillery school, killing sixty cadets and wounding many others. Asad's response was the stick and the carrot. The stick fell on the Brothers: three hundred of them were imprisoned. The carrot was extended to other members of the Sunni community, as more and more Sunnis were awarded government posts.

The Brothers continued to agitate, and a crackdown in 1980 was directed at the city of Aleppo, in the far north on the same trade route with Hama. Five thousand people were arrested, hundreds killed. In a single helicopter attack on a Brothers' outpost, two hundred of their number were killed. The local merchants of Aleppo attempted a strike, parallel to the one previously declared in Hama, but it fizzled and failed.

By spring 1980 the Baathists had introduced a special law that made membership in the Muslim Brothers an offense punishable by death. Though public membership disappeared overnight, the Brothers, operating clandestinely, tried to assassinate Asad in June 1980. They failed, but his security forces killed over five hundred Brethren who were serving time in prison.

The Brothers now became part of a united Islamic Front that opposed Asad as an unbeliever, not only because of his draconian measures against them but because of the secular constitution he introduced in 1973 at the same time that he required the president of Syria to be a Muslim. It is impossible to calculate how broad was the social basis for the Islamic Front. It seems more coherent than its counterpart in Egypt, yet it also seems more vulnerable to isolation and defeat, for behind the rhetoric of opposition to the Baathist regime there emerged a low-key success story: the constitution, combined with Syria's modernizing prosperity, allayed the fears and raised the hopes of many groups in urban areas. It also appealed to rural peasants and, of course, to loyalist elements of the army.

But the Brothers were able to strike. A bomb attack in late 1981 killed five hundred people in central Damascus. It was followed by a military plot to overthrow Asad in January 1982; over four hundred members of the army were purged.

It was against this backdrop that the rebellion in Hama occurred in February 1982. From Asad's view, it was hardly an isolated incident, but rather the latest and most portentous in a series of threatening actions by his declared enemies. His response was swift and brutal. Between ten thousand and twenty-five thousand people were killed. As whole districts were razed, many families were allegedly taken from their homes and shot en masse.

The campaign worked. Hama halted the Islamic challenge to Asad's rule. It epitomized not a religious struggle but a struggle for power in which religion was used by both sides as a mask for deeper grievances and more palpable stakes. The merchants and landlords who were the backbone of support for the Brothers and the Islamic Front numbered about one-sixth of the Syrian population. The Baath party relied on workers, peasants, minorities, and army personnel. Its constituency accounted for about one-fourth of the Syrian population. The chief issue did not concern Islam but modernization. It was not an up or down decision on Islamic statehood, but rather a process involving countless daily decisions on how the country modernizes, who benefits, and who is in charge. It was also in part regional. The merchants, landlords, and religious classes from the North resented the influence of other groups. They could appeal to some disaffected student cadres and military units but not to broader constituencies. Even though upper-middle-class professionals denounced the government as authoritarian, they were unenthusiastic about an Islamic state. Teachers and professors might sympathize with the Brothers, yet they remained in the employ of the state. Little support came from working classes or peasants. Indeed, these groups, which represented the majority of Syrians, had benefited from Baathist social policy and were also often controlled via trade unions or the Peasant Union, both of which were allied to the Baath party.[103]

If one charts political conflict on socioeconomic lines, it is possible to say of modern-day Syria that the Baath party represents a secular state with rural constituents opposing an urban mercantile class professing Sunni orthodoxy. Framed in this perspective, Islamic fundamentalism stands out in Syria for what it is everywhere: an ideology of protest that represents the interests of specific socioeconomic groups yet claims to project all of Islam under the banner of those interests. It is not often that the conflict reaches the battle proportions that it did in Hama in 1982, but when it does, the outcome is clear: the Syrian state, with its powerful economic and technological base, its professional army and security forces, can suppress any rebellion. The rebellion is labeled sedition, the rebels traitors. The state wins militarily but it also wins psychologically, for many afterward are led to applaud the rational nature of the state's response to terrorism. "The state is said to be (by its custodians, by its many, many spokesmen) the only dike against great upheaval and disorder."[104] Was it possible that many Syrians in the aftermath of Hama thought to themselves: "Better one month of Hama than fourteen years of Lebanon"?[105] If so, the chief legacy of French colonial rule in the Levant would seem to be a predisposition to accept the worst excesses of authoritarian government rather than to opt for change. Was French colonial rule therefore more destructive of indigenous resilience than its British counterpart? Not perceptibly, for comparison of Syria with its Arab neighbors does not reveal a qualitative difference. Authoritarianism and popular complicity or cooptation seem to be the rule.

Even were Hafiz al-Asad to be replaced as leader of Syria by the end of the current century, the new ruler would be, at best, an "enlightened" despot, one who invokes Islam but, like Asad, stops far short of implementing an Islamic state. After all, that state would have to straddle Shi<i and Sunni sensibilities, since the Alawites are much closer to Iranian than Saudi notions of Islamic observance. What modern Syrian history seems to favor is the continuation of a secularist polity that genuflects toward Qom as much as Mecca, favoring Shi<i piety around its own monument to martyrdom at Sidi Zaynab, outside Damascus, as well as commercial and political ties with Tehran.

* Tunisia

Principal dates and rulers:

| 1881 | French Protectorate |

| 1956 | Independence |

| 1956–87 | Habib Bourguiba |

| 1987- | Zayn al-'Abidin Ben 'Ali |

| 1990 | An-Nahda party, also known as Le Mouvement de tendace islamique, outlawed, and its leader, Rachid al-Ghannouchi, sent into exile |

Tunisia, at first glance, may seem like an unlikely candidate to include in a survey of the engagement with Muslim protest movements known as Islamic fundamentalism. It is a small North African country of seven million people, wedged between two magnets of revolutionary fervor, Algeria and Libya. If one wanted to chart the aftermath of French colonial rule and the agency of indigenous Muslim activists, one might expect to profit more from a study of Islamic fundamentalism in Algeria or even distant Morocco than Tunisia.

Tunisia, however, offers some unique characteristics that highlight the nature of Islamic fundamentalism in general. Like Syria, it was shaped by French colonial policy, above all in the educational sphere and in the development of the army. Like Syria, too, it has prospered not so much through its natural resources, which are meager, as through its ability to integrate into the commercial patterns of the larger Mediterranean world. The first of the North African French colonies to obtain independence (in 1956), it has been dominated for the past forty years by one party, the Destourian Socialist party, and shaped by one man, Habib Bourguiba, leader of the independence movement and president-for-life. At least Bourguiba was supposed to be president-for-life, but in 1987, though still alive, he was declared unfit to rule. Through a bloodless military coup he was deposed and replaced by the current president, a former securities force chief, Zayn al-‘Abidin Ben ‘Ali.

The major reason for studying Tunisia goes beyond its French connection and authoritarian politics. It has to do with the expressiveness of its ideologues: along with the fundamentalist movements in Pakistan and Egypt, the Tunisian opposition ranks as among the most articulate in the entire Muslim world.[106] It has played only a marginal role in the history of modern Tunisia, yet it has eloquently voiced both its laments and its hopes. Faced with intractable opposition, and against impossible odds, Tunisian fundamentalists throw into bold relief the dilemma of other postcolonial Muslim societies: the struggle to forge a new identity against forces identified with the colonial period and yet the desire to recuperate agency as Muslims allied with economic as well as political progress.

Tunisia resembles Syria in more than its Francophone legacy. Politically it too has the power of the central government vested in one city, the capital city. From Tunis and through Tunis all the mechanisms of the modern nation-state are channeled. Bourguiba, like Asad, defined the state in his image, though Bourguiba even more than Asad might be portrayed as a rank secularist. Bourguiba was a product of the bilingual education system that the French had introduced in order to bridge the modern and traditional cultures of Tunisia. After completing his education in France, he became a lawyer active in the nationalist movement. Immediately after World War II, he was challenged by an Islamic rival, Salah Ben Youssef. Ben Youssef based himself at the most prominent mosque, the Zaytuna, in Tunis and drew support for his cause from other Muslim countries. While Bourguiba stressed themes of progress and development, building indigenous power through trade unions and maintaining external leverage through ties with the French, Ben Youssef appealed to traditional merchant and landowner interests, accenting Arab-Islamic solidarity rather than Tunisian national identity.

Ben Youssef’s challenge faded because nationalism, not Pan-Islamism, was on the ascendant in the late 1950s and 1960s. Bourguiba became president and almost immediately sponsored a Code of Personal Conduct. It was made the law of the land in August 1956. It outflanked while also delegitimating Muslim law (the shari’A). Most important were its provisions in the realm of family law. Polygamy was abolished, judicial divorce granted to women, a minimum age fixed for marriage, and mutual consent of both bride and bridegroom required. Women also were given the right to vote and to hold political office. Education was made free for both men and women, at the same time that women were to be given equal pay for equal work, as well as an equal chance to be hired.[107]

The challenge of the Code of Personal Status was followed by the abolition of the shari’A courts. At the same time, charitable endowments (the habus) were incorporated within the state bureaucracy. The Islamic educational system also became redefined as an extension of the Tunis government. Religion followed suit, as the state gave Zaytuna mosque in Tunis, together with all other mosques, maintenance allowances, at the same time that it directly subsidized preachers’ salaries.

Whatever hope religious leaders may have had for intellectual or institutional independence from the Bourguiba regime was removed by still another provision: all those who sought government employment were required to be bilingual. “As a consequence of these reforms, that fraction of the political elite whose symbolic capital was based on knowledge of Arabic and Islam and on the control of Islamic institutions was dispossessed of political power and social mobility.”[108]

To complete his credentials as a thoroughgoing secularist, Bourguiba proposed an unprecedented change in February 1960: he attempted to eliminate one of the defining pillars of Islamic ritual observance, the Ramadan fast. Anyone who has traveled in the Muslim world or lived in a Muslim country must be sensitive to the tenacity of the Ramadan fast. It requires all observant Muslims who have reached young adulthood to abstain from food, drink, and sexual liaison during the period from dawn to dusk for twenty-eight days.

How, then, could Bourguiba expect his fellow Tunisians to welcome his proposal to end the Ramadan fast? Because, he argued, such fasting impeded national development, and what was needed in Tunisia was to break the back of underdevelopment. Nothing less than a holy war or jihad against underdevelopment was required if Tunisia expected to enter the competitive ranks of its industrialized Mediterranean neighbors. It was not merely to get ahead but to survive that Tunisians needed to increase their productivity. And so, in the name of a higher principle, the survival of an Islamic society, Bourguiba called for the renunciation of a lower principle, the prolonged fasting of Ramadan.[109]

However flawed the logic of his appeal, Bourguiba's declaration was consistent with a pattern of ambiguity that beguiled his enemies, even as it strengthened his own support. Bourguiba never renounced Islam; he merely claimed that his own interpretation of its tenets superseded that of the traditional classes. He even sought and obtained the approval of religious functionaries for his 1956 Code of Personal Conduct. No urban revolts or assassination attempts followed its implementation. And in the 1959 constitution Bourguiba did what Asad later did: he proclaimed Islam to be the state religion and required that the president of the republic be a Muslim. At no time during his more than thirty-year rule did Bourguiba, his ministers, or his party reject the Islamic focus of Tunisian identity. They never became explicit secularists in the tradition of Kemal Mustafa Ataturk, the founder and icon of modern-day Turkey.

Even when he hit a trip wire, Bourguiba knew how to keep his balance. Unlike the Code of Personal Conduct, the banning of the Ramadan fast did not win the approval of most <ulama. To be sure, some modernist Sheikhs did support Bourguiba, declaring, "As long as one conserves one's faith, religion can adapt."[110] Yet most religious leaders rebelled. Defying Bourguiba, they continued to urge the Ramadan fast, and in one instance, in the city of Kairouan, a mob of students attacked the governor's house. Eight deaths resulted. Other public reactions were sporadic and less violent. Even when some civil students and university students did eat in public to show their support of Bourguiba, they were ignored rather than attacked. Most Tunisians quietly persisted in keeping the fast of Ramadan, and Bourguiba turned his attention to other reforms: he restricted religious education to one hour per week in primary school, and he banned the wearing of the veil in any staterun system of education. Even without the effective ban of the Ramadan fast, he hoped that the effects of secular education would eventually produce the secular lifestyle and competitive national economy that he sought for Tunisia in the late twentieth century.

In the face of such a populist autocrat, a determined modernizer with widespread appeal, how could fundamentalists hope to effect any change? They did not pick the option of armed revolt, as in Syria, or assassination of public officials, as in Egypt and Syria. Nor did they attempt to foment large-scale civil unrest, as in Iran. The cyclical pattern of economic life in Tunisia did cause several explosive incidents in the late 1970s and early 1980s—the Black Thursday riots in Tunis in January 1978, the Gafsah revolt of January 1980, and the bread riots of January 1984—but none of these was either initiated or supported by fundamentalist groups. Unlike the Syrian case, where the socioeconomic basis for fundamentalist anger, dissent, and open revolt was evident, the leading religious activists of Tunis attempted to influence the populace at large through literary and cultural media. Several journals served to promulgate the views of an Islamic opposition to Bourguiba and his party. But the government seldom closed them down or arrested their editors. Instead, the Tunis bureaucrats selectively removed the most flagrant abuses to which the Islamists drew attention, while also stressing their own Islamic convictions and behavior. Only in December 1979 was a fundamentalist journal, Al-Ma<rifa, the official publication of the Mouvement de tendace islamique (MTI), banned, and then on the flimsiest of pretexts: because it dared to criticize the Saudi regime for its handling of an attack on the Meccan Grand Mosque (discussed below).

In the late 1980s, however, after the removal of Bourguiba from office, the Tunisian authorities became less tolerant of cultural protest. Bourguiba’s successor, Ben ‘Ali, supported a law disallowing any political group specifically affiliated with any race, creed, or religion (as had Syria and Egypt). Because the leading fundamentalist group, the MTI, headed by Rachid al-Ghannouchi, is called Le Mouvement de tendance islamique, it is now banned as a political party in Tunisia’s avowedly pluralist system, and al-Ghannouchi himself has been sent into exile.

Both the ban and the exile have outraged some of the marginalized intellectual and social groups in Tunis. It may yet undermine the current regime, especially if economic conditions become more desperate once Tunisia's long-protected agricultural and textile export markets are opened, as they will be in 2007, according to a free-trade agreement signed with the European Union in 1995.

Yet the social sources for fundamentalist appeal in Tunisia are as limited as they were in Syria. The major bases for recruitment are the universities. Tunisia's population is continuing to grow at a rapid rate (2.1 percent annually), with over two-thirds of its nine million citizens under twenty-five years of age. Many of those who attend university come from salaried middle classes. Not only the parents but increasingly their children are coming to face what one observer has described as "a blocked future and downward mobility,"[111] even though female literacy and life expectancy continue to soar.[112] It is fundamentalists who benefit when despair over a secular future runs high among urban professionals. Not surprisingly, over 80 percent of the membership of MTI comes from this group, as do 75 percent of its leaders. The remaining 25 percent come from white-collar and blue-collar workers, either unemployed or underemployed.

The similarity of their profile to the Islamists studied in Egypt are striking. In both instances the majority of the members are under thirty. In geographical origins both are urban or of recent rural origin. A minor difference concerns parentage: while in Egypt two-thirds of the fathers were middle-level government employees, in Tunisia almost half of the fathers were urban or rural workers. The major difference seems to reflect the social fallout from the 1956 Code of Personal Conduct: while in Egypt none of the fundamentalists came from families that had been scarred by divorce or separation, in Tunisia almost a third did come from families that had been so scarred.

Despite the adverse economic circumstances that Tunisia has faced in the 1990s, with upwardly mobile young professionals being caught in a downward cycle of frustration, it is hard to foresee how fundamentalism can enjoy more than a short-term appeal. First, there is the organizational problem: not all the fundamentalist groups coalesce under one umbrella. Their world views differ, their objectives conflict, their membership compete, each with the other. One group tries to combine socialism with Islamic radicalism: labeling its major journal 15/21, it hopes to elide the fifteenth Islamic century with the imminent twenty-first century of Christian, now Western preference.

More significant is the cultural antipathy of the MTI leadership to all things European. Rachid al-Ghannouchi feels himself alienated from the nationalist movement, his rights deprived since independence: he, and many of his followers, were "educated as Muslims and Arabs, while we could see the country totally molded in the French cultural identity."[113] Like the Syrian Muslim Brethren in Hama, the MTI leadership have been set adrift by the modernizing forces of their new nation-state, but unlike them, MTI has not opted for violent confrontation.

Rachid al-Ghannouchi had but slight ties to groups of the urban poor and the regionally marginalized, even before his exile to London in the early 1990s. Predictions of the late 1980s that Tunisia was on the brink of disaster, and that the government's failure to recognize MTI as a political party would bring about an alliance between Islamic and secular forces, forging links between private citizens and the military that would eventually topple the Ben 'Ali government—such predictions now seem at best premature, at worst hopelessly naive.[114]

There are at least two further reasons why Tunisia seems more stable now than it did a decade ago. One, the option of military intervention, has not been seriously broached in modern Tunisian history. Civilian political institutions are stronger in Tunis than in any neighboring North African or Middle Eastern polity, even though security forces pose an omnipresent, stifling control on social mobility and political experimentation. Another is the anomaly of women's role in Tunisian fundamentalist protests. To the surprise of some, women have actively participated in MTI. Why would young, mostly educated Tunisian women support a group that advocates an Islamic state? The women themselves seem to feel that Islamist organizations "provide well-known male acquaintances and also, by their professed code, guarantee physical respect."[115] However, a fuller explanation seems to lie in the distance between the goals of Bourguiba's secular utopia and the reality of present-day Tunis. Women have been encouraged to succeed outside traditional, domestic roles. They have tried to emulate the independent-minded women of Europe, and some, such as the teacher/activist and film maker shown in figure 4, have succeeded.

[[b-b-bruce-b-lawrence-shattering-the-myth-islam-bey-3.png][Figure 2. (right) Two veiled women by the sea wall in Tunis.]]

[[b-b-bruce-b-lawrence-shattering-the-myth-islam-bey-2.jpg][Figure 3. (below) A swimsuit ad with veiled passer by in Tunis]]

[[b-b-bruce-b-lawrence-shattering-the-myth-islam-bey-4.jpg][Figure 4. A light moment between the award-winning director Moufida Tlafli (right) and Amel ben Aba, feminist, teacher, and advocate of women's rights (left).]]

[[b-b-bruce-b-lawrence-shattering-the-myth-islam-bey-5.jpg][Figure 5. A feminist perception of the new family code in Tunisia.]]

Yet, even after obtaining a university education, others have been denied the achievements they were taught to expect. Job discrimination and gender segregation persist, despite the longstanding Personal Status Code. Unable to work outside the home and urged by male contemporaries to remain in the home, many Tunisian women have retreated, reclaiming traditional roles while also participating in the Islamist movement.

But women's roles, like Tunisian society in general, are clearly in transition. It is important to stress that the experiment begun by Bourguiba is still young, and that it is still in limbo. Bourguiba himself gave the fundamentalists their best opening when he tried to have nine MTI members retried and hung for a crime of which they had been previously acquitted. The sympathy generated for the MTI from groups that usually did not support them alarmed other members of his party, and it was at this crucial moment, in 1987, that Ben Ali intervened to depose Bourguiba. Though Ben ‘Ali’s own policies have, in turn, been criticized, it is too early to say that he will not succeed in the art of ambiguity and compromise. It is, after all, a form of art that Tunisians have come to expect of their political leadership.

Above all, it is important to note that Tunisia remains “the only Arab country which has been governed by a mass-supported party, rather than by military dynastic rule, or by a group of notable families.”[116] Its Personal Status Code has also been in effect for thirty-five years; by prohibiting polygamy and attempting to make men and women equal in matters of divorce and inheritance, the Tunisian code exceeds even the secular legislation of Turkey. Indeed, “the code stands out as one of the most progressive pieces of legislation ever promulgated in any Islamic country.”[117] Further modified in 1993, it now provides still more explicit legal guarantees for women, especially in alimony and divorce.

The range of opportunities for Tunisian women is also reflected in their contrasting images, from traditional to modern dress: neither beach ads nor feminist cartoons are precluded from the cosmopolitan public space of modern Tunis. (See figs. 4 and 5.)

By such accomplishments, Tunisians have shown themselves to be both nimble and adaptable. Their stake in the twenty-first century, as the journal 15/21 suggests, may yet depend on adapting Islam to new global challenges, while at the same time maintaining their competitive edge in an increasingly technological and regionally unionized global economy. Civil society has continued to function even in the shell of a praetorian state, suggesting that the French colonial legacy in Tunisia may yet prove to be more positive than it has been in either Algeria or Syria.

* Saudi Arabia

Principal dates and rulers:

| 1902–32 | ‘Abd al-‘Aziz ibn Sa’ud contests other Arab chiefs for control of the Arabian peninsula |

| 1927 | Treaty of Jidda, by which the British recognize ‘Abd al-‘Aziz as King of Hijaz and Najd |

| 1932 | Kingdom of Saudi Arabia consolidated |

| 1933 | First oil concession to Aramco |

| 1953 | Death of King ‘Abd al-’Aziz |

| 1953–64 | King Sa’ud |

| 1964 | King Sa’ud deposed, goes into exile, replaced by King Faisal |

| 1975 | King Faisal assassinated |

| 1979 | Mecca mosque rebellion |

| 1975–82 | King Khalid |

| 1982- | King Fahd |

It is a frequent if simplistic argument that Saudi Arabia is the oldest fundamentalist state in the Muslim world. “Having established a state,” argues one writer, “the House of Saud has used Islam to legitimize its dynastic rule. Saudi Arabia is unique. It was created out of a series of Islamic campaigns in modern times, and its character as a fundamentalist polity has remained unchanged since its inception in 1932. It is thus the oldest politically independent Islamic fundamentalist state in the world.”[118]

Or is it? The argument for Saudi-style fundamentalism accords Islamic legitimacy to Saudi Arabia, even while ignoring evidence that the opposite conclusion is equally valid: Saudi Arabia has become a viable nation-state not by implementing Muslim norms but by using religion as a mask. In the name of Islam, the state introduces changes that would otherwise be unacceptable to a population little prepared and even less inclined to engage the modern world.

Saudi Arabia is neither old nor unique. It is a tribal theocracy of very recent origin. There was no unified political entity called Saudi Arabia until the major provinces of the Arabian peninsula had been conquered by a skilled Hijazi chieftain. That chieftain, the later King ‘Abd al-’Aziz, believed in the puritanical Wahhabi creed. Wahhabi was a name given to the small group that ‘Abd al-’Aziz legitimated by his bold military and diplomatic actions in the 1920s and 1930s. At first he employed religious zealots, the Ikhwan or Brothers (not to confused with the Muslim Brothers of Egypt and Syria), but by 1929 ‘Abd al-’Aziz had outgrown his need for, and his toleration of, his erstwhile Ikhwan supporters. Aided by British weaponry, he attacked and defeated them at Sabila and later that year killed several of their leaders who, after being captured by the British, were dutifully returned to him.

Even before he entered into the treaty with Aramco in 1932, the nimble ‘Abd al-< Aziz was using European assistance to help him dominate and outstrip his rivals on the peninsula. By the Treaty of Jiddah in 1927 he had recognized treaty borders of the sort laid down by the Great Powers after World War I. Though he claimed legitimacy for his kingdom by declaring the Qur’an as state constitution, few among the Qur’an’s lofty verses refer to political structures. Kingship is neither affirmed nor denied in the Qur’an, and so the only basis on which ‘Abd al-’Aziz and his successors can claim Qur’anic legitimacy is by alleging that the king is equal to all other believers. It is to maintain that scriptural facade, and also to perpetuate tribal custom, that ‘Abd al-’Aziz and his successors have held open consultations where subjects can approach and ask them about any matter of public concern. That practice, however, hardly fulfills the Qur’anic mandate (3:158) that the ruler, following the example of the Prophet Muhammad, should consult with those ruled about all matters of governance. There has never been a consultative assembly in Saudi Arabia, nor has any publicly elected body enjoyed the influence that the National Assembly did in neighboring Kuwait during the 1980s.

Saudi history pivots around two facts: (1) the holiest shrines of Islam exist in the western province of the Hijaz, and (2) one-quarter of all proven oil reserves exist underneath the sands of the eastern provinces. Every other significant dimension of Saudi life relates to one of those two “gifts.” Take them away, as if by a magical, whimsical sleight of hand, and Saudi Arabia would be as important in contemporary affairs as the hapless African nation of Chad.

The king of Saudi Arabia is a twentieth-century monarch. He continues a dynasty less than sixty years old. His religious title is “Protector of the Two Holy Places.” The two holy places he is committed to protect are transnational centers of Islamic ritual loyalty: the birthplace of the prophet Muhammad and his first home, Mecca; and the city where he established his first armed polity, Medina. King Fahd protects them, but not as a spiritual leader, for he can make no pronouncement that other Muslims accept as authoritative. Rather, he protects them as the head of a modern-day nation-state. His task is at once simple and impossible: to ensure the hegemony of one tribe, the al-Sa’ud, over an area larger than the United States east of the Mississippi River. Not all Saudis are either Sunnis or Wahhabis; a disaffected Shi<i populace inhabits the strategically significant eastern province of the kingdom. It is demography and economics that make King Fahd’s task manageable: a minute population enjoys stupendous wealth. The total population of native Saudis is less than five million, despite published statistics to the contrary, while the vast income generated by petroleum production and export continues to provide, even with the reduced power of OPEC since the mid-1980s, the basis for large-scale modernizing strategies.

While it is easy to say that “in Saudi Arabia the <ulama enjoy more power and prestige than in any other Sunni state” and even to claim that “they are the key element in bestowing legitimacy on the Saudi regime,”[119] their actual role is, in fact, ceremonial. No group of religious functionaries determines the dominant tone of the state, nor do they set its planning agenda. There are numerous other bureaucrats, many of them members of the royal family, most of them educated abroad, who advise the monarch on such matters.

The usefulness of the <ulama is chiefly exemplified by the one event that will live as the true expression of Saudi Arabian fundamentalism in the twentieth century. It was not initiated by the state but against it. Its leaders did not come from the House of al-Sa’ud or from then King Khalid’s theological advisers but from those who had lost hope in the religious credibility of both the king and his advisers. It is known as the Mecca Mosque incident, and it inspired tremors from Wall Street to Riyadh. It is noteworthy as a showcase demonstrating how tenuous can be any nation-state’s attempt to co-opt Islamic symbols and discourse.

The Muslim lunar calendar does not coincide with the common era solar calendar. The beginning of the fifteenth-century hijri occurred in November 1979, nearly ten months after the return of Khomeini in triumph from Paris to Tehran. The new century was inaugurated by a revolt against the Saudi monarchy that took place in the heartland of Arabia in the precinct of its holiest mosque. The leader of the movement was a disaffected National Guardsman who had become a theological autodidact. In the province adjacent to the Hijaz, Juhayman ibn Sayf al-<Utayba preached against the corruption of the Saudi state. He had been inspired by one of the king’s theological advisers, Shaikh ‘Abd al-’Aziz ibn Baz, and when Juhayman had first provoked the Saudi authorities in 1978 he had been arrested along with nearly one hundred of his followers. But Shaikh ibn Baz had intervened, procuring his release. Security police monitored his actions thereafter, but not with great efficiency. For Juhayman managed to evade detection as he returned to his anti-Saudi declamations. Now he not only advocated but he also planned for the overthrow of the monarchy. And he found followers. Young theological students, disillusioned and disoriented by the rapid change that took place in the kingdom during the late 1970s, joined Juhayman’s movement.

Juhayman’s message was simple, but his motivation was complex. He believed that King ‘Abd al-’Aziz Ibn Sa’ud had gone astray from the shari’A in the 1920s: disavowing the Ikhwan, the king had become corrupted by collusion with Western forces. But Juhayman’s zeal had a personal as well as a theological motivation, since his grandfather had been among the Ikhwan killed by Ibn Sa’ud, with British assistance, in 1929. Preaching that the expected mahdi, a messianic figure for both Sunni and Shi<i Muslims, would usher in the new century, Juhayman proclaimed his own brother-in-law as the mahdi. The band of modern-day Ikhwan marched on the Great Mosque at Mecca and easily gained control of its sacred precinct. Juhayman then began to preach his message of messianic imminence to the surprised congregants, fully expecting that Allah would intervene and assist his small band to overcome the expected counterattack from unbelievers, that is, from troops loyal to the Saudi regime.

Juhayman's was a bold if suicidal move. His makeshift militia, which may have numbered several hundred, overwhelmed the thin Saudi security forces. Not only did they capture the ritual center of the Islamic world, but they effectively controlled it for exactly two weeks. The authorities, embarrassed, did not try to dislodge them immediately. Instead, they first obtained a fatwa, or legal decree, from the <ulama. Wards of the state, the <ulama readily complied, providing written religious sanction to crush the revolt. The false mahdi and numerous others were killed in the ensuing engagement, but Juhayman was captured alive. He, along with sixty-two others deemed to be the ringleaders, were quickly tried and publicly hanged. The Saudi authorities blamed the whole incident on outside interference. International oil companies, after briefly suffering heart arrest, calmed down by the early 1980s. They were assured by their Saudi counterparts that such an eruption would never, never occur again. The Mecca incident remained just that— an untidy domestic episode. Once the main rebels had been subdued, tried, and executed, no one within Saudi Arabia attempted to address the challenge that Juhayman had briefly raised: had the House of Sa'ud gone too far in its implicit accommodation to secular values?

Yet an astute observer of Saudi national life has raised just this question, though in slightly different language: "Precisely because the Sauds claim to be so Islamic," writes James Piscatori, "the decisive field of action may yet be that of ideology—not in the sense of whether Islam is compatible with the modern age, but in the sense of whether the Sauds are seen to be faithful to it."[120]

The greatest irony of the Saudi experiment in Islamic statecraft may be that the regime, from 'Abd al-'Aziz to Fahd, played the fundamentalist game without being fundamentalists. "How long can a society succeed when its professed symbols war with its realities?" That is a question that as yet no one is willing to answer, nor do the Saudis themselves want it to be asked, yet it may contain the distinctive, if unintended, Saudi contribution to the history of Islamic fundamentalism and its manifest contradictions.[121]

Nowhere are these contradictions more evident than in the way that the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia projects its image abroad: (1) through foreign policy initatives that have fear, mixed with hatred, of Iran at their core, and (2) through international groups that claim true Islam to be Wahhabi puritanism, with every rival version of Islamic belief and practice outlawed as heretical, Western-inspired, and blasphemous. Whether due to systemic weakness or creative marginality, Saudi efforts to influence others can produce confusing signals, as they did recently in Afghanistan. When the Taliban were resisting the government in Kabul before seizing power, as they did in mid-1996, they were described in some media reports as “Wahhabis,” and yet a journal supported by Saudi sympathizers criticized this very label as itself evidence of a plot by “the Western press, Radio Kabul, Sufi Marabouts, the Voice of America and Radio Free Iran”![122]

What needs to be constantly born in mind is that the Saudi-Iranian rivalry is seldom raised to the explicit level, either in policy or in journalistic circles. It has been kept discreetly parked to one side of media attention because of United States foreign policy. Since 1979 American officialdom, with few exceptions, has remained fixated with the superseding danger of Iran to all American interests in the Gulf region. It is for that reason that a closer reading and more nuanced understanding of Iran occupies the next chapter of this book.

* Iran

Major events and rulers since the outbreak of World War II:

| 1941–46 | Iran occupied by Allied forces |

| 1941–79 | Muhammad Reza reigns as shah |

| Mar. 1951 | Iranian oil nationalized; Musaddiq named prime minister |

| Aug. 1953 | Musaddiq overthrown by CIA plot |

| Jan. 1963 | The shah inaugurates the White revolution |

| June 1963 | Khomeini’s arrest sparks antigovernment demonstrations |

| Nov. 1964 | Khomeini exiled, first to Turkey, then to Iraq, and finally (1978) to Paris |

| Jan.-Feb. 1979 | The shah departs Iran; Khomeini returns |

| Dec. 1979 | The Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Iran is ratified by popular referendum |

| 1980–88 | The Iran-Iraq war |

| Feb. 1989 | The Salman Rushdie affair erupts when Khomeini issues a fatwa against the author of The Satanic Verses |

| June 1989 | Khomeini dies; Khamenei is elected his successor, with Rafsanjani becoming president of the Islamic Republic of Iran |

| May 1997 | Mohammed Khatami, a moderate cleric, is elected to succeed Rafsanjani as president |

While the above list may seem quite detailed, at least compared to the brief sidebar calendars provided for other Muslim polities, it is not. It represents what is commonly known about the Islamic Republic of Iran because Iran since Khomeini has engendered more fear, and more misunderstanding, than any modern-day Muslim government. For the same reason Iran merits closer scrutiny than any of the Arab or Asian Muslim nation-states: it is said to be the sole test case of a successful fundamentalist revolution. “Islam in Power: The Case of Iran” is how one writer depicted the last twelve years of Iranian history. Another, still more effusive, summarized the period as “Iran: Revolutionary Fundamentalism in Power.”[123]

Despite such pronouncements, a longer view of the Iranian experiment is required. Not only does the Islamic Republic of Iran remain a young political experiment, but it also has not established a collective profile that takes into account all the evidence of its most recent history. There are at least two distinct approaches to understanding Iran as an Islamic fundamentalist polity. They compete with each other. They do not offer a single, coherent view of recent Iranian history.

One proposes that Iran must be evaluated as the final outcome of several experiments in Islamic radicalism/fundamentalism that have marked the postcolonial era. According to this approach, radicalism/fundamentalism is “a purely modern, or contemporary, reaction to the emergence of revolutionary nationalism and secular norms of government.”[124] As the latest endeavor to rescue the political fortunes of Islam, it first rose in countries that attempted to implement a secular nationalist tradition but did not engage all sectors of their diverse societies. These would be Egypt, Syria, and Iraq. The North African countries of Algeria, Tunisia, and Libya were also radicalized in the 1960s and 1970s, but with less social disruption than Egypt, Syria, and Iraq, in part because their governments did not attempt radical agricultural reform. Still another group, consisting of Asian Muslim countries such as Indonesia, Pakistan, and Bangladesh, attempted to initiate policies of industrialization and modernization through existing patronage systems, with mixed results. In a fourth set of countries the ruling family remained as the primary nexus of the patronage network, thus precluding any wide-scale socioeconomic transformation. Saudi Arabia, Jordan, Morocco, Brunei, the United Arab Emirates, Kuwait, Oman, and Bahrain all fall into this category. Yet a fifth category ranks as the most un-Islamic group of all, since here Islam becomes “almost submerged in the interstices of national, sectarian, ethnic or religious differences within one single state.”[125] This patchwork amalgam of political-social authority applies to Malaysia, Afghanistan, occupied Palestine, Lebanon, the Sudan, and Nigeria.

While the above schematization of Muslim nation-states is rife with generalities that admit of too many exceptions, it does allow its author to suggest that prerevolutionary Iran combined elements of all five. Under the shah land reform had been applied but failed: ownership patterns changed little, while agricultural production stagnated. By attempting to industrialize wholesale in the White Revolution (launched in 1963), the shah alienated bazaari merchants and artisan guilds. He also did not produce a fully modern infrastructure, except perhaps in the two extensions of the state that mattered most to him: the armed forces and security services, both of which were organized, equipped, and maintained at a high level and at great cost.

Hence by the time Khomeini raised a challenge to the shah, much of the population had become disenchanted and alienated, poised for fundamental change.

In other words, in searching for an explanation of the Iranian revolution, one must look almost entirely to internal, socioeconomic factors. But the opposite approach is also possible: to locate the revolution's source above all with reference to external factors. While conceding that rapid economic growth was disruptive and that the self-interest of traditional social groups, especially the ulama and the bazaaris, was threatened, some scholars have seen the precipitating cause for the shah's fall and Khomeini's success in one major external development: the human rights policy of the Carter administration during 1977. It was Carter's accent on human rights as a major cornerstone of U.S. foreign policy, goes the argument, that produced two unexpected developments in Iran. First, the shah opted to curb his repressive tactics, at least temporarily. The outburst of criticism against him was thunderous. Critics, hearing other critics for the first time, were empowered to articulate their own grievances. Second, Khomeini was able to galvanize criticism of the shah into support for his own rule. Khomeini's insistence on drastic change was strident and uncompromising. It also was better articulated once he moved to Paris in winter 1978, for from Paris he had ease of access to Iran, especially through smuggled cassette tapes, that was denied him in both Iraq and Turkey, where he had previously resided in exile. Once the shah cracked down again on protestors, as he did in the winter and spring of 1978, it was too late: the sources opposing him, even though they did not know about his cancer, sensed his vulnerability, and in the figure of Khomeini as a charismatic debunker of the shah and the West, they had a symbol around whom to rally, a hope to propel them beyond the horror and bloodshed of mid-1978.[126]

The problem with both the internal and external explanations of revolutionary Iran is that neither addresses the Iranian context except in parochial terms. The first adds up all the problems that could be perceived in modern Muslim nation-states and then, having located them in Iran, concludes that Iran was ripe for revolution. The second lists all the possible approaches to explaining the revolution and then determines that one or two were precipitating, even though many others may have been contributory. What neither does is to approach head-on the problem of turning data into evidence. To determine which data can be used as evidence, one must construct an analytical framework that permits comparative, cross-cultural assessments. In the case of the Islamic Republic of Iran, no such assessment is possible unless one first devises a strategy that matches the rhetoric of Islamic Revolution with the reality of building an Islamic nation-state in the late twentieth century.

The very first step, therefore, must be to examine major categories rather than to accept them as self-evident, at once timeless in origin and univocal in meaning. All human language is derived, all is socially conditioned. To understand aggregate terms like Islam or revolution, one must specify in what ways and by what criteria they are to be invoked. Islam has already been shown to be as much a pliable symbol as a fixed system; Arab and Asian Muslim rulers use it at the same time that all contestants for power challenge their use of it. The situation is no different in Iran. What is different in Iran is the constant invocation of the term “revolution,” as though this is the revolution, that it is also, because its supporters say it is, an Islamic revolution. Both claims need to be examined more carefully.

Did 1978–79 produce an Islamic revolution? No and yes. No, because it was more than Islamic in its genesis, it was also a Third World revolution. Yes, because Islam became the label by which it was broadcast as a legitimate transfer of power, replacing a Shi<i-Iranian monarchy with an Iranian-Shi<i theocracy.

Both the no and the yes require explanation.

The events of 1978–79 may be termed a Third World revolution because they exhibit several of the features characteristic of the accelerated technological era after World War I. It was a local happening, yet it was precipitated by transregional factors, not the least being Iran’s economic marginalization in the 1940s and 1950s. Only oil production and its strategic location gave Iran some political leverage at the outset of the Cold War. In the 1960s and 1970s that situation changed. Increased oil prices opened up major opportunities, but mismanagement, greed, and paranoia prevented those opportunities from being realized. The White Revolution, launched in 1963 to make Iran rapidly modern and military powerful, failed. It created a crisis affecting numerous groups, not only the clerical elite. Dissatisfaction came to focus on the autocratic leader, but also on the external, colonizing forces linked to him.

A land of poets also intensifies the power of slogans: one Persian word has come to symbolize extreme dependency on foreign income, foreign military aid, foreign political adventurism, and foreign lifestyles. That word is gharbzadegi, “excess of the West,” or, as some would have it, “Westoxification.” Gharbzadegi was pinned on the shah as transmitter and perpetuator of the colonial past, which Iranians of nearly all classes so deeply resented. Though Iran was never directly colonized, Prime Minister Mossadegh was overthrown by CIA collusion in the early 1950s and then replaced by the shah, leaving the impression that Iran was not in control of its own destiny. And the wealth that came with oil production was suspect, benefiting only a small minority of Westernized, affluent Iranians. The dispossessed resented their lowly status, even when they had neither the means nor the hope of successful revolt.

Religion provided the vehicle of Third World protest in Iran. The years 1978–79 witnessed not only a Third World but also a religiously inspired revolt. A Shi<i Iranian monarchy became an Iranian-Shi<i theocracy. Most observers neglect to note how inextricable are the two, how thin the line between Shi<i Iranian and Iranian-Shi<i. There is no neat division of religion from national, or national from religious, in the consciousness of most Iranians. To oppose the enemy within there had to be a moral, specifically Shi<i criterion against which the enemy could be measured and found wanting. The shah was vilified not because the majority of Iranians were Shi<i rather than Sunni Muslims, nor because as Shi<i Muslims they had a deep distrust of, or outright aversion to, political power, especially when exercised by an absolute monarch. History disproves that essentialist reflex. The accommodation between shahs and their Iranian Shi<i subjects goes back to the early sixteenth century and the founding of the Safavi Empire, a vast, successful, bureaucratic, military patronage state. The crisscrossing of religious-political authority and the constant need of even the most powerful monarchs to claim religious legitimacy ensure that the shah could, and did, project himself as “God’s Shadow on Earth.” From the Safavi period, Iranian rulers had arrogated to themselves the multivalent title “God’s Shadow on Earth.” Even though some have remarked that “Mohammed Reza Shah seems to have given little more than ritually dutiful attention to this aspect of his role,”[127] he never disavowed it.

Yet, in the minds of his Iranian subjects, there lingered an implicit, unescapable question: is it possible for din and dunya (the demands of religion and the lures of worldliness) to be reconciled? How does the ruler resist the latter while promoting the former? Do the Shi<i clergy, as the repositories of Islamic teaching but even more as the custodians of hope for all Iranians, deem him to be sultan’Adil or sultan jabir—a just ruler or a despot? Until 1979 there was no Shi<i consensus either that monarchy was patently un-Islamic or that a cleric should rule in place of the shah. Rather, the hope for clergy and laity alike was that the shah—if not this shah, then another shah, whether from this dynasty or a successor dynasty—could be made accountable to the standards of justice, which also meant at least the appearance of rejecting, rather than promoting, colonial—which is to say, European or American— influence in Iran.

The events of 1978–79 therefore did produce a dramatic shift in the world view of Iranians. As such, they could be said to have augured a revolution, whether Third World or Iranian-Shi<i or both. Yet to Iranians, this revolution was not their first revolution. That distinction belongs to the Constitutional Revolution of 1905–1911, and in many ways that earlier revolution prefigured the events of 1978–79. It, too, was a revolution against the shah, though he was then a Qajar rather than a Pahlavi shah. It, too, was sparked by a protest against foreign (then British, now American) influence, involving tobacco rather than oil. It also had the support of a few influential Iranian clergy. However, the principal agenda for that revolution was strikingly different: its advocates insisted above all on the implementation of a uniquely Western democratic instrument, namely, a constitution. Hence it has been named the “Constitutional Revolution.”

As firm as is collective memory of the Constitutional Revolution, dim and dreaded is the memory of another Iranian revolution, the failed “White” Revolution heralded by the late shah in January 1963. As its name suggests, it was intended to be a revolution without violence, one that would modernize Iran’s economy (especially the agricultural sector) and also upgrade its military profile during the remainder of the twentieth century. The White Revolution failed, yet its deeper aspiration, to modernize Iran and make it a country benefiting from the global economic system, is one that drives the planning of many pragmatists in the current Islamic Republic of Iran.

Against this background, we must revisit the events of 1978–79. If we suppose that the ascent of Khomeini did augur an Islamic Revolution, to what extent was it more than a mere circulation of ruling elites under opposite ideological banners? Since most observers agree that both the Constitutional and the White Revolutions have failed, in what sense can one claim that the current, Islamic Revolution has succeeded?

It can only be said to have succeeded as a durable revolution if it embodies economic as well as political change; in other words, if it succeeds in doing what neither the Constitutional nor the White Revolution could do. It is an awesome challenge because, as indicated above, this revolution was not only Islamic but Third World, its power deriving from the marginalized disempowerment of those who protested the structures of late twentieth-century Iranian society. How could its leaders both transform their own society and alter the role of that society in the larger world community?

For many observers, it is more than an awesome challenge, it is an impossible goal. Class analysts especially are skeptical of Iranian claims. The sociologist Bryan Turner, looking at the critical transformations that have characterized Western societies, notes that in each case the presence of an autonomous, commercial middle class was required to make the transition from feudal/religious to industrial/secular culture. That class has been lacking in Middle Eastern societies, including Iran; its absence has produced the “No Revolutions” thesis that dominates much writing on the premodern and modern Middle East. Though it is an Orientalist argument, it has its Marxist counterpart, namely, that these societies, precisely because they have not undergone genuine “social” revolutions, have experienced mere political coup d’etats and palace revolutions. Ernest Gellner advances a similar claim in arguing that outside Western Europe and North America no other societies could forge liberal democratic states driven by capitalist, scientifically oriented economies. Islamic Iran becomes the crucial test case proving the incompatibility of Islam and modernity, at least insofar as modernity can be defined as coeval openness to pluralist structures and technological advance.[128]

Yet the clerics who came to power in Tehran in 1978–79 are not so easily pigeonholed. Their ideology includes a platform for totally restructuring the economic, judiciary, and administrative instruments as well as the symbolic profile and political leadership of Iran. Have they succeeded? In any such evaluation two indices would seem to be crucial: the mode of political representation and the sources of income. At a formal level, neither has changed significantly since the Pahlavi period. The state has been called an Islamic Republic, yet it does not function as a democracy. There is a single party majlis (parliament), with courts, mosques, schools, and land law functioning under a hierarchically monitored state ideology as rigid as that which prevailed prior to 1978. The income that allows the new government to function domestically and to prosecute its foreign policy continues to derive from the export-oriented segment of the economy. Since the fall of the shah, oil revenues as a percentage of total foreign exchange revenues have actually increased; they now constitute 80 percent of Iran’s export earnings, while non-oil-related exports have continued to decline.[129]

New revolutionary institutions have been established, yet many of them shadow institutions remaining from the ancient regime, with only the personnel circulating. Particularly at the provincial level, where there is great disparity between the less and more developed provinces, almost the same procedures are followed today as were in place twelve years ago. The court system has not been reorganized. In the absence of an Islamic Retribution Bill (ratified in 1981 but not yet enacted), individual revolutionary courts and firing squads acting as neighborhood committees continue to operate. On the crucial issue of land reform, little has been done since the time of the shah.

Land reform is indeed the most evident single issue for gauging how difficult it is to implement a genuine social revolution in Iran. The 270-person majlis (an elected body) and the 12-member Council of Guardians (first appointed by Khomeini and now by Khamanei) have been in sharp disagreement with one another on just this point. The former has loudly advocated rapid socialization of the entire economy, including land. Social justice is its shibboleth. The latter has quietly held out for individual rights, retention of private property (with scriptural support from the Qur’an), and free trade (not restricting it to the Muslim bloc as the majlis has advocated). In effect, there is a continuing ideological contest between the majlis and the Council of Guardians. While he was alive, only the undisputed authority of the Imam (as Khomeini was affectionately and fearfully known) held together the Iranian government on these issues. But even some of his efforts at mediation failed: the 13-member council for determining the interests of the Islamic order, a body consisting of 6 members from the Council of Guardians, six from the majlis, and his own personal representative, which he first appointed in February 1988, still wavered on the implementation of land reform.[130]

Since Khomeini’s demise, a viable policy on social change remains paralyzed by the same forces that were at work during his lifetime. Rather than focusing on ideological claims that continue to stress how the Islamic Republic is an agent for social justice acting on behalf of the dispossessed, one must look closely at the class distinctions that stymie the Islamic Revolution and its present leadership. The first, crucial point to note is the absence of the cross-class conflict contributing to the formation of a fundamentalist opposition elsewhere, especially in Syria and Egypt. Though their ideology is cross-class—indeed, universalist—in scope, the members of the ruling elite in the Islamic Republic are predominantly middle class. Nor should one think of the ideological contests within the middle class as interclass political conflicts or rivalries. It is not different classes, but different factions within the middle class, that subscribe to different types of economic policy and development strategy. And they debate as members of the same social class, arguing, in effect, about how their class relates to those beneath them, that is, the vast majority of Iranians.

There are three middle-class groups that vie with one another for the mantle of leadership in post-Khomeini revolutionary Iran. There is a conservative faction. Supported by wealthy merchants, landlords, and some high-ranking ayatollahs, they reflect the dominant merchant-clergy alliance that is often credited with having authored the events of 1978–79. They oppose planning, state ownership, and public management of the economy. They advocate free enterprise and decentralization. They oppose both the land reform bill and any increase of direct taxes. They favor free trade with Western Europe and Japan as well as with Islamic countries. They prefer agricultural exports over oil exports.

Opposed to them is a radical faction. They consist of lower- to middle-ranking clergy, many religious intelligentsia, and most revolutionary organizations. Traditional middle and lower classes in the urban centers and rural areas also support this faction. They advocate public ownership and management of large enterprises. Supporters of agriculture, they want food products consumed at home but not exported. They are against both free trade and openness to international economic forces. They stress self-reliance and confrontation with the Great Powers. They deride the conservatives as proponents of “American Islam” because the latter allow for engagement with the Great Satan. They claim that their own is “the Islam of the Prophet Muhammad” or “the Islam of the Oppressed.”

Bridging the two groups is the centrist-pragmatist faction. While they are supported by the religious intelligentsia, the new middle class, and the technocrats, they also enjoy the confidence of most classes throughout Iran. They are classic fence-straddlers. They favor a market economy, but with controls. They uphold the need for socioeconomic and even further political reforms, but they equivocate on their implementation. They advocate free trade, but only within limits: they do not want Iran to be exposed to the risks of an open economy. They advocate peaceful coexistence with other Islamic nations and want to build an exemplary society rather than to export the Islamic Revolution, as the radicals propose. In 1989 they advocated a change in the constitution and succeeded in eliminating the premiership, transferring the functions of this office to a more powerful presidency.

Since the end of the Iran-Iraq War and even more since Khomeini’s death, this centrist-pragmatist group has determined the future course of events in Iran. They have not yet succeeded in transforming factionalism into full-scale participatory democracy. That remains a distant goal in the Islamic Republic of Iran, but even short of that ideal, if the three factions could succeed in cooperating to the extent that they ensure enough political stability and social security to cause a sustained upturn in the economy, they may institutionalize the Islamic Revolution. However, it will be a revolution with a small r, rather than a capital R, one that allows Iran to survive as a modern-day theocracy with a mixed socioeconomic policy. The problems of ethnic and religious minorities will persist, and while Muslim Kurds and Armenian Christians may fare moderately well, Muslim Afghans and Bahai sectarians will find a cool reception even were pragmatism to reign long after Rafsanjani's departure from the presidency. [131]

What challenges and preoccupies all branches of current Iranian political culture is an ideological high-wire act: how to take account of the modern world while not disallowing or reducing the Islamic difference. On this point, the adaptability and tenacity of Islamic thinkers in Iran can be traced from the modernist Shari'Ati[132] to the fundamentalist Motahhari to the pragmatist Rafsanjani. They stretch Islamic thought and its technical categories to include a range of data that is clearly engaged by the modern world, saturated even with philosophical or scientific reference, yet never loses its spiritual rootedness. While one could focus on Shari'Ati or Motahhari, Rafsanjani invites closer attention, if only because one seldom finds a politician with the multifaceted intellect that Rafsanjani clearly possesses. His homiletic style is revealed in Friday sermons as well as in political stump speeches. In one such sermon, he deftly defends the Islamic legal code while also implying that it can and should be adapted to changing times:

<quote>

The important point here is that the Islam which developed 1,400 years ago on the Arabian peninsula—in a settlement where the people were fundamentally nomads—was a legal code specific to that society. And even that code was promulgated slowly over a period of seven or eight years. Now the legal code, which was executed in those days for that particular nation, aspires to become the code for a world in which humanity has plunged the depths of the earth and mined resources thousands of meters below its surface, has competed in space to conquer Mars, has built formidable weapons of defense and offense from particles of atoms, and has conquered the sky, the earth and the mountains At this very moment millions of people are engaged in legal research to better human society. The Islam which was revealed some 1,400 years ago for the limited society of that time, now desires to become the fulcrum of [modern] social administration and [our] nation wants to use this fulcrum [as a weapon] to wage war on the entire imperialist world, testing its mettle by those means. Unique circumstances have arisen during the course of time. How can Islam [without adaptation] cover all these contingencies? [133]

</quote>

<quote>

</quote>

Despite the final appeal to “wage war on the entire imperialist world,” the tone of this speech is an impassioned plea for Islamic flexibility in the face of the scientific and technological advances that have shaped the modern world. It is hardly a radical or fundamentalist view of Islam, and the fact that it is made by the de facto ruler of the Islamic Republic of Iran suggests how far the first success of Islamic fundamentalism has come from the millenarian aspirations of its founding figure. If Khomeini had to swallow poison in order to accept a cease-fire with his nemesis, Saddam Hussein, he must have been jolted from his eternal sleep by the tone and the message of Rafsanjani’s speech.

What the message illustrates is the extent to which the continued memory of Khomeini, which extends to the construction of a marvelous tomb complex honoring him near the Graveyard of Martyrs on the outskirts of Tehran, may cloak other realities. If one were to observe the posters that continue to lionize Khomeini, or if one were to compare popular photos, such as those linking him iconically as well as thematically to both ‘Ali and Hussein, the exemplars of Shi’i Islam, it would be easy to assume that the Islamic Revolution persists, its ideals intact, since Khomeini’s demise in 1989.

[[b-b-bruce-b-lawrence-shattering-the-myth-islam-bey-6.jpg][Figure 6. ‘Ali, the major figure in Shi<i veneration.]]

[[b-b-bruce-b-lawrence-shattering-the-myth-islam-bey-7.jpg][Figure 7. Hussein, ‘Ali’s son and the major martyr of Shi<i veneration.]]

Yet the changes signaled in Rafsanjani’s speech are not limited to him. They are mirrored in numerous other currents of thought in post-1989 Iran. During the past eight years, there have mushroomed within cosmopolitan circles heated debates about the future course of Iranian society. For a time the press in Iran, unlike its Arab neighbors, became so free that “newspapers, magazines, scholarly journals and books provided a forum for the dissemination of ideas that only a few years ago would have been considered dissident thinking.” Intellectual populists, such as Hosain Azimi and Abdul Karim Sorush, until recently have been allowed to voice their views openly, even when they called for a reassessment of the role of religion in the Islamic Republic of Iran.[134]

[[b-b-bruce-b-lawrence-shattering-the-myth-islam-bey-8.jpg][Figure 8. Khomeini’s official portrait.

[[b-b-bruce-b-lawrence-shattering-the-myth-islam-bey-9.jpg][Figure 9. Khomeini’s tomb mosque.]]

The makers of revolutions and the builders of revolutionary nation-states may walk in the same shoes, but they do not always march to the same cadence. What was true for the Soviet Union from Lenin to Gorbachev is also now becoming true in the Islamic Republic of Iran, but within a much shorter time span. There is evidence of a broadly based rethinking of the goals of an Islamic society, one so pervasive that it has been labeled andisheh-ye digar, alternative thinking, which is to say, opposition to current policies framed by respected figures who accept the premise of a Shi<i state but not its current format. If a Second Republic is emerging within the chrysalis of the Islamic Republic of Iran, it will be more tolerant, of both internal dissent and external difference, than its predecessor. It will be neither an outlaw state nor a hostile civilization. Instead, it will project a development that students of late capitalism should welcome: while the world system may not be one, its parts do interconnect, and cultural distinctiveness can be maintained only if each nation-state fosters exchange with other nationstates who do not share or who may in part oppose one's own motto of authenticity. Fundamentalists, whether in Iran or in Egypt or any Muslim nation-state, will always hold out hope for a radically new world order, but in the meantime they must, and they will, live within the present order.

It is necessary, however, to look at the Iranian experiment with religious nationalism at a more profound level than has been the case up till now in most public policy and journalistic quarters, especially in the United States. The great difficulty, as indicated in the previous chapter, is the overwhelming support within the American political establishment for privileging Saudi interests. That translates into permitting Saudis greater access to American institutions and also into aiding pro-Saudi Muslim groups, such as the Islamic Students of North America (ISNA) and the World Muslim Council, the group that in spring 1997 protested the statue of Muhammad in the U.S. Supreme Court building. Many of these groups have no explicit Saudi connection yet are either funded by Saudis or remain sympathetic to them; the Iranians have no counterpart to these groups and operate mostly through cultural venues that tend to differ among themselves as to what is the most appropriate stance toward religiopolitical identity generally and the regime in Tehran in particular.[135]

The global political outlook for Iran may depend on a new generation of American pragmatists assessing what the long-term loss will be for U.S. interests if implacable, uncompromising hostility by Iran to the United States is matched by equally implacable, uncompromising demonization of Iran from the U.S. Department of State. Iran, far from being an immediate threat, poses the best venue for access to inner Asia through the Caspian Basin, itself "the most promising source of new energy in the 21st century."[136]

But the greatest resource of Iran may be its mobile, entrepreneurial people, many of whom are keenly aware of advantages in the global market. Urban Iranians speak better English, and also have more acquaintance with philosophical and technical issues of the high-tech era, than do their counterparts in other Middle Eastern countries, with the partial exception of Turkey and Egypt.

Yet few observers would doubt that the major hurdle to Iranian acceptance into a larger international commity may have less to do with Washington-London-Paris-Bonn policy makers than with internal disputes about culture. The present rulers of the Islamic Republic of Iran have maintained a definite stance on women's dress codes and also women's participation in the public sphere. The accent on women remains central to a Muslim difference in projecting global norms and values.

If the difference is persistent, it is also subtle. Not only Iranian Islamists but their counterparts in other Muslim countries are slow in coming to terms with gender differences that escape the too neat binary categorization common to dogmatic pronouncements. Women—their role, their status, their future—provide a key to understanding the social dilemmas of Islamism. They also permit one to see differences internal to Muslim countries. To the extent that some Muslim men not only control women but also direct the perceptions that others have of them, the production of the Woman Question must be addressed. In part 2 I shall try to clarify what has been the impact of male ideologues, and the patriarchal order that they proclaim, on their female coreligionists. At the same time, I will attempt to chart future options that empower Muslim women in what one observer has called, referring to late-twentieth-century Iran, a "post-Islamist society."[137]

* Part Two: Muslim Women and Islamic Fundamentalism

 Chapter 5. The Double Bind Revisited

A RECENT study of the multiple writings of Frantz Fanon made clear the importance of gender for Fanon's critique of both colonial and postcolonial Afro-Asian societies. It was Fanon's goal, never fully realized, that a new social order—at once more generous and more equal toward all its citizens—should emerge in the aftermath of colonial rule. Though far from consistent, Fanon seemed to grope toward a criterion for authentic humanism that would "take the condition of woman as a mark of the degree to which human beings in a determinate place and time have truly come into their own."[138]

By Fanon’s criterion, both fundamentalists and the praetorian, neocolonialist state have failed. Both conspire to keep Muslim women in a condition of marginality. Like other Asian and African women, most Muslim women still enjoy neither the educational nor professional opportunities available to their fathers and brothers, husbands and sons. And while much more information now exists about the variety of circumstances that characterize the lives of Muslim women, the information widens rather than reduces the sense of oppression they face. Some thought that the state would in time reduce the hold of religious tradition falsely arrayed against female Muslims, but in fact, as Hisham Sharabi has shown, the modern state has itself fallen sway to neopatriarchal norms.[139] Even when literacy is dramatically improved, as in the case of Iraq, the public role of women does not change significantly.

The largest single factor handicapping women in the Muslim world is the same that inhibits men: the underdevelopment of economic opportunities for their respective nations within the current “new world order.” It is not the sole factor, nor has its impact gone unchallenged, yet to begin to understand the range of options available to Muslim women, one must recognize what is not available to them: the bourgeois lifestyle that presupposes a public sphere of opportunity for both men and women with market access to resources for education and employment, communication and consumption. Such resources are not available to most Afro-Asian Muslims, either men or women, and while the frank acknowledgment of their absence may lead some to an economic determinist reading of the Muslim world, it may, and should, lead others to frame a realistic assessment of local options and future possibilities.

Since there is a limited middle class in most Muslim countries, economic inequalities still situate a few landed or mercantile rich above masses of urban and rural poor. The army remains one of the principal avenues to social and economic advancement, provided one also has the right tribal or sectarian markings to evoke trust from the ruling elite of one’s country. Educational restrictions are severe. Not only are there too few universities and too many applicants, but there is also the absence of high tech institutions of quality, with the result that the few who are rich (the 8 out of 100 who can qualify for credit cards) send their children abroad.

Alternatively, foreign nationals from abroad are hired to perform the functions that indigenous professionals do not know because they cannot learn them locally.

Gender asymmetry becomes reinforced by such structural limitations. While tradition may be invoked to deny women entrance into the public job market, it is in fact the prevalence of unemployed or underemployed men vying with one another for scarce jobs that ensures the continued exclusion or curtailment of Muslim women from employment in the industrial or modern sector of their respective countries.

The double bind becomes triple: being Muslim, being female, being economically marginal, would seem to exclude all but the most desparate options. Yet women's voices do register in protest against the present system. Literate women protest in writing; their illiterate sisters are spoken for by others. These are the voices to which we should be listening. Many tell a story of violence on several levels. Cognitive violence is to ignore, social violence is to reduce, the marginalized or feared group; these same women suffer a physical violence the pain of which cannot be glossed as "mere" cultural difference. Where there is resistance, challenge, and change, it needs to be highlighted, but first it must be located.

An example from Egypt illustrates the dimensions of the dilemma facing responsible scholarship on Muslim women. Few monographs have explored the ambiguous stance of veiled working women as well as Arlene MacLeod's, Accomodating Protest: Working Women, the New Veiling, and Change in Cairo.[140] MacLeod's Foucauldian study of middle-class women in Cairo reveals that the muhaggabat, or veiled women, resist through accommodation as well as protest. They do so by exhibiting that contradictory consciousness to which Gramsci drew attention: working in low-level government positions, they are responding to economic pressures that necessitate as many incomes as possible, at the same time that they are able to express Islamic loyalty through dress code. They do give religious meaning to the veil that they adopt, argues McLeod, but to the degree that their veiling remains instrumental—providing, as it does, the pretext for their being allowed by conservative relatives and friends to work—they will be alert to ways that they may oppose, rather than merely being preempted by, the increasingly Islamist tone of modern-day Cairo.

Unlike MacLeod’s nuanced analysis, the public story of Muslim female fundamentalism is most often told by charting the women’s groups that appear alongside men’s. The very telling of the story presumes (a) that female fundamentalists share the same social and political agenda of their male counterparts and (b) that women participate in defining the public agenda for protest. Neither presumption is correct. Female fundamentalists are, by definition, concerned with private rather than public issues: the home and not the headlines motivate them. For that very reason we will rarely see the diary of a female Muslim fundamentalist; whatever she thinks and feels and hopes for is best voiced by male fundamentalists.[141] Even when women do join in public gatherings, whether to sport rifles or to shout slogans, their presence, and one imagines also their performance, is choreographed by men. The myth of the independent, voluntary female fundamentalist has no factual basis. Men create a space for representative women, and these women are representative precisely because men select and direct them to the purposes that they, the men, favor. Fundamentalists insist that women by nature are weaker than men, mentally as well as physically, and yet since women are also possessed of the ability to distract men, the Islamist mandate is to create and maintain separate public spheres. As the French political theorist Olivier Roy has observed, the true taboo for fundamentalists is coeducation (ikhtilat): women’s track for learning must remain separate from men’s.[142]

In what follows I will try to soften the male fixation that characterizes most studies of Islamic fundamentalism. I will look not at the manipulated women counterparts to male fundamentalists, but at the role or roles that women seek in Muslim nation-states. I will also try to assess how those roles have changed in three representative Muslim nation-states: Iran, Egypt, and Pakistan.

The choice of these three as “representative” Muslim states reflects their frequent citation in all studies that claim to grapple with Islamic values. They also touch disparate geographic regions of the vast Muslim world. Iran is both Middle Eastern and Asian, Egypt is both Middle Eastern and African, while Pakistan is South Asian, reflecting the nexus between Central Asia and the Indian subcontinent. More important, all three have had to come to terms with the commercial expansion of Western Europe and the United States, and to a considerable extent they share structural features that handicap them vis-a-vis the existing transnational order shaped by global capitalism.

In pursuing the changing circumstance of Muslim women, one could pick other countries than Iran, Egypt, and Pakistan, yet the combined geographic diversity and socioeconomic commonality they represent will at least suggest insight into patterns that may apply elsewhere in that vast domain of Asia and Africa known as the Muslim world.

Why begin with Iran? Because it is in Iran that Islamic fundamentalism began. Iran determines the standard, which is to say the male-specific, depiction of Islamic fundamentalism. It also sets the standard for women. Not only did Iran signal the return of Islamic values as a dominant element of national identity in many Muslim societies, but the women of Iran, in particular, had a history of participation in that society prior to 1979 that was so extensive, and so well documented, that examining it allows us to understand the force—some would say the fury—of Islamic fundamentalism.

The Pahlavi regime had a specific policy toward women. Embracing Euro-American norms, it tried to impose them on twentieth-century Iranian women. Its major moments include:

1935–36 Women compelled not to wear the veil in public places

7 Jan. 1937 Marked as women’s day by Reza Shah

1938 First women admitted to Tehran University

1958 High Council of Women organized; later (1966) replaced by Women’s Organization of Iran (WOI), with branches in all major cities

Jan. 1963 Among the six points marking the reforms known as the White Revolution, one promises women’s suffrage

1967 Women accepted into the judiciary and also drafted into the police and army

1967 Family Protection Law passed, modified in 1975 to provide for mutual consent in divorce

Spanning the forty-four year period from 1935, when the veil was banned, till 1979, when the Islamic Republic of Iran came to power, these government-initiated changes produced results. Among them were the following:

<quote>

Women’s Organization of Iran expanded to a network of 400 branches and 118 centers, with 51 affiliated organizations. The centers provided vocational training, literacy classes, childcare, legal and professional counseling, as well as family planning.

</quote>

<quote>

The number of girls attending elementary and vocational training schools rose dramatically, increasing more than tenfold in the decade of the 1970s alone. By 1978, 33 percent of all university students were women, and many had begun to choose fields other than those marked as traditionally female occupations. For example, the number of women candidates for medical school in 1978 was higher than the number of men.

</quote>

<quote>

By 1979, 2 million Iranian women (out of a total female population of 20 million) had entered the labor force. Almost 200,000 were enrolled in academic and specialized fields; another 150,000 worked as civil servants, with over 1,500 serving as managers or directors. There were over 1,800 women university professors, and women worked in the army, in the police force, as judges, pilots, engineers—in every field except religious activities. Schools of theology were the only academic institutions closed to women.

</quote>

<quote>

Political space was also opened to Iranian women. Women were encouraged to run for public office. In 1978, of 1,660 candidates elected to local council, 33 were women. Twenty-two of the 270 member majlis were women. There was a woman cabinet member, ambassador, and governor. There were five women mayors.[143]

</quote>

As heady as were these achievements for Iranian women, they depended for their continuation on government support. There were no private-sector initiatives, nor did the private sector begin to acquire an institutional autonomy that allowed it to complement or compete with government initiatives. Consequently, when government support was withdrawn with the return of Khomeini and the coming to power of the Islamic Republic of Iran, the above markings of women's public prominence were erased. They were quickly replaced by rules favoring women's absence from, or invisibility within, the public sphere:

Feb. 1979 Family Protection Law suspended

March 1979 Women no longer appointed judges or allowed to hold decision-making posts; public veiling required; childcare centers closed; women barred from competing in internation sports

May 1979 Coeducation banned, with women also segregated in cafeterias and on buses

Dec. 1979 The first woman to have served as a cabinet minister under the shah (a medical doctor and teacher who had been education minister from 1968 to 1975) is brought to trial, condemned for spreading corruption on earth, and sentenced to die before a firing squad

March 1980 The First Islamic majlis is elected; there are 2 women among its 270 representatives

April 1980 Universities closed indefinitely

May-July Further steps are taken to implement compulsory 1981 veiling, e.g., unveiled women fired from government jobs

July 1981 The majlis ratified Bill of Retribution, especially harsh on women offenders

Yet a skeletal reiteration of legislative or juridical measures taken against women's participation in the public sphere does not tell the full story. The Shi<i clergy who dominate the Islamic Republic of Iran also extol those women who conform to their understanding of women's ideal roles in an ideal Islamic nation-state. Their viewpoint deserves scrutiny in its own terms, even when it rubs up against the dominant notion of who women are and what their public role ought to be.

A crucial issue is representation: representation within the clerical leadership and representation within the female population of Iran. Who speaks authoritatively for the norms established by the Islamic Republic? And to which women do those norms apply? Do they apply equally to urban and rural women, to elites and nonelites, to wealthy and poor? Such questions about female representation complicate the issue of women and fundamentalism, yet by specifying subgroups within a population too easily glossed and generalized under a single image, they allow us to nuance the future of women in an Islamic nation-state.

The authoritative spokesperson setting forth the fundamentalist view of women might be either Khomeini or Motahhari. Khomeini is the better-known figure, but Motahhari is the more consistent thinker. Khomeini's position is complicated by the seeming contradiction between some of his pronouncements, which seemed to hold out hope for women's public participation in the Islamic Republic, and his writings, which, along with the provisions of the 1979 Constitution, extolled women solely as childrearers and educators, i.e., as the denizens of domestic space.[144] Motahhari, on the other hand, has systematically delved into the question of women and women's social roles. He is no less controlling than Khomeini, but he is better grounded in his mode of argumentation. It is from his writings that we gain a unique perspective on the Iranian clerical view of women.[145]

It is a view defined by two considerations: (1) the requirements of marriage and (2) the challenge of the modern West and its social norms. So major is the West and its symbolic challenge that traditional marriage must be retained, at all costs. Motahhari is not content merely to restate what Islam does, nor how Muslims ought to behave. Instead, he frames his own views as counterarguments to the arguments of his opponents, those who advocate the heralded notions of freedom and equality. Both notions are boldly attacked in two sets of lectures, one addressing "The Rights of Women in Islam," the other, "Sexual Ethics in Islam and in the Western World." Though the second is much briefer than the first, it contains in summary form the central postulate of Motahhari's approach: women are primarily defined as sexual beings, for it is their sexuality that provides the criteria for their broader function as members of society. While disclaiming any essentialist notion of female sexuality, he dwells on what he terms "the basic need for humane conditioning of natural instincts and desires."[146] This conditioning applies both to men and to women, and yet it is women who bear the burden of responsibility for allaying male concerns. The male-privileging moves that punctuate “Sexual Ethics” become starkly evident when Motahhari lists the most frequent charges that he feels permissive Westerners raise (without justification, of course) against proponents of traditional mores. They are:

<quote>

male sense of possession of his female

</quote>

<quote>

male jealousy

</quote>

<quote>

male concern for establishing his paternity of a child

</quote>

<quote>

asceticism and monasticism based on the assumed sinfulness and wickedness of human sexual relations

</quote>

<quote>

female sense of impurity arising from her menstruating nature

</quote>

<quote>

male abstinence from sexual relations with a menstruating female

</quote>

<quote>

severe punishment at the hands of men undergone by women throughout recorded history

</quote>

<quote>

causing women to remain economically dependent on men[147]

</quote>

Apart from (4), which applies to both men and women, and (5), which is a female reflex, all the other charges concern male malevolence. It is men who marginalize and subordinate women, whether due to insecurity or to a drive to power. Motahhari never refutes these charges; he seems to presume that he has removed their stigma by itemizing them serially without comment.

Despite the ad hominem form of his reasoning, Motahhari's argument does exhibit a form of logic. The logic he pursues is the logic of internal falsification, refuting the West through the West. He adduces case after case of how traditional morality works and modern laissez-faire ethics fails. Ironically, Motahhari summons as witnesses on behalf of his position prominent Western thinkers like Bertrand Russell, Will Durant, and even William James.

The major weakness of Motahhari's position lies not so much in the form of his argument as in its unspoken, and therefore unexamined, premises. He views woman first of all as a sexual being, and so defines her from the outset within a world view that excludes the social roles that many modern women have come to take for granted: freedom of mobility, equality before the law, the right to higher education (whether in university or in technical schools), and opportunities for employment in business, medicine, law, or government, with the expectation of advancement in each up to the highest level or office. Motahhari never cites these options, nor does he acknowledge them as women's rights, for none of them pertains to the foundational notion of a woman's identity, her identity as sexual being.

Motahhari's views are not his alone. They are shared by other clerical members of the Islamic Republic of Iran, by other Iranian men and women, and by non-Iranian Muslims, even by some deemed to be "progressive." One such "progressive" Muslim, a modern-day Tunisian scholar, declared that "male supremacy is fundamental in Islam."[148] If he is right, then the only true Islamic society would have to be patriarchal. But is he right? Could it be that male supremacy is not fundamental to Islam? Might it not be rather due to the construction of Islam that has developed since the time of the Prophet Muhammad, a construction that is at variance not only with the Qur'an but also with the exemplar conduct of the Prophet's own life? As early as the 1920s, a Lebanese woman activist, Nazira Zayn al-Din, made just this assertion, arguing that it was religious scholars who had occluded the gender-inclusive message of the Qur'an and relegated women to a position inferior to men.[149] And as Barbara Stowasser, in a trenchant textual analysis of women and early Islam, writes: "The fault for unjust laws and practices such as women's inequality lies not with God's revelation but with the 'ulama's interpretation of it ... as well as with contrived or unauthentic variations of Prophetic Hadith."[150]

It is important to recognize that there is a contest about what constitutes true Islam, and that testimony from Qur'anic evidence often conflicts with later juridical decrees. It is equally important to note that women have been defined not only textually but also socially. Whether they are urban or rural matters as much as their class markings. Rural women are rarely reported, much less featured, in journalistic accounts of Muslim women. Rural women are also uneducated, often illiterate. Yet they represent the largest number of women in Iran, as also in Egypt and Pakistan.[151] Neither veiling nor polygamy characterizes their lives, and so the driving issues of both fundamentalist and feminist ideologues have little appeal since neither religious conformity nor social liberation is related to the day-to-day reality of life for these women. Arguments about women's rights vs. women's duties remain just that, arguments. They are arguments that presuppose a space for reflection denied to rural women whose social and economic value is measured by increments of survival.

Women of Deh Koh is a brilliant anthropological study of one group of rural Iranian women, a study undertaken since the establishment of the Islamic Republic of Iran. It provides several anecdotes that demonstrate how women cope. Especially gruesome is the story of a village woman's rape. This story demonstrates just how limited are a woman's options. Not only was the rapist not executed, it was the woman who was burdened by his crime; since she was no longer a virgin, her "best" hope was to have the rapist marry her. She resisted that conclusion, but fellow women villagers, in talking among themselves and with her, left no doubt that her only other option (and one that many women are driven to choose), was suicide.[152]

If women are everywhere vulnerable to men, in the countryside of Iran they are less prone to seek or support options for change than elsewhere. They live as economic dependents of their male relatives, but they also form emotional attachments to other women that preclude criticism. One of the most scathing indictments of the Islamic Republic's policy toward women also criticizes Iranian women for condoning their own lot. "The women themselves are to blame for ... women are not conscious of their rights and either try to justify the existing laws, or raise cries for our rights without any valid backing."[153] Yet this is an urban lament, since rural women must continue to think in terms of one right: survival.

Since 1979 women, along with men, have begun to move out of the villages in greater numbers. Many recent migrants to Tehran, whose population in 1997 has swollen to 13 million, have become part of a lumpenproletariat, or lower-middle-class urban population. Changing locale has also entailed a change in the visible expressions of Islamic loyalty. In crowded, often inadequate housing, women have embraced the austere black veil or chador and maghnae (a head, shoulder, and bodice covering that leaves the face and hands free) as a passport to public space. Since all urban women must wear this uniform, they become equally conformist in the public domain but also equally free of patriarchal control restricting them to the private domain, that is, their households.

Common dress code then allows to surface the true problem of women: their place in the workforce. On this question there has been, and will continue to be, debate at all levels of Iranian society. Until Khomeini's demise, most governmental positions, except teaching and women's health, had been closed to women professionals, but for the past six years "women have been able to study whatever they want and enter all jobs." One might scoff at such a statement except that it comes from the editor of Zanan (Women), a bimonthly magazine focusing on women's issues that began publication in 1991 and has not shied away from such controversial topics as divorce practices, the condition of women prisoners, stereotypes of women in textbooks, the image of women in Iranian cinema, and particularly alternative readings of Qur'anic passages concerning the status of women.[154]

Zanan is a publication by and for urban women—those who have had the benefit of education, employment, and access to public space. It is they who have protested against the Islamic Republic of Iran. They have written passionately and argued effectively against patriarchal norms. Many have also projected their views through publications that have appeared in English while they were exiled to England or North America.[155]

The comparative freedom that Iranian women enjoy reflects the resilience and determination of those who have lived through both the early years of the revolution and the eight-year-long war with Iraq. It also reflects the political courage of Rafsanjani, who in a characteristic interview noted the accomplishments as well as the limits of women in the public sphere:

<quote>

After the revolution, we invited people to encourage their daughters to play a more active role in society. And we encourage them very much to send their children to higher institutes of learning and research centers. Now, about 35% of our university students are women. And about 40% of school teachers are women. We do not have many women at the level of high management, but their number is increasing in the parliament and top management. We think that the status of women has been enhanced and that their future is even better in this 19

</quote>

<quote> country.[156]

</quote>

While not all clerics or parliamentarians share Rafsanjani’s “liberal” view of women’s role in society, there is little doubt that the situation of Iranian women is improving, partly as a result of their own efforts, but partly also with some help from engaged and supportive leaders. Iranian women are far from passive creatures confined to home and unable to participate in the public sphere; EuroAmerican media stereotypes die hard, but die they must if the reality of Iran is to be recognized.

 Egypt

What is true for women in Iran is also true in Egypt during the past quarter century: Islamic fundamentalism has played an increasing role in their lives.

There are at least three profiles that need to be considered. The first, and narrowest, profile focuses only on those female cadres allied with male fundamentalists. These are lower-middle- to middle-class women, often of rural background. There are few of them, and they do not speak for themselves because their self-described role does not permit their voices to be heard as individual testimonies. The second profile centers on those women who are negatively affected by fundamentalist-inspired laws, which reduce or exclude them from public space that during a prior period had seemed open to them. Also few in number, they are almost entirely second- or third-generation urban dwellers. By birth, education, and travel they have an awareness of the status of women in Europe and America, even when they criticize the excesses of “Western” feminists. The third profile is the one least often considered in discussion of fundamentalism: it is the great mass of rural women for whom the issues of fundamentalism and feminism alike are moot. As we saw in the Iranian case, it is foolish to speak of Muslim women as a single group since the social, economic, and educational profile of rural women brackets them from their urban sisters.

If we begin with urban women, it is because only in cities, and with the transformations that occur to women in Muslim cities, can the saga of Islamic fundamentalism be charted.

In the Egyptian case, as in the Iranian case, we begin with a provisional list of public events, but even as we do, we must recognize that the events of progress that they signal affect but a small number of Egyptian women, nearly all of them urban dwellers.

Egyptian Feminist Union (EFU) is founded; its journal, L’Egyptienne, is published in French. Its upper-class constituents, headed by Huda Shaarawi, advocate social reform.

First women admitted to Fuad I, later Cairo University Minimum marriage age for women raised to sixteen; marriage laws reformed; higher health standards advocated for rural women

Protective legislation passed for working-class women

Muslim Ladies’ Association (MLA) formed as an alternative to, but not a competitor with, EFU

EFU shifts its journal from French to Arabic language (becoming al-Misriya), but still denies even middleclass women educated abroad admission to its ranks

National Feminine Party (NFP) founded, limited to Cairo

League of University and Institutes' Young Women (LUIYW) founded. Its leader, Inji Aflatun, writes two major books: 80 Million Women with Us and We Egyptian Women, arguing that women's liberation is compatible with Islam

Daughters of the Nile Union (DNU) also founded in Cairo, but with branches throughout Egypt. DNU, along with NFP and LUIYW, advocates political rights, literacy, and hygiene for poor women

First family planning programs inaugurated

Article 40 guarantees citizens equality before the law, with "no discrimination made on the basis of race, sex, language, ideology, or belief."

By law women are guaranteed thirty seats in Parliament Personal Status Law passed. Canceled in early 1985;

most of its central provisions reinstated in a new law that went into effect in July 1985

Arab Women's Solidarity Association founded by Nawal el-Saadawi. At first denied permission to register by the government, it was finally allowed to register in 1985 but then was dissolved in 1990 along with its journal, Nun.

What the above list of dates and events omits is the level of interaction between fundamentalists and feminists that moved from initial cooperation to outright hostility. MLA was founded by Zaynab al-Ghazali, the leading female Islamist, as an alternative to EFU, but with the goal of furthering options for Egyptian women. However, in 1952, when Nasser and his fellow officers came to power, fundamentalists split from feminists and disavowed the latter's goal of harnessing all women to the development goals of the state. Nasser reacted by choking off fundamentalist women. He treated them less harshly than he did their male counterparts: though imprisoning Zaynab al-Ghazali in 1965, he executed her male role model, Sayyid Qutb, the following year. Sadat may be seen to have had a similarly punitive stance toward female fundamentalists: after Zaynab al-Ghazzali's release, another female Islamist, Safinaz Kazim, was incarcerated on three separate occasions —in 1973, 1975, and 1981.

Yet attention to the names and fates of a few fundamentalist women ignores an underlying class disjuncture. Both Zaynab al-Ghazali and Safinaz Kazim were upper-middle-class Cairene women of education and privilege; while distanced from the upper-class women of the EFU, in class background they very much resembled members of the MLA or the DNU. By contrast, fundamentalist women who joined Islamic alternative groups in the 1970s and 1980s tended to be middle- or even lower-middle class.[157] This cross-class mobilization of female Islamists invites attention. It matches the growing economic disjunctures of urban Egypt during the past two decades. Women as well as men have been confronted with mammoth shortfalls between their educational horizons and their occupational opportunities: each year 375,000 new people enter a workforce that already is swollen with 40 percent unemployment,[158] and so the new class lines tend to be drawn between those who are employed with any semblance of "honorable" subsistence and those who are not. Fundamentalism appeals to educated, underemployed women, as it does to their male counterparts.

Faced with such a massive, intractable economic crisis, Sadat and then Mubarak followed the policy of Nasser in manipulating both women's issues and fundamentalists toward their own Pharaonic objectives: to maintain the state as a refuge against chaos at all costs. The Constitution of 1971 is a showcase of juridical ambiguity, as Margot Badran has demonstrated in her path-breaking article on women and modern Egypt. While guaranteeing women equality before the law, it also declared: "The state guarantees a balance and accord between a woman's duties towards her family on the one hand and towards her work in society and her equality with man in the political, social and cultural spheres on the other without violating the law of the Islamic Shari'Ah."[159]

In effect, the fundamentalist viewpoint that women are to be maintained in the domestic sphere and excluded from the public sphere was supported by the tone, as well as by the last clause, of the declaration above. In other ways, too, Sadat undermined women in the workforce. His famous Open Door (infitah) policy, inaugurated in 1974, embraced foreign investment and encouraged the private sector, but it also rescinded the state's guarantee to employ all university graduates who could not otherwise find jobs. Since women had to compete with men for the few private-sector jobs available, the Open Door became a closed door for female university graduates. With every other Egyptian facing unemployment by the mid-1980s, the state positioned itself as the constrainer of woman's public roles, the advocate of her retreat into the home.

What Sadat took away through economic policies he seemed to restore by legislative decree. Through a double move in 1979 he opened up Parliament to greater female representation and also passed the most hotly contested legislation of his entire rule, the Personal Status Laws. The Personal Status Laws gave women the right to initiate divorce, protected them in divorce actions, and also placed controls on polygyny. All this in the same year that witnessed the ratification of the Camp David Accords with Israel and the ascent to power of the Ayatollah Khomeini in Iran!

Despite the uproar that greeted the Personal Status Laws, they did not change the subsurface reality of Egyptian social culture. In the early 1980s a flood of editions of popular religious tracts appeared from Egyptian publishing houses, at the same that the charismatic preacher Muhammad Mitwalli al-Sha<rawi rose to public prominence. Their message was the same: the happy woman is the woman in the home, an Egyptian woman who is at once obedient wife and nurturing mother. While the radical female fundamentalists like al-Ghazali and Kazim were kept at bay, the moderate fundamentalists were allowed to operate at will. They were even supported by the state under Mubarak. In 1988 Shaarawi, whose television popularity exceeds that of America's televangelists and who, unlike them, was granted free air time by the state, received a national decoration. In the same year a similar decoration was bestowed on a university professor of peasant origins,

Bint al-Shati, whose prolific writings were chiefly marked by their unflagging exaltation of women's domestic roles.[160]

There was a still deeper subsurface reality of Egyptian economic life that had not changed. While statistics are notoriously inaccurate, it is still likely that the majority of Egyptian women continue to be rural rather than urban, and among rural female workers, more than two-thirds are engaged in some kind of economic productivity outside the house, whether plowing in Lower Egypt or milking cows and tending to chickens in Upper Egypt. Such women are concerned with subsistence, with managing minimal resources. Illiterate themselves, to the extent that they think of educational opportunities for their children they "harbor a suspicion that an education which at the end of university [no longer even] guarantees a poorly paying job in the government bureaucracy may not always be worth the effort."[161]

And what does occupy them beyond subsistence is family relations and, above all, marriage. When one reads accounts of the lives of such women, it is neither the platitudes of fundamentalism nor the promises of feminism but the strategies for coping with arduous circumstances and limited options that loom large. These women are far from being passive or unresourceful. Though they and their families are visited by numerous and unending afflictions, they are never left without some appropriate action to take. They are "actively and energetically involved in manipulating their and others' lives, in responding to difficulties effectively, and in discovering solutions to problems that are realistic given the limits of what is available."[162] And yet when all the opportunities for change have been mapped out, neither a religious validation of hearth and home nor a shift to education and public employment is among them. It is only a tiny fraction of urban-dwelling Egyptian women who are affected by either the fundamentalist or the feminist option— or by a newly emergent trend toward "Islamic feminism."

 Pakistan

One reaches the same conclusions about Pakistan that one does about Egypt, though by a different historical route. The tabulation of public events prior to 1947 is difficult because it must take into account the multiple groups participating in colonial India, conjoining future Pakistanis with Muslims and Hindus who were as opposed to Partition as they were to British occupation. Indian Muslim women, for instance, were visible in the ranks of those supporting a Pan-Islamic coalition (the Khilafat movement) in 1917. They also helped to found the Muslim League, which was the prime advocacy group of an independent South Asian Muslim nation. Soon after Partition in August 1947, Muslim women became visible as Pakistani citizens. They began to organize at the national level. Among their achievements were the following:

1949 All Pakistan Women's Association (APWA) formed by the wife of Pakistan's first prime minister, Begum Liaqat Ali Khan

1956 APWA publishes a report recommending restrictions on talaq divorce and polygyny

1961 Moslem Family Laws Ordinance passed, raising the legal age for marriage from fourteen to sixteen for women, and eighteen to twenty-one for men

1973 New constitution promulgated, one of its provisions claiming to guarantee women's equality

1974 Married Women's Property Act and Dowry Prohibition Act passed

1979 Women's Division created at the federal level

1979 Hudood Ordinance passed, creating a special threat to lower-class women

1981 Women's Action Forum (WAF) formed, stressing feminist issues and attracting housewives, students, lawyers, and professional women

1982 A lay preacher, Dr. Israr Ahmad, calls for the complete seculsion of women as well as total enforcement of the veil, and a Federal Council appointed by General Zia al-Haq limits women’s participation in spectator sports

1983 Law of Evidence passed, limiting women’s testimony in court and also compensation due from murder of a relative

All these dates suggest again a tug-of-war between feminists and fundamentalists, with the fundamentalists in Pakistan enjoying explicit government support, at least until General Zia’s death in 1988. After its founding in 1981, the Women’s Action Forum (WAF) spread to all major urban centers of Pakistan, and with support of the older APWA, focused on advocating women’s rights, including education, marriage choice, family planning, even abortion. WAF members were loyal citizens of the state and also devout followers of Islam, inasmuch as their members participated regularly in Qur’an classes. These feminists, like their counterparts from Egypt, Iran, and elsewhere, were seeking to find scriptural justification for Islamic norms other than those sanctioned by a neopatriarchal religious class.

The WAF strategy did appeal to some moderate Muslim males, but it did not not succeed in convincing other conservative Muslims, both male and female. The state, which was tainted by its illegal usurpation of power, nonetheless countered the WAF challenge through its own backers, female as well as male Islamists. “The women’s wings of the fundamentalist Jamaat-e Islami and its student appendage, the Jamiat-e Tulaba, banded together with the newly formed Majlis-e Khawatin Pakistan to stymie WAF’s campaign against Zia’s Islamization policies.”[163] At the height of this ideological battle, in 1984, the founder of the APWA, Begum Lia-qat Ali Khan, challenged General Zia to a showdown. She was the leader of Pakistani women while he was the head of state. He was the instrument of religious fundamentalists, she the advocate of democratic processes and women’s rights.

The drama evident in this theater of confrontation masks a deep and disturbing reality. Pakistan is less able to nurture, to educate, and to employ its women citizens than either Egypt or Iran. Pakistan is predominantly agrarian, over 75 percent of its ninety-five million population living in forty-five thousand villages in four provinces. Most women live in such abject poverty that a report by the government-sponsored Commission on the Status of Women could report that “the average rural woman of Pakistan is born in near slavery, leads a life of drudgery and dies invariably in oblivion.”[164] Girls’ education is even scarcer than running water or electricity. While most boys go to elementary school, some to high school, and a few even to college, most females “typically have been trapped into a traditional treadmill as maintainers of simple one- or two-room dwellings, tenders of animals, and auxiliary farm workers.”[165] And, of course, they get married and produce children, an average of seven surviving children per family since only a small percentage of fertile couples practice family planning.

Yet even in the most desperate village, women continue to function, as they do in the most upper-class circles of Karachi social life, as vessels of honor. “For whatever her station in life, the Pakistani woman derives identity in the family circle as mother, wife, daughter, and sister. The stability and sanctity of family life, kinship ties and loyalties, the fabric of religious observance and custom—all these are maintained largely through women who are looked upon as preservers and upholders of social virtues.”[166]

In relation to the total population of Pakistan, both feminists and fundamentalists seemed to share certain benefits. They were far more privileged than the poorer, which are also the more populous, segments of Pakistani society. In Egypt, the feminist and the fundamentalist movements also drew support from urban women of privilege: regardless of class differentiation among upper, middle, and lower classes, they all benefited from their placement in the upper third of the Cairene social scale. For Pakistani women also, markers of class location are crucial. They mirror a pattern of social hierarchy that has been historically constructed and remains deeply embedded as the “obvious” norm of social exchange, above all in urban settings. Feminism, despite its rhetorical clamor, remains socially conservative, so socially conservative that the politican historian Ayesha Jalal depicts its functional stance as “the convenience of subservience.” She explains:

<quote>

In Pakistan, as in other parts of the world, the class origins of those who have formed the vanguard of the “feminist” movement have been the decisive factor in the articulation of women’s issues at the level of the state. Educated, urban, middle and upper class in the main, these women have toyed with notions of emancipation but carefully resisted challenging their prescribed roles in society. Such deference is merely the outward expression of a deeper and largely subjective consideration: the stability of the family unit and by implication of the social order itself. As beneficiaries of social accommodations worked out over long periods of history, middle and upper class women everywhere have a stake in preserving the existing structures of authority, and with them the convenience of a subservience that denies them equality in the public realm but also affords privileges not available to women lower down the rungs of the social hierarchy.[167]

</quote>

In the context of Pakistan, such conservatism, expressed as subservience to existing structures, means that the mere election of a woman to the highest political office does not assure that the fundamentalist cause has been stalled, the feminist advanced:

<quote>

On the face of it the election of Benazir Bhutto as prime minister ... might well suggest that the march of history has dramatically changed course. Yet even the most visible symbol of a woman successful in the public domain has been compelled to win social approbation with measured nods to the orthodox and fundamentalist galleries. [Hence Benazir Bhutto during her time in office did not repeal either the hated Hudood Ordinance or its sequel, the Law of Evidence.][168]

</quote>

While Pakistan provides a test case of how gender advocacy and class consciousness do not mesh, leaving poor urban and destitute rural women equally disempowered, the circumstances of women in Egypt and Iran are better only by degrees. The strategy for feminists has been to advocate advancement for their country, along with the improvement of opportunities for women. Hence Azar Tabari has declared that “any struggle must also fight against the overall political Islamic system that deprives women and men of the most elementary rights of choice and any kind of self-determination,”[169] while Nawal El-Saadawi has gone even further, asserting that “the complete and real liberation of women, whether in the Arab countries or the West or the Far East, can only become a fact when humanity does away with class society and exploitation for all time In other words, women can only become truly liberated under a socialist system where classes have been abolished.”[170] Hers is an appealing utopian vision: it evokes a global community at once transgendered and classless. Yet it must be tempered on three counts: (1) It conceals the class-embeddedness of the speaker, a medical doctor whose writings and travel place her among the most privileged of Egypt’s tiny urban elite. (2) It provides no middle ground for advocacy within the current global economic order, where classless society is not only a lofty ideal but also an unattainable option. Reallocating wealth is no easier for women than for men: how many advocates of a truly classless society would be prepared to endure the grinding poverty of El-Saadawi’s rural Egyptian sisters, or their counterparts in Iran and Pakistan? (3) It downplays the historical formation of contemporary Arab/Muslim society, which has been very uneven, leaving most societies with impoverished masses (Egypt and Algeria) or expatriate workers who amount to indentured servants (Saudi Arabia and the Gulf States). Not only capitalism but industrialization and corporatization have reinforced divisions among humankind within as well as between different societies. Socialism in the mid-1990s represents a spent force.

Pakistani women are, and will continue to be, deprived of the opportunity to work. Their irreversible deprivation underscores the global, international specter that daunts feminists and fundamentalists alike: “In the final analysis, the integration of women in the wage-labor force hangs on a solution to the Arab [read: Egyptian, Iranian, Pakistani] economic crisis. This in turn depends on the political will to achieve real national independence and regional self-reliance. If the past is anything to go by, little will be achieved in the foreseeable future.”[171]

Because feminists have neither the internal mechanisms nor the external supports to further their agenda, it will remain possible for others, especially fundamentalist others, female as well as male, to propound their solution to the no-win economic dilemma. As new generations crowd out the old, more and more young people will continue to migrate to cities. They will seek education and employment, only to meet with dissatisfaction and poverty. The most visible group to blame will be “the modernizers,” those who seem to have succeeded by defending the current order. A major group standing against the modernizers will be the Islamists or fundamentalists, those who articulate an indigenous set of codes, grounded in one reading of the Islamic past. The fundamentalists will claim to provide a safety-net against the disruptions and disappointments of emerging economic order. Since no such safety-net exists, the fraud of fundamentalism will become evident, at least to some. Yet the fundamentalist protest will persist. Even when its proponents do not succeed in gaining direct political power, they will have succeeded to the extent that they have made conformity to religious norms the litmus test of cultural authenticity. Even though a theocratic experiment is unlikely for either Egypt or Pakistan, elites in both countries will experience the impulse, from the government as well as from the opposition, to seek an Islamic solution to nagging problems. Women will be drawn into the fray from both sides, and their voices will merit close attention, etching sharply the contradictions that face Muslim society as a whole.

 Chapter 6. The Shah Bano Case

NOWHERE have the contradictions posed by an Islamist solution become more evident than in the case of a South Asian Muslim divorcee who sought support from her husband through the court system. To examine the case of Shah Bano is to call attention to the pivotal yet problematic role of one mode of governance, the judiciary, as it functions in the three major Muslim states of South Asia: India, Pakistan, and Bangladesh. I will argue two points that emerge when one looks at women as an independent category and the judiciary as a crucial dimension of governance. The first is that women are made to represent the cultural norms shared by men and women alike throughout Muslim South Asia. The second is that court cases involving women's legal rights not only reflect boundary markings between Muslim and other communities, they also heighten tensions about their maintenance, even as they complicate notions of what it is to be both Asian and Muslim in the late twentieth century of the common era.

Shah Bano was the daughter of a police constable.[172] At an early age she had been married to her first cousin, Muhammad Ahmad Khan. During more than forty years of marriage she had borne him five children. Then one day in 1975, according to her account, he evicted her from their home. At first he paid her a maintenance sum, as was required by Islamic law, but he ceased payment after some two and a half years. When she applied to the district court for redress, he divorced her. Uttering the formula disapproved by the Prophet but authorized by the Hanafi school of law, he declared: "I divorce you, I divorce you, I divorce you."[173]

At that point they were fully divorced, but, complying with a further provision of Islamic law, Muhammad Ahmad Khan repaid Shah Bano the dower of about three hundred dollars that he had set aside at the time of their marriage. Legally he had fulfilled all his responsibilities to her.

Shah Bano, however, was left impoverished. She had no means to support herself, having worked only as a housewife for over forty years in the domicile from which she was now debarred. She sued her former husband by going to the magistrate of a provincial court. The magistrate ruled that Muhammad Ahmad Khan, having violated the intent of Muslim Personal Law, was obliged to continue paying Shah Bano her maintenance. The court awarded her the sum of roughly two dollars a month. She appealed the amount of that award, and two years later, in 1980, the High Court of her state (Madhya Pradesh) awarded Shah Bano approximately twenty-three dollars a month.

It was at that point that Muhammad Ahmad Khan appealed the High Court's decision. A lawyer himself, he took the case to the Indian Supreme Court, arguing that he had fulfilled all the provisions of Muslim Personal Law and hence had no more financial obligations toward his former spouse.

The Shah Bano case dragged on for another five years. Without the financial support of “fairly well-off male family members (in this case, Shah Bano’s sons),”[174] she could not have pursued her appeal. Finally, in 1985, seven years after she had begun litigation in the lower courts, Shah Bano was vindicated: the Indian Supreme Court upheld the Madhya Pradesh High Court judgment, and her former husband had to comply with its verdict. The Supreme Court justices, in dismissing Muhammad Ahmad Khan’s appeal, cited the Criminal Procedure Code of 1973, one section of which referred to “the maintenance of wives, children and parents.”[175]

None of the above narrative makes Shah Bano exceptional. Neither her plight nor the length of her legal battles lacks precedents. Numerous are the studies of South Asian women that underscore the discrimination they continue to experience even after the attention drawn to Third World women during the International Women’s Decade (1975–1985).[176] It is no small irony that Shah Bano’s legal vindication came just as the International Women’s Decade was ending, but the favorable outcome of her case had more to do with a legislative act than with public advocacy of women’s rights: it was a change in the Code of Criminal Procedure (often abbreviated Cr.P.C.) enacted in 1973 that made possible the reconsideration of provisions for divorced Muslim women. Under this code, two Muslim women had been awarded maintenance—in 1979 and again in 1980—and it was their cases, though reviewed and modified in the Shah Bano judgment, that provided the precedent with reference to which the Supreme Court opted to rule in favor of Shah Bano.

The legal drama, and its political consequence, are dense. Often the case seems to remain only a watershed for identity politics in the continuing struggle for inclusive norms within postcolonial India. What needs to be stressed alternatively is the nature of the legal system that made all three cases possible. All three women resided neither in Bangladesh nor in Pakistan, the two majoritarian Muslim nations of the subcontinent, but in the Republic of India. As Indian citizens, they lived under an ad hoc system evolved since British colonial rule. It was a system that tended to separate criminal law from Muslim personal law. Throughout the nineteenth and the early twentieth centuries there was no uniform manner of applying Muslim family law within the lower courts. On the one hand, the number of rules applied to questions of marriage and inheritance were restricted, while on the other hand, they were enforced through a strict hierarchical structure where appeals moved haltingly from a subordinate district judge to a state high court to the London Privy Council, replaced after 1947 by the Indian Supreme Court.[177]

Due to the omissions and excesses of this system, it is not surprising that customary law, unfavorable to women, was often applied instead of the more favorable terms of Islamic law. Muslim women in the western and northern regions of India were especially vulnerable to facing the denial of property inheritance and dowry settlements, both provided to them under the shari’A or Islamic law. Finally, in 1937, under pressure from Muslim elites, the Shariat Law was passed. It required all Indian Muslims to be governed solely by Islamic juridical norms in family matters, namely, in marriage, divorce, maintenance, adoption, succession, and inheritance. But at independence ten years later, Parliament passed an All India Criminal Procedure Code that applied, as its title suggests, to all Indian citizens, whatever their religious affiliations; one of its provisions stipulated “the maintenance of wife, children and parents.” It was that provision which the Supreme Court justices cited in the 1979 and 1980 cases and again in 1985 when they ruled in favor of Shah Bano and against Muhammad Ahmad Khan.[178]

Personal law, in effect, acquired a double tracking, one pertaining to the Muslim community, the other to common Indian citizenship. While that double tracking created tension between secular and religious authorities after Independence, such tension was nonetheless successfully negotiated prior to 1985. Were the issue itself a sufficient provocation, then both the 1979 and the 1980 cases should have set off a nationwide row. In fact, they did not.

The case of Shah Bano became decisive for one reason: its timing. It did not occur in the mid-1970s, when Mrs. Gandhi’s declaration of a state of emergency had muzzled the court system, nor will it occur again in the mid-

1990s, for reasons that will be made clear below. It was the changed climate of religious identity in the mid-1980s that set the stage for the Shah Bano debacle. There were several necessary conditions, but the one sufficient condition was timing: it was in the mid-1980s, and only in the mid-1980s, that there surfaced an issue that signaled how permeable and volatile were the boundaries of Muslim identity. That issue was Muslim Personal Law, that is, law that applied to the personal status of each Muslim within the family domain. Personal law became the litmus test of Indian Muslim collective identity, its fragility underscored by the creation in 1972 of an All India Muslim Personal Law Board to maintain and defend its application.[179]

Even so, personal law by itself would not have created the Shah Bano debacle. The case came to public attention in the aftermath of Indira Gandhi's assassination at the hands of Sikh extremists. Riots in Delhi and elsewhere had shredded the myth of communal harmony in the Republic of India. Everyone had become more aware and more worried about his or her markings as a Hindu or a Muslim or a Sikh or a tribal. While Sikhs, not Muslims, had been the primary targets of the Delhi riots, Muslims still felt vulnerable.

It was in this charged atmosphere that demagogues sought pretexts to "prove" that the ruling party was but a front for furthering Hindu hegemony, at the expense of all minorities but especially the largest, which was the Muslim, minority. The Shah Bano case provided Muslim ideologues, supported and abetted by the All India Muslim Personal Law Board, with "clear" evidence that there was a juridical slide toward uniform civil codes, codes that would enforce majoritarian Hindu values on all Indians. Rajiv Gandhi's Congress-I was then the ruling party. When Congress-I supported the Supreme Court decision, an incensed Muslim politician ran against the Congress-I candidate (who also happened to be a Muslim). The demagogue won, lambasting the anti-Muslim impact of the Shah Bano judgment. How could Muslims preserve their separate identity, he argued, if even their personal laws were subject to arbitration in the higher, "secular" courts of India? The Muslim Personal Law Board, having won a victory at the regional level, ratcheted its claims to the next level. Its members pressed on the national front, appealing to legislators, ministers, and, of course, journalists. They were abetted by Muhammad Ahmad Khan, a barrister arguing his own case! Together the aggrieved former spouse and representatives of the Muslim Personal Law Board carried the banner of Muslim juridical autonomy to several members of Parliament, their every move broadcast by the press.

The role of the press in dramatizing the Shah Bano case has been considerable. In volume of print and decibels of emotion it exceeds all other tragedy-laced spectacles, even the storming of the Sikh golden temple in Amritsar, even the assassination of Mrs. Gandhi and later her son, Rajiv. It exceeds even the Rushdie affair, with which it has sometimes been linked, notably by Gayatri Spivak.[180] The Shah Bano case exceeds all these because it concerns a process that has tapped into communal fears, and drawn out appeals to communal loyalty, not witnessed since independence. Its only competitor for sustained media attention is the Ayodhya mandir/ Babri masjid dispute. That dispute erupted in 1986 as a politically motivated effort to reclaim all of India as “Hindu” by pinpointing, with scant historical evidence,[181] one pilgrimage site as the birthplace of the god Ram and then alleging that sixteenth-century Mughal invaders built a mosque on this same site in order to affirm their superiority over Hinduism.

Important though the Ayodhya dispute is, in a real sense it occupies adjacent space on the same spectrum of communally marked confrontation as Shah Bano. Ayodhya becomes the sequel to Shah Bano since it was the latter that pushed Muslim-Hindu antagonism to new levels. Unlike the local protagonists of previous communal riots, the India-wide Hindu protagonists of Ayodhya’s sacral purity used the media to stage a grievance identical to that of the Shah Bano case, namely, that Muslim and Hindu world views were finally incommensurate and that the Republic of India could not grant both equal representation.

In such a charged atmosphere the value of religious identity is heightened, and appeals to creedal shibboleths abound. The ideological weapon wielded on both sides quickly became identified as fundamentalism. It was fundamentalism Indian-style, but it was still the bugbear of fundamentalism. The challenge was thrown down by the demagogue who used Shah Bano as the rallying cry for his own election to Parliament in 1985. Syed Shahabuddin decried the Supreme Court decision as “clear” evidence of Hindu contempt for Muslim law. He opposed it not only for himself and for his Muslim constituents but also for all believing Muslims who, like himself, were fundamentalists. Fundamentalists? Yes, fundamentalists, because to be a true Muslim, in his view, was to bind oneself to the literal revelation of the Qur'an. "Historically," declared Syed Shahabaddin, "the Qur'an was revealed to the Prophet 1400 years ago but it is the final message of God to mankind. Not one syllable is subject to change It is in this sense that the Muslim is by definition a fundamentalist."[182]

There are, of course, enormous contradictions in this assertion, since the Qur'an itself is subject to variant interpretations within the believing community of Muslims. Despite the consensus shared by all Muslims that the Qur'an is the final message of God's final messenger, its rare legal passages engender multiple interpretations, arising as they do in a myriad of human circumstances. When Syed Shahabuddin and his followers appeal to Qur'anic finality, they are really staking out a claim for themselves as the sole valid interpreters of what they take to be the simple, singular meaning mandated by Qur'anic verses. Yet other, equally devout Muslims can challenge those claims and offer in their stead equally valid alternative readings of both the Holy Qur'an and Islamic history.

In a time of crisis, to those who perceive themselves at risk, a dispassionate view of the Qur'an may be less plausible than the unequivocal reading claimed by Syed Shahabuddin and other "fundamentalists." The mid-1980s were such a time of crisis for many Indians. India's Muslim "fundamentalists" challenged the Shah Bano ruling at a moment when the center seemed to be unraveling. Their appeal to Parliament to reverse the Shah Bano decree seemed implausible, and the uproar about Shah Bano would have quickly subsided had their appeal failed. But for a variety of political considerations both the Congress-I and Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi perceived themselves as vulnerable to "the Muslim vote." Out of expediency the Indian Parliament in 1986 passed a bill often referred to as the Muslim Women's Bill.[183] That bill withdrew the right of Muslim women to appeal for maintenance under the Criminal Procedure Code. In other words, after 1986 Shah Bano could have no successors, for the Muslim Women (Protection of Rights on Divorce) Bill, in fact, discriminated against Muslim women: it removed the right of any Muslim woman to juridical appeal for redress of the award made to her under Muslim Personal Law.

Damaging though that outcome may be to the invisible seam of multiculturalism without which Indian democracy cannot function, its most dire consequences may yet be muted by the logic of its initial success. Rather than closing debate on the Shah Bano case, the legislative reversal of the Supreme Court ruling raised new questions about who has the right to speak on behalf of the Muslim community. The Supreme Court judge who read the majority decision made his own claim to best understand Muslim interests when in concluding his argument for the court's ruling he justified it as "more in keeping with the Quran than the traditional interpretation by Muslims of the Shariat."[184] His move to separate the purity of Qur'anic principles from the obfuscation of Muslim jurists was followed by others, including a score of journalists. In an exchange that enlivened the Illustrated Weekly of India during early March 1986, a Hindu journalist, Arun Shouri, argued that "while there was much oppression of women under Islamic law, the Quran, rightly interpreted, would make possible the removal of the injustices they suffered." But, according to his respondent, the Islamic scholar Rafiq Zakaria, Shouri only seemed to be concerned about true Islam; his stated concern actually masked a contempt for Muslims and a not so subtle attempt to undermine Muslim religious identity. Nor did the debate disappear once the Muslim Women Bill became law: women's groups opposed the government's stand in favor of the bill, with the result that leading Muslims spoke out on both sides of the issue.[185] Seldom before had religious identity and gender parity been so publicly framed in antithetical, competing terms. No wonder that Shah Bano subsequently rejected the court verdict in her favor and occasioned still another round of debate about the meaning of her subjectivity as a Muslim woman.[186]

What is too easily ignored in the heat of the debate is the further limiting effect it has on the claims of Islamic fundamentalists. Islamic fundamentalism spurs competitors, also religious ideologues, also "fundamentalists."[187] The Islamist move is countered by the effort of Sikh and Hindu others to mark their community boundaries with shibboleths. Each shibboleth is said to echo an element of scriptural, linguistic, or ethnic purity. Collectively such shibboleths are upheld as fundamental dicta, that all insiders must defend, but which outsiders also must respect.

While the outcome of ideological warfare, with its frequent eruption into physical violence, is not clear, one thing has now become clear. Though seldom stressed, the status of women in fundamentalist discourse is crucial. Laws governing women have provided the touchstone for Islamist identity in the maelstrom of Indian politics. While much more could be said about how several groups have manipulated the Shah Bano case to their own perceived advantage,[188] that narrative obscures rather than illumines the significance of Shah Bano's gender. It is only when Shah Bano has been highlighted as a Muslim woman litigant in modern-day India that one can begin to assess how other Muslim women fare in the judicial systems of Bangladesh and Pakistan.

 Female Litigants in Pakistan and Bangladesh

There are no Shah Banos in the Pakistan of the 1950s and 1960s, nor in the Pakistan and Bangladesh of the 1970s, 1980s, and 1990s. Despite the attention directed to the implications of the Shah Bano case within India, no one has yet examined its implication for India's Muslim neighbors.[189] To ask why Shah Bano is a distinctly Indian test case is to make a comparative move across territorial borders by presuming that Islam as a variable can be tested in each postcolonial state. It is also a move that reveals the major divergences between the advocacy groups claiming allegiance to Islamic fundamentals as they strive to dominate the social and political life of the subcontinent in the 1990s.

One would like to believe, for instance, that there are no test cases of female appellants in Pakistani or Bangladeshi courts because as majoritarian Muslim nations, Pakistan and Bangladesh treat their women citizens fairly, providing them with the entitlements specified in the Qur'an and in Muslim law. Such is not the case. If one could measure, one would probably find as many infractions of Muslim fundamentals in the cases of divorcees or widows in Pakistan and Bangladesh as in India, and one would also probably find most of these infractions committed by devout Muslims who ignore the "clear" reading of the Qur'an, not so much because it is expedient to do so but because they feel themselves to be legally "protected" from its application to them. They are "protected" because Muslim law is continually being reinterpreted and adjudicated, making it impossible to chart a single, direct line of interpretation from seventh-century scripture to twentieth-century juridical norms. There is no “clear” reading of the Qur’an as law, just as there is not of the Bible or the Torah, or the Adi Granth or the Vedas. Scriptures are themselves symbol systems that allow for multiple, often conflicting, extrapolations of their legal mandates.

Yet there is more than juridical ambiguity that accounts for the absence of publicized cases involving women and personal law in both Pakistan and Bangladesh. One must also look to structural features that have determined, and so delimited, each country’s mode of governance. One must confront, in particular, the colonial legacy of Pakistan and Bangladesh. At the most general level their colonial legacy is the same as that of India. It can be traced to the calculated imposition of British administrative norms. The new norms were designed to meet the needs of competing interest groups, but they also impelled these same groups to continue to compete with one another. The final demarcations of territory in 1947 further ensured that groups defined and controlled as rivals would find no intrinsic basis for national cohesion after Independence.[190] Even if one demurs from the wag who quipped that “British rule in India began on 14 August 1947,”[191] one must acknowledge that the structures defining governance in Pakistan and India after 1947 diverged more and more from one another. Both nations, and later Bangladesh, had inherited the threefold division of governance into executive, legislative, and judicial branches. But the three branches did not function with equal authority in each polity. It is in examining differences between them that one can begin to understand the ideology of control that has been obsessed with women’s status since the mid-1980s, that is, since the advent of competing religious fundamentalisms.

The space created for Shah Bano to protest came out of the mixed legal system inherited from the Raj. On paper Bangladesh and Pakistan have a judicial system similar to India’s, one where criminal law parallels but also diverges from Muslim Personal Law. Yet only in India does one find an independent judiciary functioning as a third branch of government, at once separate from and unbridled by its legislative and executive branches. The Indian court system, despite many challenges, has maintained its autonomous role since 1947. It continues to be a single, integrated, hierarchical system, consisting of the Supreme Court of India at the top, high courts in the states, and lower courts in the district and local areas. The idea of the independence of the judiciary, introduced by the British, has struck deep roots in India. The Constitution guarantees security of tenure for judges ... and outlines an exhaustive procedure for dismissal on charges of incompetence or misconduct Given India’s diverse and contentious social groups,

<quote>

</quote>

<quote>

the judiciary overall has played an indispensable role in mediating social conflict. Not only the educated elites concentrated in the cities but also the poorer rural and urban sectors of the population have made frequent use of the courts, and Indians in general have gained the reputation of being a highly litigious people.[192]

</quote>

While opponents of the Shah Bano case have contested the Supreme Court’s ruling, they have had to go to great lengths to mitigate its effect. Despite the political debacle produced by the subsequent Muslim Women Bill, the very process that produced the Shah Bano case demands attention if we are to understand why no Shah Banos have litigated their grievances in either Pakistan or Bangladesh.

It is executive supremacy, rather than judicial autonomy, that characterizes the postindependence polities of Pakistan and, since 1971, Pakistan and Bangladesh. From its inception in 1947 Pakistan functioned as a Punjabi-based militocracy, where the influence of British-trained senior army officers determined the political culture of first Karachi and then Islamabad. Although Bengalis resisted West Pakistani disdain for their culture and waged a successful war of independence, with Indian assistance and at great cost, the asymmetry of governance that prevailed in Islamabad was transferred to bhaka. During the past two decades the military has dominated all levels of governance in Bangladesh. Sheikh Mujib, through the Awami party, guided his countrymen to independence and was twice elected to office with massive pluralities. Yet, because of his close ties with India, he lost the confidence of the army, for despite the fact that India had assisted Bangladesh to gain independence, the officer corps had inherited from their Pakistani counterparts a deep anti-Indian bias. In 1975 a group of young army officers invaded Mujib's Dhaka residence and another residence where some of his family lived, assassinating Mujib and nine of his closest relatives. They justified their mass murder in part because of Mujib's alleged subservience to India.[193] In 1981 Mujib's successor, Zia ar-Rahman, who had tried to form his own political party and to bring new groups into Dhakan public life, was also assassinated by the army. Zia's successor was an army general, Husain Ershad, who imposed martial law on Bangladesh and suppressed all rival political parties. When at last Ershad was forced to hold elections in 1988, the entire opposition boycotted the polls, producing a voter turnout of less than 3 percent! In such circumstances it was nonsensical to talk of a democratic polity: Bangladesh, even more than Pakistan, functioned as a one-party militocracy till the early 1990s. Though the Constitution of 1972, later modified in 1977 and 1988, provided for independent legislative, executive, and judicial branches of government, the legislature consisted of Ershad appointees, as did the court system at all levels, even after Begum Khaleda Zia, the widow of the general assassinated in 1981, became prime minister of Bangladesh in 1990.

While Begum Khaleda Zia is seen as an ineffective executive, her successor, Hasina Wazed, is not. Elected prime minister in June 1996, Hasina Wazed is one of the two surviving members of Sheikh Mujib's family. She promises to usher Bangladesh into a new era of internal justice and external respect. Yet the path beyond military domination remains perilous; it has been difficult even for Hasina Wazed to bring the still living murderers of her own family to trial. In late April 1997 she did succeed in beginning a process of litigation that, when it culminates in 1998, will perhaps demonstrate that at last, more than twenty-five years after its separation from Pakistan, Bangladesh is "finally becoming a nation under law."[194]

Despite the repressive, single-party regime that prevailed in Bangladesh till recently, women still enjoy some benefits. There is a tradition going back to Zia ar-Rahman of Bengali participation in the cause of Women in Development (WID). This program channels international aid to women's cooperatives in the poor rural areas that constitute most of Bangladesh. Since both Zia and Ershad found it expedient to mobilize at least some women into government-sponsored activities, it is not surprising that two women, though rivals of each other, have made it to the highest executive office, with first Begum Khaleda Zia and now Hasina Wazed serving as prime minister of their nation.

Personal law, however, has fared less well. Not till 1985 were family courts even set up. Though they were said to have been given “exclusive jurisdiction to deal with cases relating to parental and conjugal rights, thereby expediting their resolution,”[195] one may wonder how efficient these courts were. Changes at the executive level may accelerate the snail pace of litigation and appeal, but the legacy of martial law lingers, and as recently as 1987 “there were 29 Supreme Court judges dealing with 21,600 cases.”[196]

Throughout the 1980s the cases selected as well as the decisions rendered by the Bangladeshi judiciary were also subject to review by the executive. Since Ershad attempted to make Islam the defining badge of national identity, he did not tolerate a case that questioned personal law, even if the litigant based her plea on Qur’anic precedent. Women, most of them rural, poor, and illiterate, remain subordinate to norms that are un-Islamic because the state-sponsored version of Islam reflects surface expediency rather than scriptural zeal. What few rights Bangladeshi women have gained come from left-wing parties or grass-roots organizations; the anaemic judiciary has left them no other avenue of redress.

The legal situation of women in Pakistan reflects a postcolonial asymmetry that more nearly mirrors the condition of Bangladesh than India. Pakistan, like Bangladesh, is plagued by a history of military interventionism. What seems on paper to be a tripartite government of executive, legislative, and judiciary powers turns out to be a long executive arm enveloping and so curtailing both the legislature and the courts. The high profile of Pakistan in international politics has deflected attention from its structural deficiencies. Unlike Delhi, Islamabad did not develop a legislature that could be regularly elected from different regions and so represent plural constituencies at the center, nor did it sponsor a judiciary that could be freed of political pressure from the head of state. Again, the role of the army provides the principal narrative tracing political power in Pakistan's fifty year history. The first ten years of a lackluster experiment with parliamentary democracy ended in 1958 when a military coup by General Mohammad Ayub Khan took control of Islamabad. Ten years later Ayub Khan was, in turn, removed from power on charges of corruption and inefficiency, to be replaced by General Mohammad Yahya Khan. Yahya suffered both a military defeat by India and the territorial loss of East Pakistan in 1971. He was replaced by a popularly elected prime minister, Zulfikar Ali Bhutto, whose brand of Islamic socialism produced a 1973 Constitution for Pakistan. His insecurities, however, led him to rig elections in 1977, or at least that was the claim made by his adversaries. The uproar that followed the "disclosure" of rigging provided the cover for an ambitious general to invoke martial law and eventually declare himself president of Pakistan. Zia al-Haqq not only replaced Bhutto, he engineered the latter's execution through a mock trial on trumped up charges. The Lahore High Court as well as the Supreme Court were divided in their decisions to support the government's case against Bhutto, but in the end they both capitulated, and Bhutto was hanged in 1979. Zia proceeded to rule through a small junta consisting of senior generals close to him. His disdain for other branches of government was made evident by his cynical manipulation of elections to the National Assembly but even more by his assault on the courts.

Zia's opposition to the judiciary took two parallel and complementary forms. One was to subordinate the judiciary to the chief executive. This he did through the Provisional Constitutional Order of 1981. When the chief justice and four other justices of the Supreme Court, along with several high court judges, refused to accept this 1981 Order, Zia fired them and replaced them with his own appointees.[197] Still more subversive of judicial independence was Zia's move to impose military courts and Shari'At courts on the traditional court system. The former was to provide security, the latter to introduce Islamic orthodoxy into the fabric of Pakistani society. Both turned out to be extensions of Zia's power-sated personality, and the status of women, in particular, was problematized by the agency of the Shari'At courts.

The benchmark of Pakistan's effort to provide legal rights for all its citizens was the Family Law Ordinance of 1961. Introduced by Ayub Khan when he was attempting to extend the bases for his own limited claim to legitimacy, its provisions were hardly radical, yet they did curtail polygyny and also enhanced women's rights in the event of divorce. The bill also raised the legal age of marriage for both females (from fourteen to sixteen) and males (from eighteen to twenty-one).

For religious zealots and political conservatives, the Family Law Ordinance was wrong because it interfered in the private domain, which only Muslim law courts could regulate. Bureaucratic and ideological impediments limited enforcement of the ordinance, and it has functioned more as a symbolic point of attack by fundamentalists than as an instrument of large-scale social change. Its bearing on women's status since 1979 has been almost entirely overshadowed by the moves that Zia made to define criminal justice for women. Three ordinances shaped the tone of Zia's allegedly Islamic reforms: the Hudood Ordinance, the Qisas and Diyat Ordinance, and the proposed Law of Evidence. Each downgraded women to a juridical value roughly equivalent to half the value accorded men. It also exalted patriarchal norms to such a definitional cloud zone that adultery and rape became indistinguishable. [198] Not only were there no Shah Banos in Zia's Pakistani courts, but the equivalent case of a woman whose litigation drew nationwide attention was the victim of a double rape who was herself convicted of adultery and punished for her "crime." Under Zia's Hudood ordinance there was both zina (adultery) and zina bil-jabr (adultery by force, i.e., rape). But the latter crime had to be established by the same procedure as the former, that is, it required the testimony of four pious adult male witnesses. In the case of adultery, such testimony is hard to come by, but in the case of rape, it boggles the mind to think of four pious Muslim males witnessing the act without intervening on behalf of the intended victim!

These obvious contradictions in the Hudood ordinance did not concern the single-minded Zia, and their crowning mockery became evident in the Safia Bibi case. Safia, the daughter of a poor peasant, had been employed in the local landlord's house as a domestic servant. Virtually blind, she could only do minimal chores. She was eighteen years old. According to the statement she made to the police, she was raped first by the landlord's son and then by the landlord himself. As a result she became pregnant and gave birth to an illegitimate child who later died. It was after the death of the child that her father registered a case of rape. The sessions judge in a lower provincial court acquitted both the son and the father of the crime, claiming insufficient evidence to prove rape under the Hudood Ordinance. Had he stopped his judgment here, the case would scarcely have merited mention in the press, but he then went on to note that Safia Bibi's self-confessed pregnancy was evidence supporting a charge of adultery against her. Having ruled that she did in fact commit adultery, he then gave her what he later claimed to be a light sentence: on account of her young age and near blindness, he sentenced her only to public lashing (fifteen lashes), three years imprisonment, and a fine of Rs. 1,000. When his ruling became public in July 1983, there was an outburst of indignation from several quarters. Especially effective was the advocacy of Safia Bibi's case by the Women's Action Forum, calling attention to the illogic of a judge sentencing a rape victim for adultery on the basis of her own testimony![199]

So embarrassing was the Safia Bibi case to Zia's credibility that the Federal Shari'At Court intervened the following month (August 1983) and requested that the case be transferred to it for review.[200] Chief Justice Aftab Hussein overruled the session judge and, clearly distinguishing between rape and adultery, dismissed the case of Safia Bibi. He also added a note of sympathy for the victim.

The Safia Bibi case underscores what is evident about justice in Pakistan during the past two and a half decades. It depends on the shaky autonomy of an appointed court, the Federal Shari'At Court, to overrule misguided convictions in the lower courts, at the same time that other instruments of Pakistan's militocracy, notably the Islamic Ideology Council and the Qazi Courts, are indifferent to changes in women's status. Their indifference mirrors the indifference of most Pakistani women to their judicial status. There is renewed hope for some women litigants in the reemergence of the Supreme Court in Pakistan as a vigorous, independent voice during the late 1990s. Yet the litigations that take place continue to have a distinct class coloration. The majority of feminists argue within the urban, upper-middle-class professional ranks of the Punjab and Sind. They do not represent women from other provinces, nor do they represent the vast numbers of rural, illiterate women who account for the majority of Pakistan's female population.[201]

It is dangerous to make too much of the class bias in the feminist movement: [202] most sociopolitical protest movements in the Islamic world are limited to urban settings and to the multiple groups that are at once spawned and alienated by urban conditions. Yet its limited class basis should not obscure the fact that Pakistan, in Nikki Keddie's view, "has the most effective and militant women's movement of any Muslim country."[203] During the 1980s urban groups of professional women, joined by sympathetic male counterparts, did succeed in protesting against a system that masks authoritarian control through the creation of feeble alternatives to executive power.

The excesses of Zia thrived in the cracks: he attempted to reduce or to manipulate the other two branches of government, exploiting their intrinsic weakness to his own ends. Instead of vesting an independent judiciary with the right to pursue guidelines for Islamic justice, Zia sidestepped the existing courts. He supplanted them with courts that reflected his own one-person interpretation of what constituted Islamic orthodoxy. Ironically, the Federal Shari'At Court that was designed to project and enact Zia's views became independent of him in certain instances,[204] at the same time that the Supreme Court of Pakistan appealed to the constitution as the basis for its own noninterference in the process of Islamization, leaving that task to the executive branch.[205]

The shallowness of Zia's moves are further demonstrated by the inability of Islamic groups to win votes in nationwide elections: the people who do care about Islam are not convinced that state-sponsored fundamentalism represents the true intent of Islamic communitarian norms. Not only feminists and moderate professionals but also respected lawyers and judges are intent to remove the judicial process from the arbitrary dictates of a nonjurist ruler, whether Zia or one of his successors.

One must ask the tough structural question: can Pakistan (or Bangladesh) forge a representative, effective polity when one of its three branches of governance functions undaunted, and unchallenged, by the existence of the other two? Not likely. Yet Zia's legacy continues ten years after his death. It continues because a militocracy does not quickly or easily reform itself. Moreover, his successors have been handicapped. The first premiership of Benazir Bhutto was so marred by programmatic contradictions and political opposition that her mere survival became more important than any moves to establish a fairer, more durable polity. Her successor Nawaz Sharif concerned himself with pleasing conservative supporters and military interest groups; he never ventured to intervene in the judicial process. While the Shari'Ah Ordinance of 1988 was never enacted,[206] the Federal Shari'At Court introduced by Zia continues to function under his successors, including Benazir Bhutto, during her second term in office as prime minister, and now Nawaz Sharif in his second term. One must note the evident good will of some of justices sitting in the Federal Shari'At Court, but the court as a whole still stops short of functioning as an independent judiciary. In its present form it makes democracy in Pakistan a distant rather than an imminent prospect.

The focus on women's status through the Shah Bano case goes to the heart of many issues raised in the age of Islamic fundamentalism. It is often said—and with considerable truth—that the early Islamic movement effected a revolution in the status of Arab women.[207] Muslim norms provided new rights for women, within limits. The Qur'an makes explicit that male and female believers alike inherit Paradise. In all matters of faith women are, as Stowasser aptly notes, "the spiritual and sexual equals of men."[208] Stipulations concerning divorce and inheritance law also mark an advance over prior practices, and even the oft-cited permission for Muslim men to take up to four wives is hedged with restrictions (Q.4:3: "If you fear that you will not do justice, then marry only one."). Throughout most periods of history Muslim wives have been accorded provisions of justice, even while dependent on their husbands to interpret of what is meant by justice. For Islam, like all premodern societies, remained patriarchal in its norms and values. The Qur'an, like the Torah, the Bible, and the Vedas, mirrors those patriarchal standards. Men count twice as much as women in giving legal testimony, and it is incumbent on men to maintain women, with proportionately greater responsibilities in public matters (Q.4:34).

Reading the Qur'an in tandem with early Islamic history remains, for Muslims, both an act of piety and an interpretive challenge. How does one respond in successive eras to divine revelation? Is submission to the will of God best accomplished by conforming to the patterns of earlier epochs? Or does one have to search anew for the spirit of God’s directive and Muhammad’s example and try to apply their guidance to today’s challenges? In South Asia, as elsewhere, such questions have been raised with insistent urgency in the modern period. Nineteenth- and early- twentieth-century reformers like Sayyid Ahmad Khan and Amir Ali argued that the spirit of Qur’an and hadith alike required the Muslim community to participate in an ongoing effort to improve the social status of women. Contemporary Muslim writers, such as the late Fazlur Rahman, have followed in the same tradition.[209] Despite the controversy of such efforts, no one can escape the question posed by the foremost twentieth-century intellectual from Muslim South Asia. For the poet-philosopher Muhammad Iqbal that question was: can Islamic law, including its provisions for women, develop and change or not? His own answer was an unflinching “Yes.” “I have no doubt,” he wrote in his most famous theological essay, “that a deeper study of the enormous legal literature of Islam is sure to rid the modern critic of the superficial opinion that the Law of Islam is stationary and incapable of development.”[210] And the principle of development rested, above all, on the practice of ijtihad as a vehicle for returning to authoritative sources and reexamining them in the light of present-day conditions. Iqbal’s was an unabashed reformist voice.

Yet those who oppose Iqbal and all other reformist voices argue that there is no going back, except by way of emulating, without change, the example of earlier generations. For such Muslims, adherence to Islamic tradition, understood as a network of practices ordained by prior custom, becomes the benchmark of Islamic identity, over and against the military, economic, and intellectual power of non-Muslim communities. In South Asia, as elsewhere, Muslims who perceive themselves above all to be engaged in intercommunal struggles dismiss the reformist argument as an alien import: reflecting Western influence, it dilutes true Islam and debilitates its present profile. They consider loyalty to the Muslim community as primary, its core defined, above all, by willingness to subject one’s personal and family life—fully and without question—to traditional legal norms. The advocacy of such norms in a charged public forum for explicit group interests is not, however, part of Islamic tradition, and so the nontraditional advocacy of traditional norms is most often called fundamentalism or, less accurately, “neo-traditionalism.”

At present, the reformist voices have become muted, or attenuated, in public debates where Islam is invoked. It is the neotraditionalist or fundamentalist approach to Islam that dominates the intercommunal disputes of South Asia. Politicians understand the negative as well as positive force of a fundamentalist agenda and so often become its most ardent supporters. As long as reformist voices are denied equal access to both media and policy forums, they will have difficulty reshaping institutions that apply to the range of Muslim social life, including those affecting the status of women.

As a consequence, there are no Shah Banos in Pakistan. There have been none in Bangladesh. A cross-national comparison of South Asia's major states confers on the Republic of India a pivotal distinctiveness: despite its struggles with an independent judiciary, India has maintained a claim to impartial review that extends to female as well as male litigants. In Pakistan women continue to suffer from an ad hoc judicial review system that affects too few rural women, at the same time that it is subject to manipulation, rather than consultation, from the center. In Bangladesh one is confronted not only with the neglect of women's rights but also with the absence of all but a few women from any public scrutiny. In part the anonymity of Bangladeshi women is a legacy of that country's belated and brutal entry into the comity of nations, yet postcolonial independence, first from England, then from Pakistan, has not allowed an independent judiciary to emerge in Dhaka. Justice through litigation has become the expectation for a mere handful of Bangladeshis, while the continuing co-optation of the federal courts by the executive branch signals just how difficult it has become, and will remain, for Bangladeshi women to counter fundamentalist or other state-directed ideologies.

 The Future of Islamic Fundamentalism

In recent decades the emphasis of scholars, journalists, and policy makers alike has been almost exclusively on Islamic fundamentalism. The result has been a deficit in understanding the actual nature of Muslim social and cultural values in the modern period. For there is no concerted, uniform movement called Islamic fundamentalism. It varies due to many factors, and after situating it within a broader historical context, we must still examine specific local contexts. The beginning of each of its several manifestations must be ratcheted to specific regions, its ideologues traced to specific countries and then sorted out into specific classes, and specific groups of men and women. At the same time, one must examine the limits of fundamentalism, to gauge why its appeal is not greater and for what reasons the largest number of pious, observant Muslims remain nonfundamentalist in their outlook as also in their behavior.

It is too easy to follow the opposite course. One can read numerous statements from leading Muslim thinkers and from EuroAmerican analysts attesting both to the unity of the Islamic world and to its exceptionalism. All Muslims think alike, we are told, and no one else thinks as they do. While Muslims, from the time of the Prophet Muhammad, have been enjoined to function as one community, the foundational ideal has not become a sustainable reality: Muslims have failed to cohere as a single, cohesive group, either politically or ideologically. Their failure is no worse than that of Jews, divided into three major and other minor sects for more than a hundred years, and Christians, likewise divided and subdivided into numerous competing sects since the Reformation. Why, then, should we be surprised that Muslims have failed to obtain either a structural coherence or a creedal/ritual/juridical uniformity? In premodern times there were already Muslim sects, not merely the familiar Sunni-Shi<i faultline but myriad internal divisions within both Sunni and Shi<i communities. More importantly, in modern times sectarian divisions have been surpassed by national ideologies of Islamic identity. Some have tried to suggest that since World War II the major difference is between Islamic states and Muslim states, the latter resting on demographic indices, the former on dedication to a uniform religious culture. But this distinction is moot, for it belies an underlying common function of both Islamic and Muslim states: both states define Islam for their citizens rather than acknowledging an independent or polyphonous source of religious authority. The major characteristic of all modern-day Muslim societies is the centralized authority exercised by the state on behalf of whichever form of Islam best suits its rulers. As one scholar has noted about the profile of statist Islam:

<quote>

This rise of “officialized,” government-supported forms of Islam and Islamic ideologies is ... one of the most important developments of Islam in Muslim countries since the mid-century. The government itself benefits from this “officialized” version of Islam because it gives a religious legitimation to the state and its politics, however hard they may be on the population. But this “officialized” Islam inevitably evokes responses among the population, including political and religious opponents of the established regime, and these will also be expressed in terms of Islam. As soon as the centralization of state power leads to particular state supported definitions of Islam, its opponents will develop alternative definitions such as one finds in Islamist circles all over the present-day Muslim world.[211]

</quote>

This point can be expanded. Not only does the state define Islam, but its definition competes with the definition of other Muslim nation-states. Hence the irony that all Muslims, while clinging to ideals of collective solidarity, live within Muslim nation-states that compete with one another. Most were created since World War II, often by colonial administration and imperial diplomacy. As independent nation-states they must compete with one another, for, though free from direct foreign rule, they remain separated from the political and social loyalties that characterize their Muslim neighbors. No new state has disappeared (despite the further partition of Pakistan in 1971 with the creation of Bangladesh, and despite the 1990 Iraqi invasion that placed Kuwait’s future at risk). Nor have any two states combined, though several attempts were made both by Nasser of Egypt and later by Qaddafi of Libya. Why, we might ask, should Muslim nation-states combine? Could anyone imagine Canada, the United States, and Mexico becoming federated as the Union of American States? As preposterous as that scheme sounds, even more preposterous would be the suggestion that such a federation is mandated on religious grounds, since the majority population of all three is Christian! Yet a parallel suggestion is regularly put forth by those who look at the Muslim world. “Aha!” they exclaim: “The hold of their religion on them is stronger than ours on us. They can unite against us, and we must fear their collective hostility.”

This fear would be dismissable if made only by Serbian nationalists trying to cow their Muslim neighbors, as it was in the early 1990s, or by Jewish settlers seeking to curtail a Palestinian presence in West Bank and Gaza. But it is also made by many respectable American academic and foreign policy pundits. It is given credibility because some Muslim leaders, such as Muammar Qaddafi and Saddam Hussein, deliberately play on such fears. Yet the discerning observer must remember time and again to separate the rhetoric from the reality, the ideals proclaiming unity from the institutions, especially the nation-state, mandating competition. Islam is no different from Judaism or Christianity. Living in a world of compromise, it cannot meet either the goals of founding figures or the ideals of present-day spokesmen.

A related and equally important rule of thumb is to ask: Whose Islam? Whose Islamic revivalism? Or whose Islamic fundamentalism? Is it Arabs or Persians, Africans or Asians who are drawing attention to Islam? Is it those in power or those seeking power? Is it men or women or teenagers? The greatest problem for the best informed non-Muslims, even when they are sincere and well-intentioned, is the absence of acquaintance with real-life Muslims. The only Muslims who are known to most Europeans are Muslims from abroad living either as expatriates or as temporary laborers in their midst. Such Muslims are refugees from the economic, and often also the political, climate in their country of origin. Though concerned about their distant coreligionists, these refugees do not inevitably mirror the outlook or aspirations of those back home. By contrast, in the United States there exist both emigre and indigenous, or African American, Muslims. Despite their small numbers (less than two million[212]), they are no less heterogeneous than Protestant or Catholic or Jewish Americans. They consist of immigrants from Middle Eastern, African, and Asian Muslim nations as well as indigenous converts.

Neither Americans nor Europeans have cause to fear the growth of self-confident Muslim communities in their midst. The great difficulty is to separate the Muslims represented—and too often misrepresented—in the media from the Muslims resident next door. To acknowledge diversity is the first step toward placing Islamic fundamentalism in its proper perspective, and replacing a negative image of Islam with a proper vision of its norms and values. Europeans, like Americans, should learn more about real-life Muslims. Few of them resemble the feared Muslim fanatic or his gun-toting accomplices or his veiled female companions.[213] And indeed, one sees in the voices of Muslim modernists the continuity of an Islamic alternative to both fundamentalism and praetorian neocolonialism.

I have explored above the answers of a Muhammad Iqbal and also an ‘Ali Shari’Ati. But how does one frame their contribution, along with that of Izetbegovic and other Muslim modernists? To do so with any hope of interpretive, cross-cultural affirmation, one must introduce a category that does not limit God to the mosque, the school, the court, or the seat of government. One must find a new word that demotes religion and politics alike from their current prestige ranking. In English the most suitable word might be “mentality” or “world view.” It eschews a kind of linguistic reductionism by admitting the role of imagination and historical change. It also collates the givenness of key ideas and values with the equally important property of adopting “models of behavior inherited from different traditions.”[214]

Muslim thinkers in the context of the late twentieth century who have exhibited the ability to be both traditional and modern can and do embrace elements from the Islamic past while also espousing “models of behavior” from other sources. They are not less Muslim for being adaptive. They exposit a world view or mentality that may over time generate powerful changes, even though they are largely ignored in the current debate. Among their number, in addition to Izetbegovic, Shariati, and Iqbal, one needs to add the names of Egyptian jurist ‘Ali ‘Abd ar-Raziq, Algerian semiotician Mohammed Arkoun,[215] and Sudanese exegete Mahmoud Taha.[216]

Though ‘Ali ‘Abd ar-Raziq achieved fame—or rather, notoriety—in the early part of the century, the issues he raised continue to inform alternate views of Islam that inform internal debates about the profile of a distinctive Muslim world view, at least in Sunni Muslim circles. For the furor that surrounded ‘Ali ‘Abd ar-Raziq concerned the debate about the Caliphate. The Caliphate stood at the apogee of Sunni Muslim symbolic structures, just as the Imamate occupied that rung for Shi<i Muslims. And it was at the height of Ataturk’s challenge to the Caliphate that many Muslims in adjacent countriues, including India, rallied to the support of the Caliphate.[217] At the height of this debate over the Caliphate, ‘Ali ‘Abd ar-Raziq, himself a Shaykh at al-Azhar, posed to other Egyptian scholars a challenge to the very notion of political-religious symbiosis as crucial to Islamic life. His book, al-Islam wa usul al-hukm (Islam and the bases of governance), caused an uproar that led eventually to his trial and also his dismissal from the post he held at al-Azhar. As Leonard Binder has deftly shown in his extended analysis of ‘Ali ‘Abd ar-Raziq’s trial,[218] it was not easy for him to maintain his initial position, and he may have been browbeaten into reversing himself, but the notoriety of his case suggests that he went to the heart of a major issue and provided an alternative that could not be dismissed out of hand, namely, that there is a religious core to Islamic identity that may take multiple political forms, and by the same token, that there is no single political structure announced by the Prophet, perpetuated by the first three Caliphs, or sanctioned by practice in subsequent Muslim dynasties. It is the opposite of current thinking in Islamic fundamentalist circles but also in much of popular perception about the Muslim difference in religio-political norms.

Arkoun is alive and well because he forged his boldly revisionist view of Islam from Paris, not from Algiers. His is a powerful appeal to the transformative power of the Qur’an and its applicability to a range of modern issues, including equality for women and human rights for religious as well as ethnic minorities. He also privileges myth over history, suggesting that there is a narrative kernel in the Qur’an that supersedes all other markers of its revelatory impulse. The task of scholars and activists alike, in Arkoun’s view, is to separate mythic from both mythological and ideological invocations of the Qur’anic fact.[219]

One of the ironies of Arkoun’s approach is its relocation in English via translations, or references to his works in English-language theoretical works such as Binder’s Islamic Liberalism. It is ironic because Arkoun’s methodology presupposes an acquaintance with, and acceptance of, French discursive subtleties that often elude or just plain annoy English readers and Anglo-American scholars. Binder, who devotes a long section to Arkoun in his own assessment of Islamic liberalism, still has to take him to task for not accepting “either the historicity or the validity of what happened in Iran.”[220] Yet Binder misses, or chooses to avoid, the linchpin of Arkoun’s argument: that the Qur’anic myth can never be fully or adequately reappropriated at any moment in history. Every reading is also a misreading. Every truth is also a lie, and so on. Arkoun does privilege post-Enlightenment, poststructuralist methods in his assessment of the Islamic world view, but his approach merits sustained attention, despite its obtuseness for American pragmatists or their British counterparts.

Taha, on the other hand, wrote in Arabic but, like Arkoun, has achieved notoriety in his land of origin as well as in some American academic circles. A Sufi exemplar with distinctive exegetical perspectives, he evolved a way of reading the Qur'an that directly assaulted the traditional approach of most Sunni Muslim scholars. His provocation was more virulent than Arkoun's and more lethal than 'Ali 'Abd ar-Raziq's because he remained in his native Sudan. Tolerated for a time, he was subjected to a mock trial, conviction, and execution, all engineered by the then ruler of Sudan, General Numeiri, in the late 1980s. Numeiri has ceased to rule Sudan, but Taha's radical view of the Qur'an still inspires debate. Like both 'Ali 'Abd ar-Raziq and Mohammed Arkoun, he would be deemed heretical by many Muslims, and yet his legacy is to provoke a continuing debate about what comprises an authentic Muslim world view and attendant practice of Muslim norms.

By examining these and other Muslim provocateurs, one begins to see how Islam as world view does more than locate Islam beyond the ideological fray of religion and politics. It also posits Islam as a symbolic resource that has not been exhausted by its relation to Europe and to the triple process of colonialism, postcolonialism, and neocolonialism. But it also requires seeing Islam as less than a sufficient explanation for the ills or the hopes of all Muslims. Islam is but one of several variables determining the social fabric of Muslim communities in Asia, Africa, and America. It does not itself determine the dominant culture, nor does it provide the sole, or even the most adequate, ideology for protesting the disruptive qualities of the high-tech era. In such circumstances Muslims may protest with violence, but they protest as aggrieved parties on the margins of a world system that they did not create and cannot control but in which they participate and refuse not to be counted.

One would like to linger on the hope embedded in the work and vision of Izetbegovic and company. However, they represent but one stratum of modern-day Islam, and their Muslim opponents are numerous. There are also non-Muslims who continue to fear what some Muslims proclaim as the cornerstone of faith, namely, jihad. Is not jihad holy war, and is it not always to be waged against the infidel? These are frequent questions, and they need to be addressed, all the more so because new ideological challenges face the increasingly visible Muslim community of Southeast Asia. Unlike their West Asian coreligionists, Southeast Asian Muslims see their battle as economic. Recently that battle has been captioned as “Islam and Corporate Culture.” And so at the end of a book exploring Islamic diversity and underscoring the potential for accommodation in the Muslim world, it is salutary to explore both jihad and corporate culture. Jihad and corporate culture exist together in the minds of many Malay Muslims, but till now they have not been highlighted in an overview of sociocultural tensions and opportunities that face contemporary Muslims, Malay and nonMalay. The time has come to make that step.

 Conclusion: Convergent Signposts: Jihad and Corporate Culture

TWO TECHNICAL terms that circulate in the contemporary Muslim world are “jihad” and “corporate culture.” One is Arabic and has a long, contested history, mostly applied to the older Muslim regions of Africa and Asia. The other is English and has a lifetime of perhaps a decade, mostly in Southeast Asia, above all in Malaysia. It would seem incongruous to compare the two terms except that together they address the central question of this book: how do Muslim countries in the postcolonial—and now post-Cold War— era move from confrontation to accommodation?

The very word jihad connotes violence. It is most often translated into English as “holy war,” war waged against non-Muslims, a kind of Crusade in reverse. Jihad could be, and was, invoked in Muslim protests against European colonial rule, for it embodies ideology; it translates thought into action; it mobilizes the committed for a cause perceived as both just and necessary. But jihad also has a history in Islamic religion prior to the anticolonial and then nationalist movements. All proponents of jihad, whether intellectuals or politicians, are ideologues, but more importantly they are religious ideologues. For Muslims, as for others, religion and ideology merge, and during the modern or high-tech era, their merger is crucial for understanding the ambiguities of violence in an Islamic context.[221]

The same prologue informs the brief history of corporate culture as a Muslim idiom. It has no Arabic equivalent. It arises as a technical term describing the framework for competitive business in the high-tech era. The countries most renowned for their attention to corporate culture are non-Muslim industrial powers: Japan and the United States.

Yet Muslim proponents of corporate culture are now in evidence, nowhere more so than in 1990s' Malaysia. And, like proponents of jihad, they are motivated by both religion and ideology since they are intent on applying religious guidelines to the special conditions of late capitalist society in Southeast Asia.

If post-Cold War events have offered any single lesson, it is that historical antecedents do not determine the present or dictate the future: neither Muslim nation-states nor urban sectors of wageearning Muslims are bound by the premodern legacy or symbolic capital of centrist Islam. There are discrete local and global factors informing Malay expansion into what the sociologist Clive Kessler has called cultural modernity. One is corporate culture, portending the accommodation of Islamic norms and values in the once alien terrain of late capitalist economics. The other is Chinese pluralism, the networking of a specifically Chinese world view under the rubric of Confucianism, Taoism, and/or Buddhism. Like corporate culture, Chinese pluralism too has been a domain where Islam until recently has been either a minor player or a reluctant outsider.

The challenge of Chinese pluralism needs to be assessed, but only after corporate culture. For, despite its recent origins and geographic restriction, corporate culture has as much right to be considered in a Muslim context as does jihad. Muslims, like Christians and Jews, like Hindus and Buddhists and Sikhs, must be modern to survive. They are inescapably moderns because they live at a point in time best labeled the high-tech era. They experience modernity even when they do not fully embrace modernism. And one of the most radical consequences of modernity is to transform every theology or philosophy into a species of ideology that matches the requirements of the present age.

The transformation of jihad into a modern ideology has been uneven. Its accommodation to practical exigencies, while seldom admitted among Sunni theorists, is showcased among their Shi<i counterparts. Wherever one looks, whether to a “secular” Iranian ideologue such as ‘Ali Shari’Ati or a clerical theoretician such as Ayatollah Motahhari,[222] one finds Iranian Shi<is consciously reflecting on the needs of the present age, and the shifts that it requires.

Equally important, however, is the reduced attention to jihad in some quarters. While jihad may retain its rhetorical appeal in a North African, Middle Eastern, or even South Asian context, for Southeast Asians, and especially for Malay Muslims, jihad (understood as an appeal to armed struggle) has already been bypassed by the need to situate Islam in the context of international economics.[223] As the second epigraph for this volume suggests, jihad has come to mean the advocacy of social justice in a widening circle that also includes economic participation and prosperity for Muslims.

The dominant Malay accent on corporate culture seeks to locate an Islamic dimension parallel to the commercial culture of the most economically advanced countries while not reflexively imitative of them. It seeks to operate not against the G-7, the core group of high-tech, industrialized countries, but within that alternative group of nation-states clustered as the G-15, that is, South-to-South countries that have experienced rapid growth in recent years and are now pledged to support one another in trade, commerce, and industry, even while recognizing their individual and common subordination to the G-7.[224]

The example of Malaysia helps to highlight a pattern of change that may begin to appear in other Muslim nation-states in the next phase of the post-Cold War era. While some may continue to link national interests to narrowly ethnic goals (Malays against Chinese), many others are attempting to move beyond ethno-nationalism to higher collective opportunities (Malaysians among regional economic powers).

The constant theme of Malaysian public life is mobilization in economic terms for the future. While it can be directed abroad, as it is in the G-15 meetings, it may also motivate a domestic audience, specifically Malays, who have yet to attain economic prominence equivalent to their Chinese countrymen and women. The prime minister is a weathervane of new dispositions. Mahathir could not be a successful Malay politician unless he advocated a set of policies that would advance his own basic constituency within UNMO, the political party that brought him to power and remains his primary base of support. Does Mahathir always live up to his professed goals? Of course not; neither does any public figure. The larger question is whether he can maneuver the G-15 or any South-to-South alternative group to avert the Greater China identity that many see as the future for the entire region.

The question seems to have already been answered by a new and aggressive breed of image purveyors. Among their venues is the Asian Marketing column regularly featured in The Asian Wall Street Journal. For marketing people, ever alert to the power of advertising slogans, there is but one caption that fits the entire Asia-Pacific region: “Greater China.” All the region consists of growth triangles knit together under the umbrella of Greater China. Marketers take account of variant cultural traditions, such as the “globalization of the world through multinational brands, music, film, and television,” but they always defer to Greater China as the telos for the region as a whole.[225]

Malaysia, like most of Southeast Asia, lives in the shadow of Greater China. Mahathir has charted the kind of values needed if Malaysia is to achieve regional recognition. It was in his 1991 address labeled “Vision 2020” that Mahathir first launched his program for making Malaysia a fully developed country, able to strut with those countries already regarded as “developed.” Mahathir acknowledges that Malaysia has not yet reached the next level of economic recognition. The liminal status of his country partially explains why membership in the G-15 is so important to him: paralleling the G-7, it reminds those other top-rank countries that the second-rank countries cannot be ignored. It also reminds the Muslim world that no Muslim country has made it to the top: only Malaysia, along with Algeria, Egypt, Indonesia, Senegal, and Nigeria—who happen also to be members of the G-15—are possible contenders. And for there to be an Islamic difference in the Greater China Co-Prosperity Sphere, one must forge a broad-scale economic strategy that takes account of cultural difference while accenting Islamic norms.

In other words, it is the symbolism as much as the reality of Malaysia's economic achievements that are framed in Vision 2020. One much respected Malaysian academic told me: "It does not matter where Malaysia is in actual economic standings; it does matter how it projects its economic weight in geopolitical terms. A major economic heavyweight like Japan often appears to be either quiescent or subservient on global matters, while another economic giant, South Korea, has scarcely any independent foreign policy."[226]

No wonder, then, that there are few places in Malaysia today where Vision 2020 is not discussed, and when discussed, it is invariably in terms of the relatedness of values, that is, Islamic values, to economic growth. The lexical linchpin behind this bid to become globally competitive is corporate culture.

To the extent that every vision needs an ideological engine, the engine in Malaysia is IKIM, a think tank established at government initiative to project Islamic values. It is IKIM that engages Corporate Culture as both Islamic and Malay. IKIM is the acronym for the Institute of Islamic Understanding Malaysia: it parallels but turns to practical ends the work of another recently founded institution, the International Islamic University, or IIU. In trying to promote Islamic understanding, IKIM publishes a wide variety of books on specialized topics. One major new IKIM publication consists of an edited volume titled Quality and Productivity: Creating a Difference in Modern Industry and Corporations. Though the initial essays stress Islamic precedents for corporate culture, gleaned from the Qur'an, the life of the Prophet, and early Muslim history, it is a thin Islamic veneer, since no contributor claims that corporate culture emanates from either Islamic scripture or the Muslim past. Instead, the sole cross-cultural essay stands back from Malay self-absorption and lays out two variant models for economic growth. One, deriving from the United States and favoring productivity over quality, prevailed through World War II. The second, linked to Japan and opting for quality, has achieved spectacular results from the early 1950s to the present.[227]

While the narrative about corporate culture is honed to contemporary history and global economics, the narrative about jihad is the opposite. Its symbolic force is evoked from the past, especially the colonial past, with the implication that Muslims should not change in their implacable posture of enmity to the West—creedal and ideological, at the least, and, if need be, political and military as well. Economics seems to be absent, unimportant for jihad advocates.

Yet jihad does entail change. It is not the same yesterday, today, and tomorrow. And it is not the same for all Muslims. Those who contest its applicability have equal claim to being devout Muslims, whether Sunni or Shi<i, legist or Sufi in their affiliations, and they do take stock of economic as well as historical markers.

Complicating the use of jihad is the series of historical asymmetries it infers between Muslim and Christian mentalities. Concealed within these asymmetries is a series of power relations. They obscure understanding and falsify judgment unless they are brought into the open. Before leaping to the analysis of a freighted term such as jihad, we must first take account of these asymmetries and their impact on cross-cultural judgments.

One asymmetry looms over all others and has to be placed in the foreground. It is a material difference that has become the hallmark of arrogance vs. weakness. Most beneficiaries of the technical age are also citizens of the G-7. Whether European or American, we speak from a moment in world history during which Christian, or at least residually Christian, polities dominate the discourse about global hegemony. From a Muslim perspective, American and European world views are naturally, necessarily conjoined, since neither the United States nor its European allies project an agenda that depends upon, or considers, Muslim interests.

Two international crises underscore the subordination of Muslim interests and sensibilities to a homogeneous globalism. First was the publication and then hyped-up promotion of Salman Rushdie’s The Satanic Verses in the late 1980s. It was not an equal contest between competing world views. Rather, it confirmed what has been evident since World War II: Muslim sensibilities seldom register, except negatively, among Euro-American opinion setters. As one wag put it, we love to hate the Ayatollah and all his fanatic followers.

The recent Balkan conflict provided further confirmation that if Muslims count, it is only in a negative sense. In late 1995 the United States government joined NATO forces trying to broker a peace in the former Yugoslavia. Yet it was global politics, not consideration for Bosnian Muslims, that prompted the change in U.S. foreign policy, just as it is the potential for a “Muslim backlash,” not the concern for Muslim sensibilities, that prompts U.S. interest in most African or Asian countries with large Muslim populations.

Yet there will never be a “Muslim backlash,” for there is no concerted strategy among any two Muslim polities. Muslim polities are not now, nor have they ever been, a political bloc. Lame and ludicrous is the effort of polemicists like Frances Fukuyama and Samuel Huntington to portray Muslim governments as both unified and adamant in opposing the West and “Western interests.” The historian Roy Mottahedeh rightly observed that “the actual agreed-upon content of Islamic government remains very limited and, more often than not, severely disputed.”[228]

Unfortunately, advocates of Western exceptionalism outnumber historians of transnational cultural movements. West-is-Best advocates proliferate; they are not limited to politicians and policy mavens. Even American observers who seem to be culturally sensitive hit a tripwire when it comes to Islam, revealing how very “present-minded”[229] most Americans are prone to be.

In the case of Malaysia an egregious offender is James Fallows, Washington editor for The Atlantic Monthly and frequent commentator on National Public Radio. In a recent book, Fallows describes the new East Asian ascendancy in economics and increasingly in politics. He devotes a major section to Malaysia. He praises Malay commercial adventurism, yet he also contrasts Malaysia with Thailand, accenting the cultural deficit that Malaysia brings to global harmony. “Thailand is libertine,” he observes, but “most of Malaysia’s population is Muslim.”[230] In other words, libertine is the opposite of Muslim, and everything about Islam inhibits or limits. It especially limits Western influence, since “in its political tone Malaysian life has become more and more aggressively anti-Western ... in part ... due to the worldwide rise of fundamentalist Islam.”[231]

These words would be less jarring had Fallows never visited Malaysia, but in fact he spent two years in Kuala Lumpur during the 1980s. He saw what he expected to see, filtering all his impressions of Malaysia through an international media fixation with Islamic fundamentalism. So narrow is this fixation that it made all representations of Islamic loyalty seem like but another turn away from the West and toward religiously inspired acrimony or worse.

Reference to fundamentalism allows Fallows to keep Malay cultural pride at bay: as Muslims, Malays remain not only foreign but other.

Nor is Fallows’ implicit judgment his alone. It is shared by numerous highbrow global commentators. Despite other differences, the elites of Euro-America are presumed to have a common destiny: it is we who share—and also preserve—the legacy of globally diffuse, multinational capitalism. No longer Russians but Afro-Asian Muslims, elites and nonelites alike, become the other to us; they are also the lesser, because now the weaker, other.

A second asymmetry underscores, and enhances, the first asymmetry between “Christian” Euro-America and “Muslim” Afro-Asia. It is too often ignored because it addresses power as constructive rather than destructive. It interprets power as part of the potential good rather than the necessary evil that marks human existence. It is a major Muslim-Christian difference, since power, far from being alien to the first Muslims, was integral to their selfidentity. From the outset, the Prophet Muhammad and his companions had to confront power—political and military, economic and social, cultural and religious. The Qur’an, as the foundational text inscribing Muslim self-identity, projected the benefits as well as the limits of power. Qur’anic revelations addressed circumstances of social transformation, portending a better life in this world as well as the next. Both the order and content of the Qur'an became fixed as a single, unchanging scripture almost at once, even before the earliest period of Muslim expansionism. Yet Christians deferred entering the brutish world of politics, and Christian rulers only harnessed scriptural authority to the exigencies of political life after Christianity itself became a state religion. The time lag between Jesus's death and Christian rule was nearly three hundred years, with the result that ethical norms construed by the first, urban Christians did not engage Roman institutions of statecraft and warfare except oppositionally. While the Emperor Constantine did augur the constructive use of power by Christians, the interlude between Jesus's death and his conversion produced other influences—gnostic and stoic, Greek and Roman—that implicitly shaped Christian efforts to appropriate power. These same influences also complicated the subsequent strategy of Christian rulers and theorists in justifying war. Even today, in a post-Christian world tone-deaf to the ultimacy of religious values, Christian wariness of power continues to infuse public discourse in Europe and in America. It makes still more difficult a clear perception of the Muslim difference that often places jihad in the foreground.

Western Christian versus Asian Muslim—each label suggests uneasy accommodations to perceptual differences as well as historical asymmetries. What is true for jihad is also true for corporate culture. If Christians are ill at ease with power, Muslims recoil at profit. It is Europeans and, by extension, Americans who have the chief claim on developing capitalism as a world-encompassing mercantile and commercial world view. The Japanese have adopted, and now exceeded, Euro-American models of capitalist productivity and profit. Yet the word "profit" retains a negative connotation in Islamic parlance, at least to the extent that it connotes "excessive, personal gain." When corporate culture is discussed by Muslim members of the Pacific prosperity club, such as Malaysia and Indonesia, the term "profit" is frequently downplayed or else paired with "social responsibility."[232]

How, then, can one bridge the historical distance from developing to developed world? The G-15 can work for Malaysia only if it connects Malaysian interests to those of other economic powerhouses in Asia, like Indonesia and India.[233] So far the recognition by political leaders, business leaders, and trendsetting opinion makers that Malaysia belongs to the front tier and not the back tier or middle tier of nations has been slow to emerge, despite the hype in some quarters.[234]

At the same time, the risk of going too far forward too fast stalks all Malay modernizers. Profitability without social responsibility might lead Malays in Malaysia by the year 2020, if not sooner, to be crazed with material concerns and become neglectful of their rich Islamic heritage. To avert that possibility, Mahathir has seemed to pick an untainted successor, an embodiment of cultural purity and religious high-mindedness. At least many observers feel that it was for this reason that he selected, then groomed, Anwar Ibrahim, the former leader of the Islamic Students' movement, to be his deputy prime minister.[235]

But the larger lesson of the Malaysian dalliance with corporate culture may be to reinforce the autonomy of religion on the spiritual plane: religion as religion can converge with neither economics nor culture. Ideology often obscures the automony of religion since a parochial cultural view can project itself as a universal ethical norm. The stress on individual human rights within the United Nations, for instance, is not universally applied since economic rights, often translated as basic survival rights, have often been denied to marginalized countries. Consider the examples of post-1991 Iraq and Burma/Myanmar.

The opposite danger also looms large: a universal view may become projected into a parochial one, especially when the high-tech era encourages a selective reading of premodern history. Here the major victim is Islamic civilization itself. Luxuriant in the premodern period, it is now in danger of being squandered by too many nation-state orthodoxies, competing with each other, and often canceling each other out, all in the name of Allah's will and for the common good of the Muslim community.

Finally, there is the danger of appropriating a single global economic pattern or a particular political order as if it were a universal good, as if it had been sacralized by God and hence was incumbent on all believers to uphold and pursue. With reference to Islam, as to other universal religions, it needs to be said again and again: neither Islam nor Buddhism nor Christianity is a culture; the major social function of each is to criticize, and so to purify, cultures that already exist.[236]

Because religion cannot be fully harnessed to any social or economic system, believers are often faced with a painful, if inchoate, dilemma: they can talk about the existing order only in its own terms, not in a specifically religious idiom. In the case of Islam and corporate culture in Malaysia, that means abandoning the usual effort to relate a new approach to Qur'anic antecedents when the objective is not advocacy of Islamic economics but Muslim participation in global economics. Othman Alhabshi, the deputy director general of IKIM, faced just this dilemma when he wanted to address all Malaysians, and not just Malay Muslims, in his essay "Corporate Ethics in the Management of Organisations." He omitted the words Muslim and Islam and any reference to Qur'an, hadith, or shari'A, yet at the crucial point in his argument, after noting how corporations today differ from their predecessors (they are fewer in number, more transnational, at once more efficient and more aggressive, but also less accountable), he tried to define corporate ethics vs. corporate culture:

<quote>

Corporate culture is the way the corporation conducts itself. It encompasses the mission, objectives, strategies, plans, values and beliefs of a corporation. What determines corporate culture is really the mission and the set of values and beliefs that the corporation is committed to. The mission can be quite independently decided, but the objectives, strategies and plans will have to be influenced both by the mission and the values. In this fashion, one can say that corporate culture is the corporation's special way of conducting itself, whilst corporate ethics is the very thing that determines the formulation of mission, objectives, strategies, plans, programmes, etc. which is actually the corporate culture. It is in this sense that corporate ethics forms the basis for corporate culture or the principal determinant of corporate culture.[237]

</quote>

So which is it—mission subsumed under culture, or culture, meaning values and ethics, determining mission? Alhabshi, though he never cites market forces or the global economy, seems to say that value-driven perspectives can shape corporate culture no matter what the mission. Such abstract, often convoluted reasoning would be unnecessary if Alhabshi were addressing a Muslim audience, but he is trying to appeal to non-Muslims as well as to Muslims. A year earlier in the same journal he had pronounced that Islam is the way, the only way, to achieve Vision 2020.[238] He is closer to realeconomik when he detheologizes his ethical message, since the overall pattern of change in East Asia and globally suggests that the dynamics of corporate culture will continue to restrict the counterforce of value-directed ethics, however plausibly framed, however earnestly advocated.

Still another limitation emerges from Malay-Chinese relations. It is the second of two simultaneous fronts for the expansion of Islamic norms in East Asia, as Malay and Chinese come to symbolize Islam and East Asia in the near-term future. The challenge involves more than sorting out Malaysia's multiracial society on quota lines, a practice that began with the preindependence accords of 1957. Political dominance was decreed to Malays, with safeguards for Chinese, Indians, and others. But since Malays were underrepresented in professions and business, the federal constitution stipulated that they receive preferential treatment in the award of both university scholarships and business contracts.

Political maturity has been deferred in Malaysia because Malays continue to be represented in just one political party, UNMO, with PAS as the Islamic spoiler, and Chinese and Indians each having separate political parties but little effective power. For instance, in 1991 the Chinese political party, known as the Malaysian Chinese Association, proposed spending M$5 million on a Chinese cultural center. But UNMO objected to this public testimony to Chinese culture within Malaysia, and MCA had to withdraw its proposal.[239]

Mahathir has survived as prime minister of Malaysia for over fifteen years in part because he continues to recognize the potential political damage of having competing ethnic consitutencies, each ratcheting up the claims of its group against other Malays perceived as both other and rival. In mid-1995 he made still another plea for "Bangsa Malaysia," namely, for people to "identify themselves with the country, speak Bahasa Malaysia, and accept the Constitution” and ultimately remove the special bumiputra privileges that apply mainly to Muslim Malays. [240]

Yet, however Mahathir engineers the move to genuine Malay-ness, executive decisions alone will not resolve the crucial dilemma for Malay identity. Pluralism has to be grounded in civil society, as it functions parallel to, but not always in tandem with, the state and political society. Crucial questions remain: how can Chinese and Malay actually integrate? Beyond the orbit of Kuala Lumpur politics, how do other Malaysians approach the vast chasm between two world views and their civilizational antecedents? And what is to be the role of Malay women?

The tentative answer appears in two conferences with identical titles, but different subtitles, that were convened in Malaysia in 1995. Most of the papers wallowed in vague generalities, offering ad hominem testimonials on behalf of Islamic universalism without exploring how that universalism accommodates the equally persistent universalism of Chinese, most of whom are not now and never will be Muslim. With the exception of one paper (discussed below) that talked about pre-Muslim cultural values and the need for Muslims to affirm them, the presenters, all of them Muslim, relied on ex cathedra pronouncements about history or doctrine and broke no new ground. Moreover, the shift in format from the first to the second conference suggested an increasing intellectual isolationism on the part of most Muslim participants. The general tenor of the first conference, despite the sterility of most of the papers, was to promote a civilizational dialogue, but by the convening of the second conference, a bare six months later, the recurrent accent had shifted to the universality of Islam. It was as if to underscore the universality of Islam that nearly all the papers highlighted a Chinese Muslim diaspora from the People’s Republic of China to several parts of Asia. Ignored in the rush to combine Muslim and Chinese everywhere was the content of what might constitute a common Chinese-Muslim world view and set of practices. Grand appeals to the function of a Confucian rhetoric in Muslim guise, or an Islamic interpretation of the Analects of Confucius, only reinforced an incipient inclusivism.

If the above conferences do move beyond form to substance, and if the first rather than the second portends future developments, a long-term reflowering of Malayness as a composite pluralist culture is possible, and not only corporate culture but also transnational tolerance may be the outcome.

The role of women, however, is less clear. While Sisters in Islam has been functioning for over a decade from Kuala Lumpur and includes some pioneering women intellectuals in its ranks, their primary impact has come through the monograph on Qur'anic interpretation authored by an African American scholar teaching in Malaysia. Amina Wadud-Muhsin's Qur'an and Woman gives generous and deserved credit to the Malay activist Dr. Chandra Muzaffar at the same time that it provides fresh insight into the Islamic/Qur'anic view of women's roles.[241] Within Malaysia itself, however, the impact of the book seems negligible, and when a government-sponsored think tank like IKIM does write about religion as a social force, it is without women participants; rather, it is male authors who discuss not only politics, law, and economics, but also education and the family.[242]

Despite the underutilization of women in charting Vision 2020, it does not follow that the dominant future for Malays, as for other Muslims, will be to pursue the urge to cultural isolationism, confrontation, and war, as has been argued by theorists like Huntington and Fukuyama and journalists like Fallows and the anonymous contributors to The Economist.

Attention to the very construct jihad shows how subtle, yet determinative, can be the Muslim difference from Southeast Asia. It reflects an intra-Muslim struggle as much as a Muslim struggle with non-Muslim others. Consider Mahathir's reflection on the dilemma of his country vis-a-vis the Gulf War and the Balkan conflict. In both cases, Malaysia was forced to comply with the actions of the dominant Western powers. In a unipolar world, "might alone makes right," as Shaykh Fadlallah noted in his theorizations on jihad (discussed below). But Mahathir also had to voice his frustration after Iraq's defeat. On the one hand, he denounced Iraq for its greed, but on the other, he denounced "those who hold back the Muslim people and nations by drawing their attention to the next world to the neglect of duties and potentials in this world." He was, in effect, reprimanding his own constituents, Malays who remained backward not only compared with the industrial world but also with their Chinese copatriots. To them, his message was progress not procrastination. "The truth is that if Muslims cannot go after progress in this world and succeed like the non-Muslims, then there is the likelihood that they will become frustrated and eventually lose their faith in Islam. Poverty and weakness will lead to apostasy, so there shall be no hereafter for them."

Vision 2020 becomes more than a vague slogan; it holds out the sole alternative to a backward, weak Malaysia, lumped together with a backward, weak Muslim world.

Is Mahathir's vision so different from traditional jihad? His plea is for an all-out effort not with weapons and war but with brains and technology. Malaysia in 2020 should be nothing less than "an advanced nation capable of self-upliftment through the mastery of knowledge and skills," and at the same time a nation "professing high moral values and able to complete with other advanced nations in all fields."[243]

While the day for parity on a global scale has not yet arrived for Malaysia, it is possible to see how a Muslim perspective revalues both the Gulf War and the Balkan conflict. Yet it is difficult to hear either Mahathir's dissent from the Western public policy view of justice or his concomitant appeal for a Muslim perspective on global events. At the close of the twentieth century, it is the Fukuyamas and Huntingtons, together with the Fallowses and yellow press internationalists, who continue to dominate most media representation of issues that shape Islam and Muslims.

While Muslims themselves must bear some responsibility for being an absent or negative voice in the major geopolitical issues of the day, it is still necessary to note that they are victimized, along with most of the South, by the structure of international news. Not only English-language media but English-language media reflecting specifically North European-North American viewpoints dominates: 90 percent of international news comes from the standard wire-services of Europe and America. Even the Saudi purchase of United Press International will not change the nature of news, especially since the Saudis themselves are masters at the double standard of professing one set of ideals and pursuing with blinkers another, opposite value standard.[244]

More importantly, the level of debate about international issues is already remote from, and may even be seen to cover up, groundlevel realities. Few newspapers or periodicals, and no news programs on televison or radio, attend to structural disparities between the G-7 countries and the rest of the world. Instead, the Fukuyama/Huntington thesis,[245] as Chandra Muzaffar pointedly observed, has sparked a pseudo-debate. It serves as a smokescreen camouflaging the real post-1989 global crisis: the monopoly of resources, and so policy options for change, by the major advanced industrial nations, the G-7.[246]

In other words, a Muslim world power, despite the hype that such a power is to be feared by the West, is remote if not impossible, and instead countries like Malaysia must aim for limited economic progress while also holding out for “profitability with social responsibility.”[247] The twin challenge facing Malaysia and the Muslim world, in Mahathir’s words, is twofold: “to re-create a living civilization of Islam that was once dynamic and thriving, and to make a positive contribution to the predicament facing mankind.”[248] Not more Muslims but better Muslims, not a regression to fundamentalism “which tends to be preoccupied with forms and symbols, rituals and practices,”[249] but a progress to corporate culture both within and beyond the umma.

The obstacles, of course, are evident. Two loom largest: (1) Malaysia itself is politically unified but not culturally uniform. The values espoused by upwardly mobile middle-class Malays may not be shared by their coreligionists who are not urban or their countrymen who are not Muslims, namely, the significant Chinese minority and the prominent, if less numerous, Indian minority. One writer has even gone so far as to suggest that the ethic Mahathir labels as “Islamic,” implying its resonance with the universal norms of Islam, is in fact class-based, driven by Mahathir’s own authoritarian, petit bourgeois upbringing that stressed values which sound strangely Confucian or Calvinist rather than intrinsically Islamic: “diligence, thrift, striving, perseverance, self-improvement, self-reliance, and attainment.”[250] (2) The move to inscribe corporate culture as an Islamic ethos for the New Malay may be conflictual. It may represent not a step forward for Islam but a regression from Muslim norms of family loyalty and social responsibility. After all, the cornerstone of corporate culture is greed, not need. Can even skilled politicians like Mahathir or his likely successor, Anwar Ibrahim, engineer a social revolution in Malay economic thinking while also putting “fear of God” into those who engage in bribery or corruption? Bribery persists, as does corruption, though their scale and significance remain open to debate.[251]

The other side of Mahathir’s and Malaysia’s struggle to find an Islamic ethic that works in a pluralist, modernizing society is the rearguard engagement with jihad. Jihad has not disappeared, either from the historical memory or from the symbolic repertoire of Muslim societies. How can one keep in check the tendency to see the Islamic engagement with jihad as either (a) a systemic flaw of Islam as a universal religion or (b) a uniform characteristic of all Muslims in all circumstances? The only safety valve is constant vigilance, looking at Islamic norms as specific cultural constructs and the modern world as a further set of sociocultural constructs.

To the extent that jihad and corporate culture can be summarized as competing Muslim world views, they go beyond the contrasting visions of late-twentieth-century Islamic leaders, such as Ayatollah Khomeini and Mohammed Mahathir, and one needs to reevaluate jihad before claiming that it is the enemy of all progress, either in economics or in civil society.

Jihad is best approached as a multivalent category of reference within the Islamic symbol system. It is not limited to “holy war,” nor is it decisive to the Qur’an if one considers all the themes and counterthemes of that book of revelation on its own terms. It is especially important to see how jihad has itself been subject to change, from the earliest period of Muslim history to the Sunni-Shi<i appropriation of religious authority to modern-day revisionist packagings of Muslim norms and values.

It is necessary to begin with the Qur’an. A crucial principle, internal to the Qur’an, is that of abrogation (naskh). The Qur’an provides the basis for its own continuously revised interpretation (2:106, 13:37, 16:101, 22:52). God’s transcendence above human knowing, His sovereignty beyond human attempts to appropriate, and so limit, His power extends even to His final selfdisclosure in prophecy, the Qur’an. The Qur’an ended prophecy but not divine intervention in human affairs. While Muhammad lived, the book remained open; it could always be updated. With his death (in 632 C.E.), the question of leadership for his community also raised the related question: what would be the nature, and the limits, of ongoing divine intervention? Sunnis and Shi<is have responded to these twin problems in opposite ways. The Sunnis have closed the book, applying its ‘clear’ directives to juridical legislation. They have also closed ranks around a discrete set of leaders who defend the book and the will of the majority. They are caliphs, their shibboleth is order, their fear is sedition/discord/disbelief.[252] Shi<is accepted the book but often located decisive meanings within the ambiguous or allegorical verses (3:7), at the same time that they posited a continuing source of oral revelation in a set of leaders who are related to the Prophet Muhammad both by kinship and by piety. They are imams, their shibboleth is justice, their fear is tyranny/oppression/disbelief.

While belief in the Qur’an and rejection of disbelief are traits common to both Sunni and Shi<i Muslims, that commonality does not allow the construction of a theory of either just war or revolution that would lump them together under one umbrella rubric labeled “The Muslim View of Jihad.” Rather, acknowledging difference as basic to any sociology of Islam, we must pursue an alternate strategy. We must nuance discussion of jihad, first by recognizing it as a leitmotif of Islamic ideology, and second by exploring its variant expressions among Sunni and Shi<i theorists as well as Sunni and Shi<i activists.

Especially marked is the Shi’ite difference. For Imami or 12er Shi’is, who comprise the majority of the Shi’ite community, jihad is not indefinitely deferred, nor is it held in abeyance till the return of the hidden Imam. Jihad is constantly extolled. And it can be waged not only by the hidden Imam but by one who has been chosen by the Imam, an individual whose scholarship and piety ensures that he has been commissioned by the Imam, that is, a Shi’i cleric. And also, the enemy against whom jihad must be waged is not merely the outsider “infidel” or non-Muslim. It is also those Muslims who have not accepted true Islam. Since true Islam can only be Imami Shi’i Islam, there are many enemies who are other “Muslims.” As one student of the classical Imami juridical sources has noted, the classification of enemy encompasses “the entire hateful Sunni world, a world held responsible for all the harassment and persecution to which the Shi’is were subjected throughout the ages.”[253]

While the legal position of Imami jurists has seldom translated into day-to-day action, it is foolhardy, as well as wrong, to deny that there is a Shi<i difference on the issue of “holy war” in Islam. The Shi‘i difference is not only real, it is also pervasive. To highlight that difference and bring it into discussion at the level that it merits, we will explore the best known, and least understood, Sunni and Shi‘i cases.

The textbook Sunni case for jihad comes from the dissident group in Egypt (also named al-Jihad), which not only plotted against the pharaoh but killed him. President Sadat fell to assassin bullets in October 1981. Those who killed him invoked jihad as their cause; an ideologue who supported the same cause wrote a short tract titled al-Farida al-Gha’iba (The missing precept), which pointedly referred to jihad. Both the group and its ideology have been the subject of intensive scrutiny from many quarters. They have also spawned look-alike groups in other dissident circles of the current skewed political system called the Middle East.[254] Yet none of the vast, and still growing, literature about them challenges the above conclusions: Jihad does not succeed in mobilizing an ideology that could replace the modern nation-state with an alternate polity. Those who advocate jihad have been reduced to the role of terrorists even when, as in the case of the Palestinian Jihad group and also Hamas, they are counterrevolutionaries struggling to reclaim a national homeland.

The anachronism of jihad-type groups may be seen from the fate of those who have attempted to fulfill the vision inspiring Sadat’s assassins. Those who invoke jihad have neither mass support nor the military firepower to challenge the omnipresent, and nearly omnipotent, Egyptian security forces. And why does jihad no longer generate popular appeal nor pose a threat to nation-state polities in the Sunni Muslim world? Fouad Ajami, himself a scholar turned news analyst, has provided an answer at once simple and grim. Jihad advocates function as terrorists, with all the hope and fear that the enterprise of terrorism evokes. Yet “when terrorism becomes commonplace ... it can be accepted. What begins as a challenge to the state ends up confirming its rationality.... The state is said to be (by its custodians, by its many, many spokespersons) the only dike against great upheaval and disorder [read: fitna]. This is a game that all states play; this also happens to be a game at which the Egyptian state is particularly skilled."[255] And it is a game that they continue to play relentlessly in the mid-1990s. When Egyptian terrorists, stifled at home, bombed the Egyptian embassy in Islamabad, the bodies of "martyrs" were brought home to a state-sponsored funeral that featured loud outcries against the tyranny of terrorists. In other words, the state continues to make clear to doubtful outsiders, and also protesting insiders, that "it is the only dike against fitna."

While further eruptions of jihad-coded violence will take place in the Sunni Muslim world, they will be minor irritations rather than large-scale threats to the authoritarian regimes who continue to control all the instruments of state power, not only military and political, not only social and economic, but also religious and ideological. "There is substantial evidence," notes the historian Emmanuel Sivan, "of a long-standing and conscious effort on the part of territorial states to create a network of symbol-laden, stylized and repetitive social activities to define a meaningful focus of group loyalty, i.e., the national entity." As a result, Sunni fundamentalists "seem quite pessimistic as to their own chances. Most of their work takes place in the private sphere (e.g., in mosques that are privately-owned and not state-controlled, or in voluntary and welfare associations). They see the public sphere dominated by the state and its 'secular religion.' "[256]

At the same time, there has been an attempt at broad-scale revisionism on the meaning of jihad among the proponents of a modern Sunni world view. Chief among them is Muhammad Shahrur, a Syrian engineer turned Qur'anic exegete. In his most recent book of essays, Dirasat Islamiyat Mu'Asirat (fi dawlah wal-mujtama<) (Contemporary Islamic studies of the state and society), Shahrur argues that the first meaning of jihad is to defend freedom of belief and to oppose compulsion in religion. It then becomes extended to include protection of a community by those who uphold freedom of belief, along with other rights, and it is always directed against tyranny (<unf). While Shahrur's views are not shared by all Syrian scholars, especially those who view with contempt any nonspecialist advocating a new approach to Qur'anic interpretation, his is a weather vane of critical inquiry, and it opens up possibilities worthy of future exploration. [257]

Among Shi<i Muslims, however, there has already emerged a different canon for measuring state power and also for projecting the ideological role of jihad. The Shi<i difference might be summarized with reference to a major contemporary Iranian theorist on jihad, coupled with a unique ethnographic account of jihad from a regional, rural Iranian perspective. Both help to inform not only the Shi<i-Sunni distinction on “holy war” but also the new invocation of jihad as struggle by Mahathir in Southeast Asia.

The theoretician whose writings seem most apt is Ayatollah Mortaza Motahhari, discussed in an earlier chapter for his approach to the roles of Muslim women. Motahhari was among the foremost Iranian clerics, a man whom Khomeini once described as “the fruit of my life” and “a part of my flesh.” Although he was killed in 1979 at the outset of the Iranian Revolution, his numerous speeches, articles, and pamphlets are still widely quoted, and several, including a small pamphlet titled Jihad: The Holy War of Islam and Its Legitimacy in the Quran, have been translated into English. The pamphlet itself sorts out into a series of four lectures, all of which were delivered in the early 1960s, long before the Iranian Revolution and probably as part of a monthly debating colloquium (guftar-i mah), attended by secularists as well as clerics. We are less concerned to look at the Qur’anic justifications for jihad that Motahhari adduces than to delineate what stands out as an approach at once distinctively Shi<ite in method and characteristically modern in tone. Distinctively Shi<ite is the subtlety of exegetical techniques, so subtle that an entire lecture (#4) is dedicated to the question of abrogated verses. In Motahhari’s view, abrogation requires always interpreting the unconditional as the conditional, so that a general injunction about jihad (e.g., 9:73 “O Prophet! Fight the kuffar [disbelievers] and hypocrites and be stern against them) must be qualified by the following, more complete aya (2:190): “And fight in the path of God with those who are fighting with you and do not transgress, God loves not those who transgress.” While Sunni fuqaha or jurists use a variety of hadiths or Prophetic traditions to justify what would be called jus in bello, Motahhari is able to set forth specific guidelines solely with reference to an inferential reading of Surah 2:190. In his view, the only enemy to be opposed are soldiers on the battlefield, and even then only after they have been declared transgressors.[258]

Jihad, for Motahhari, is always defensive. Aggression is an absolute, unmitigated evil. He excoriates aggression yet quickly adds “all war, on all sides, is not always aggression. War can be aggression but it can also be a reply to aggression, for sometimes the reply to aggression must be given by force.”[259] Since only defensive war is justified, one is obliged to delineate what it is that must be defended. On this point, again using the exegetical principle of interpreting the unconditional through the conditional, Motahhari reasons that all oppressed Muslims can be defended, including and especially the Palestinians. “We may be in a situation,” he suggests, whereby a party has not transgressed against us but has committed some type of injustice against a group from another people, who may be Muslims, or who may be non-Muslims. If they are Muslims—like today’s plight of the Palestinians who have been exiled from their homes, whose wealth has been seized, who have been subjected to all kinds of transgression—while, for the moment, the transgressor has no intentions against us, is it permissible for us in such circumstances to hurry to the help of those oppressed Muslims and deliver them or is this not permissible? Certainly [it is].”[260]

<quote>

</quote>

If defensive war can be justified on behalf of the Palestinians, it can also be cast in a still larger frame of reference. It is one thing to fight against transgression that afflicts one’s rights as an individual or a tribe or a nation. While such assertion of self-defense is justified, there is a still higher form of defense. According to Motahhari,

<quote>

There exists something superior to the rights of the individual or nation. Something more holy, more sacred, the defense of which in accordance to the human conscience is higher than the defense of individual rights. And that something is the rights of humanity. [He goes on to detail what is meant by such rights, and then concludes]. I do not think that anyone has any doubts that the holiest form of jihad and the holiest form of war is that which is fought in defense of humanity and of humanity’s rights.

</quote>

Such a paean to idealism demands a practical illustration of its feasibility, and Motahhari goes on to provide it:

<quote>

During the period in which the Algerians were at war with the French colonialists, a group of Europeans helped them in their war and the jihad of such people was holier than the jihad of the Algerians, because the Algerians were defending the cause of their own rights, while the cause of the others was more ethical and more sacred than that of the Algerians.[261]

</quote>

In short, any group of people who are fighting for freedom of belief or freedom of thought deserves support from outsiders, and those who offer such support, even if they be non-Muslims supporting other non-Muslims, are waging the greatest jihad, a jihad on behalf of the universal rights of humanity.

Few contemporary Muslim ideologues rival Motahhari in expanding and redefining jihad. Within a Shi<i frame of reference, one might be the renowned spokesperson for the Shi<i community of southern Lebanon, Shaykh Muhammad Husain Fadlallah. Shaykh Fadlallah underscores the feasibility of jihad as a kind of da<wa. Unlike classical jurists, he argues that da<wa or calling the world to Islam cannot be implemented apart from jihad. For Shaykh Fadlallah, jihad is always dynamic, always interactive; it is not, in the absence of the Hidden Imam, restricted to reactive or defensive strategies. In Foucauldian terms, Shaykh Fadlallah asserts that power (quwwa) is the generic, foundational quality of human life. The major question becomes how to relate the universal urge to secure power in a distinctly Islamic framework. His response is to affirm jihad as a subcategory of quwwa that is also inseparable from da<wa. Jihad is both required and legalized by the Islamic need for power.[262] Unlike Motahhari, however, Shaykh Fadlallah does not project the scope of jihad beyond the boundaries of the Muslim community (Dar al-Islam), nor does he suggest that non-Muslims can wage jihad, including the best of all jihads, which is the jihad waged on behalf of humankind.

If Motahhari remains the foremost Shi<i theorist on jihad, the imaginative thrust of his rhetoric has thus far not translated into ground-level tactical successes for the Islamic Republic of Iran. Instead, there has emerged a practical reexamination of jihad precisely because of its widespread invocation to justify not just waging the war against Iraq but using very young, untrained combatants to face a professional army furnished with modern weapons, both legal and illegal. Iranian reactions to the jihad against Iraq provide us with a unique case instance about Muslim resort to “holy war.” The official justification for conducting a war that in the end claimed more than a million lives, most of them Iranian youth, was the necessary struggle between Islam and blasphemy. Ayatollah Khomeini was masterful in shaping the discourse of debate in terms of category differences that seemed airtight and inflexible. In speech after speech throughout the 1980s, he forced his internal adversaries to oppose not only the war but also God, Islam, and the Prophet Muhammad as well as the glorious revolution and its fruit, the Islamic Republic of Iran. “The war between Iran and the Iraqi Baathis,” he onced declared, “ is the war between Islam and infidelity, between the Qur’an and atheism.”[263]

If opposition to the Iran-Iraq War was deemed both blasphemous and traitorous, it nonetheless managed to surface. It surfaced especially in families whose children became martyrs to God’s cause. Some of these voices of dissent have been narrated by an Austrian anthropologist, Reinhold Loeffler. In an extraordinary book, Islam in Practice: Religious Beliefs in a Persian Village, Loeffler provides numerous interviews he conducted in a village of southern Iran. There he distilled poignant voices of outrage against the dominant ideology of the Islamic Republic of Iran. Some of his informants criticized the regime largely in secular terms, such as the following:

<quote>

Now, young men with no proper training go to the front and are senselessly killed. I don’t believe they are martyrs going to paradise. Who knows how many young men have been killed. If there had been a strong army, as there was under the Shah, this would not have happened. Also, when this reverend sir came to power, he immediately started to attack the whole world, made everybody his enemy. He should first have set the affairs of the country right, and then, like the Prophet, worked to gradually establish Islam and to create an example of true Islamic life. Then the world would have said, “Look, how truly human that society is,” and come toward Islam all by itself.[264]

</quote>

But others faulted Khomeini for identifying too closely with the Last Imam:

<quote>

He also claims to be the representative of the Last Imam, that is, that he came to prepare the way for the coming of the Last Imam. I know this cannot be true because the Last Imam himself does not know when God will order him to come. [The speaker goes on to enumerate what he perceives to be Khomeini’s principal shortcomings, e.g., his flamboyance, haughtiness and vengefulness. But what most distances Khomeini from “the great ones,” in his view, is lack of compassion.] Finally, the prophets and Imams were kind and compassionate. Before his final battle the Imam Husayn exempted his followers from the obligation of jihad so that they might save their lives. Khomeini, however, pitilessly incites people to go to their deaths. All these things showed and show that his claims are unjustified. He is not what he pretends to be.[265]

</quote>

Hardest for many Iranians were those moments when family members quarreled among themselves about whether or not the Iran-Iraq War was a holy war. A father-son dispute went like this:

<quote>

My son now is telling me about the true Islam; they have to fight a holy war (he says) and of necessity get killed. I tell him there is no holy war in the absence of the Last Imam. He shouts at me saying I do not understand a thing. These young ones are like unfledged birds. When they try to fly, they fall from the tree and a cat eats them. They cannot discern the right road. I tell him to stay out of everything, to mind his own business, and do his studies; it’s not the right time. But he won’t listen. He will get hurt.[266]

</quote>

The bitterest lament of all conjoins despair about the war dead with betrayal of the deepest ideals of Shi<ism, to strive for justice, which is to say, freedom and humanity:

<quote>

Some of the clergy wore their garb to gather people around themselves and make them devoted to themselves. But they did not pursue the essence of religion, that is, freedom and humanity. The Imam Husayn whom they are flaunting so much now—again only outwardly, not in truth—fought for that freedom and humanity and in this struggle sacrificed himself and his family. The Muharram celebration should be a remembrance of this and a reminder for us to follow his order to do the same, that is, not to submit to oppression but to fight it. But the mullahs never taught us that They were right when they called for a revolution against the Shah because he was an oppressor. But I don’t think that this was a real revolution. The clergy do not allow it that those basic principles, freedom and humanity, become established. In the past it was repression by the Shah, now it is repression by the clergy.

</quote>

<quote>

They refuse to stop this war in which our young men are being killed for no reason. They simply tell them that if they get killed, they will go to paradise.

This is a very cheap thing to say. Is there a proof of it? Of course we believe in the after-world. But in a matter of such gravity, when thousands and thousands of young men are sent to their deaths in this belief, one should have especially strong evidence. We are seeing what is going on and we know they are telling lies, but we cannot say it. If we open up our mouths, they shut them by force. Like our former landlords, they have gathered a bunch of illiterate youngsters around themselves by giving them much more money than they could otherwise earn and telling them to suppress us.[267]

</quote>

These are admittedly random voices, taken from but one village by a single anthropologist. They do not include women’s voices, nor do they record the same voice over a span of years, except in rare instances. Yet the sample is reflective of a range of popular sentiments about the Islamic Republic of Iran and its rulers. It demonstrates that despite an elaborate mobilization campaign by the government, as well as efforts both material and symbolic either to accommodate bereaved families or to force compliance with the war effort, many Iranians doubted the “divine-demonic” nature of the Iran-Iraq War; they resisted its classification as a “holy war.”

Perhaps even more significant for the future of the Islamic Republic of Iran is the way in which the very concept of jihad has been expanded to include a social, and also an economic, rather than a purely military or political dimension. While complaints are rife about how badly some members of the clerical leadership have handled their political responsibilities since 1979, one also reads about the extensive efforts to bring social justice to Iranian villages. Jihad Sazendegi was created in 1979 as a grass-roots movement to bring rural Iran into the modern age. Despite the promise of the White Revolution under the shah, rural Iran remained a symbol of bureaucratic incompetence, compounded by royal neglect. The task of Jihad Sazendegi was to construct rural roads, electric lines, portable water systems, sewerage systems, schools, mosques, and health clinics. The pace of improvements was slowed down by the eight year Iran-Iraq War, but by 1990, according to official sources, 50,000 kilometers of rural roads had been built, more than 10,000 villages provided clean water, and almost 5,000 new village schools built.[268] One could quickly add that the urban poor, the so-called mostazafin, did not fare as well under the Islamic Republic of Iran, yet the government has tried to cope with the worst urban areas, at the same time that it has maintained its level of rural development. In both urban and rural arenas the notion of jihad is central to mobilizing public interest, and grassroots involvement. Economic jihad, admittedly less glamorous and less dangerous than military jihad, remains a high priority for post-1989 Iran.

* * * * *

From the above examples of jihad “holy war,” it becomes clear that the rhetoric of “holy war” changes its relevance in the actual circumstances of Muslim polities past and present. Above all, one cannot trace just war theory in an Islamic context without first delineating differences between Sunni and Shi<i norms. For Sunni Muslims, the invocation of jihad is framed by the hegemonic strictures of the modern nation-state. No rival group within the boundaries of a majoritarian Muslim country has the power to wage war on a transregional, much less international, scale. Jihad has become little more than a pejorative codeword for random protest against excesses committed by the regime in power.

For Shi<i Muslims, the situation seems to be more favorable, at least initially. One nation-state has adopted an explicit religious ideology and under the guise of jihad has waged war over a protracted period of time, with great cost of life and pain to the families of both martyrs and survivors. That nation, of course, is the Islamic Republic of Iran. The war it waged for eight years was against the avowedly secular, Ba’Athist regime of Iraq. Yet the jihad invoked in the name of Islam by Ayatollah Khomeini failed to attain its goals. The atheist opponent was not defeated, nor was the hated enemy deposed. Even had Iranian forces been militarily successful, there would have been many devout Shi<is who would have continued to question the appropriateness of such a war: can there be any invocation of jihad in the absence of the Hidden Imam? Can anyone, even a learned, pious cleric, convince others that he has been designated as the Hidden Imam’s vicar? For many, especially illiterate or semiliterate Iranian peasants, the answer to that question was and remains “No”!

While jihad retains its symbolic valence as more than a battle cry for both Sunni and Shi<i Muslims, the major mobilizing cry for Shi<is remains the call to justice, symbolized by the injustice perpetrated against Husayn on the plain of Karbala, Iraq, in the late seventh century. One may reasonably doubt that the pragmatic limits to political/military jihad will curtail or deplete the spiritual elan that motivates those for whom history has still to disclose the will of a just God.[269]

If there is to be a sequel to jingoistic jihad, it may well be the alternative force of corporate culture. In the case of Malaysia, corporate culture proposes to forsake military zeal for another, more difficult battle: parity on the playing fields of free-market capitalism. In casting Mahathir as a negative voice for the future of cooperative internationalism, Fallows emphasizes two themes, both of which he ascribes unflinchingly to Mahathir: anti-Westernism and opposition to individual rights.[270] In fact, the outlook of Mahathir is more complex. It is not to reject democracy or individual rights but rather to accent the impossibility of any shift in Malaysia's status unless and until the country as a whole attains economic prowess at the global level. Whatever his shortcomings, he has tried to lead through his own example, warding off the inevitable suspicion that he would be prone to the kind of nepotism widely recognized as inextricable with Suharto and his key cohorts in neighboring Indonesia. Personal integrity, sacrifice, hard work— all are part of the image that Mahathir nurtures and projects. But he is well aware that Malays will be leery of his intentions to the extent that they have progressed less than the Chinese during the accelerated economic growth of the early 1990s. Relative to their own past Malays have already made substantial gains. Many of the younger professional class may dare to hope that under a slogan of "corporate culture with Islamic values," they will be carried to a new level of prosperity unknown to Malays of the past.

Perhaps urban Malays, who are fond of talking about Malaysia as a model for other Muslim countries, can in this one area at least devise a product worth exporting: economic jihad, the advocacy of a modern Islamic profile that combines commerce with compassion. The alternatives are grim: either a failed experiment in modernization in one of the Asian Muslim countries best poised to succeed in the Pacific century, or else an economic success story that has a Muslim patina but no Islamic core, one scarred by personal greed and self-interest rather than ennobled by a collective will committed to decency and decorum at home, justice and persistence abroad.

What seems to be more important in terms of Malaysia and Southeast Asian Islam generally is to see the multivalence of jihad as a concept that can apply to the East as well as to the West. The overwhelming rhetoric remains Islam vs. the West. But what is equally necessary is a jihad in the East, one that asserts the Islamic dimension to East Asian prosperity, not by showing how Islam is almost the same as Confucianism but rather how an Islamic difference can provide pluralism with a moral edge that includes the welfare of all and not merely the advocacy of Muslim superiority. That task has barely begun, but it is most evident in the report of a Singaporan Muslim on the cultural benefits of non-Muslims in the Greater China sphere.

Unlike others, who talk only in vague generalities about what it means to be Muslim and Malay, Riduan Wu Chia Chung Ibn Abdullah argues that the cultural values, the family structure, and the lifestyles, including dress and eating habits, of Chinese Malaysians are not inferior to those of their Muslim Malay neighbors and political rulers. He even goes so far as to list what are acceptable Muslim approaches to Chinese ritual celebrations: Chinese New Year—yes; Qing Ming (visitation of ancestral graves)—qualified yes (don't worship them); Festival of the Hungry Ghosts—no (implies a consumer society in Hell, which is outside the bounds of acceptable Muslim belief); Funeral rites—yes; Tea Ceremony— yes. In short, he advocates an elastic practice of Islam, especially by Chinese converts to Islam, and encourages "Muslims (whether Chinese or otherwise) to attend traditional ceremonies as a mark of respect for the living and the dead while also avoiding participation in the rituals of ancestor worship that compromise Allah's Unity and Uniqueness."[271]

Even if one does not accept all the directives of Riduan Wu Chia, he has identified in graphic terms the ways that Muslim and nonMuslim values can elide in South-east Asia.

What has not yet been done is to probe the notion of jihad to the East in terms that anticipate the future of Islam as a global community embedded in an Asian as well as a non-Asian context. Jihad to the East needs to be embraced as a project where Southeast Asian Muslims can and should play a distinctive role in the future, even before 2020.

And it will have its most pivotal expression not in Malay or Chinese but in English. Why? Because whatever the outcome of Vision 2020, it is, like many dreams in Malaysia, couched in English. Mahathir was criticized in early 1994 for announcing that in university-level curricula scientific and technical subjects could be taught in English. English is a residue of the colonial experience, but it is also Malaysia's bridge to the competitive world of free-market capitalism where its leaders have pledged to make every effort to succeed. Those who protested the move to make English a science language felt that Malay would be threatened, but Prabhasa Malay has now taken deep roots in both the Chinese and Malay communities. Mahathir's was a shrewd move to keep Malaysia's cherished educational system competitive with its regional, and also global, rivals.

Mahathir also garners additional attention because of his own proclivity to speak in English. It is sometimes joked about Mahathir that he knows, and uses, English better than he does Prabhasa Malay. Throughout Southeast Asia those from countries where British colonial rule prevailed have tended to make sure that English became the language of international preference, at least for ruling elites. Their preference has prevailed during the postcolonial period. Yet, of the three ASEAN leaders who speak English—Mahathir in Malaysia, Lee in Singapore, and Ramos in the Philippines—Mahathir is the only one who is a Muslim, a Muslim representing a secular state in which Islam is the official religion.

Not only for Malays but also for other Muslims, the future may yet belong to those who learn to wage economic jihad in English. There will still be competition and confrontation; some things do not change. Yet the terms of engagement will have shifted: accommodation more than violence will be the preferred outcome for Muslims as for non-Muslims.

[1] A paraphrase from Dr. Tawfik Abdullah, dinner conversation in Jakarta, Indonesia, 12 May 1983.

[2] I am alluding to a 1990s version of the scare book genre. It comes from “an internationally recognized scholar in the field of comparative religions, the cults and the occult.” Robert Morey has written more than twenty popular books. His favorite targets begin with M: Mormons, Masons, and now Muslims. In The Islamic Invasion: Confronting the World’s Fastest Growing Religion (Eugene, Ore.: Harvest House, 1992), Morey ridicules both Islam and Muslims. His chief premise is at once simplistic and antagonistic: Islam is but “a form of cultural imperialism in which the religion and culture of seventh-century Arabia have been raised to the status of divine law” (19). Distortions, half-truths, and innuendos abound, yet the book continues to be adopted as a required text in some college-level religion courses.

[3] Elaine Sciolino, “Seeing Green etc.” The New York Times Week in Review, 21 January 1996. The bait-and-switch tone of this essay only reinforces the popular fixation on “political Islam” as the major issue, displacing concerns with other dimensions of Islamic culture and contemporary history.

[4] Again the book by Morey is representative of a spate of books that reduce Islam in America to “the Black Muslim Movement,” and the history of that movement since 1975, when Elijah Muhammad died, to the provocations of Louis Farrakhan (172–173). No mention is made of Elijah Muhammad’s son and principal successor, Warith D. Muhammad, who happens to be both a “moderate” Muslim and a Republican!

[5] For the larger picture of Bosnia, we now at last have a competent, nonpartisan history that calls into question most journalistic assessments and foreign policy initiatives. See Noel Malcolm, Bosnia: A Short History (New York: New York University Press, 1994), esp. 218–22 on Alija Izetbgovic. The best journalistic account remains Roy Gutmann, Witness to Genocide (New York: Macmillan, 1993), while a masterful documentary overview, calling into sharp question the Balkan peace process, has been provided by Rabia Ali and Lawrence Lifschultz. Why Bosnia? Writings on the Balkan War (Stoney Creek: The Pamphleteer's Press, 1993).

[6] Frances Fukuyama, The End of History and the Last Man (New York: Free Press, 1992), and Samuel P. Huntington, "The Clash of Civilizations?" Foreign Affairs 72.3 (Summer 1993): 22–49. Both authors presume that the Cold War ended a major phase in modern history, and both also project Euro-American triumphalism as the logical outcome of post-1989 global capitalism. Huntington's essay, in particular, has drawn a lot of criticism, and among the most trenchant is Roy P. Mottahedeh, "The Clash of Civilizations: an Islamicist's Critique," Harvard Middle Eastern and Islamic Review 2.2 (1996): 1–26. Mottahedeh, rather than simply deriding his Harvard colleague for rampant essentialism and pseudoargumentation, calls attention to the need for broader discussion of what shapes, and also limits, "large transnational cultural entities"(24).

[7] Anonymous, "The Shape of the World: The Nation-State is Dead, Long Live the Nation-State," The Economist 23 (Dec. 95–5 Jan. 96): 17–18.

[8] See Bruce Kapferer, "Nationalist Ideology and a Comparative Anthropology," Ethnos 54. 3–4 (1991): 161–99.

[9] I have exposed the limits to this kind of thinking elsewhere, in Defenders of God: The Fundamentalist Revolt against the Modern Age (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1989), 91–95.

[10] Sadik al-Azm, “Islamic Fundamentalism Reconsidered,” South Asia Bulletin 13.1 & 2 (1993): 95.

[11] Robert Segal, “Joachim Wach and the History of Religions,” Religious Studies Review 20.3 (July 1994): 200.

[12] Gayatri Spivak, “Postcoloniality and Its Implications for Cultural Studies,” plenary speech delivered at the 1988 convention of the Modern Language Association in San Francisco.

[13] Jose Casanova. Public Religions in the Modern World (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1994): 166.

[14] I take the term “perspectivist” from Steven Lukes, “Relativism in its Place,” in Martin Hollis and Steven Lukes, eds., Rationality and Relativism (Cambridge: MIT Press, 1982), 298–305, though I disagree with Lukes that perspectivism can have only a weak form (deferring to actors’ perspectives) or a strong form (acknowledging the interpreter’s perspective). Lukes follows too closely Said’s dictum, quoted at the end of his essay: “the student must feel he or she is answerable to and in uncoercive contact with the culture or people being studied” (305). This is a false criterion of authentic scholarship, since students will always decide what represents the culture being studied (elite or popular, textual or nontextual sources) and also which people (certainly not all the people) studied they will hold themselves accountable to. My perspectivism announces that freedom and tolerance, understood as cultural pluralism and religious multicreedalism, are decisive. One may say either that they finally do matter (weak form) or that they, and they alone, count as universal desiderata (strong form).

[15] Daniel Pick, War Machine: The Rationalisation of Slaughter in the Modern Age (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1993), 158.

[16] On the overlapping relationship of missions and missionaries with the larger colonial project of reorienting colonized subjects, see especially the evocative case study by Johannes Fabian, Language and Colonial Power: The Appropriation of Swahili in the Former Belgian Congo 1880–1938 (New York: Cambridge University Press, 1986).

[17] Izetbegovic, Islam between East and West (Indianapolis: American Trust Publications, 1984), 175.

[18] Izetbegovic here identifies religion with “weak religion,” or purely spiritual religion as identified by some Western, specifically Christian, authors. His project is to retain the applicability of the ideal while modifying the practice of Islam as a religion of harmony or balance between the spiritual and secular domains.

[19] Ibid., 180–81.

[20] Benedict Anderson, Imagined Communities: Reflections on the Origin and Spread of Nationalism (London: Verso, 1983), 116–40.

[21] Lawrence, Defenders of God, 83–87.

